The extent to which one enjoys this album all depends on how one thinks of Bob Dylan. If his songs are an incorruptible force that could never be covered in this universe, then this album will be like a root-canal. If it seems like a travesty that anyone would even try to emulate Dylan's vocal styling and persona, then this album will be painful. But if one sees Dylan as the kind of musician who can be covered as long as it is done with great respect, then this album is an example of a well-done, yet complicated soundtrack to a carefully composed film.

Allie Roth can be reached at allie.roth@gmail.com

"I'M NOT THERE" SOUNDTRACK
COLUMBIA RECORDS
4/5

Pinette takes on lines, salad and skiing during live skit

PINETTE from page 7

my luggage. I had a 42-minute flight from Los Angeles to San Jose, and they lost my bags for three days. And they always say, 'we're so sorry' but they're not. So, I finally called them up on the third day and said, 'I'm going to stand outside of your corporate headquarters in a thong with a sign that says 'this is all I have left to wear because I flew American. There was someone at my door within the hour."

Pinette's set was taken from his "I'm Starvin'" special, and he revolved the jokes around the two cruises he had performed on over the last few years on the current tour. Every set-up went off on a tangent but returned to the cruises.

All of his usual targets took abuse.

Lines – "I hate lines…but people have questions. I've waited in food lines so long that I've ordered takeout. 'Yeah, I'm at 264 Arlington,' 'that's us sir,' 'I know, I'm in line."

Salad – "Salad is not food. Salad is a promissory note that food will soon arrive."

Skiing – "I went skiing with friends in New Hampshire, now I don't ski, but apparently after five shots of tequila I think I can ski. You would think that knowing that I can't ski my friends would take me to the bunny slope…no. They took me to the top of mount-son-of-a-b*. And they bought me a white ski suit. White doesn't flatter me; I looked like an avalanche. When I crashed, kids surrounded me."

Pinette finished and received a standing ovation. After a minute, he grabbed the mic again and said, "I forgot a couple," and continued with an encore.

"I would be remised if I didn't talk about the Boston Chinese buffet," he started. "I lived by a Chinese buffet…well it's why I moved there…and after a week there was a picture of me with a slash through it on the wall. The manager would come out and say to me (in a Chinese accent) "no buffet for you! It been four hour! It all you can eat but not forever!"

Pinette ended to a second standing ovation, and the packed house left satisfied.

Ryan McAskill can be reached at rmcaskil@student.umass.edu.

Pinette's set was taken from his special "I'm Starvin'." The skit revolves around two cruises that the comedian had performed on over the past couple of years.

The Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media presents
The Art of Non-Fiction Storytelling featuring

FRIDAY NIGHT LIGHTS
H.G. "Buzz" Bissinger
Pulitzer-Prize winning author of Friday Night Lights, A Prayer for the City, and Three Night in August. Shotgun Lockhart, and Joy Inside the Mind of a Manager
Wednesday, November 14, 2007
Cape Cod Lounge
University of Massachusetts Amherst
7-8:30 p.m.
6:15 pizza and booksigning reception
Funded by David '79 and Teena Kantor
...part of the Journalism Program Enhancement Program. Please ask your professor how you can gain extra credit for attending.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT
REGISTRATION FOR SPRING 2007
The WRITING PROGRAM PLACEMENT TEST
Will be offered on:
Thursday, October 25, @ 7:00 pm, Herter 217
Wednesday, November 14, @7:00 pm, Herter 217
Monday, December 3, @ 7:00 pm, Herter 217
This test is the pre-requisite for enrollment in EnglWrit 112, (College Writing).
This test may be taken only once.
Students do not need to register for the test.

Accelerated Culinary Arts Certificate Program

THE CULINARY INSTITUTE OF AMERICA
Raise the Bar on Your Career Possibilities
Increase the Marketability of Your Bachelor's Degree in Hospitality and Tourism Management, Food Science, or Nutrition
In just 30 weeks of cooking, studying wine, developing menus, and exploring culinary trends, you will:
• Gain new skills and insight into culinary techniques, ingredients, and cuisines
• Heighten your ability to work with chefs and lead a culinary operation
• Learn in an inspiring setting in the heart of America's wine country
Program Dates:
July 21, 2008–March 12, 2009
Space is limited, so apply now!
Applications are due May 1, 2008.
www.ciaprochef.com/acap
707-967-2496
The Culinary Institute of America at Greystone
Napa Valley, California
The CIA at Greystone is a branch of the CIA, Hyde Park, NY

NOV 13 2007

Lawrence leads UM

FOOTBALL from page 14

ception by safety Michael Meggett. The 9-yard run gave UMass a 10-0 lead and came just minutes after place-kicker Chris Koepplin connected on a 51-yard field goal, tying for the second longest in school history.

UNH had success moving the ball in the second quarter, cutting the lead to 10-7 on a 13-play, 71-yard drive that resulted in a 1-yard touchdown run by Chad Kackert. The drive appeared to end on fourth-and-2 at the UMass 14, when Santos was stuffed at the line. Much of the 14,190 fans on hand began to roar but were quickly silenced as Santos kept his feet moving and pushed the pile enough for the first down.

The Wildcats had another long drive (11 plays, 67 yards) at the end of the quarter, but place-kicker Tom Manning missed a 37-yard field goal attempt to tie the game as time expired in the first half.

UMass opened the third quarter, continuously handing the ball off to Lawrence, resulting in the 17-7 lead. Coen threw just once on the drive, an 8-yard pass to tight end Ian Jorgensen. But it was a historic completion for Coen, giving him enough yards to eclipse Todd Bankhead's school record of 7,018 career passing yards. Coen, a redshirt junior, finished the game with 7,133 yards in his career.

"I usually don't really care about those kinds of things, but it was a little bit more special with the win today," Coen said. "It's really special to do something like that with the group of guys that we have and on a day like today."

While Coen and Lawrence led the way on offense, just about everyone made big plays on defense. Both safeties – Jeromy Miles and Meggett – had interceptions, with Miles' coming in the end zone on the game's opening drive. UMass recorded 13 tackles for loss, and eight different players contributed in sacking Santos, even though the conference leader in sacks, David Burris, wasn't one of them. Michael Hanson had two.

The UMass defense also contained Santos on the ground, gaining just 28 yards on his 10 rushing attempts. With the eight sacks, the senior quarterback officially ran the ball 18 times for negative 25 yards. He was 27-of-40 passing, with 221 yards and the two interceptions. Kackert had just nine carries for 30 yards, and the team finished with 44 net yards rushing. UMass had 204.

"Michael Hanson told me he wanted to send the seniors out with a bang, and everybody came together today," linebacker Charles Walker said. "We gave [Santos] a host of looks, a potpourri of blitzes today and just came from every angle."

The Minutemen increased the lead to 24-7 on their next drive after Lawrence's second touchdown, this time on a 21-yard pass from Coen to Michael Omar. Koepplin added his second field goal in the fourth quarter to cap the scoring at 27-7.

The Wildcats had two opportunities in the first quarter to take the lead, but failed to convert both times. The first was the interception by Miles in the end zone on the opening series of the game. The second came when UNH's Justin Wright blocked a Brett Arnold punt, giving the Wildcats possession on the UMass 14-yard line. A 7-yard loss on a reverse and a 9-yard loss on a sack prompted UNH coach Sean McDonnell to punt the ball, rather than try for a 46-yard field goal against the wind.

Notes

Lawrence was awarded the 22nd annual Hall Knight Trophy after the game, which is given to the game's most valuable player … The Wildcats dropped from No. 14 to No. 20 with the loss, while the Minutemen stayed at No. 8 in The Sports Network Cy poll … UMass backup tailback Tony Nelson had 65 yards on 11 carries … The Minutemen attempted a fake field goal in the second quarter, but holder – and backup quarterback Scott Woodward – couldn't connect with Jorgensen in the end zone. It was a 10-7 game at the time, and the field goal would have been from 31-yards out into the wind … UMass dominated in time of possession in the second half, holding the ball for nearly 20 minutes … UNH wide receiver Keith LeVan had nine receptions for 100 yards … UMass was penalized eight times for 80 yards.

Eli Rosenzweig can be reached at erosenzw@student.umass.edu

Burris, Hanson pressure QB Santos, restrict UNH offense

RICE from page 14

Defensive end Michael Hanson sacked Santos on consecutive plays at the end of the first half, forcing a field goal attempt as time expired. The kick went wide right. Hanson was simply adding to the spectacular season he is having opposite senior David Burris.

Burris gets most of the credit as the Minutemen's premier pass rusher, but Hanson has been unstoppable at times. And even more so than Burris, Hanson has made big plays at pivotal points in the game. For example; his fourth-down sack of Jake Phillips at the end of the game against William & Mary.

"Coach kept throwing them plays and giving them different looks," Hanson said. "We really caused chaos on [Santos'] reads. We came from everywhere."

However, the pair of defensive ends, along with the linebacking corps of Jason Hatchell, Charles Walker, George Byrd and Josh Jennings proved to be the difference in Saturday's game, as Santos simply had no time to pass the ball, while Coen sat comfortably in the pocket provided by his offensive line.

"We just came from everywhere. We had a host of looks and gave them a potpourri of blitzes today," Walker mused.

Coen finally became the all-time leader passer in UMass history, a mark he was expected to reach last week at URI. He said it was special to clinch the division on the same day as he broke the record, and once again pointed out how well protected he was throughout the game.

"I can't do it without those guys up front," Coen said. "I didn't get touched. It was ridiculous."

Santos had no such luck. He was hit on first down, hit on second down, hit on third and left the field on fourth simply glad he couldn't get hit again.

The last two meeting between UMass and UNH were close games by scores of 28-20 and 24-17. UMass held up its end of the bargain with 27 this time around, but the Wildcats were stifled time and time again by the UMass defense.

The eight sacks were spread around, too. Hanson led the team with two sacks, while backup linebacker Cesar Rosario earned one-and-a-half. Walker, Jennings and defensive tackle Kyle Harrington recorded one sack each. Byrd and cornerback Courtney Robinson chipped in with half a sack each.

Santos' totals, 27-for-40, 221 yards, no scores and two interceptions, doesn't tell the whole story. He would have attempted at least a dozen more passes if he wasn't dropped for a sack or forced to scramble. He ran 10 times, gaining 28 yards but lost 53 on the eight sacks for a net loss of 25.

The Minutemen have one more regular season game at Hofstra this Saturday. UMass leads the conference in sacks with 33. The next closest team – Richmond – with 26). Hofstra has allowed 24 this season, tied for fourth-worst in the conference.

Burris and Hanson are No. 1 and 2 in the CAA with nine and seven sacks, respectively. In order to knock off the Minutemen and keep their postseason hopes alive, the Pride will need to do what the Wildcats couldn't – protect their quarterback, Bryan Savage, because you know the Minutemen will be coming after him.

Jeremy Rice is the Collegian's sports editor. He can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Penalty corners the difference

FIELD HOCKEY from page 14

UConn (22-2-0, 5-1 Big East) responded less than a minute later. Lizzy Peijs worked the ball through traffic and into the circle. She found Katie Semanoff who blasted a shot to Becky Letourneau's left to even the score at one.

After that goal, UConn took control of the game. The Huskies were awarded a penalty corner and took advantage of the opportunity. Lindsay Leck inserted the ball to Lauren Aird who took a shot but had it blocked. She followed the play and got her own rebound and scored to give her 11 goals this season.

UConn went into halftime with a 2-1 lead and never looked back. The Huskies started the second half with consecutive penalty corners. Leck inserted the ball, and Kristen Galuski put a shot on net that Letourneau saved. Peijs found the rebound and tried to score, but Letourneau made another save.

Leck inserted the ball again on another UConn penalty corner. Peijs fielded the ball, but Letourneau stopped her shot. Melissa Gonzalez was there to pick up the rebound and scored her ninth goal for the Huskies to put them up 3-1.

The trio of Leck, Aird and Peijs struck again when UConn was awarded its third penalty corner of the half. Leck inserted to Aird who found an open Peijs. Peijs cranked a shot that found the back of the net to give UConn a 4-1 lead. It was her team-leading 16th goal.

Despite the loss, UMass coach Justine Sowry remained optimistic after the game.

"I'm just thoroughly thrilled to have coached this young group of women. I'm very proud of our efforts all season and in particular today," she said.

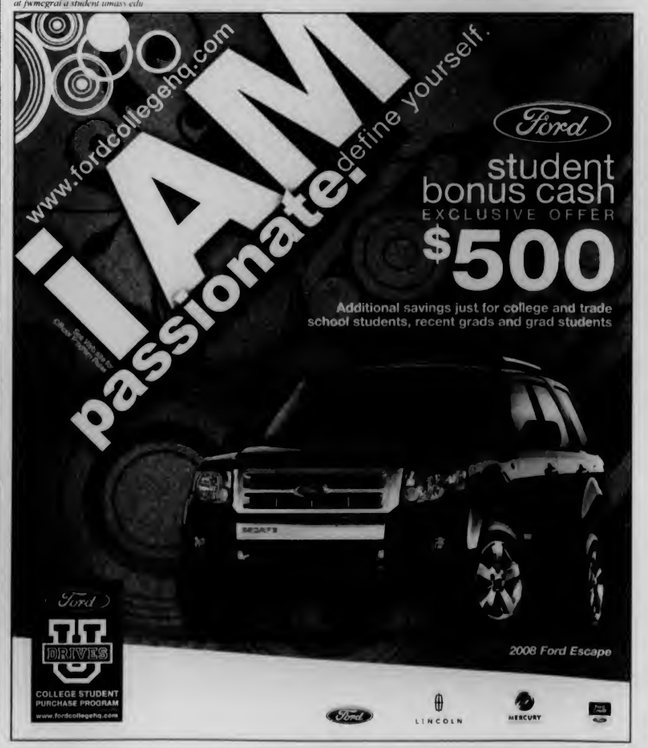
Sowry complimented the Huskies by saying that they are a very skillful team and that they have numerous quality players who execute well on the offensive side of the ball.

She also talked about some of the highs and lows of the game, mentioning that her team played well defensively and thought they pressed well on defense. She also said that the Minutewomen had a hard time moving the ball, specifically down the right side of the field. She also felt that UConn caught some lucky breaks during the game.

"There [are] plays were some bounces of the ball that didn't go our way that they were able to capitalize on. [The ball] just happened to bounce their way, and that finished the game off," Sowry said.

Sowry also talked about the future of the team. She said that she was proud of the seniors who worked hard all year and that they were a big part in rebuilding the team and the program at UMass.

Though they lost in the opening round, the Minutewomen were proud that they made it to the tournament and won their first conference championship in seven years.



Justin McGrail can be reached at jwmcgrail@student.umass.edu

One of seven seniors, midfielder Kara Murphy played her final game for the Minutewomen Saturday – a 4-1 loss to UConn in the first round of the 2007 NCAA Tournament in Storrs, Conn.

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Kickoff's Youth Drawing for free games, tickets
Students Enter drawing for fun-filled Fan Bag!
FREE
Networking Breakfast
for
Students, Faculty, Staff, Alumni
Wednesday, November 14
8:30 - 10:30 a.m.
Memorial Hall
Sponsored by the UMass Amherst Alumni Association and Brueggers Bagels of Amherst
(Limited to first 250 people)
BRUEGGER'S BAKED FRESH

Results you can feel.
• headaches • neck pain
• back pain • sports injuries
• auto injuries • carpal tunnel
Dr. Lee Kane
Chiropractor
Participating provider for HMO's student insurance, Blue Cross, GIC, car insurance & most others www.AmherstFamilyChiro.com
Amherst Family Chiropractic
Center for Natural Health
228 Triangle Street
Amherst, MA
(near Bertucci's)
549-1500

Speeding to victory

Mass Attack uses quickness on the ice to outplay opponents

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — The Massachusetts hockey team's 5-3 defeat of Boston University Friday night was the first time UMass defeated the Terriers since the 2003-04 season.

The victory was also a demonstration of what UMass coach Don Cahoon wants his team to be this season – fast.

A healthy dose of young, speedy skaters in the 2007-08 freshman class has transformed this team from a trapping, conservative hockey squad to an aggressive, relentless skating team that can score with any line.

The transformation has coincided with the addition of Will Ortiz last year and Cory Quirk and Chris Davis in the year before. And it was on display inside Agganis Arena Friday night.

"One of our biggest improvements is our ability to skate," coach Jack Parker said after the game. "We tried to create a lot of foot races and make it a game of speed. You can't do that for 60 minutes because the game shifts gears, but when we had the opportunity to use our speed against their physical strength, we thought that would help us, and at times tonight, that was the case."

Each of the Mass Attack's five goals on the night was the result of puck movement and quick work on the skates. Even P.J. Fenton's empty-netter at the end was an example, where he outran two BU defensemen before throwing the puck in the net.

UMass scored two power play goals, one in the first period and one in the third. Both were scored on the first shift of the man advantage. Mike Kostka's power play goal in the first was scored 45 seconds into Zach Cohen's slashing minor and Chase Langeraap's tally in the third came just 15 seconds after Eric Gryba was called for hooking.

They happened in the same fashion. Beat the opponent to the corner, dig the puck out to the point, find an open man with a lane to shoot in, fire it home.

"They really undressed us down low on the power play, and we had no answer. We were just standing around, watching," BU coach Jack Parker said after the game.

It wasn't just on the power play, though. Chris Bevis' goal that gave UMass its first lead was created by Davis' hustle into the corner. Though it appeared the smaller UMass forwards were getting muscled around by the larger BU defensemen, they were winning the footraces to the puck, and it produced scoring opportunities.

Davis was the first man to the puck in the right corner. He dug it out and fed Justin Braun at the top of the right faceoff circle. Braun quickly found Bevis, and Bevis quickly found the net.

The third goal was Langeraap's power play score. It began with a quick move by Janies Marcou to get the puck on net. BU goaltender Brett Bennett pulled himself out of position try to react in time, and Langeraap picked up the garbage goal in a scrum in front of the net.

"Our penalty-killing units tonight were inept," Parker said. "A lot of it had to do with how well [UMass] was executing, but we were skating in sand when we were killing penalties."

The Terriers may have actually looked like they were skating in sand compared to the speedier UMass forwards, who moved with ease around the BU skaters.

Ortiz's goal mid-way through the third was much the same, simply plenty of hustle. Justin Braun took a shot from the blue line that bounced away from Bennett. By the time the puck was back in open ice, Ortiz was already there. He one-timed it back on goal to notch the eventual game-winner.

The Minutemen are quickly becoming a threat every week in the Hockey East landscape, evidenced by last year's NCAA tourney run, but they won't be muscling past anyone in the standings.

They will just skate right past you.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

UM earns three league points

HOCKEY from page 1

As the puck skidded over to Ortiz, he didn't hesitate, immediately sending it on net. Sophomore goaltender Brett Bennett, screened by the group of players in front of him, reacted poorly, and the puck hit the net before he reacted.

"It's good to get a game-winner, but it's more important that we got the 'W,'" Ortiz said after the game.

The goal resulted from UMass coach Don Cahoon's demand that his team continue to get more shots on net. Two of UMass's goals came from shots at the point that found their way through Bennett and the BU defense.

"I think we've done a pretty good job of getting pucks on net. We got a few good chances because of it in the overtime tonight," Cahoon said after Saturday's draw with the River Hawks. "Earlier in the season, we weren't delivering the puck."

Down 1-0, after senior Pete MacArthur beat freshman goaltender Paul Dainton 33 seconds in the game, senior captain Mike Kostka held the puck at the top of the zone with Zach Cohen in the penalty box for slashing. He wristed a shot on net, that found its way through Bennett's legs. Initially, it looked like freshman Chase Langeraap deflected the puck past Bennett; although he missed it, he drew Bennett's attention long enough to keep Bennett's five-hole open. Langeraap and Marcou received assists on the play.

UMass dominated the rest of the period, but Bennett kept his team in the game with a series of great saves, including a pair on shots from Quirk. In a 4-on-4 situation, Quirk beat a pair of BU defenders and skated in alone on Bennett. Rather than try to beat him by taking left or right, Quirk wristed a shot from 15 feet that Bennett knocked away easily. Minutes later, Quirk came from behind the net and tried to stuff a shot by Bennett. The goaltender held his ground though and kicked the shot away with his left pad.

The score remained 1-1 until Topher Bevis followed Kostka's model at the 16:55 mark of the period and fired a shot on on Bennett that sailed into the net. The score was Bevis' first goal of the season and first since March 4, 2006. Braun and Chris Davis received assists on the play.

Davis earned three assists on the two games over the weekend, including a pair in the tie at UMI.

After the teams traded goals in the opening period, Fenton skated out of the UMass zone and hit Davis streaking along the left board. Davis seamlessly brought in the pass, Braun trailed the play and flew into the zone forcing a 2-on-1. Davis fired through the UMI defender, and Braun caught it in stride and flipped it past UMI's Nevin Hamilton.

Hamilton made 39 saves on the night including three in overtime to maintain the tie. Kory Falite gave the River Hawks a 3-2 lead at 5:17 of the period. Falite scored two goals on the night. Marcou's tying goal came exactly four minutes after Falite beat Dainton.

Dainton made 25 saves on the night but struggled to control rebound-filled long shots. The second UMI goal scored by Mike Pelegrew came when Dainton let the rebound from Ryan Blair shot get away from him.

"I could see the puck fine. The defense was letting me see the puck but tonight I was fighting it," Dainton said. "The puck came in, but hit off my toe and went right back out there.

"Some of it has to do with [the defense not clearing the puck]. But most of the time, I have to take full blame for those goals. It's only something I'll have to work on in practice."

Notes

The win over BU came on the ice ever contest between the two in which UMass was ranked and was not … UMass was ranked both the USCHO.com Men's Poll and the USA Today Hockey Magazine Men's Hockey Poll before the game … BU and the #1 UMI … Sophomore defenseman Martin Sidler returned from a four-game absence with a lower-body injury … Sophomore center Brian Strait returned from a four-game absence with a lower-body injury … Ortiz has scored a goal in four consecutive games … Senior Matt Burtis's four-game scoring streak ended against BU on Friday.

Joe Mahoney can be reached at jmahoney@student.umass.edu.

Seniors key for UMass in '07 campaign

SENIORS from page 11

She also contributed on offense, scoring the game-winning goal against Richmond on Oct. 21 and also scored in a 2-0 win over La Salle on Oct. 7.

Sowry's successful first season in Amherst won her A-10 Coach of the Year and much of that was due to the senior class.

"Anything is possible with hard work, and players who are willing to work hard from this senior group," Sowry said. "Me coming in, they could have gone either way, but they have been the catalyst for the turnaround. I owe so much to that senior group for moving the program forward."

In addition to the three senior defenders, the Minutewomen will also lose midfielder Kara Murphy, forward Rachael Mervine and starting goalkeeper Becky Letourneau.

Murphy scored three goals and three assists, while adding experience to the midfield line. Mervine had an assist and provided a spark off the bench when she did not start.

After losing her job to sophomore Sarah Williams last season, Letourneau eventually won the starting job this year after a couple weeks of alternating goalies. Letourneau finished the season with a 10-7 record and improved her save percentage, going from .579 in 2006 to .777.

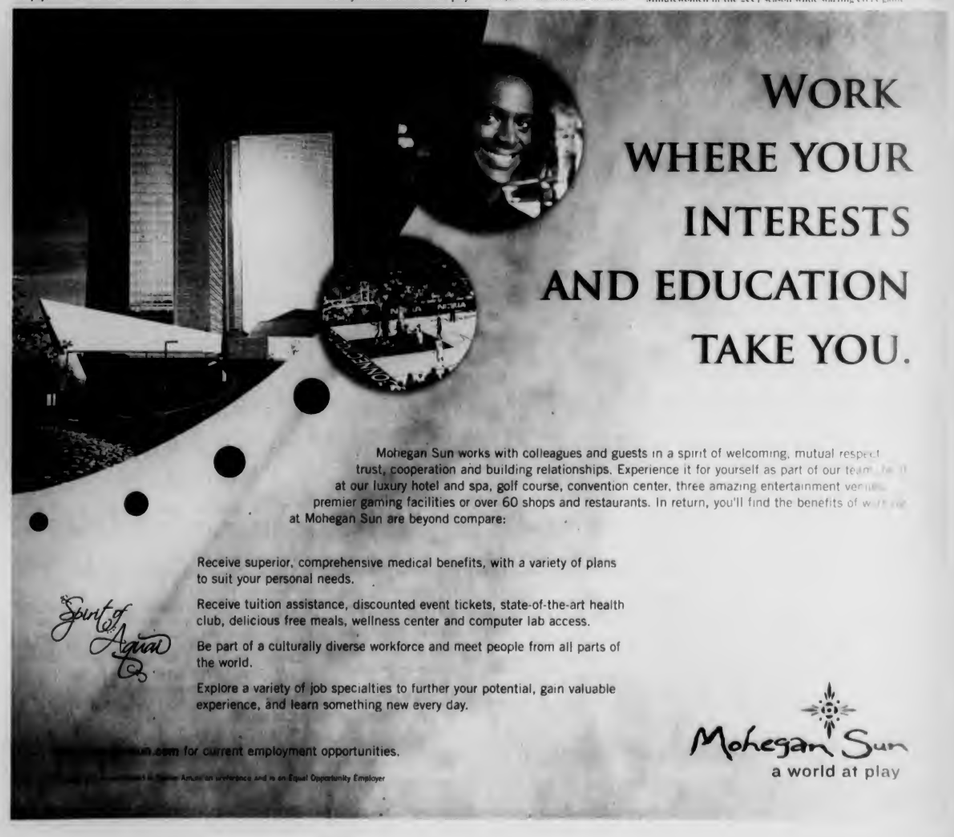
Williams played well in 2007, but she suffered an injury. Letourneau's success gave Sowry no reason to make changes. Williams will be a key component in 2008, as she is the only non-senior goalkeeper currently on the roster.

O'Brien leaves UMass with an impressive field hockey record. She was named a Division I Senior All-Star by the National Field Hockey Coaches Association, started all four years in Amherst and captained the UMass defense this season. O'Brien also led the backfield vocally and rarely was beat by opponents.

"I think our program's back on a very positive track, and to have been a part of that is very rewarding," she said.

DoRosario also started each year since she's been in Amherst. She immediately stepped in after sitting out a year under NCAA transfer ruler and was rewarded for her play by being named the A-10 Tournament's Most Outstanding Player.

For the program to continue moving in the right direction, Sowry will have to find players who are capable of replacing the senior defenders. Freshmen Christina Dzwill and Courtney Mayerick are the only two players on the roster listed as defenders, and they combined to see less than one minute of game action this season. Even if these two start next year, there will still be one defensive slot to fill, so Sowry will need to recruit defenders or make some position changes.



"We do belong here [NCAA tournament], and this is going to be our goal from every season here on out."

After her 14 win debut season, it's hard to doubt Sowry's ability to find a way to win again in 2008, but it's going to take a lot of work, as well as the team "having the belief" that their coach so often stressed this season.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

Junior midfielder Marc Shea registered three assists in six Minutewomen in the 2007 season while starting every game.

NOV 13 2007

UMass wins season opener

Five players score at least ten points for Maroon and White

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team got its 2007-08 season off to a good start Friday night as it squeaked by Vermont 69-68 in the season opener.

Junior guard Sakera Young nailed two critical free throws with four seconds remaining, consequently making the Catamounts' two-pointer with no time on the clock irrelevant.

Also, Pam Rosanio passed the 1,000 career points mark. The senior guard entered the game 12 points away from the feat. In the midst of a career-high 25-point performance, she became the 16th player to ever achieve the milestone when she drained a 3-pointer with 17:11 left. Before the game resumed, UMass coach Marnie Dacko called a timeout so Rosanio could take a photo for posterity at halfcourt.

When the final horn sounded, three Minutewomen – Rosanio, senior Kate Mills and junior Stephanie Gerardot – had finished the day with 10 or more points.

Rosanio, in addition to going 10-16 in reaching the career milestone, notched seven assists and stole two passes. She also tied Vermont's Alissa Sheftic for the most rebounds in the game, with nine. She managed to pull down one offensively and eight defensively.

Mills, the Maroon and White's leading scorer last year, amassed 12 points, going 6-for-11 from the floor. On top of registering three boards, two assists and two steals, the forward recorded a deuce in an area of her specialty – blocked shots.

UMass	69
Vermont	68

Gerardot subbed in and out throughout the game and went 4-for-6, to finish with 10 points. She also got a steal and grabbed three rebounds.

Dacko said she was pleased to come away with a "W," adding that it was a good start to what she thinks will be a very tough season schedule. She said, however, that the game revealed some areas the Minutewomen need to improve upon.

"I'm happy with the win – we shot 44 percent from the floor. But I think we tried too hard. We were traveling. I mean, how many games do you have that you've got eight travel calls? So, that's an indication to me that we're just trying too hard. I think it was the nervous jitters," Dacko said. "We've got to find ourselves. We've got to find the personality and settle in and just come out and expect to win."

She said her team was tested by Vermont, which came out shooting in the first half, scoring the game's first five points in the initial 35 seconds.

Dacko said the Catamounts were as tough an opponent as she was expecting going into the game.

"[Vermont's] tough. They're a gritty team," Dacko said. "They played well. They got the ball in their scorers' hands. And their second efforts – they killed us on the boards. They played really hard."

After the first few minutes of Vermont dominance, the game's score seesawed back and forth for the remaining ones. Regardless of who was leading, the point difference never exceeded five points.

UMass found itself on top 67-66 with 2:48 left when the game entered a nerve-racking final two minutes.

With 1:47 remaining, Rosanio fouled out of the game and was subbed out for senior Alisha Latham. The rest of the game was characterized mostly by missed opportunities.

After a missed layup by Janousek, Rosenkrantz notched one of her own, and Gerardot gathered the rebound, which she turned over to Rosenkrantz. After UMass senior Whitney McDonald stole it back for the Minutewomen, Gerardot missed a 3-point shot.

Dacko substituted sophomore Kim Benton out of the game for Sakera Young just before Latham was fouled by Vermont. With 14 seconds on the clock, Latham missed both free throws. Shortly after another missed layup by Rosenkrantz, Young was fouled going up for a defensive rebound. Young stepped to the line, needing to drain both free throws to give more cushion to UMass's 67-66 lead.

"I was just talking to myself in my head, just 'OK, make this shot,'" said Young. "I heard Whitney McDonald say, 'Just like practice.' And I just kept talking to myself at the line, 'Make this shot.' I took it one shot at a time."

Young deposited both free throws and put her team up 69-66. A layup by Vermont's Nicole Trott proved moot as UMass pulled off the 69-68 win.

It was the second year in a row that UMass beat Vermont in the season opener. It was the third season opener the Minutewomen have won since Dacko took the reins in 2002.

"I think a lot of people stepped up," said senior Kate Mills. "Pam had a great game… [Sakera] did a great job for us hitting those two free throws at the end. Maybe a year ago she might not have hit those, but she's really matured. She's really grown up as a player, and she had the confidence to hit those shots. It was just a great team win for us, especially on offense."

The Minutewomen will take on Boston College on Wednesday at 6 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu

Forbes reaches 1,000 career point mark

BASKETBALL from page 14

Iowa, seven players registered rebounds, including Forbes – who led the team with nine.

Even without their floor general against Northern Illinois, the Minutemen ran and shot their way to a 102-87 win. Despite building a 32-point lead in the second half, the Huskies crawled back into the game during the waning minutes. Once the lead shrunk to 14 points, Ford re-entered several of his starters back into the game, having taken them out with the large lead.

UMass took advantage of its open 3-point shots, shooting 53 percent. The team made 14 shots from the behind the 3-point line, nearly reaching the school record of 15.

Forbes paced the Minutemen with 22 points, converting 7-of-12 3-point attempts.

Friday, the Minutemen were in a close contest during the second half before a second-half propelled the team to a 90-64 victory. UMass broke a 54-54 tie in the middle of the second period with a 26-2 run.

With the team's new, up-tempo style, the Minutemen are capable of scoring a significant number of points very quickly.

Senior forward Gary Forbes registered a double-double with 26 points and 10 rebounds. Despite shooting 2-8 from behind the arc, Harris also displayed a penchant to get to the foul line, making 11 of 16 free throw attempts.

NOTES

Forbes notched his 1,000 career point against Northern Iowa with 511 coming from his time at Virginia before transferring … The Minutemen shot 19 percent from the floor in the first half on Sunday … Harris left the first half of Sunday's game with an injury before returning midway through the second half … UMass held all Cal Poly players to single digits in Friday's win … Junior forward Tony Gaffney grabbed eight rebounds in his debut for the Minutemen.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Emotional leader

Rosanio leads Minutewomen with versatile play at forward

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Intensity can be defined as a high degree of emotional excitement. On the Massachusetts women's basketball team, it could be defined in two words: Pam Rosanio.

Whether it was diving on the floor, encouraging teammates, drawing charges or hitting big shots, Rosanio helped the Minutewomen secure a 69-68 victory over the Vermont Catamounts on Friday.

"I show a lot of emotion clearly, and I think that helps our team, because if they see me having that, then maybe they'll feed off it," she said. "I just know that I need to come every game with that because that's what I bring to the team."

The team needed all Rosanio could provide to escape with the one point win.

Even with her nine points, four assists and five rebounds in the first half, UMass trailed the Catamounts by five points and at that point needed a better second half from their emotional leader to win the game.

It didn't take long for Rosanio to remind the Catamount players why UMass remained within striking distance. In a critical juncture less than three minutes into the second half, Rosanio hit a layup and drew a foul on Nicole Trott. She converted on the free throw and put the Minutewomen within one at 36-35.

Those three points put the senior guard in an elite class – she joined 15 others in the 1,000 point club for the program. UMass coach Marnie Dacko came out to pose with Rosanio for pictures, but there were 17 minutes of basketball to be played.

After two scoreless Minutewomen possessions, Rosanio found point guard Sakera Young for a layup that gave the Minutewomen their first lead since the 2:17 mark of the first half.

The teams continued to trade baskets, and with 11:20 left in the half, Rosanio sank two free throws to give the Minutewomen a two-point lead. Vermont responded with a basket of its own, but Rosanio gave UMass the lead right back seven seconds later.

Neither team built more than a four point lead in the half, so there was little room for error or wasted possessions. With the score tied at 56 with just over six minutes to play, Rosanio stole the ball and went in for a layup to put the Maroon and White up two.

At the 4:07 mark, Rosanio picked up her fourth foul. Alisha Latham came in for Rosanio, but after Vermont went on a 4-0 run, Dacko decided to put Rosanio back into the game with 2:56 remaining.

It was a decision Dacko didn't regret. Just eight seconds upon returning to the game, Rosanio hit a three that gave the Minutewomen a 67-66 lead. However, she fouled out less than a minute later.

"I wanted more than anything to be on that floor in the last minute of the game," she said.

Without Rosanio, the Minutewomen held Vermont scoreless until they hit a meaningless layup as time expired. Rosanio finished the night with a career-high 25 points, as well as collecting 9 rebounds and 7 assists.

Despite her impressive game, Rosanio knows there are still things she can improve upon. She wants to step up her defense and was unhappy with her four turnovers, including three in the first half.

Dacko described the game as an "ugly win," but was proud of the resilience her team showed, especially from Rosanio.

"[Rosanio's] intensity is believing we can win all the time," she said. "She has a never say die attitude and I think that's contagious. Even when she fouled out, she's in the huddle, 'C'mon guys we've got to get this one,' and you have to believe. So much of this game is mental and believing that you can do it, even if you're the underdog in the game.

"Pam's belief in everybody instills confidence, and you can grow on that," she added.

After Friday's game, it's clear that Rosanio's effort on the court will be essential if the Minutewomen want to have a successful 2007-08 season.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

Junior center Luke Bonner and the Minutemen won two-of-three games over the weekend in Cedar Falls, Iowa, as a part of the BTI Tip-off Tournament.

The Massachusetts
Daily Collegian
is looking for a new
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER

ARE YOU AN EARLY RISER WITH SOME TIME BEFORE CLASS?

ARE YOU ORGANIZED, EFFICIENT, AND PROFESSIONAL?

DO YOU WANT TO BE A PART OF THE LARGEST DAILY COLLEGE NEWSPAPER IN NEW ENGLAND?

APPLY NOW:
113 CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT
DAILY COLLEGIAN OFFICES
(413)545-3500

JAMAICA SPRING BREAK 2008
JAM FEST
THE JAMAICA MUSIC FESTIVAL FEATURING ARTISTS SUCH AS: SHAGGY, BEENIE MAN, and much, much more!
Concert Dates: March 3rd, 10th, 17th & 24th
Book Your Trip Today! Contact:
1.800.426.7710
1.800.648.4849
JAMAICA
Once in you know.

Write For News
news@dailycollegian.com

Campus to Career
Covering Your Assets
Wednesday, November 14
5:30 p.m., Memorial Hall
Come hear a Liberty Mutual representative lead an informative discussion on understanding auto, home, renters, and life insurance options and policies.
Attendees are encouraged to bring their declarations page from their current insurance policies (if applicable), for a more individualized and interactive session.
FREE ADMISSION • FREE PIZZA
FREE REFRESHMENTS
To register visit the Alumni Association web site at UMassAlumni.com/students
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
STUDENT ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Liberty Mutual
Sponsored by the Alumni Association and the Student Alumni Association in partnership with Liberty Mutual.

PREPARE YOURSELF FOR THE COLLEGIAN'S WEEKEND EDITION PREMIERING THIS FRIDAY... IT'S GONNA BE JAWSOME...

SINCERELY,
THE STREET SHARKS

Daily Worthless Numerical Exercise below:

		7	4			9	5
				1
6		2	8		7	3
	2		3		9		4
9		4		2		7
	1	9			6	5		7
			7
3	7				5	2

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Shirttieeves
5 Wall dirt
8 French mathematician Blaise
14 College official
15 John Dos Passos trilogy
16 Baltimore ballplayer
17 Saintly circle
18 Sawbuck
19 Put down in writing
20 Eight-limbed creature
22 Young ruffians
23 French castle
24 Flexible
27 Llamas' kin
29 Genetic material, briefly
30 Tops of heads
34 Fond du ___, WI
35 Ado
36 Blunders
37 Call
39 Slink
40 Urgent memo letters
41 Chick's mom
42 Military installations
43 Bamboozle
44 Picture takers
47 Catch in a trap
49 Bring into bondage
54 Cicero's tongue
55 Adjusts pitch
56 Swaps
58 Greek letter
59 Wrongful act
60 Hit the sack
61 Legendary bird
62 Advantage
63 Disinclined
64 Pivotal measures
65 Observes

DOWN
1 Type of committee
2 Attain, as a goal
3 Valletta's nation
4 Schnoz
5 Reciprocal
6 Consumes completely
7 Dapper fellow
8 General public
9 Sites for lights
10 Becomes submerged
11 Makes sense of 12 Pub quaff
13 Guided
21 Pod look-a-likes
22 Nutty pie
25 Map in a map
26 Large barrels
28 Fly around
30 R.I.P. word
31 Fireball's crime
32 Interpret
33 6th sense
35 To's counterpart
37 Ancient Jewish sect member
38 Mr. Universe contestants
42 Attention getter
44 Supplies the books
45 Think logically
46 Playful pranks
48 Lowest point
50 Stringed instruments
51 Battery terminal
52 Brink
53 Senator Kefauver
56 Song refrain opener
57 Gun it in neutral
58 Season opener?

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"The only way to find true happiness is to risk being completely cut open."
-Chuck Palahniuk

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK BY JOSH SHALEK

PAUL BY BILLY O'KEEFE

THE QUIGMANS BY BUDDY HICKERSON

"I think the fact that I'm a garden gnome at your garden party entitles me to a free drink!"

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Spend the day watching movies about oversized reptiles on the Sci-fi channel.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
¡Your life is upside-down and even now you're just reading along as it nothing were wrong. Wake up, dinkwad!

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Life is what happens while you're busy reading dumb aphorisms about life.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
You and your gaggle of gossiping girls need to relocate your own beeswax and mind it.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
It is only natural to lust after your roommate's siblings

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You're not a rapper; you're a wrapper. Now get out there and make me a sandwich.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You will design a car-mounted vacuum cleaner that sucks up neighborhood cats...

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
How can anyone really care about you when you don't really care about anyone?

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You are being stalked by a cougar. Make sure she isn't married to a mob-boss.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You are narcoleptic and will probably fall asleep before you reach the end of this.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
You are a flamboyant yet loveable clown, fit for a circus yet destined for greatness.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
You are now entering no man's land... WELCOME TO CURVES!

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes start January 2nd
Plan Now for Winter Break
Get ahead this Winter
wherever you are!
Online classes or on campus classes?
YOU DECIDE!!!
Registration begins Tuesday Nov. 13th
www.UMassULearn.net

Comics are your bread, horoscopes your butter, milk is the divine nectar, expelled from a cow's udder.
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Montreal weekend from $99.00 complete motel, transportation and more. Montreal Express.net 781-979-9001. Lowest prices on campus.

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalik@student.umass.edu for information

EMPLOYMENT

Hurry! Last day to apply to become a legal assistant a tthe Student Legal Services Office is Nov. 16th. Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable expenence in the legal field. Stop by our office at 922 Campus Center or call 413-545-1995

EMPLOYMENT

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Nov. 13 in the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

Bartending $300/Day potential NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Exp line cook, p.t./f.t. nights & weekends. Great training program & starting wage. Apply at Eastside Grill, 19 Strong Ave, Northhampton or info@eastsidegrill.com.

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

SERVICES

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101

Keep it GREEN
Please Recycle

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birth-control, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins wecome www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+ Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445.

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, earn Cash & Go Free! Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/ Reservations. 800-648-4849/ www.ststravel.com.

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

NOV 13 2007

NOV 14 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Three in a row

DANIEL LEE / COLLEGIAN

Redshirt senior running back Matt Lawrence falls forward into the endzone during one of his two touchdowns Saturday. Lawrence and the Minutemen defeated New Hampshire for the third time in the past two seasons. The senior also won the Bill Knight Trophy, as the game's most valuable player.

Lawrence has big day on the ground, rushes for two scores

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Matt Lawrence is a big fan of Liam Coen.

And after Lawrence rushed for 139 yards and two touchdowns to lead Massachusetts to a 27-7 victory over New Hampshire, the senior tailback became a fan favorite himself on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

"My man Liam," Lawrence said after the game with a laugh, referring to a key drive in the third quarter, in which Coen handed him the ball 10 times for 80 yards and a touchdown. "My fine was going to work; they did what they do best. It was a lot of fun."

UMass	27
UNH	7

It was the third straight win for No. 8 UMass (8-2, 6-1 Colonial Athletic Association) over rival UNH in two seasons, with this senior day victory clinching the CAA North Division title for the Minutemen. With the defeat, the No. 20 Wildcats (6-4, 3-4 CAA) were eliminated from playoff contention.

"It was a great, great win, especially when you go through a deflating experience like last week," UMass coach Don Brown said, referencing his team's upset loss in overtime to Rhode Island on Nov. 3.

The UMass defense was relentless, sacking UNH quarterback – and 2006 Walter Payton Award winner – Ricky Santos eight times and intercepting him twice to limit the Wildcats to just seven points.

"We have one game left in our college careers," Santos said, clearly frustrated. "That's it for us and our senior class. We have a bad taste in our mouth right now."

Offensively, Coen was solid (21-of-28 for 191 yards and a touchdown), but the offensive line and Lawrence did the bulk of the damage. Coen wasn't sacked and was rarely pressured, while Lawrence was strong all afternoon. He was never better than on that 11-play drive in which he toted the ball 10 times, ultimately leading to a 5-yard touchdown and a 17-7 lead.

"We came out in the third quarter, against the wind, and just had a sensational drive," Brown said. "It was the way we like to do it around here, and that's to be able to pound the ball."

Lawrence's first touchdown run came with 25 seconds left in the first quarter, on the first play after an inter-

See FOOTBALL on page 10

UMass begins season in Iowa

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you made the trip to Iowa this weekend, you would have seen the best and worst of the Massachusetts men's basketball team's new style.

During the three games of the BTI Tip-off Tournament in Cedar Falls, Iowa, the Minutemen found themselves in almost every conceivable game situation – playing with a large lead, a sizeable deficit and in a close contest.

UMass lost to Northern Iowa Sunday, 75-68, after defeating Northern Illinois and Cal Poly earlier in the weekend. The Maroon and White open its home schedule Wednesday against Yale at the Mullins Center.

The Minutemen were without point guard Chris Lowe in the middle game of the tournament, after the junior suffered an ankle injury in the first contest. He returned to play 33 minutes in the loss to the Panthers.

UMass	68
N. Iowa	75
UMass	102
UNI	87
UMass	90
Cal Poly	64

The Minutemen played most of that game from behind, trailing by 20 points late in the first half. Though UMass cut the lead to three on numerous occasions in the second, the Panthers sealed the victory in front of their home fans behind the 21 points of Eric Coleman.

Forward Gary Forbes led all scorers with 29 points, despite only making one 3-point shot. However, the senior was nearly perfect at the line, making 11-of-12 free throw attempts.

Without a dominant frontcourt presence, the team unveiled its new rebounding-by-committee style. Against Northern

See BASKETBALL on page 12

Defensive dominance for UM propels team to win over rival

Anyone could tell the Massachusetts football team was focused Saturday when it knocked around perennial rival New Hampshire and punished quarterback Ricky Santos en route to a 27-7 victory that was never in question.

Jeremy Rice

There was neither a goal-line stand to stamp a momentous victory, nor a back-and-forth battle displaying how evenly matched the teams were.

Instead, the Minutemen made it clear that last year's Atlantic 10 Championship was not a one-year visit atop the region's football world. The Maroon and White's eight sacks of Santos, who became well acquainted with the FieldTurf at McGuirk Stadium Saturday, kept the Wildcats in check. The defensive dominance allowed the UMass offense to run through its usual work day, putting up 395 yards of offense and scoring 27 points behind Matt Lawrence's 139 yards rushing and two touchdowns.

"Just a great, great win," Brown said. "Especially when you go through a deflating experience like we did last week [at Rhode Island], where you're playing in 50 mile-an-hour winds and you don't come out with a win. I was a little concerned on Sunday. We were a very frustrated football team. When times were tough during the course of the game, we never broke. We just stayed together as a football team."

UMass signal-caller Liam Coen was 21-for-28 passing for 191 yards and a touchdown, but it was the relentless pass rush UMass coach Don Brown unleashed on Santos and Co. that transformed what should have been a dogfight into a one-sided affair that clinched the Colonial Athletic Association North division crown for UMass.

See RICE on page 10

NCAA run comes to an end

Minutewomen ousted in first round of national tournament

BY JUSTIN MCGRAIL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

STORRS, Conn. – The Massachusetts field hockey team's season ended with a 4-1 loss to Connecticut in the opening round of the 2006 NCAA Tournament on Saturday.

One of the six graduating seniors, Nicole Phelan, talked about the team's mentality heading into the game.

"We knew coming in that Connecticut was an excellent program, but we wanted to show them that we have heart and we belong on that field too," Phelan said.

UMass	1
UConn	4

Sowry added that the Minutewomen gained a lot of confidence after defeating Richmond in the regular season for the first time in five years. She called it the catalyst for the team's successful end to the season.

The Minutewomen (14-9, 6-1 A-10) took the early lead off a penalty corner goal. Erin Parker inserted the ball to Cher King who put the ball on the net. UConn goalkeeper Andrea Mainiero made the save, but Parker got the rebound and put the ball high over Mainiero to give UMass the 1-0 lead.

It was Parker's fifth goal of the season and raised her point total to 15 for second on the team.

See FIELD HOCKEY on page 10

BRIAN FITZPATRICK/COLLEGIAN

Junior Erin Parker scored the only goal for UMass in the team's 4-1 loss to UConn in the first round of the 2007 NCAA Tournament. She finished the season second on the team in scoring with 15 points.

After many strong games in '07, seniors will be missed next year

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

STORRS, Conn. – The Massachusetts field hockey team accomplished a lot in 2007. They won the Atlantic 10 regular season and conference tournament, had six players named to all-conference teams and increased its win total this season by eight games. Now that they have been eliminated from the NCAA tournament, UMass coach Justine Sowry has her hands full trying to replace a senior class that significantly contributed to the team's sudden transformation.

The defense included freshman star Jaime Bourazeris but also consisted of three senior defenders who used their experience to bring the team to new heights. Goals weren't easy to come by for opponents as the Minutewomen finished the season allowing 25 goals in 23 games.

"I think that when we came in August, we came in with very high expectations, but I'm not sure if any of us envisioned going to the tournament," senior Erin O'Brien said.

O'Brien and Kristina DoRosario were named to the A-10 All-Conference first team for their defensive efforts throughout the season. Though Nicole Phelan, the fourth member of the defense, wasn't named to an all-conference team, she was by no means a weak link.

See SENIORS on page 11

BRIAN FITZPATRICK/COLLEGIAN

Freshman midfielder Ben Arikian had a hand in all three goals – scoring once and adding two assists – in the team's 3-0 win over Saint Joseph's.

Maroon and White attain A-10 birth

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Losing in double-overtime isn't a great way to end the regular season.

But when Temple's Brian Weinhardt scored in the 109th minute to clinch a 1-0 win over the Massachusetts men's soccer team, the Minutemen weren't heartbroken.

UMass defeated Saint Joseph's, 3-0, on Friday evening, clinching a spot in the Atlantic 10 Tournament. It is the first time UMass qualified for the postseason since 2002 and the victory over the Hawks was the first for UMass since 2003. Despite leading the all-time series 14-4-2, the teams tied in their last two meetings.

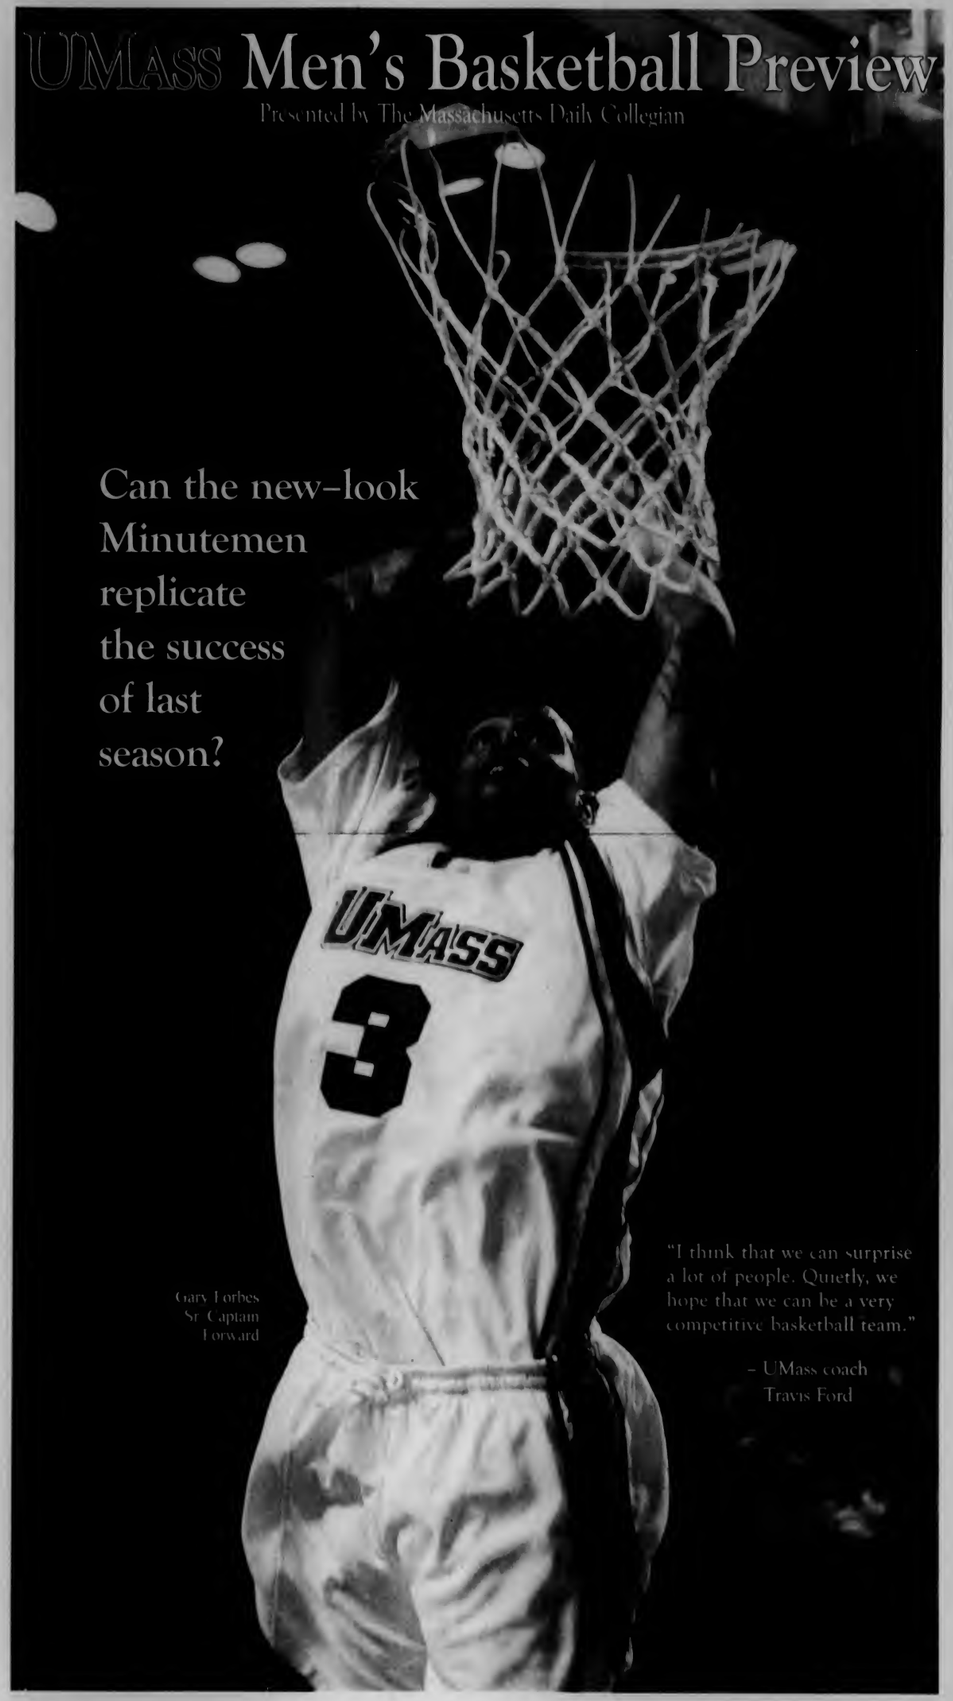
The Minutemen take on Dayton in the first round of the A-10 Tournament on Thursday at 8 p.m. Dayton is this season's host school and despite UMass's higher seed, the Flyers get a home game by default.

UMass	3
Temple	1
UMass	3
St. Joe's	0

Freshman midfielder Ben Arikian gave UMass a 1-0 lead in the 38th minute when a free kick sailed past SJU goalkeeper Bryan Benedict. Both of Arikian's goals this season came on free kicks.

The Minutemen held the one-goal lead until 64th minute when Arikian fed sophomore Mark DeSantis at the top of the penalty area. DeSantis turned and beat the SJU goalkeeper to put UMass up 2-0.

Junior Prince Ofosu scored the third goal off a pass from Arikian in the 84th minute to seal the victory.



Redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons made six saves in the win and recorded his seventh shutout of the year and 21st of his career. Earlier this season, he overtook Bryan O'Quinn as the school's career shutout leader. He's also now tied for fourth all-time in saves. His 71 saves this season tie him with Mark Wolf at 255.

The Minutemen have now outscored their opponents 6-2 in the first half of games this season.

The Hawks received three yellow cards and one red card in the match. Despite the Hawks aggressive style, UMass avoided retaliating to any of the plays that warranted bookings.

Temple was equally aggressive, but created offense rather than fouling. UMass players; the Owls outshot UMass 27-8, including 14-3 in the first half.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Like you've never seen them before

Minutemen to unveil new up-tempo style, with emphasis on the 3-point shot in 2007-08

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

It was one of its most successful seasons in recent memory.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team won a share of the Atlantic 10 regular season title as a part of its 24-win campaign in 2006-07. The Minutemen also returned to the postseason for the first since 2000, winning a home NIT match against Alabama.

But the Minutemen won't return anything close to the championship team of last year – in both roster and style. The team graduated one of its best front-court combinations in years. In fact, the duo of Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman defined last year's team. UMass played a physical game in 2006-07 and focused its offense around the two big men.

In many ways it's an important year for UMass coach Travis Ford. Now in his third season, he has completely turned over the roster from the previous regime and will start playing the type of basketball he prefers.

"I put a lot of pressure on myself and a lot of pressure on my staff," said Ford. "Nobody wants to win more than I do. I understand what we lost, and I understand what we brought in. We're very excited about our players and the way recruiting is going right now."

This season, the new-look Minutemen have moved on from that physical style of basketball and welcome eight new players to the roster. Without a strong front-court presence, Ford is turning to an up-tempo style of basketball – something Ford has wanted to implement since he arrived in Amherst.

He built his Eastern Kentucky teams along a similar model and achieved a comfort level coaching in this style. But he admits he wouldn't mind having his former front-court pair back for one more season.

"It's comfortable coaching Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman – it makes my job easy," Ford said. "I've never played as slow as we've played the past two years. I wouldn't say it was difficult or uneasy; it just wasn't [something] I was necessarily used to. Right now is probably as fast as I have ever played."

The Minutemen will constantly look to push the ball up the court to catch opposing defenses out of position and rely on the 3-point shot as its primary offensive weapon.

"I think we're trying to take this to the extreme – which we need to do," Ford said referring to his team's new up-tempo style. "We're not a physical basketball team, so we need to spread the court, make it fast and make it and up-and-down game, rather than a half-court, aggressive, physical power game – that's not who we are."

Ford knows his team's makeover is still a work in progress and that it has the potential for varying results.

"It's a style of play that on any different night, anything can happen," he said.

With a blend of quick guards and forwards capable of making shots, Ford believes the style matches his players' strengths.

One position that will be crucial for the team's success is point guard. Ford believes he has one of the better returning point guards in the A-10 in junior Chris Lowe.

"The way we're playing actually places more pressure on him," Ford said regarding his junior point man. "We're going to change defenses a lot. He becomes more of a focal point than in years past. Now he's leading us vocally and in other areas, so [his increased leadership role] will be very much noticed."

The coach also has a dependable backup in senior Gary Forbes, though the development of freshman Gary Correia would allow Forbes to spend more time at both forward positions.

Regardless of who is playing the point, that player will be responsible for to directing the team's fast-break opportunities.

"It may look like we're running out there chaotically, but there's a lot of organization to what we're doing on our fast break," Ford said.

In addition to running teams from end-to-end, the 3-point shot will be an important part of the team's offense. Ford said his players will take between 25 and 40 shots per game from behind the arc.

With the construction of his team, the coach knows making 3-pointers will be necessary for success. He also knows his team can't abandon the 3-point shot during a game, should the shots struggle to fall.

"We're going to stick with [the 3-point shot] – that's our strength," he said. "We don't want to just live and die with [it], we want to be versatile. But [it] is something that we'll need to make."

As with the roster's design, the vast of majority of the players have the green light to toss up 3-pointers. Ricky Harris and freshman Max Groebe, shooters-by-trade, will take most of the shots from long range, though forwards Forbes, Etienne Brower and Luke Bonner will take their share of shots.

"The only guys that you probably won't see taking 3-pointers are Dante [Milligan], Trey [Lang] and Papa [Lo]," Ford said. "Everybody else can shoot them and has the green light to fire it up there and see what happens."

It can be difficult to find open looks in a traditional half-court offense, but it will be easier for the team to create shots with its up-tempo pace. Catching teams in transition will be important for allowing the offense to flourish.

"The way we move the basketball up and down the court, it's going to create open shots," Ford said. "I don't think teams will be able to take the 3-point away from us – it's going to be a different style of basketball than teams are used to playing."

But it remains to be seen how the team will respond when the shots don't drop. Great teams that utilize the 3-point shot fall back on rebounding and defense when its shooters struggle. With UMass's significant question marks in both these areas, the team will need to successfully implement a rebounding-by-committee strategy and develop an identity on defense.

The technique of utilizing multiple defensive sets will help the Maroon and White keep team's off balance. UMass will switch between several formations, including a variety of zone groupings. The team will also employ full and half-court presses, as well as traps to force turnovers and keep the game moving quickly.

The team lacks a true defensive stopper, unlike last year, when UMass could depend on Lasme to defend the frontcourt.

Defense won't be the Minutemen's strength this season, but it needs to be serviceable enough to avoid costing them games. Ford is the first to admit that defense is essential for his team's new style.

"You can't play up-tempo if you don't play any defense," he said. "We're not trying to outscore teams – that's not going to work. We've got to develop a better mentality of stopping people."

It also remains to be seen if the team can shut down a dominant scorer like Dionte Christmas of Temple.

"It's a serious concern of this basketball team right now – what player can step up and shut someone down individually," Ford said. "It's going to be by committee. When you're playing the way we are offensively, you're not going to be great defensively."

Lowe, whom Ford classifies as his best defender, will be charged with defending some of the dominant guards the Maroon and White will see this season, including Drew Lavender of Xavier.

In the frontcourt, the Minutemen lack a dominant big man, making rebounding a concern heading into the season.

"It's not one guy who's going to average 10 rebounds per game – it's going to be by committee," Ford said. "Our guards need to get in there and find a few per game."

In addition, the squad will depend on positioning to avoid losing the battle on the glass. Dante Milligan is the team's only traditional center, and he will split starting duties with Bonner.

At forward, Brower, Forbes and Tony Gaffney – three players whose skill sets include the ability to shoot 3-pointers – will see most of the action.

The versatility of these players will help the team overcome its physical deficiency.

"I love 6-foot-7 versatile guys," Ford said. "I could have five of those on the court. I love guys who can shoot, pass and dribble. You don't necessarily have to have good height."

It's also evident that the coach will make use of his 17 eligible players. An up-tempo game plan requires a lot of running and, consequently, many athletes with good fitness.

Unlike many teams that like to quickly push the ball upcourt, Ford prefers to make frequent, individual substitutions instead of rotating players en masse. Yet the coach knows fitness must improve in order to execute its offensive style to perfection.

"It's something that will be a work in progress, as we continue to get into better shape," Ford said. "I don't necessarily like where we're at right now, but we've got to get better."

Until then, Ford has instituted a substitution policy that lets players briefly take themselves out for a breather before returning. But if the coach has to take a player out for fatigue, he may be on the bench for a while.

"I'm a guy that likes to keep my best players on the court," Ford said. "If three minutes – as hard as they can play – is all they can do, then that's what we need and we'll give them a break. But we can't at any point in time have someone catching their breath while playing – it won't work."

Another crucial aspect of the game for the Minutemen will be free-throw shooting. The team struggled from the foul line in 2006-07, but with a dominant frontcourt, many teams inadvertently put Lasme and Freeman on the line while struggling to defend the pair.

And at times, the Maroon and White simply couldn't make an attempt.

Though the team earned an inconsistent amount of free throws over the season, there was a general correlation between victories and attempts.

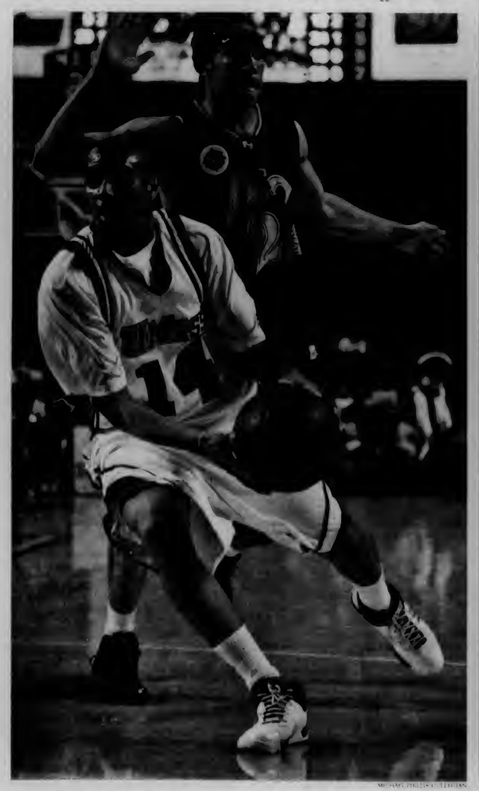
This year, expect the Minutemen to spend less time on the line. Though, the numbers should vary between games depending on how adept teams are at handling an up-tempo team.

"As fast as we're playing, teams will try to follow late in the game to try to catch up with us, because they're lagging," Ford said. "Fouling usually happens when players are out of defensive position while trying to keep up with us."

On the other hand, the coach is concerned with the frequency that the opposition gets to the line. When an opponent earns a lot of attempts, it's indicative of a slower game – something Ford wants to avoid at all costs.

He also stresses the importance of limiting turnovers in order to maintain a high tempo, but any team that plays a fast style is bound to turn the ball over.

Also expect the team to attempt to create turnovers by pressing on defense. UMass will need to convert the turnovers into easy baskets, especially with teams that can dominate the frontcourt.



"Against a physical team, we're going to try to make it fast and hopefully not a physical, aggressive game," Ford said. "Rather than try to to figure out how we can become physical, we're going to try to camouflage that and do something to negate that."

In the end, the team wants to have another successful conference season and return to the postseason in 2007-08. Even with a younger team, Ford and his staff have an attainable challenge – one that can only be achieved by the development of the 17 players into one basketball unit.

"It's going to be a big change for everybody, that's for sure," Ford said, commenting on his new roster and style. "We hope it equates to a lot of wins. We have great young players and some talent. It's a different style of basketball and will take the fans and everyone some time getting used to it, but I think it's something they're going to enjoy.

"I think that we can surprise a lot of people," he added. "Quietly, we hope that we can be a very competitive basketball team."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

One of the Atlantic 10's top returning guards, junior Chris Lowe has the essential task of directing the Minutemen's new up-tempo offense this season. He led the team with 4.2 assists per game last year.

It won't be an easy task for UMass to replace Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman in the frontcourt. But junior center Luke Bonner will play a significant role in replacing the rebounding production of the departed forwards.

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN
NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

MOSTLY CLOUDY : HI: 62 LO: 48 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 2007

Campus braces for student strike

Republican club leads charge in opposition of class boycott

By Kristen Healy
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Republican Club is holding a "Speak-Out" against the scheduled General Student Strike at noon today on the steps of the Student Union.

According to the Republican Club President Brad DeFlumeri, they are going to discuss why they are opposed to the strike, which is scheduled to take place Thursday and Friday, and specifically why they disagree with the grievances students have.

"We think that the grievances of the students are absurd and that students are paying a lot of money to attend classes here and shouldn't just refuse to attend for two days," said DeFlumeri, speaking for the Republican Club.

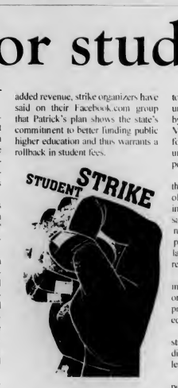
The strike's leaders are not justified in their attempts to encourage students to be absent from classes and having students not attend classes on Thursday and Friday will not further any of the causes they are fighting for, said Republican Club leaders yesterday.

The opposition to the strike stems from the fact that students would be missing part of the education they have already paid for in order to protest and that some students might use the strike as an excuse to not attend class. As long as students continue to pay tuition, professors get paid, and the University continues to be employed by the students, according to the Republican Club.

Strike organizers are requesting that the University roll back student fees, bring an end to police patrols in residence halls and control over student space in the Campus Center and Student Union and create diversity outreach and funding accountability.

The Republican Club plans to address more specifically all the concerns they have surrounding the general student strike during today's rally.

Kristen Healy can be reached at kkhealy@student.umass.edu



Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) in conjunction with the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) is calling on students to participate in an all-student strike scheduled for Thursday and Friday of this week.

Students' refusal to attend classes is hoped to attract media attention that will bring the governing bodies' demands into state-wide public consciousness.

Organizers of the strike said a rollback in student fees, accountability for diversity funds, student control over student space and police presence in dormitories have warranted the move to hold informational meetings in lieu of scheduled classes at the end of the week. The issue has largely polarized the student body with many in agreement and a seemingly equal number in opposition.

Opinion may be split, but few students can disagree with smaller hills, an action that SGA vice-President Ruth Thompson said is both possible and deserved. Governor Patrick's Capital Plan is expected to bring $1 billion in revenue to the University of Massachusetts system and approximately $500,000,000 to the system's flagship Amherst campus. Due to the added revenue, strike organizers have said on their Facebook.com group that Patrick's plan shows the state's commitment to better funding public higher education and thus warrants a rollback in student fees.

University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski explained the University's stance saying that the Board of Trustees [BOT] has worked to raise fees at a modest pace. Organizers cite fees having gone up 200 percent over the past 20 years, however. Blaguszewski said that in recent history the BOT has worked to raise fees at a level that is either under or equal to inflation as defined by the Consumer Price Index. Last March, the BOT voted to raise fees for this year by 3.4 percent, which is under the reported inflation rate of 3.6 percent.

Blaguszewski said budget cuts in the past have necessitated a package of action to reduce University spending while maximizing revenue. He said the increase in student fees was not done in isolation but was instead part of this program that included a large number of layoffs and forced retirement among other things.

The GSS's Web site reads that the increase in fees has had a major effect on campus diversity as it allegedly prices students out of public higher education.

According to Thompson, graduate students who apply for money from diversity funds have been rejected, leaving many scratching their heads.

Blaguszewski said the University's policy "has to do with the decision to invest funds in different ways." He said, "A year or two ago, the University received a federal grant to encourage more under represented minority students to pursue careers in sciences and mathematics."

Blaguszewski added that a lack of funds necessitates the need to get outside grants.

"It's a policy issue," he said. "The University pooled the money and decided to allocate the funds to emphasize a nationwide need for professionals in the highlighted fields."

GSS President Eli Sapolitano said on the GSS Web site, "For the administration to fulfill the requirement of diversity as a core mission of the University, we call on them to institute a fair, patient, accountable and democratic process that incorporates student input and oversight."

He added in an interview that graduate students studying in the humanities have seen their funding "evaporate" and that there needs to be more accountability as to how the federal money is spent. He said the GSS received a one-page, double spaced, "cryptic" rundown but the report is a far cry from the transparency that should exist.

However Blaguszewski reiterated his prior point saying, "It's a policy choice, not an issue of transparency. You may disagree, but that's the decision made."

Thompson said that while the administration has been making decisions to maximize revenue to aid shrinking budgets, decisions regarding the number of student space such

See Strike, page B3

ISOM cracks list of top business schools

Quality of teaching receives high grade

Leif Walcutt
Collegian Staff

The Isenberg School of Management's Part-Time Professional MBA program placed fifth in the Northeast and 29th nationally in a recent BusinessWeek article.

Released on Nov. 7, BusinessWeek's 2007 Part-Time MBA Programs ranked 30 national programs on three factors: student satisfaction based from a survey of 9,274 MBA students, academic quality, and post-MBA outcomes.

The University of Massachusetts earned all "A's" in teaching quality, caliber of classmates, and curriculum. UMass was also second among three other schools for highest completion rate and eighth in the percentage of tenured faculty teaching in a part-time program.

"These rankings reflect the strong regional and national quality of our Part-Time Professional MBA program," said Eric Berkowitz, associate dean for Professional Programs at the Isenberg School.

The part-time program has over 900 students at sites in Holyoke, Shrewsbury, and Pittsfield. Students from all 50 states and around the world participate is the courses, which are also offered online.

"The program is designed to meet with people's intense lifestyle demands," said Lou Wigdor, the school's communication director.

Wigdor said the ages of students taking the part-time program range around 26-32 and most students already have full-time jobs.

"It's very difficult with a family to simply stop working and get your MBA," Wigdor said.

He said Isenberg's part-time program will help people get their MBAs without making hard financial sacrifices.

According to the survey, UMass rated highest as the "job changer" university, as opposed to titles applied to other schools such as "career switchers" and "career advancers."

Among the other best part-time programs in the Northeast were Worcester Polytechnic, the Stern School at New York University, Boston University, and the Carroll School at Boston College. The top-rated part-time MBA program was the Anderson School of Business at the University of Los Angeles.

"I am proud to see the hard work of our faculty and staff as well as the quality of students that we attract reflected in these ratings," Berkowitz said.

The Part-Time Professional MBA is a 12-course, 37-credit program that can be completed in a span of 2-2.5 years. Core curriculum is offered online every spring, summer and fall semester and students can take courses at any pace comfortable.

"This is a new wave of flexibility in continuing education," Wigor said.

Leif Walcutt can be reached at lwalcutt@student.umass.edu

Ex-Duke coach speaks out

Former Duke lacrosse coach Mike Pressler discussed his new book at Amherst College last night. Pressler is entering his second year as coach of the Bryant University lacrosse team.

Alumni on hand at plaza dedication

Class of 1956 donates newest addition to Minuteman statue

By Elizabeth Hawley
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts Alumni dedicated Minuteman Crossing, the new stone plaza surrounding the Minuteman Statue between the Old Chapel and the Campus pond, on Saturday.

The plaza is a gift from the Class of 1956 in honor of their 50th reunion. The circular terrace surrounding the Minuteman Statue itself is a gift from the Class of 1950. Steps line one side of the plaza, whose walls were built from local Ashfield stone.

The project cost $160,000.

The ceremony was arranged for Nov. 10 so members of the Class of 1956 who wanted to attend the ceremony could also attend a home football game.

"[The ceremony] was nice," said Sarah Sligo, senior associate director of annual giving. "A lot of the class members came back, which made it even more special."

Construction on the project began in June and lasted through the summer, into this semester. The planning for the project began in the fall of 2005, when Scotty Donald, Class of 1956 Reunion Committee member and landscape architect, proposed the idea of a public plaza for the class gift. The location was selected and John Sendelbach was hired to assist in the project's design.

The Reunion Committee unanimously approved the proposal.

Sendelbach is a landscape architect and stonemason/artist based locally. He was chosen after Scotty Donald saw work he had done for Donald's daughter, who lives in Amherst.

The Minuteman Crossing is Sendelbach's third public project. His other works include "Crossroads Salamander" at the Cushman Common in North Amherst.

"It far exceeded any of our expectations," Sligo said of the completed Minuteman Crossing.

Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano spoke during Saturday's dedication ceremony for the new plaza surrounding the Minuteman statue.

The class hopes the plaza will complement the statue's design and will serve as a place for the campus community to congregate.

Elizabeth Hawley can be reached at ehawley@student.umass.edu

New FCC ruling favored by students

By Katrina Ossna
Collegian Correspondent

Students at the University of Massachusetts supported moves by the Federal Communication Commission (FCC) voted to eliminate a competition barrier in the cable market for managed real estate developments last week.

On October 13, 2007 the FCC, citing a violation of section 628(b) of the Telecommunications Act of 1996, voted in favor of banning video service exclusivity in multiple dwelling units (MDUs).

The order is expected to eliminate a barrier to competition in the video service market for MDU residents by prohibiting multi-channel video service providers from including exclusivity clauses in their contracts with MDU landlords. The order prohibits both the execution of such new clauses, and the enforcement of currently existing clauses.

Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein defined MDUs as "apartment buildings, condominiums, mobile home parks, and other centrally-managed real estate developments."

It is estimated by the FCC that between [illegible] and 30% of all American households live in MDUs.

This ruling will impact many Amherst residents, including a large portion of the University of Massachusetts' student population – many of whom live in one of the numerous MDUs in Amherst and the surrounding towns. Comcast is currently the [illegible] provider for MDU video service in Amherst.

A majority of students surveyed support the decision.

"I think it's a good idea. We pay an extra [illegible] fee for cable," said Nicole Cotter, a Psychology student at Orchard Village Park.

Dissenters protest the concern that it will [illegible] the individual consumer to get himself to see the difference [illegible] competition is

See Ruling, page B3

NOV 14 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 50
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Staigen
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Stymiest
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Manea Wooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Gurber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenzweike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toun Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FALL/SPRING SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALOFT LIFE, BECAME THE MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN IN 1892, THE COLLEGIAN IN 1915 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nicholas Belanger

COPY EDITOR
Domenic Poli

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

Around the world, across the U.S.

Monkey embryos, stem cells cloned by Oregon scientists

BY MALCOLM RITTER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Scientists in Oregon say they've reached the long-sought goal of cloning monkey embryos and extracting stem cells from them, a potentially major step toward doing the same thing in people.

The research has not been published yet or confirmed by other scientists. But if true, it offers fresh hope in field that has been marked by frustration and even fraud. The claim of a similar breakthrough with human embryos by a South Korean scientist in 2004 turned out to be false.

The hope is that one day, such a procedure could be used to create transplant tissue that's genetically matched to an ailing patient. Because stem cells can form all types of tissue, the approach might one day help treat conditions like diabetes and spinal cord injury without fear of rejection by the patient's body.

Scientists have tried for years to clone monkey embryos and extract stem cells because monkeys are more closely related to humans than other lab animals are. So monkey work has been expected to give hints about how to do this in people.

The success was reported earlier this year at a scientific meeting in Australia by Shoukhrat Mitalipov of the Oregon National Primate Research Center in Portland. It received limited media attention at the time, but the results were given new attention Tuesday by a London newspaper, The Independent.

Mitalipov did not immediately respond Tuesday to an interview request from The Associated Press. But another scientist, Jose Cibelli of Michigan State University, told The AP on Tuesday that he'd heard Mitalipov's presentation at the Australia meeting.

"To me, it's a breakthrough," said Cibelli, who studies cloning and stem cells. The work shows "it is possible."

In cloning to obtain stem cells, DNA from an adult animal is inserted into an unfertilized egg. The egg is grown into an early embryo, from which stem cells are extracted. These stem cells, and the tissue that develops from them, will be a genetic match to the source of the DNA.

Unpublished research conducted by scientists in Oregon may lead to the cloning of monkey embryos in the future.

The idea of doing this in people is controversial because the embryos have to be destroyed to obtain the stem cells.

Despite the monkey success, "we're still far off to start dreaming about translating this technique to humans," Cibelli said. That's because the reported results were very inefficient, requiring many eggs to produce stem cells, he said. Still, the work shows monkeys can be used to study the potential of embryonic stem cells produced through cloning, Cibelli said. "That's a terrific tool."

Cloning is most famous for producing not stem cells but baby animals, such as Dolly the sheep. But while some people may view the new development as a move by scientists on the "slippery slope" toward producing cloned human babies, "we're all opposed to that," Cibelli said.

Jim Newman, a spokesman for the Oregon Health & Science University, which operates the primate center where Mitalipov works, declined to confirm whether the scientist had cloned monkey embryos. But he said a study in that area of research will be released soon by the scientific journal Nature.

Katie McGoldrick, a Nature spokeswoman in Washington, said she could not discuss papers that may or may not have been submitted for publication.

The primate center was in the news for another reason Tuesday. An activist group, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, said it had documented violations of animal protection laws there. University officials said the primate center has an excellent record for animal care.

STD's hit record high levels across nation

BY MIKE STOBBE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

More than 1 million cases of chlamydia were reported in the United States last year – the most ever reported for a sexually transmitted disease, federal health officials said Tuesday.

"[It is] a new U.S. record," said Dr. John M. Douglas Jr. of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

More bad news: Gonorrhea rates are jumping again after hitting a record low, and an increasing number of cases are caused by a "superbug" version resistant to common antibiotics, federal officials said Tuesday.

Syphilis is rising, too. The rate of congenital syphilis – which can deform or kill babies – rose for the first time in 15 years.

"Hopefully we will not see this turn into a trend," said Dr. Khalil Ghanem, an infectious diseases specialist at Johns Hopkins University's School of Medicine.

The CDC releases a report each year on chlamydia, gonorrhea and syphilis, three diseases caused by sexually transmitted bacteria.

Chlamydia is the most common. Nearly 1,031,000 cases were reported last year, up from 976,000 the year before.

The count broke the single-year record for reported cases of a sexually transmitted disease, which was 1,013,436 cases of gonorrhea, set in 1978.

Putting those numbers into rates, there were about 348 cases of chlamydia per 100,000 people in 2006, up 5.6 percent from the 329 per 100,000 rate in 2005.

CDC officials say the chlamydia record may not be all bad news: They think the higher number is largely a result of better and more intensive screening.

Since 1993, the CDC has recommended annual screening in sexually active women ages 15 to 25. Meanwhile, urine and swab tests for the bacteria are getting better and are used more often, for men as well as women, said Douglas, director of the CDC's Division of Sexually Transmitted Disease Prevention.

About three-quarters of women infected with chlamydia have no symptoms. Left untreated, the infection can spread and ultimately lead to infertility. It's easily treated if caught early.

Health officials believe as many as 2.8 million new cases may actually be occurring each year, he added.

Chlamydia infection rates are more than seven times higher in black women then whites, and more than twice as high in black women than Hispanics. But it's a risk women of all races should consider, CDC officials said.

"If (health care) providers think young women in their practice don't have chlamydia, they should think again," said Dr. Stuart Berman, a CDC epidemiologist.

The gonorrhea story is somewhat different.

In 2004, the nation's gonorrhea rate fell to 112.4 cases per 100,000 people in 2004, the lowest level since the government started tracking cases in 1941.

But since then, health officials have seen two consecutive years of increases. The 2006 rate – about 121 per 100,000 – represents a 5.5 percent increase from 2005.

Health officials don't know exactly how many superbug cases there were among the more than 358,000 gonorrhea cases reported in 2006. But a surveillance project of 28 cities found that 14 percent were resistant to ciprofloxacin and other medicines in the fluoroquinolones class of antibiotics.

Similar samples found that nine percent were resistant to those antibiotics in 2005, and seven percent were resistant in 2004. The appearance of the superbug has been previously reported, and the CDC in April advised doctors to stop using those drugs against gonorrhea.

Douglas said it doesn't look like the superbugs are the reason for gonorrhea's escalating numbers overall, but they're not sure what is driving the increase.

UM 'will be open for business,' officials say as the Lincoln Campus Center and the Student Union should be left to the original caretakers of the areas – students.

STRIKE from page B1

"When something in the Student Union that is funded through student fees, we should not have to pay the added fees often placed on students," Thompson said. She added that campus center rooms are not rented with student priority in mind.

According to Thompson, student groups looking to use a free room have to compete with private companies who pay for the space. She added students rarely have priority over the paying parties, even if a student group were to successfully reserve the space, steep fees on projectors, catering and other services leave many student functions without amenities that could be enjoyed if such policies did not exist.

"The University has the hotel, conference services and other ways to get revenue. We're already paying enough in fees to be here, so we don't need to pay more money in order to have an event."

Blaguszewski agreed that it is hard to reserve a room in either building but he said the reason was due to the fact that the spaces in the buildings were small, and competition was to blame for students' difficulties rather than that of the building administrators' priorities. He added UMass plans to build a new Student Union building, but a lack of funds has stopped any real plans from being formulated. The University recognizes the need for larger, more accessible rooms, but students must work with administrators to make the most effective use of the space, he said.

According to Blaguszewski, fees for electronic equipment and catering are determined with efficiency in mind by those who run the buildings.

The SGA added to its list of grievances a desire to return "freshmen only" dormitories back to buildings that feature students of all grades.

The strike's Facebook.com group reads: "With little student input and consideration, the Office of Student Affairs and Campus Life has ordered the implementation of a policy 'All Freshman' dorms, particularly in the Southwest Residential Area. This is an abrupt shift in long-standing policy which negatively changes peer dynamics and creates an artificial divide amongst the student body. We call on an end to 'All Freshman' dorm housing and for student input and influence into future housing policies."

However Blaguszewski said the original decision was indeed driven by feedback from students' freshman experiences with academic performance in mind. He added that while many of the decisions may not have had a great deal of engagement with the SGA, the administration's decision was one that was influenced by high student support from others not affiliated with student government.

He said students in residential life – including those in Greek life – were asked about the issue.

As supporters of the strike demand a greater say in who lives in certain dormitories, they also demand to have control over who doesn't enter student rooms.

Thompson said that illegal searches are being conducted by plain clothed officers of the University of Massachusetts Police Department. She added that students' fourth amendment rights are being overlooked as officers patrol private areas of students' dorms.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano said in an e-mail, "All of the national studies identify the abuse of alcohol, abuse of prescription medicines and the use of illegal drugs as the general cause for the types of crimes and bad behavior we witness in our towns and communities as well as on college campuses. This behavior is a national society concern. The unacceptable behavior we see and read about in our towns and cities eventually get played out on the college campus."

Deputy Chief of Police Patrick Archbald said the demands are not valid as police officers do not enter the halls unless they are responding to a call from a Resident Assistant or a concerned student. According to Archbald officers must be certain probable cause exists before going through the Assistant District Attorney's Office for a search warrant.

He added that officers do check on the lobbies and cluster offices of dormitories but do not patrol private areas of dorms. He added that officers responding to calls often knock on the doors of suspects who often open it to officers and charges.

"Anything they see in plain view becomes evidence in a potential case. We don't patrol the floors. It's not our practice," Archbald said.

But the SGA disagrees.

"That's false," Thompson said. An RA herself, she said that personal experience has shown her that police are not following the law.

They come and patrol dorms when RAs aren't calling them. It makes their job harder because RAs are trying to build a community out of their students while cops come in as pizza delivery guys trying to bust students with whatever it is they have in their rooms," she said.

Thompson added the civilian clothing police wear makes it harder for students to protect their rights as they are less likely to realize they are being threatened.

"It's not the role of police officers to patrol [the dorms]. It's the role of the resident directors, the assistant resident directors and resident assistants in the housing department."

The teachers union has signed a non-retaliatory agreement that prevents students who wish to attend the strike instead of scheduled classes from disciplinary actions of teachers.

Gargano added, "It is a personal decision whether to attend class. We know this as freedom of choice. Folks make decisions that meet their personal need or interest."

Blaguszewski said the University will be "open for business."

"We expect classes to be taught and students to attend classes. If we do get complaints forwarded that students showed up to classes only to find their teacher or teaching assistant is not there, we will investigate according to the terms of their contracts. We'll review that and see what's appropriate."

Thompson said the all-student strike is not a rash reaction to policies recently introduced by members of the administration but rather a last resort.

"These are the issues every year," she said. "Every time we try to change an issue, we have people blowing us off or ignoring us. That's really what the strike is for: to educate the student body, to get the media to show people that these are the issues that we want to change."

"Since my first year [three years ago] we've had rallies, teach –ins. There has been so many things that have happened. They take us as kids. We represent the students who are tired, who are frustrated."

Though the strike is in effect a boycott as student refuse the services of the University, rather than their refusing to provide a service to UMass, Ruth Thompson said this is her legacy.

"I'm graduating in May, and I want to know that something has changed. I want to know that there has been change. I don't want all the work that I've done and all the work others in student government has been in vain."

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@gmail.com

Commission passes competition order supposed to bring.

FCC from page B1

Frederico Fernandes is also a student at UMass, studying Psychology and Biology. He lived in Brandywine last year and is currently living in Sugarloaf Estates, where cable is included.

"I get cable free with my rent, which is nice, but the quality isn't great. In Brandywine, you had digital cable, which was better, but it cost around $98 per month for that and internet."

Fernandes, 20, hopes that competition in the cable market will allow his landlord to negotiate a higher quality cable package for his tenants.

The FCC estimates that the price of cable has risen 93% from 1995-2005. The cost of a triple play bundle through Comcast is currently $129 per month. For some students, this cost is too high when considered along with all of the other costs of being a student.

One Puffton resident, who asked not to be identified, explained that the cost of "bundles" that include the "triple play" combination of video, voice, and internet services was so high that "me and my roommates sort of found a way around it... we couldn't afford the packages, and with Comcast, the internet is still really expensive if you don't get cable with it. Technically I guess we're stealing internet signal."

Nicholas Ryder, 23, is a senior student in Mechanical Engineering at UMass who also expressed frustration with the high cost of student living.

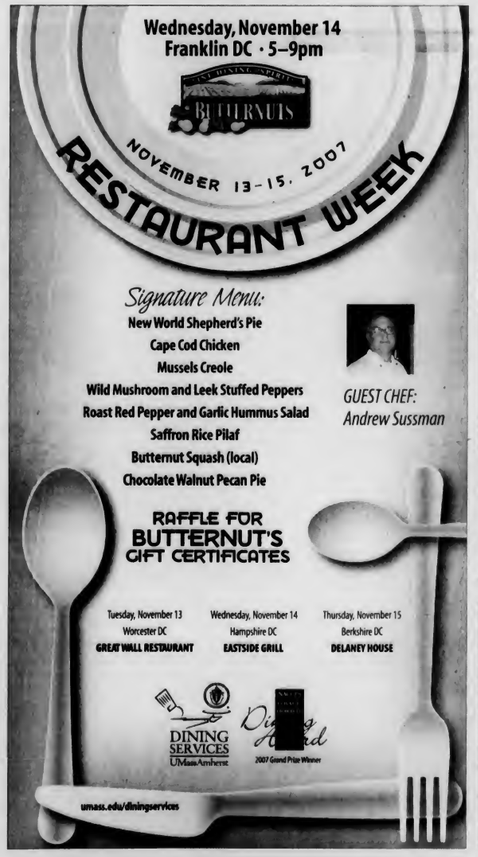
"Right now, I'm paying $100 bucks a month for cable and internet. But I'm also paying for books, my car, my car insurance, my rent, my food. I can only work so much, and I'm not exactly making $23 an hour."

At a meeting last month concerns about the order, which took effect after its publication in the Federal Register only a few days later, were discussed. Commissioner Robert M. MacDowell expressed worries that "our order may not give sufficient deference to states that have passed their own laws helping consumers with this issue."

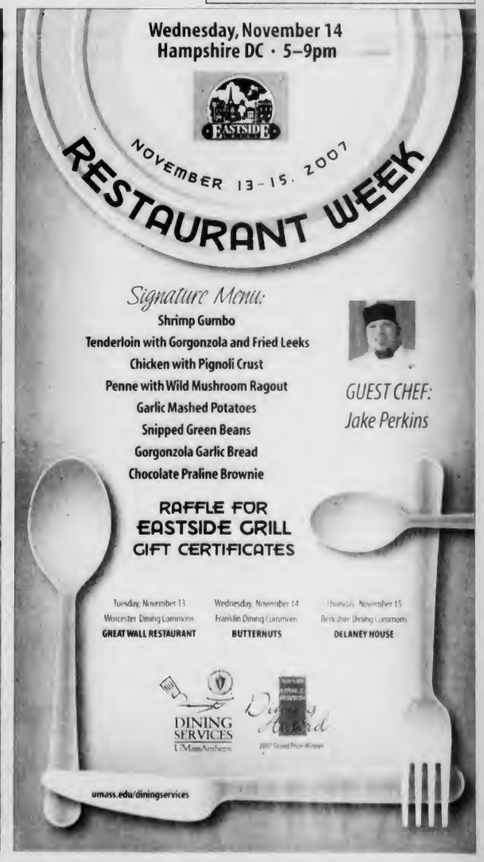
MacDowell also cited the possibility that there may have been a lack of sufficient evidence in the record to justify such an immediate mandate, referring to a contradictory decision made in 2003 by the Commission that claimed "we do not find a sufficient basis in this record to ban or cap the term of exclusive contracts."

Despite recognition of such concerns, the order passed unanimously, with Chairman Kevin J. Martin and Commissioners Copps, Adelstein, Tate, and even McDowell concurring.

Chairman Martin expressed a belief that people living in MDUs "deserve to have the same choices as people that live in the suburbs."



Citing data released in the American Housing Survey Report that shows 40% of all households headed by Hispanics or African Americans are in apartments, Martin explained his conclusion that "minorities in particular will benefit from today's ruling."



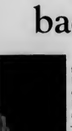
A press statement issued by Commissioner Michael J. Copps indicated that future action in reducing cable market competition is possible.

"We could have gone even further," he explained.

Citing the tendency of markets to "move quickly in response to regulatory changes," Copps worried that "some MVPDs not covered by today's decision will attempt to fill the vacuum" through marketing themselves as "the only exclusive game in town."

NOV 14 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN



EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 2007

"It were best that we not all think alike; it is difference of opinion that makes horseraces."
- Mark Twain

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

No news but bad news

Ben Duffy

It's all too much for some people to bear, but the tide is turning in Iraq. A massive paradigm shift occurred in Iraq in 2007, due in large part to the "surge" of 30,000 additional troops to the country – as well as the new leadership of General David Petraeus. The situation in Iraq today is not the same situation that existed between 2003 and 2006.

According to an Oct. 22 Reuters report, "violence in Iraq has dropped by 70 percent since the end of June, when U.S. forces completed their build-up of 30,000 extra troops to stabilize the war-torn country, the [Iraqi] Interior Ministry said on Monday."

Although some areas of Iraq have experienced more progress than others, the nation as a whole has seen a reduction of violence that cannot be explained away as an anomaly. While Anbar province once raged out of control, it has seen an 82 percent reduction in violent deaths since June. Baghdad has witnessed a 67 percent decrease in car bombs and a 40 percent decrease in roadside bombs.

CNN's Howard Kurtz had an interesting segment in September about the media coverage of rapidly declining casualties: "The news from Iraq has been consistently depressing for several years now, a continuous tableau of death and destruction, but when the administration released more positive casualty figures this week, the media paid little attention. A couple of sentences on the CBS Evening News and NBC Nightly News, the New York Times ran it on Page 10, the Washington Post on Page 14, USA Today on Page 16, the LA Times a couple of paragraphs at the bottom of a Page 4 story."

Kurtz asked reporter Robin Wright, "Should that decline in Iraq casualties have gotten more media attention?" Wright replied, "Not necessarily. The fact is we're at the beginning of a trend – and it's not even sure that it is a trend yet. There is also an enormous dispute over how to count the numbers. There are different kinds of deaths in Iraq ... There are also a lot of numbers that the U.S. frankly is not counting ... So the numbers themselves are tricky."

[Iraq] as a whole has seen a reduction of violence that cannot be explained away as an anomaly.

Well, yes, some figures of civilian deaths can be tricky because the left is continually trying to inflate them. But the deaths of U.S. troops aren't "tricky" at all. We know how many troops we have on the ground, and when one of them winds up dead, we count it. There's nothing tricky about it.

According to the Abilene Reporter-News, "The drop in deaths among U.S. military personnel in Iraq was even sharper according to AP's records – down from 65 in September to at least 36 in October. The October figure is by far the lowest in the last year and is sharply lower than the 106 deaths recorded in October 2006."

Kurtz asked the same question to reporter Barbara Starr, who gave much the same answer – the press shouldn't report on declining casualties until it's sure that there's a trend. Kurtz replied, "But let's say that figures had shown that casualties were going up for U.S. soldiers, and going up for Iraqi civilians. I think that would have made some front pages." Starr replied, "Oh, I think inevitably it would have. I mean that's certainly – by any definition, is news..." When casualties are up, that's news. When casualties plummet precipitously, reporters stand around waiting for a "trend" to develop. Well, the trend is here – a 70 percent reduction in violence since June. It's time for our shamelessly biased media to start reporting on it.

Many of our elected officials are also refusing to open their eyes and ears. Congresswoman Nancy Boyda (D-KS), for example, stormed out of a session of the House Armed Services Committee rather than listen to retired General Jack Keane's generally positive assessment of the Iraq situation.

"There was only so much that you could take until we in fact had to leave the room for a while," said Boyda. "So I think I am back and maybe can articulate some things – after so much of the frustration of having to listen to what we listened to." Yes, it must have been excruciating listening to a retired general testify about positive trends in Iraq. It's difficult only if you belong to a political party that has wagered its political future on American failure in Iraq.

Boyda claimed that Keane's testimony asserted "in some way or another that [Iraq is] a place that I might take the family for a vacation – things are going so well – those kinds of comments will in fact show up in the media and further divide this country..."

Yes, and we wouldn't want good news leaked to the media. Rep. Boyda shouldn't worry; our media probably wouldn't report it anyway. I would advise the congresswoman to open her ears, rather than storming out of committees like a kindergartner.

Being skeptical means having a "show me" attitude. It does not mean refusing to believe facts that are as plain as day. Our media and elected leaders seem incapable of saying anything about Iraq that isn't defeatist in nature. It's time to stop relegating the truth about the war in Iraq to the back page.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at baduffy@student.umass.edu.

Defining the 'American idea'

Dan Nicastro

What is the American idea? Are we a nation ultimately characterized by a linear, tangible concept like progress, or is the American idea more conceptual, such as the idea of democracy or the principle of equality? Perhaps the American idea is the idea that we simply don't have a unifying American idea.

In the November 2007 issue, The Atlantic Monthly asked authors, actors and other notable figures to comment on what they considered to be the American idea. It may seem like a tired concept for a magazine to survey a large sampling of successful people about their definition of the American idea, but the question is much deeper and much harder to answer than you may think.

Since the founding of this country, writers, politicians and citizens have tried to fully explain and quantify what it means to be American. While similarities certainly exist between many of these answers (something which can be seen even within the small confines of an Atlantic Monthly article), we have yet to find one unifying concept which links us all as American.

When we are faced by national crises, American presidents are allowed to re-imagine the American idea and use it to reassure shaken citizens. While there is no real, definitive American idea, it is clear some presidents believe in it more strongly than others. After the attacks on Pearl Harbor, President Franklin Roosevelt seemed to indicate that the American idea was made up of the interminable will and "righteous might" of the American people.

On the evening of Sept. 11, 2001, President George W. Bush told Americans that the terrorist attacks were aimed specifically at our way of life. Like Roosevelt, Bush praised the resolve and character of his citizens, but Bush's American idea was a much clearer and directly articulated vision. His address to the nation constantly alludes to a series of ideals which are definitively American, saying things like our country "was targeted for attack because we're the brightest beacon for freedom and opportunity in the world," and terrorist attacks "cannot touch the foundation of America."

Ultimately, we need to ask why we are so obsessed with quantifying ourselves as Americans.

As I'm sure is true of many other Americans, it's clear Bush has a strict definition of the American idea, something that can be evidenced by his push for the Iraq War. While I have been against the War in Iraq since its inception, even I believe we are in Iraq (at least partly) because Bush really did believe the "American way of life" held transformative powers and had the power to change the Middle East for the better.

So why don't we have one conception of the American idea? Obviously part of the reason is that every one in this country has a different view of what it means to be American. My upbringing has shaped the way I view the world, meaning the ideals and conceptions I hold as important are completely different from the rest of America.

However, on a deeper level, there is no monolithic American idea because it is inherently dangerous to create such a definition. As columnist George Will writes, "It is a good and very American idea to avoid the definite article in locutions like 'the' American idea." It's not often that I agree with George Will, but creating a solitary definition of the American idea excludes those who do not fit into a rigidly defined system. Also, if only one idea is held up as uniquely American, we may be responsible for spreading that idea through the world (and we've seen how well that's worked out in Iraq).

Ultimately, we need to ask why we are so obsessed with quantifying ourselves as Americans. In order to understand our place in history and in the world, we need to feel as if our lives revolve around some unifying concept which gives us a sense of national identity and which can be called upon for strength in times of hardship. However, the existence of an idea which is strictly American seems to be a strictly un-American concept.

We are a country which was built not on the personal morals of our Founding Fathers, but instead on an assortment of parts taken from other cultures. We have done more than just adapt to our surroundings; instead, citizens of this country have invented new ways for us to live. One "true" American idea forces us to be stagnant and work only within the confines of that idea, and that's not something I'm willing to do.

While we all grow up enamored by the mythos revolving around the American dream and the quintessential American idea, hearing these phrases makes us each conjure up different images of what it means to be American. And that's why we will be left defining an American idea for as long as there is an America.

Dan Nicastro writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at dnicastr@student.umass.edu.

The presidential double standard

Parisa Saranj

The image of women in the U.S. media is not a new picture. The arguments and analysis about these images haven't been few either.

In her latest book, "Selling Anxiety: How the News Media Scare Women," Caryl Rivers mentions two of the most powerful images of women in media: the myth of female weakness and female strength. She says a woman is portrayed as either a weak-willed, anxious, small-brained creature or shown as a wonder woman who belittles men to obsessed fools with only the wink of an eye.

However, it is unfortunate when these mentalities enter the field of competition where women struggle to get their hands on male-dominated positions. For instance, Senator Hillary Clinton's presidential candidacy is not solely about politics. It is not only the question of whether the United States is prepared for a woman president, but also the debate on if she is strong enough for such role.

In an article published two weeks ago in The Chronicle Review, Evan R. Goldstein takes a closer look at how Rivers studies Hillary Clinton's image in the media. He claims that even Rivers sees how Hillary's image has been reduced to a dependent woman. These images suggest that Hillary is not as independent as a woman candidate should be since she inherits the whole package from her husband, former president Bill Clinton.

"The idea is that she is never going to be her own person because a woman is always going to be manipulated by a man," according to Goldstein's observations on "Selling Anxiety."

Moreover, there has been another image that consists of a both pre- and post-Monica Lewinski Hillary. In the first period, according to Goldstein, Hillary Clinton is depicted as a strong character that was then seen as weak-willed by being complacent in her husband's immoral behavior. The path these images have taken is exceptionally considerable. The poles are extreme. Would the same shift of conception happen to a male Senator and has created a part of her own identity by now.

Senator Hillary Clinton is considered by many to be a frontrunner in the race for the Democratic candidacy. But is she being subjected to more intense scrutiny because of her gender?

Furthermore, Goldstein mentions how Hillary Clinton's campaign this month has focused on the idea of "women changing America." This stems from her visit to "The View" talk show hosted by Barbara Walters, where she spoke of the difficulties of being a female candidate.

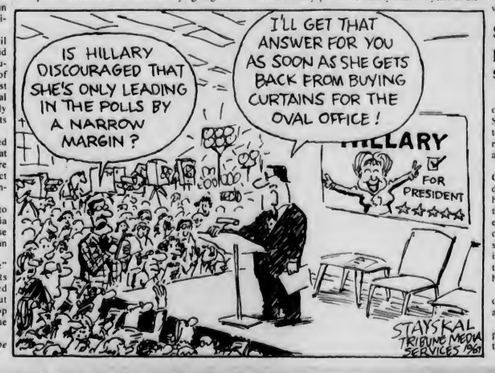
"You try to break a barrier, do the best you can and people are saying, 'Well I don't like her clothes or don't like her hair,' or whatever. But, I think we're getting beyond that," she told "The View."

So, are there tougher standards for women? In the game of politics, everyone is obliged to play the best role by appealing to the mass majority. It is – hopefully – the candidates' credibility that will win them the highest positions, not the hair style or the clothes.

However, this seems to become an additional factor of judgment for some. Maybe if Hillary Clinton succeeds in overcoming obstacles such as anti-feminist bias of media, she would make it to White House. More than anything else, I hope Hillary Clinton wins her battle of breaking these barriers.

At last, University Press of New England has the final words about what Rivers draws: The image the media try to sell us is of a woman who has made her family miserable by achieving the higher standards. This message is often based on specious "scientific" studies and reports that are played over and over again in televised newscasts, print newspapers and the Internet. We should be aware that these stories "sell" because they point out the fears of affluent women.

Senator Hillary Clinton's presidential candidacy is not solely about politics.



What can be done to stop the news media's assault on women? Change, according to Rivers, is the answer. She believes that as women have changed their status to more professional achievers, their media profile have remained the same, saying, "There tends to be great alarm and discomfort in some quarters with change."

My opinion is not an endorsement of Hillary Clinton. It is not an endorsement for any other candidates, either. Rather, it is a call to reflect on how women have been the victims of media coverage – the media that constantly tell them that it is an awful mistake to earn higher education or advance in academia, business, or medicine and has taken the control to feed us with stereotypes and enforcing the status quo. My concern is that women's chances are gradually ruined while the remedy for them is to return to traditional roles of housewives and mothers.

All this is evidence that it is crucial to pay attention to our surrondings. What image are we buying to? Where and from whom are we buying them?

Everything, even the most male-dominated role of the presidency, is possible for women if they are only given the chance.

Parisa Saranj is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at psaranj@student.umass.edu.

You've got to have some sort of opinion on something you see up there. Let us know what it is!

Letters to the editor should be no longer than 550 words and can be sent to: editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Project Runway' starts new season

15 new contestents attempt to win their own fashion line

Reece Coppolino

For devotees of the fashion world, a long awaited event has finally arrived.

Season four of "Project Runway" kicks off today at 10 p.m. on the Bravo network. With its quirky and talented designers, creative twists on challenges and addicting dramatic antics, "Project Runway" has certainly become a guilty pleasure for millions of television viewers.

Throughout the competition, we are graced with the input of notable members from all sectors of the fashion industry. Host and judge Heidi Klum has gained her prominent status in the industry as a top fashion model for many high profile clients, host of "Germany's Next Top Model," and author of "Body of Knowledge: 8 Rules of Model Behavior."

As tradition, Klum's judging panel will include American designer of women's and menswear Michael Kors and fashion director of Elle magazine Nina Garcia. While the three judges consistently critique designs and provide aid in the selection process, a surprise fourth judge always offers a fresh new perspective during each competition.

This season, 15 contestants were selected to showcase their talents to the judges and Bravo spectators. More than ever, this gifted group embodies the most impressive list of credentials. Ranging from age 21 to 46, some competitors admit to having prior experience with designer labels such as Valentino, Alexander McQueen, Oscar de la Renta and Vera Wang. Many have also had their designs featured in the pages of prominent fashion magazines and claim to be favorites of editorial stylists.

Bravo's competition series, which hosts contestants with personal talents rivaling each other, can certainly lead to emotional feuds and frazzled spirits. Considering the varying levels of experience in the fashion industry, I won't be surprised if this season's "Project Runway" competitors establish some sort of talent hierarchy among one another.

While the dramatics undoubtedly boost ratings for the show, I hope the producers for this season aren't as focused on shocking the viewers as they were last season. Contestants who stick around until the very end of the competition shouldn't be those who cause the most controversy, they should be those who embody the most sheer talent.

To celebrate the return of the ever-popular show, Klum, Nina Garcia and Tim Gunn, chief creative officer for Liz Claiborne, Inc and mentor to the competing designers, joined together on Nov. 6 to host the first-ever Project Runway preview fashion show. The 15 designers were instructed to create three signature designs to debut on the runway. The preview showcase was held at Lincoln Center in New York City, and without a doubt, raised anticipation and excitement levels to new heights.

FabSugar.com reports that designs included "cropped military coats, jewel-toned dresses, metallic frocks, Grecian draping, high-waist shorts, long jersey dresses, pant suits, and hats."

It will certainly be difficult to select the winner this season. While reflecting upon the sneak peak, Gunn enthused, "This is the first season I've said any one of the designers is talented enough to win the entire season. There is no one on the show about whom I thought, 'Oh, they'll last two or three challenges and then they're going to be gone.'" Klum proclaimed that the skills of the selected competitors were "made sure of" this time.

Fresh, innovative philosophies, impressive constructing techniques, and flaring tensions are guaranteed to fill the air in the workroom at Parsons School of Design. Will this season finally provide a winner who truly surpasses their fame beyond being named "winner of 'Project Runway'"? Stay tuned to find out whose talents keep them in, and whose designs get the boot with an "Auf Wiedersehen."

Reece Coppolino can be reached rcoppolino@student.umass.edu.

Heidi Klum returns to television tonight as the host of the reality show "Project Runway." This is the shows fourth season.

By Susan Young
The Oakland Tribune

Tim Gunn says this will be a fabulous season filled with the best designers ever, although he says he may get a little more stern with the lot this year.

"This is the first season that any one of the designers is talented enough to win the season, so I don't let them get away with as much," Gunn said in an interview last summer. "We have some of the best designers ever and I'm excited."

Oh, Tim. I so want to believe that.

But based on Wednesday night's fourth season opener, I'm a little concerned. These designers seem a little too professional, and indeed most of them already have decent careers in their chosen profession. I've always sort of liked the underdog tradition at "PR," where some little Cinderella from, say, Oklahoma could just come in and knock our designer hosiery off.

Instead, we've got people like Rami Kashou, who already designs for such stars as Jessica Simpson, Paris Hilton and Jennifer Lopez. I'm no fashion expert. Heck, I can barely dress myself. But Rami got on my nerves almost immediately with his draping fabric and lots of tying. My guru Gunn loves him, so perhaps we'll cut him some slack despite the one-trick-pony feeling.

Ricky Lizalde comes from Oscar de la Renta and has his own line, Lizalde, in major department stores. He's a lingerie kind of guy, however, and went a little too naughty for my tastes.

We do have three locals to root for this season, including Chris March of San Francisco. March is a freelance costume designer living in New York, and his client list includes Cirque du Soleil, Madonna and Thierry Mugler. OK, I had to Google Mugler, but I know the other two. But locals would know him from his work on "Beach Blanket Babylon."

We'll see if this campy costume guy has some hot fashion ideas. In Wednesday's episode, we felt it was a bit mean to show the designers racing across the park to get first dibs on some pricey fabric for the first challenge. Poor March came huffing and puffing in last place and his material choices were limited, even though he claimed everything that would have been his first choice was still available. Scary.

San Francisco native Simone LeBlanc likes to experiment with fabric and she did some funky stuff to the fabric she scored in the race to the material tent. Loved the effort, but the outcome was less than satisfactory. Let's hope for better things down the line.

Both LeBlanc and Jack Mackenroth, who graduated from UC Berkeley with a double degree in fine arts and sociology, attended Parsons School of Design, which Gunn headed before recently moving on to Liz Claiborne. Could it be all the Parsons grads have a bit of an edge?

Gunn says to make it a level playing field, the producers had to make sure everyone was working at a professional level. Once the decision was made to go that direction, they couldn't put people in that weren't up to the challenges.

Better fashion? Sure. Better drama? We'll see. "Project Runway" has always been about the drama, and more importantly, the frills.

Could we get any more into this show? Just watching each week isn't enough. You can access the "Project Runway" WAP site at wap.bravotv.com, or text BRAVA to 27286 to see exclusive video diaries, photos, interviews, designer fashion tips and oh so much more. You can go to the Web site at www.BravoTV.com to "Rate the Runway" and vote on which designs should have been "in or out" after every episode. On mobile phones you can visit www.BravoTV.com to see the bonus clips, check out the videos, read blogs written by Gunn and judges Nina Garcia and, listen to Gunn's podcast.

Then every Thursday morning, you can do a quick recap with your pals around the office where one can actually recreate Gunn's podcast, doing the snooty-sounding voice to perfection.

Ok, may be that's just my editor Chad Jones. But you really should call him sometime and beg him to do the Tim. It's so worth it.

Check out our blogs as we pick our favorites and chase them to the end. Who needs fantasy football when you can have fantasy fashion?

And for those of us who are body challenged, this is as close as we're going to get to haute couture.

'Beowulf' goes digital

John Malkovich leads a stellar cast in new Zemeckis film

By Colin Covert
Minneapolis Star Tribune

"Beowulf" reinterprets the English language's oldest narrative through the latest techniques of digital filmmaking. The results are sometimes spectacular, often empty spectacle.

The 8th-century poem isn't the stuff of traditional screenplay structure – it's two hero vs. monster battles separated by a 50-year gap – and despite an ingenious adaptation by fantasy novelist Neil Gaiman and Oscar-winning screenwriter Roger Avary ("Pulp Fiction"), the tale feels a bit garbled.

You watch it with a sense that there are still scenes missing. The computer-generated visuals, based on motion-captured performances by the cast, are at once photorealistic (you can count the whiskers in Beowulf's blond beard) and phantasmagorical (the monster Grendel is an 11-foot-tall fetus-corpse-lutefisk thing). The film will have a wide release in 3-D, and that's definitely the format it was meant to be seen in.

As you may recall from Cliff's Notes, boozy old King Hrothgar of Denmark (Anthony Hopkins, rendered in eerie living-mannequin style) needs a hero. Grendel, a giant mountain troll, breaks up his parties, bursting into the great hall and gobbling up members of the royal court with very poor table manners. His reluctant consort, Queen Wealtheow (Robin Wright-Penn), wouldn't mind meeting a champion, either. Enter the Viking Beowulf (voice by Ray Winstone, body a digital amalgam of Sean Bean and Hulk Hogan), a fabled warrior who claims to have slain aquatic monstrosities and swum for a week against tidal wave seas. He's a hero with flaws of vanity and braggadocio as overblown as his physique.

From the moment he bellows "I am Beowulf and I am here to slay your monster!" he upsets the balance of power in the kingdom. Unferth (John Malkovich), a conniving courtier, resents the newcomer, while Wealtheow can scarcely catch her breath in his presence.

The film makes quite an issue out of Beowulf's superhero physique. As he strips down for the night, the camera virtually licks his body, while comic-prudish Austin Powers obstructions hide his broadsword. There's plenty of raucous, politically incorrect humor in this retelling.

Beowulf proves he's more than good looks, and when Grendel attacks again, he mortally wounds the beast with his bare hands in a scene of exuberant bloodletting. After that confrontation he tracks the creature back to its lair, determined to kill its mother. When she turns out to be a shape-shifter who can do a striking impersonation of Angelina Jolie, his commitment wobbles and he makes a decision that will return to haunt him after he assumes the king's throne.

Where the film works best is in the reinvention of the narrative. The hero-good/monster-bad flatness of the poem is reworked for modern sensibilities, with flawed characters who grow through their experiences. Grendel (harrowingly portrayed by Crispin Glover) is a pitiable ogre whose life is near-constant torment. His ghastly mutant form is cleverly accounted for, as is his angry yet fearful relationship with Hrothgar.

The origins of the mysterious dragon are made clear, too. These monsters are by-products of the kings' lust, power, or lust for power, demons that are not so easily vanquished.

Director Robert Zemeckis has succeeded in making his human characters much more plausible than in his choo-choo-of-the-undead picture "The Polar Express." The skin textures are remarkable, muscles knot and relax realistically, and the eyes are full of emotion (at least for the primary male characters and Jolie, the background folks aren't so lovingly rendered).

His action scenes are borderline ludicrous, however. He seems drunk on the novelty of his new toys, using them to dazzle more than to advance the story.

Zemeckis sends his virtual camera zooming up to the skies along the trajectories of flung bodies, and dollying back from a castle window up to the top of a far-off mountain (mountains in Denmark?) just because it looks cool. From the look of the movie, he shot every wild idea that came to him without regard to the flow or development of the images. Then he chopped it up, slapped it together with his fingers crossed, and hoped everyone would be too giddy to notice the holes.

There are passages of exuberant fun when the flying dragon tries to char-broil the ladies of the court while Beowulf holds on with one hand and hacks with the other. The overall effect is intrusive and gimmicky. A collage of interesting fragments, "Beowulf" is a triumphant mess.

Director Robert Zemeckis has previously worked with digital graphics in the movie adaption of the "The Polar Express." However, this time around the graphic body features are more realistic.

Koepplin hits career-long kick honors for his pair of field goals in the win over UNH.

FOOTBALL from page 8

The senior nailed a career-long 51-yard field goal in the first quarter to give UMass the early 3-0 lead. The kick was a yard short of the UMass record of 52 yards, accomplished twice in school history.

Dennis Gagnon kicked the first 52-yarder in 1971, also against UNH. Sandro Vitiello tied the mark in 1978 against Boston College.

Koepplin tied his career-long of 48 yards in the season-opener against Holy Cross. Asked if he was aware of the school record before attempting the kick, Koepplin shrugged off the thought.

"I was more worried about just getting out there and getting my spots and making sure I was on the line," Koepplin said.

"I knew what the record was, I just wasn't thinking about it when I went out there."

LAWRENCE LEAVING MARK

Lawrence finished the day with 139 rushing yards, pushing his season total to 1,274. His best season prior to 2007 was last year – when he racked up 174 yards on 34 carries.

His total this year is the ninth-best in UMass history, two yards behind Frank Alessio's 1,276 in 1995. He will likely pass that mark and Rene Ingoglia's 1,285 in 1993 next week at Hostra. Ingoglia's 1,505 yards in 1994 would be next at No. 6 in the list. Of course, Marcel Shipp's 2,542 yards during the national championship season in 1998 is easily the top single-season rushing mark … The Minutemen's eight sacks of UNH quarterback Ricky Santos included two on consecutive plays by defensive end Michael Hanson. He is now tied for second in the CAA with seven sacks … Fellow defensive end David Burris leads the conference with nine sacks.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Huskies claim another upset victim

CAA NOTEBOOK from page 8

at 1-7 overall.

Last week they went to Durham, N.H., and defeated the Wildcats in convincing fashion, 31-13. This week they pulled an upset at home by beating Hofstra, 35-31, on a trick play on the final drive.

The Huskies (3-7, 2-5 CAA) looked like they would drop another conference game with 2:16 left in the game. They received poor field position on their own 8-yard line and would need a substantial drive to get in field goal position.

Hofstra (7-3, 4-3 CAA) couldn't respond to the Huskies' drive and suffered its third loss of the season.

"They had our number, they kept us off balance, they did a really good job, they changed the tempo and the pace of things," said Hofstra coach Dave Cohen. "They did one or two things we hadn't seen on tape which was really effective."

Running back Maurice Morris created problems for the Pride defense all day. He rushed for 147 yards and three touchdowns, and is now 68 yards short of tying L.J. McKanas's 3,692 rushing yards at Northeastern.

LANDERS LEADS JMU

After consecutive losses by a combined four points, James Madison (7-3, 5-2 CAA) got back on track thanks to an impressive performance by quarterback Rodney Landers.

The Dukes scored on their first nine offensive possessions, including five touchdowns on their first five drives, to beat William & Mary (4-6, 2-5 CAA) by a score of 55-34.

Griff Yancey rushed for 135 yards and three touchdowns, but Landers was not to be outdone. He rushed for 171 yards with a pair of touchdowns and broke the JMU rushing records for a quarterback for the second time this season – he previously set it when he ran for 166 yards Oct. 6.

"It's very difficult with all the offensive skill kids we've had out to have a lot of continuity in the throwing game," said JMU coach Mickey Matthews. "Sometimes it's not his fault, running bad routes or whatever, but he's improving."

Yancey won his second consecutive CAA Rookie of the Week Award. All three of JMU's first quarter touchdowns came via Yancey runs and his 25 rushes were a career high for the redshirt freshman.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

COLONIAL ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION STANDINGS

– NORTH DIVISION –

TEAM	CAA RECORD	OVERALL RECORD	PA	PF
Massachusetts	6-1	8-2	300	175
Hofstra	4-3	7-3	281	222
New Hampshire	3-4	6-4	355	300
Maine	3-4	4-6	172	230
Northeastern	2-5	3-7	187	257
Maine	1-6	2-8	193	330

– SOUTH DIVISION –

TEAM	CAA RECORD	OVERALL RECORD	PA	PF
Richmond	6-1	8-2	371	235
Delaware	5-2	8-2	409	271
James Madison	5-2	7-3	350	224
Villanova	4-3	6-4	272	251
William & Mary	2-5	4-6	299	396
Towson	1-6	3-7	158	219

Sowry brought new confidence to UM

CONNORS from page 8

Sophomore Cher King, who led the team with eight goals this season, nicely summed up how the immediate success came about.

"[Sowry] can be your coach and your friend, but I feel players need that from their coach to know they're comfortable," said King. "She came in and just said 'Don't worry about last year, we can change it around if we just believe.'"

Belief was drilled into the players' heads time after time this year. It sounds like a simple concept, but it's harder coming off a year in which the Minutewomen won six games.

"You're not only coaching the game of field hockey, you're coaching the game of life and many life lessons," Sowry said after the team's final game. "The field hockey component is only a small part of my job and that's challenging for me but it's just so rewarding."

If anyone was to watch part of a practice or see Sowry on the sideline, it's obvious this isn't just a coach who says one thing and does another. What you see is what you get, and Sowry never seems to get too worked up. She'll yell when things need to be corrected, but she is the same person who hands out pirate flags for awards.

Sowry must have known what percentage of work and play were necessary to capture a conference tournament. For the first time since 2001, UMass won the A-10 Championship.

In the first round, it defeated Richmond for the second time this season. To put that in perspective, Richmond outscored UMass 39-8 from 2002-2006 and went 8-0 against the Minutewomen during that span. This year, UMass allowed one goal in two games, and the Spiders' five-year conference championship run was over.

While coaches and players alike were disappointed after the loss to UConn, one could tell how proud they were of the season. UMass field hockey is back on the map.

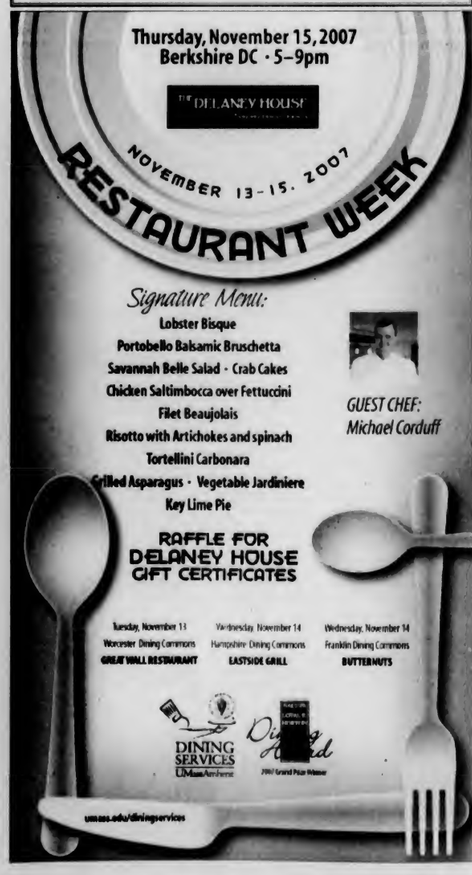
But Sowry will have to try and work her magic again in 2008 with a team losing six seniors. If she can do anything similar to 2007, other coaches are going to be making the trip to Amherst to take notes.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

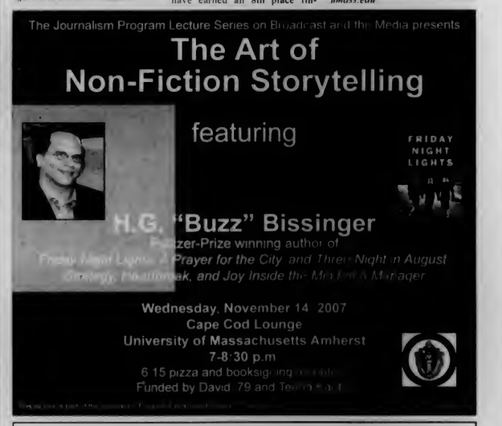
UMass looking for positives to build on

CROSS COUNTRY from page 8

McCann (51st), junior captain Jesse Regnier (71st) and freshman Kris Carle (79th).



All five runners provide tremendous depth for the men's team. Although they have not always participated in the same races, none of the runners placed outside the team's top five in any race. Yet none of the runners in this weekend's top five have more than four races—out of a possible seven—to their credit this season.



While moving up three spots as a team from last year's meet, if each of the top five runners on the team had finished two seconds faster, the team would have earned an 8th place finish. However the team overcame individual respiratory problems to earn its place in the Top 15. O'Brien's goal for the team was to finish in seventh place, but he understands this is a tough time in the season for his young runners to consistently perform at a high level.

"I'm disappointed that we didn't reach our goal, but at the same time we had a lot of good things happen," O'Brien said. "I think we ended up with a better day than our 11th place indicates."

The Minutemen will join the Minutewomen in the Bronx, where they will finish their seasons at the 1C4A Championships.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT
REGISTRATION FOR SPRING 2007

The WRITING PROGRAM PLACEMENT TEST
Will be offered on:

Wednesday, November 14, @ 7:00 pm, Herter 217

Monday, December 3, @ 7:00 pm, Herter 217

This test is the pre-requisite for enrollment in EnglWrit 112, (College Writing).

This test may be taken only once.

Students do not need to register for the test.

Seven O's
EVERY WEDNESDAY
KARAOKE
* * * * * *
THURSDAY, 11/15/07
CHARLIE THE DOGG
FRIDAY, 11/16/07
SCENIC ROUTE
SATURDAY, 11/17/07
NO NO'S BAND
STUDENT BAND WANTED.
NEED A PLACE TO PLAY? COME TO SEVEN O'S.
LOOKING FOR A PLACE TO HAVE A PRIVATE EVENT/PARTY?
CALL 413-530-6996
ROUTE 116, 330 AMHERST RD
SUNDERLAND, MA 01375
(413) 665-6788
3 PM TO 1 AM M-F
1 PM TO 1 AM SAT&SUN
NEXT TO CUTTYSOL ARTS.

Whatever gets you through the day.

7	5			3		9
			6	7	1
							7
9					6	2	1	5
	6						9
3	2	1	5					8
	7
			2	1	9
		2		4			6	3

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Splinter group
5 Out-of-fashion
10 Kind of crazy?
14 Ibuprofen target
15 Duck past
16 Coastal eagle
17 Native American tribe
18 Medieval surcoat
19 Highway
20 Sheep fat
21 Famed violin maker
22 International monetary standard
23 Big rigs
25 With intensity
27 Coil
29 La Scala offering
31 Corrida call
32 Irritate
34 The nays
38 Emcee
40 Attire
42 Legal wrong
43 Chose
45 Fed the pot
47 Commit slander
48 Brooding places
50 Most recent
52 Proprietary product
55 Part of the way up?
56 News piece
57 Hot under the collar
60 Scroll
63 Sound quality
64 Actress Sophia
65 Skiers' ride
66 Fly and fly
67 Clear thinking
68 Yale alumni
69 Shipped
70 JFK' director
71 Lacrosse or tennis

DOWN
1 Pouchlike structures
2 Hosiery shade
3 Of the poorest quality
4 Rock on the edge
5 Itemized
6 Grails
7 Albacore in a can
8 Correct text
9 Make up one's mind
10 York or Friday
11 Group of scouts
12 Total
13 "I am Woman" singer
24 Traveler's guide
26 Period of time
27 London district
28 Drop heavily
29 Bakery appliances
30 Irritant
33 QED part
35 Just OK
36 Eye part
37 Editorial notation
39 Apartment building
41 Time to serve
44 Hideaway
46 Narc org.
49 Photographs
51 Cold season
52 Sandwich breads
53 Make amends
54 Morbid repertoire
55 Pewter mug
58 Botanical anchor
59 Jason's ship
61 Discomfort
62 Scottish Gaelic

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes start January 2nd
Plan Now for Winter Break
Get ahead this Winter wherever you are!
Online classes or on campus classes?
YOU DECIDE!!!
Registration begins Tuesday Nov. 13th
www.UMassULearn.net

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Good relations with the Wookiees, I have."

-Yoda

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK By Josh Shalek

LAST DITCH EFFORT By John Kroes

THE QUIGMANS By Buddy Hickerson

"Calling dispatch ... This is Officer Katz ... I'm in pursuit of my tail ... requesting backup."

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
J-Lo is having three babies. One in her belly, two in her bum cheeks.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
H-2-O-NO you did not leave the water running in your sink. You must conserve.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Don't eat after midnight or you'll turn into a gremlin or a Furby.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Underneath it all, you're wearing a man thong and that must be uncomfortable.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Closeness only counts in horseshoes, hand grenades and sexual harassment suits.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Get your dancing pants on, a new season of Project Runway is afoot. Make it work!

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
...and flings them sideways out of a CATapult thus forming a feline projectile.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Your arms feel like you don't love them because you insist on wearing vests.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You are the editor of a very important page in a college newspaper, oh wait, that's me.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Hot mom and daughter combos: good or creepily incestuous?

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Start gathering roadkill for next week's Thanksgiving extravaganza.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
One day you will make cookies that are as delicious as your mother's.

THERE WAS A TIME WHEN THIS BOX WAS FILLED WITH COPIOUS AMOUNTS OF SNOW. ALAS! GLOBAL WARMING!

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Montreal weekend from $99.00 complete motel, transportation and more. Montreal Express.net 781-979-9001. Lowest prices on campus.

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt.
JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts.
Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

EMPLOYMENT

Hurry! Last day to apply to become a legal assistant a the Student Legal Services Office is Nov. 16th. Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable experience in the legal field. Stop by our office at 922 Campus Center or call 413-545-1995

Part-time teller opening in Amherst 11-2 M-Thurs, Friday. 1-6 pm + Sat. 8:30-12:30 pm. $9.75/hr. Call 529-7100 or email mmisuraca@staffingnow.com for more info.

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

FOUND

Ipod Nano SOM. Contact Prof. Weiss to identify. mweiss@northamptonlaw.com

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birth-control, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst. Call 413-548-9992. Walk ins welcome. www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

NOV 14 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fairytale run authored by rookie coach

Mike Connors

Sometimes it takes coaches a substantial amount of time to turn around a struggling program. Players must become comfortable with the coach and learn a new system. And if all that goes smoothly, everyone must then buy into that system.

First-year Massachusetts field hockey coach Justine Sowry took over the reins after a 6-14 2006 season, and in fairytale fashion, turned the frog into a prince.

After starting the season a mediocre 5-6, the Minutewomen won nine of their last 12 games to earn a berth in the NCAA Tournament before losing to Connecticut, 4-1. The 14 wins are the most since the team won 19 in 2000.

In between the first 11 games and the tournament loss, UMass did some special things.

Goalkeeper Becky Letourneau, who lost her starting job to Sarah Williams last season, made 52 saves in the final 12 games of the season, while only allowing 10 goals. This equates to a .839 save percentage and a 0.83 goals-against average. One highlight of Letourneau's senior season included her 12 saves in a 2-1 victory over Princeton in the play-in game for the NCAA Tournament.

Captain Erin O'Brien led a defense that allowed 25 goals in 23 games, and consistently shut down opposing teams' star players. Joining O'Brien in the backfield were fellow seniors Kristina DoRosario and Nicole Phelan, as well as freshman Jaime Bourazeris.

They developed a chemistry that stopped teams from scoring 31 less goals than they did last year – and in three less games.

"Just like any UMass program, we're a blue-collar team," Phelan said. "If there's anything to go out with, it's just that I'm very proud to be part of a program that is going to put it all on the field."

Sowry admits her team wasn't the most skilled team in Division 1 field hockey, but through promoting hard work and confidence, she lead them to the top of the A-10 and beyond.

Athletic Director John McCutcheon is likely patting himself on the back for the hiring of Sowry. The native Australian won Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year, and brought in experienced assistants to supplement her knowledge.

Kelly Dostal won three consecutive NCAA Championships at Wake Forest from 2002-2004 and Chrissy Needham played four years an UConn.

This staff of winning coaches bred winning in Amherst – with the field hockey skill of the staff, combined Sowry's personality, everything seemed to click into place.

See CONNORS on page 6

Justine Sowry led UMass to its first NCAA tournament birth since 2001 in her first year as coach.

Eagles come to Mullins

UM looks to start season on winning streak

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Five days after a 69-68 win over Vermont got its 2007-08 season off to a rolling start, the Massachusetts women's basketball team faces Boston College in the Mullins Center tonight at 6.

The teams last met Dec. 31, 2006 when the Eagles defeated UMass 70-64. The year before that, BC trampled the Maroon and White 83-44 on Dec. 8.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko hopes to turn things around today as the Minutewomen (1-0) brace to take on a team that last year posted a 13-16 overall record.

The Eagles are 1-0 after besting Wright State (0-1) 68-36 Friday and the Minutewomen have just that one game to help them scout the Eagles.

"They really want to get the ball inside. They have a lot of isolation players," said Dacko, looking at game film. "They lost Kathrin Ress to graduation and she's been doing a great job in the WNBA [for the Minnesota Lynx] and so they replaced her with [freshman center] Carolyn Swords and they're looking to get the ball out [to her]."

Swords led the way for BC Friday night, scoring 23 points and six rebounds in the contest. Swords saw 29 minutes and went 11-of-15 from the floor; the performance won her ACC Rookie of the Week honors. It was the first time in school history a freshman had earned the award.

Junior Corey Rusin also made her presence known, adding 10 points, two assists and two steals.

According to Dacko, Rusin is a very talented shooter off the bench. She didn't get a lot of minutes last year but will be making up for it soon and Dacko said she is someone her team needs to watch out for.

Kate Mills and the Minutewomen host Boston College at 6 p.m. tonight. The men's and women's basketball team play a doubleheader tonight, with the men's team holding their home opener at 8 p.m. against Yale.

Dacko tried to recruit Rusin to UMass before she opted for BC.

Freshman Stefanie Murphy contributed nine points to Friday's win. She went 4-of-8 from the field and 1-of-2 at the free-throw line in her first collegiate game. She also grabbed seven boards (three offensively, four defensively) and recorded an assist.

Dacko added, however, that her Minutewomen shouldn't focus on individual players, but on BC as a whole.

"They're a solid team. We've got our work cut out for us. And hopefully we're going to get a collective effort. Hopefully some of the freshmen that got their feet wet against Vermont are going to be better," she said. "Hopefully we're going to be better in being consistent.

"We went to the line 15 times the second half and four times the first half. We want to get to the foul line more," she continued. "I think the first-game jitters are over. We got through it."

The game will be somewhat of a reunion for the teams' coaches. BC coach Cathy Inglese was Dacko's teammate at Southern Connecticut State University in the 1970s. Dacko was a post player for the Owls, while Inglese, who was two years behind her, was a guard.

Dominic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Runners struggle at NCAA Regionals

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Depth was again a huge factor for the Massachusetts cross country teams Saturday. The men's team came in 11th place, while the women's team took 28 at this year's NCAA Regional meet.

After finishing 20th at the meet a season ago, the Minutewomen fell eight spots, for various reasons.

Due to injury, the women's team did not have senior captain Amber Sayer, redshirt freshman Shiyi Zan or freshman Lauren Stocker. Freshman Samantha Sacchetti dropped out during the race because of a knee injury.

The lack of depth hampered the Maroon and White this weekend. Sayer, Zan and Stocker are consistently in the top five on the team and their presence was sorely missed in this race.

Behind the team-leading 26th-place finish of senior captain Christina DeRosa, the only other runner to finish any previous race better than fourth on the team was freshman Kristin Darling. Darling placed third on the team and 196th overall this weekend.

The top five UMass runners on the day were DeRosa, junior Beth Harlow, Darling, and freshmen Erin Megan and Elizabeth Fisk. Harlow, Megan and Fisk placed 182nd, 199th and 203rd, respectively.

However, this was invaluable experience to a young team. Freshmen take up over half the roster's 20 spots. Sacchetti steadily improves her time in every race that she participates in. Also, Harlow provides a solid example for her younger counterparts to emulate, finishing one spot higher in each of this year's competitions that she has participated in.

"It's going to take time for them to develop and be where they need to be," women's coach Julie LaFreniere said of her young team. "I think it was just a tough meet. It didn't go the way we were hoping it to go but I'm not really sure why or what happened."

The Minutewomen will conclude their season Saturday at the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championships in the Bronx, N.Y.

The Minutemen also had young runners take control of the team and ultimately propel them to an 11th-place finish, three places higher than last season.

Freshman Jeff Hill led the team, finishing 36th. Of Hill's four races this year, the Blackstone, Mass., native has finished as the top UMass runner three times. Hill was among the top runners in the race, even leading for the first two miles, however he could not overcome the experienced running of the other athletes.

Men's coach Ken O'Brien noted that the Minutemen have fallen victim on numerous occasions to teams that have a top-tier runner. The ability of the Maroon and White to have runners step in and fill gaps left by other runners is crucial to the team's success.

Finishing second for UMass was sophomore Jonathan Pierce, finishing 47th overall. Rounding out the top five for the men's team were sophomore Andrew

See CROSS COUNTRY on page 6

Coen becomes all-time leading passer

UMass quarterback eclipses Bankhead on passing yards list

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team's quarterback will likely never be forgotten in UMass sports lore. Liam Coen became the school's all-time leading passer Saturday in the Minutemen's 27-7 victory over New Hampshire.

Coen threw for 191 yards on 21-of-28 passing and a touchdown to Michael Omar. That lifted his career total to 7,133, enough to pass Todd Bankhead's 7,018, amassed in two seasons at UMass (1998-99).

UMass Football

"It's really special to do something like that with the group of guys that we have on a day like today," Coen said after the game. "To be mentioned with the likes of guys like Todd Bankhead and Jeff Krohn (fourth all-time), it's a great thing. I'm really appreciative of the whole system and the coaches."

Coen entered his junior year third all-time on the UMass passing list, passing Dave Palazzi (5,402 yards from 1985-88) and Bankhead during the season. Coen became No. 1 in touchdown passes earlier this season, passing Bankhead's 51. To date, Coen has thrown 55 touchdowns as a Minuteman.

On a day when Walter Payton Award winner Ricky Santos was getting most of the attention as people wanted to see how he would fair against the powerful UMass defense, Coen turned out to be the quarterback putting up numbers.

"There were two quarterbacks out there today, and we happen to have a pretty good guy here, too, who just happened to be 21-of-28," UMass coach Don Brown said of Coen.

With a season-plus remaining in his already illustrious career, Coen is now 2,867 yards away from being the first UMass quarterback to pass for 10,000 yards.

Interestingly, four of UMass's top six passers in history all played within the last decade. Coen (2005-present), Bankhead (1998-99), Krohn (2002-03) and Tim Day (sixth, 2002-2005) all played out their careers at UMass in the last 10 years.

Palazzi and Peil Pennington fifth all-time with 4,687 yards from 1971-73 – are the other quarterbacks on that list.

This season, Coen ranks sixth in the Colonial Athletic Association with 1,942 passing yards, but tops the league with 19 touchdown passes. His 148.1 efficiency rating is fourth overall.

Liam Coen still has a year left in his collegiate career, and already has more passing yards than any other Minuteman.

Koepplin gets his kicks

UMass place-kicker Chris Koepplin earned this week's CAA Special Teams Player of the Week

See FOOTBALL on page 6

Spiders clinch CAA South division title

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

Richmond thought they had defeated Delaware, 38-31, at the end of regulation, but they were in store for a lot more football.

It appeared the game clock was at 0:00 before the Blue Hens' center snapped the ball to quarterback Joe Flacco, but the referees ruled the snap occurred before time expired, and Flacco ran the ball into the end zone.

CAA Football

With the extra point converted, the game was headed to overtime.

Both teams scored touchdowns, and then field goals, during the first two overtimes before Delaware had a chance to seal the win in the third extra session. Place-kicker John Striefsky had not missed a field goal or extra point this season, but his 22-yard attempt hit the left upright and the Spiders (8-2, 6-1 Colonial Athletic Association) remained alive.

Richmond would go ahead in the fifth overtime and Michael Ireland made sure the Blue Hens (8-2, 5-2 CAA) wouldn't respond. He knocked away Flacco's third- and fourth-down passes to secure the victory. With the win, the Spiders clinched the CAA South Division crown.

"Usually after you win you sleep a little better than when you lose," Richmond coach Dave Clawson said in this week's CAA teleconference. "Even Saturday night, I had a hard time sleeping. It's really hard to decompress after a game like that."

Spider quarterback Eric Ward won CAA Offensive Player of the Week for his efforts in the win. The sophomore threw for 199 yards and four touchdowns, and did not turn the ball over once. He also carried the ball and was responsible for 14 of Richmond's 22 first downs.

In the matchup of two Walter Payton Award candidates, Tim Hightower carried the ball for 113 yards and a touchdown, while Delaware's Omar Cuff ran 48 times for 189 yards and two touchdowns.

Huskies down Hofstra

Two weeks ago, Northeastern was beginning to look like a team the opposition could pencil in as a win on the schedule. They hadn't won a conference game and stood

See CAA NOTEBOOK on page 6

Breaking down the Minutemen

By Eli Rosenwaike
Collegian Staff

The running theme of the 2007-08 Massachusetts men's basketball team is how different this squad looks from last year's.

Not only are there a number of new players, the style of basketball will look nothing like last season. Third-year coach Travis Ford now has the players in place to execute his preferred brand of basketball, which involves a lot of running and a lot of shooting.

Here's a player-by-player breakdown of the roster. The ordering of players at each position is dictated by the expected playing time.

GUARDS

Chris Lowe

The 6-foot, 170-pound point guard from Mount Vernon, N.Y., was Ford's first recruit to sign at UMass three years ago. And if you ask Ford, he thinks his junior guard is the perfect player to run the new offense.

"Chris Lowe is probably the fastest point guard from end-to-end in the country," Ford said. "This really fits the way he plays. He's the quarterback of this team; this is his basketball team."

Lowe's performance will be pivotal to the Maroon and White. And he has the ability, experience and skill set to do just that.

He's one of the best defending guards on the UMass roster and has exceptional quickness with the ball. He's a solid distributor, something that will the other guards and scoring forwards.

His 4.2 assists per game last year ranked third in the Atlantic 10. Although turnovers have been an issue in the past for the Minutemen, Lowe was solid in 2006, ranking fourth in the conference in assist-to-turnover ratio.

Ricky Harris

Ford hopes Harris, a sophomore shooting guard, will be on the receiving end on many of Lowe's passes. And Harris will likely be standing behind the 3-point line waiting for them.

Fans should expect the 6-foot-2 Harris to shoot at least five shots from behind the arc every game. Ford thinks that could translate to him leading the team in scoring this season. On some nights he may take 10 shots, and he is a prime candidate to the lead the conference in attempts from long range. Even on nights when his shot is not falling, Ford will likely tell Harris to keep shooting.

Harris played just under 11 minutes per game in 2006, but will start this year and see extensive playing time. He is also a capable defender; someone Ford hopes will guard elite players on the opposition.

He has some experience at point guard, but he is unlikely to see any of his minutes from that spot this season.

Max Groebe

Despite coming off the bench, this 6-foot-5 freshman shooting guard just might challenge Harris for the most 3-point attempts on the team this season. Groebe has good size at the wing spot, and is a terrific catch-and-shoot player. Lowe's assist numbers are likely to rise when Harris and Groebe are on the floor.

With his shooting and athletic ability, coupled with his defensive skills, Groebe may lead the freshmen in minutes played.

He was a McDonald's All-American nominee his senior season in high school in Miami, averaging 22.3 points and seven rebounds per game. Groebe was born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and is a member of the German national team. He was recruited by perennial Division 1 power Georgetown, but opted for UMass instead.

Ford is pleased he did, and expects him to make a big contribution off the bench in his inaugural season.

Gary Correia

The 6-foot-1 freshman is capable of playing both guard positions, but Ford is hoping Correia can quickly develop and be the backup at the point to Lowe. In the meantime, forward Gary Forbes may see some time at point guard when Lowe is getting a breather.

"It's a very critical situation, it will probably be Gary Forbes until this point, until Gary Correia is ready," Ford said about the backup point guard spot. "We don't want to put a lot of pressure on him so early. But as much as any player on our team, he's getting better every day."

Much like the other guards, Correia is a capable shooter and another player likely to get his share of 3-point attempts. He's also a strong passer and the leadership he displayed in high school will translate into significant minutes this season.

Matt Glass

Another freshman guard, Glass played a prep year with Correia at the Northfield Mount Hermon School last year. At 6-foot-7 and 200 pounds, Glass has good size for a shooting guard and his good rebounding skills enable him to play at the small forward position as well.

His main attribute is his shooting touch, particularly from 3-point range. His ball-handling and defensive skills are not where Ford wants them to be, and his improvement in those areas will dictate his playing time.

Glass helped lead his high school team to two state titles, and he was named Mr. Vermont Basketball in his final two seasons. As a senior he averaged over 22 points and 10 rebounds per game.

Nana Ampim

The walk-on from London, England, has rarely seen the court in his three seasons at UMass. His senior campaign is expected to be more of the same for the 6-foot-1 guard.

Over that time he has appeared in eight games, seeing 11 total minutes of game action. However, he is one of the better athletes on the team and may be the best defensive player on the entire roster.

Ampim plays with a lot of intensity – particularly on the defensive end – but his overall game hasn't been there. And that's reflected in the sparse minutes.

Sedale Jones

Jones is one of many freshman guards Ford recruited to fit his style. A 6-foot-4 shooting guard, the Pittsfield native will likely get the fewest minutes of the freshman class.

He's a good shooter, but the coaching staff wants him to play more physically and improve on his defensive skills. He comes to UMass after a year at Notre Dame Prep in Fitchburg, a highly regarded program.

Anthony Gurley

This sophomore transfer from Wake Forest is perhaps the most highly touted of all the newcomers to Ford's roster. But Gurley will sit out the entire season per NCAA regulations after transferring.

He played in all 31 games for the Demon Deacons, making one start. He averaged over 14 minutes per contest, scoring over six points per game. He's a 6-foot-3 shooting guard capable of scoring in bunches, and will bring a lot of excitement to the Mullins Center in 2008-09.

FORWARDS

Gary Forbes

Ford classifies the 2007-08 Minutemen as Lowe's team, but Forbes is his best player. He's a virtual lock to lead UMass in scoring and he also has a good chance to lead the team in rebounding.

The 6-foot-7 redshirt senior took time to acclimate himself last season after transferring from Virginia, but he still managed to average 13 points and 5.8 rebounds per game. Those numbers will see a big increase now that he's more comfortable and responsible for the scoring load.

Forbes is one of four captains this season, and is capable of playing any position on the floor. He will start at the small forward spot, but will also see some time at point guard. He is a dangerous offensive weapon with an inside and outside game, providing matchup problems for the defense.

He spent the summer playing in the FIBA Americas Championship for his native Panama, gaining valuable experience against world-class competition. Although the Panamanian team struggled, Forbes excelled averaging 17.8 points per game.

Forbes was named to the A-10 Preseason Third Team; that should serve as good motivation for him, although he's never lacked drive to improve on the basketball court.

Etienne Brower

Another senior captain, Brower is a terrific athlete that will start at the power forward position. He battled through injuries last season that limited him to 22 games, but this will be his year to prove himself, provided he stays healthy.

He is a versatile player, capable of playing anywhere in the front court. He's generally considered the hardest-working player on the team, and Ford raves about how important it is to have players like Brower on the team.

The 6-foot-8 forward can shoot the ball well, and is a 3-point threat. He can also get to the basket, using his phenomenal leaping skills to throw down power dunks to pump up his teammates.

With the lack of established big men, it will be important for Brower to help out with the rebounding. His athletic ability should allow him to do that.

Tony Gaffney

After transferring from Boston University, Gaffney sat out last season. But the 6-foot-8 redshirt junior power forward is now ready to contribute in many ways.

Gaffney will get plenty of playing time and his primary concern will be rebounding. He's a good rebounder and a capable defender – using his long arms to get steals, help on defensive traps and block shots. Much like the other new players, Gaffney can shoot the ball from the perimeter and seems like a good fit to the team.

His role should increase as the season wears on, and he could find his way into the starting lineup from time to time if his offensive game becomes more complete

Trey Lang

Ford is impressed with this 6-foot-7 freshman's strength and physicality, but is looking for him to develop a more well-rounded offensive game. He is a good finisher, but his jump shot and release need to improve.

He has a pretty good post game already, and is a player that the coaching staff is really excited about. But it appears much of that excitement will be generated in the coming seasons, not necessarily this one.

Matt Hill

Hill won't see much time this season as a freshman. He was injured last year and is still recovering. The coaches are taking their time with Hill, getting him accustomed to the offense and trying to get him fully healthy.

A 6-foot-7 power forward, Hill can shoot mid-range jump shots and also take it into the low post. He has a good all-around inside game, capable of blocking shots and getting rebounds.

Matt Pennie

Pennie may play sparingly typically in the final minutes of uncontested games – but he plays a key role on the team.

Now a graduate student, the former team manager and walk-on was named a captain for this season. He works extremely hard in practice, trying to bring out the best in all his teammates.

CENTERS

Dante Milligan

The 6-foot-9, 215 pound redshirt senior will likely get the majority of the starts at center. He played less than 10 minutes per game in 12 contests last year, but improved his play as the season progressed.

A captain this year, Milligan is one of the best of the team at blocking shots and will be counted on to rebound regularly. Milligan, a captain this season, has struggled with consistency.

Being a senior and a captain a lot is expected out of Dante. He's a hard worker and will need to continue improving his offensive game and overall rebounding skills.

Luke Bonner

Milligan will have to show the improvement Ford is looking for, otherwise Bonner will get more starts at center.

The redshirt junior has tremendous size at 7-foot-1 and 245-pounds, but he needs to improve his rebounding production. Without Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman it will be crucial for him to grab a high number of rebounds.

Bonner's minutes should see a big jump from last year (7.21 and Ford thinks that he's up for the task.

Bonner can shoot the ball well for a big man. But with many solid shooters on this basketball team, it will be his inside game that matters most. Bonner's development is something to watch for this season. His high intelligence on the court should help him improve his overall game.

Papa Lo

This is a player who will instantly be a fan favorite, for a multitude of reasons.

First, he's very similar to Lasme, who was an extremely popular player in his time at UMass. Like Lasme, he comes to UMass from abroad. Senegal as a tall and skinny shot-blocking extraordinaire. He also has a lot to learn offensively like Lasme did, but Ford thinks Lo's defensive skills are better.

Lo is shorter than most good shot-blockers, but he has tremendous hands and uses that to his advantage. He will get sparing minutes, but they will likely get more substantial as he becomes more comfortable.

Labs had a knack for defensive skills in the exhibition against Concordia when they erupted after an emphatic block by the 6-foot-9 freshman.

Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at erosenwaike@student.umass.edu.

With UMass coach Travis Ford placing emphasis on the 3-point shot this season, sophomore shooting guard Ricky Harris' shooting touch will be an important part of the Minuteman offense.

Senior Dante Milligan is the team's only returning traditional center. Expect the captain to be the Minutemen's primary offensive and defensive presence in the paint, and to increase his rebound production.

UMASS MEN'S BASKETBALL
VS.
YALE
TONIGHT 8 P.M.
AT THE MULLINS CENTER

NOV 14 2007

NOV 15 2007

New faces for UMass

Freshmen to play integral role off bench in 2007 campaign

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Historically in the Atlantic 10, the best teams have been the ones returning the majority of its starters. Last season the Massachusetts men's basketball returned its most important players and rode that experience to a share of the A-10 regular season conference title.

This year, UMass coach Travis Ford has the challenge of integrating nine newcomers (if you include transfer Anthony Gurley who will redshirt the 2007-08 season) to a squad returning the same number of players.

But the Minutemen return two starters and six other letterwinners, and the team now just has an unusually large roster.

Yet with the up-tempo style the Minutemen are playing, they'll need a lot of players.

So the Maroon and White return plenty of experience, but the team's seven freshmen will certainly need to be a positive factor in order to return UMass to the postseason for the second time in as many years.

Ford recruited the freshmen with the intention of implementing the up-tempo style and emphasis on the 3-point shot.

Guard Max Groebe will most likely see the most minutes among the freshmen this season. He is one of the team's best shooters and his ability to make the 3-point shot should make Groebe the most important offensive player off the bench.

"Groebe brings that dimension where he can score a lot of points very quickly," Ford said. "He will probably stand out among the freshmen."

Gary Correia will also see time at point guard, spelling Chris Lowe in conjunction with Gary Forbes.

It remains to be seen how the Minutemen will integrate the other freshman into the lineup. Though, forward Papa Lo and Trey Lang will see some time in the front court, with Matt Glass seeing some minutes at small forward.

Overall, Ford acknowledges that it has been a challenge to integrate so many young faces into the system.

"It's just been a slow process," he said. "The first day of practice, everyone is looking at you like you have no idea what you're talking about. Last year, we were so far ahead – every time we did a drill or ran a play, everyone knew what it was."

He's also tried to set reasonable expectations and not try to overwhelm his group of newcomers with too much responsibility at this point in their collegiate careers. Yet Ford expects his players to understand the basics of his system, including where they should be on the court at all times.

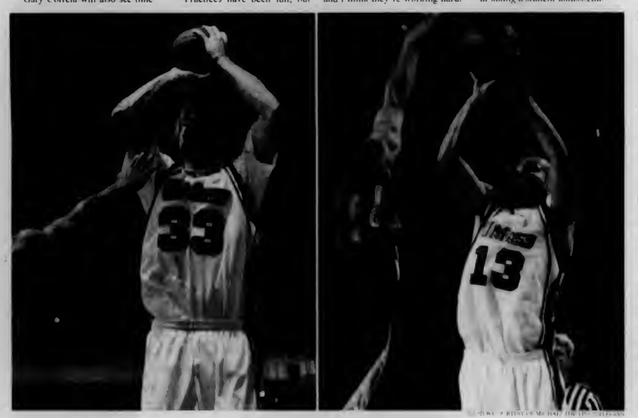
"I'm being patient on certain things, and on other things I'm not," Ford said. "We've given each one of these guys a role – one or two things that we need them to contribute. And if we don't get those things, I'm not patient. Not knowing all the plays – those kinds of things – I'm patient; I understand."

Only three games into the season, the coach knows his team is a work in progress. Over the first few weeks of practice, Ford said he focused on implementing his new style of offense, while recently shifting focusing toward defense.

"Practices have been fun, but its difficult trying to teach so many new guys the system," he said. "What we've tried to do is become great at a couple of things – great at our fastbreak, our offensive rotations."

Yet the freshman learning curve has not only been getting accustomed to Ford's coaching style and fast-paced offense. It's also about how to play at a Division I level.

"They think they're playing hard, but they're not playing hard enough," Ford said. "They don't understand how hard it is to play at this level. But I like their attitude and I think they're working hard."



With so many newcomers, players only in their second year with the team have become role models. Ford referred to guard Ricky Harris, the team's only sophomore, as one of the older guys by virtue of his year's experience.

"I'm a sophomore now, so I have to show the freshmen the way," Harris said. "I told the freshmen that I was going to be in their class, since I had no other freshmen in my class. I hang out with them. Whenever they have a problem, they come talk to me."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Freshman class 2007-08

Name	Pos.	Ht.	Hometown
Max Groebe	G	6-5	N. Miami Beach, Fla.
Gary Correia	G	6-1	Providence, R.I.
Matt Glass	G	6-7	Underhill Center, Vt.
Sedale Jones	G	6-4	Pittsfield, Mass.
Trey Lang	F	6-7	Marietta, Ga.
Matt Hill	F	6-7	Middletown, Ct.
Papa Lo	C	6-9	Thies, Senegal

Guards Matt Glass (left) and Max Groebe are a part of the Minutemen's seven player freshman class this season. The first-year players will play an important role for UMass off the bench. With the team's new up-tempo style, expect UMass coach Travis Ford to employ a 10-11 man rotation in 2007-08.

Challenging slate awaits Minutemen

Though Kentucky's out, big names still appear on schedule

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last season, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford scheduled multiple games against highly regarded opponents with an eye to bolstering his team's postseason resume.

This year, the number of quality opponents doesn't stand out as much as 2006-07, but the Minutemen still have a challenging schedule in front of them.

All games against major-conference teams will take place on the road. The Maroon and White travel to Syracuse Nov. 28 and face Southeastern Conference foe Vanderbilt in Tennessee Jan. 5.

The game with the Orange rekindles a rivalry from the 1960s and early '70s, but the schools have not played since the 1995-96 season.

UMass also continues its annual series with Boston College, this year playing the Eagles in Chestnut Hill Dec. 12 in a Wednesday night matchup.

But the schedule this season lacks the marquee home game the team had last year. The Minutemen welcomed Boston College to a sold-out Mullins Center last December. UMass also played another Atlantic Coast Conference rival, Miami, in Amherst in 2006-07.

Yet in fairness to Ford and his staff, UMass was scheduled to face Kentucky at the TD Banknorth Garden during Thanksgiving weekend.

Ford has moved on from his alma mater's decision to not face his Minutemen in Boston.

"It didn't really cross my mind, actually," he said when asked about it.

After the hiring of Billy Gillespie to replace Tubby Smith as head coach, the school decided to exercise the buyout option in the pact of the home-and-home series between the two schools.

That decision in May – late in the scheduling season – left Ford scrambling to find a team to replace the Wildcats for UMass's sixth non-conference home game. The decision left the Houston game as the marquee non-conference game for the Minutemen.

The Cougars, though a team with a history of success from the Hakeem Olajuwon and Clyde Drexler era, have not made the NCAA Tournament since 1992.

Regardless of its previous success, Houston is not Kentucky.

But the team and coach has since moved on and are focused on the rest of their schedule – one that features greater balance than last year.

The 2006-07 season included many games against opponents ranked in the bottom level of Division I teams. Gone are road games against Jacksonville State and Savannah State, replaced by teams such as Toledo and Marist this year.

"Last year, we had a lot of high level games and a lot of low level games," Ford said. "This year, we've tried to balance it as much as possible. Looking back, last year's schedule would have been better for this team, as we need some easy games.

"With this basketball team, we'll see if it can rise to the occasion – it's certainly going to test them," he said.

Regardless of whom the Minutemen play this season, Ford is adamant about his team not altering its style. For instance, the Maroon and White will face a team that plays an identical style when it visits Duquesne Jan. 30.

"We're not going to be changing [our style] I can tell you that," Ford said of his preliminary plan for the Dukes. "[The winner] will be who is the faster that night or who is making the most shots that night."

As far as Atlantic 10 games are concerned, the league inexplicably is refraining from encouraging its traditional rivalries. For example, this will be the first year since the series began in 1983 that Temple will not visit Amherst.

However, the Minutemen will continue its home-and-home series with Rhode Island. Last season, UMass won handily at the Mullins Center, but lost a close game in Kingston earlier in the year.

"I think it's a natural rivalry and I think that they could be the best team in conference this year," Ford said of URI. "It's a team that's returning nine [players] – you're always going to be successful in our league when you return starters. I expect them to have a great year – something similar to what we had last year."

Xavier will also visit Amherst this season. The Musketeers shared the A-10 Regular Season Championship with UMass last season and the league's coaches chose the team to repeat this year. The Maroon and White's defense will have its hands full Jan. 27 as Xavier returns preseason All-Conference selection Drew Lavender.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Forbes ready for stardom, to lead team in '07-08

Eli Rosenswaike

After playing against the likes of Duke and North Carolina at Virginia, Gary Forbes was billed as a big-time player when he transferred to Massachusetts men's basketball team two years ago.

After sitting out the 2005-06 season, Forbes had a large hand in the success of the Minutemen last year – a season that resulted in a co-Atlantic 10 regular season championship and a berth into the NIT.

But this will be the season Forbes becomes that star player UMass coach Travis Ford was looking for. Last year it was Stephane Lasme who claimed the spotlight. Forbes will do the same now.

The 6-foot-7, 220-pound forward excelled at times last season, but wasn't the consistent offensive threat that stars are. His 13 points and 5.8 rebounds per game both ranked third on the team in 2006-07, but he struggled with his overall shooting and he settled for too many jump shots.

Forbes entered last year as an Atlantic 10 Preseason Second Team selection, and despite his inconsistency, he was named Newcomer of the Year by Sporting News after the season ended. This season, Forbes was recently named to the conference preseason third team.

Based on his numbers from last year, Forbes probably deserves the third-team selection. But his statistical output, not to mention other variables that won't show up on a stat sheet, will greatly improve this year. His preseason ranking should reflect that. For some reason, it doesn't, and the coaches tabbed him for the third team.

Forbes will also be a much better player this season after his experience playing for his native country Panama in the FIBA American Championship this summer. He excelled playing against better competition, averaging 17.8 points per game in four contests.

"It's helped a lot. I think I approach the game differently," Forbes said of the experience. "I think I look at the game from a more mature perspective and more seriously than I did last year. It helped out a lot to see what it takes at a higher level.

"A lot was on the line, so guys played with a different passion than guys do in college," he added. "It's just a different game, a lot more thinking and more physical."

Although the A-10 is particularly talented this season, I highly doubt coach Travis Ford would rather have Stanley Burrell (second team) of Xavier on his roster. Forbes says he doesn't feel slighted, but he probably should.

"I don't really care about all that stuff," he said. "Those are people who are critics. They're going to say what they say. It makes me hungry and gives me something to fight for and prove to a lot of people out there."

What Forbes cares most about is getting better, both as an individual and as a team.

One thing he will have to improve on is his foul shooting. Forbes got to the line frequently (150 attempts) but converted on only 64 percent of them. His improvement in that area is essential for him to take his game to the next level.

His shooting from the floor also lagged a bit. Forbes finished the season with a .427 shooting percentage, but he did improve as the season progressed – connecting on .466 percent of his shots in conference play. He hit nearly one-third of his 3-point shots, a number that will likely improve this season.

Forbes enters the year as one of four captains, and he realizes how important his leadership and experience will be to the Minutemen this season.

"Just to be a leader, and get the young guys under my wing and teach them what system coach Ford wants," Forbes said, regarding his role as a captain. "I feel like there's a great deal of responsibility with the amount of young and inexperienced guys we have."

On the floor, Forbes will find himself playing a variety of positions. Although he will start at the small forward spot, he will spend some time playing point guard when starter Chris Lowe needs a rest.

No matter the position, Forbes will have the ball in his hands a lot. He's a good passer and an unselfish distributor of the ball, something that the good young shooters on the team will appreciate.

"I feel comfortable with the basketball in my hand, whether I'm at point guard or wherever I am on the floor," Forbes said. "Whatever coach wants me to do."

One thing he'll have to do more of this season is rebounding. Losing Lasme and Rashaun Freeman has decimated the front-court, making it imperative for everyone to chip in on the glass. Forbes needs to pick up the slack more than anyone, simply due to how talented and capable he is.

Last season Forbes had some stellar games on the boards, including a 16-rebound performance against Richmond and 14 against Temple. His outing against the Owls Feb. 11 (31 points, 14 rebounds) was the perfect glimpse into what Forbes is capable of doing on any given night.

Expect many more big nights like that from Forbes this season.

And expect the voters to realize they were wrong about him.

Eli Rosenswaike is the Collegian's assistant sports editor. He can be reached at erosenswaike@student.umass.edu.

Senior captain Gary Forbes is expected to carry the Minutemen this season, both with his scoring and rebounding abilities.

MINUTEMEN OUTLAST YALE IN OPENER | PAGE 14

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN
NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

RAIN : HI: 51 LO: 34 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2007

Mixed reactions surround strike

Anti-rally held yesterday

BY DERRICK PERKINS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Members of the University of Massachusetts Republican club spoke out against today's planned student strike during a rally on the steps of the Student Union at noon yesterday.

Standing below a display advertising the two-day student boycott of classes in the window of the Student Government Association [SGA] offices, Republican club leaders called the strike a "politically motivated stunt" and the grievances filed by the SGA and Graduate Student Senate [GSS] "ridiculous."

"These two misguided and self-interested student organizations do not care about the best interests of all students," said club President Brad DeHumen. "Rather, they are calling a strike to pursue a political agenda that includes the glorification of GSS President Jeff Napolitano."

Speakers took turns refuting the list of demands presented by the SGA and GSS including rolling back student fees, increasing diversity funding and accountability, regaining student control over student space and bringing an end to alleged patrols of plainclothes police officers in residence halls.

"The Republican club feels that the GSS and SGA are not representing their constituents properly," said Greg Collins, vice president of the Republican club.

Collins said the calls for a student strike were encouraging teachers and graduate students to cancel classes thus undermining the education of undergraduates. He also called the grievances filed by the GSS and SGA misguided.

"We feel that the GSS and the student senate and SGA focus too much on racial diversity and socio-economic diversity," Collins said. "We already have diverse organizations in relation to different religions, different faiths, different ethnic and cultural groups."

According to Collins, increasing funding for outreach programs for

See ANTI-RALLY on page 3

ASSOCIATED PRESS PHOTO/CHARLES KRUPA

Republican Club Vice President Greg Collins spoke against the general student strike, flanked by a sign saying, "Don't let leftist radicals close down our University," yesterday.

Student and parent e-mail urges students to attend class

BY FRANK VITALE AND TIM MCCALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In an e-mail addressed to all students and parents, Interim Chancellor Thomas Cole dismissed rumors that class would be canceled Thursday and Friday in reaction to the student strikes.

He assured students and parents that the University would be conducting business as usual, including the full class schedule, for which students would be held accountable.

"We expect that all regular instruction will take place and that [the student] will be fully responsible for any material covered in classes on these days," he said in the e-mail.

He also added lines in the e-mail addressed to parents advising and reassuring them.

"I want to assure you. The flagship campus is safe and secure," it read. "I would recommend you speak with your stu-

See ADMIN REACTION on page 3

RSOs demand control over space, costs stifling for orgs.

BY LUCAS CORREIA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the issues students are protesting about today and tomorrow is control over student space – particularly free student use of the Campus Center and Student Union.

"A few years ago we had unlimited access to equipment and space in the Student Union and Campus Center," said Registered Student Organization (RSO) member Susan Allen in a statement.

Currently, RSOs have to pay money to rent space and equipment in both buildings.

At an information session earlier this week, members of the Student Government Association (SGA) announced that last year, RSO use of the Lape Cod Lounge was free. This year, it costs $150 to hold an event in that same space, plus the cost of food and equipment.

In the Campus Center, the space is free, but the University charges

See RSO SPACE on page 3

Alleged harrassment causes student rally at Amherst College

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Amherst Pride Alliance rallied yesterday on the Valentine Quad at Amherst College in response to a recent incident involving the harassment of several homosexual Hampshire students attending one of their GAP (Gay Amherst Party) functions.

On Saturday, Nov. 10, Hampshire students attending the GAP function, held in Crossett Hall on the Amherst College campus, were allegedly harassed by an unconfirmed number of Amherst students. The Amherst students reportedly threw water balloons, threatened the Hampshire students with homophobic slurs and poured beer on them as they attempted to exit the party.

"Over the course of a half an hour, I was witness to other people being verbally abused and I personally experienced physical violence on the part of some Amherst students," said Lilly Walleck, one of the Hampshire students who was allegedly harassed.

Walleck has filed a complaint with the Amherst Police Department and Amherst College Campus Police, and estimates that seven other students have also filed complaints, though it is unclear how many students were allegedly harassed.

The Amherst Police and Amherst College Campus Police are currently investigating charges of "physical intimidation and harassment," according to Craig Cullinane, director of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer, Intersex and Ally (LGBTQIA) support.

The Amherst College administration received the official police report on Monday and took action to remedy the situation.

"We were all horrified and outraged by it, and of course it swept across campus, and so we wanted to swiftly respond," said Cullinane.

Ben Ticher, the Amherst College Dean of Students, said the rally, which was put on by the Amherst Pride Alliance, was organized to "express a great deal of concern" for the events that transpired Saturday night.

The rally was held from 11:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. on the Valentine Quad and featured speakers from across the Five College area.

A table was set up for participants to make signs with their own supportive slogans which ranged anywhere from "End Hate" to "Home Sweet Home."

At the rally's onset, several hundred students, faculty and

See AMHERST RALLY on page 4

Students rally after a reported incident concerning the harassment of homosexual Amherst College students last Sunday. Hundreds of students, faculty and community members attended the event, holding various signs and listening to speakers.

Mass Attack prepares for pair with Eagles

John Wessbecker (left), Topher Bevis and the No. 14 Minutemen welcome No. 6 Boston College to the Mullins Center Friday night and travel to the Heights for a matchup with the Eagles on Saturday. UMass is 3-1 in its last four games against BC.

BY JEREMY BICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With five teams tied for first place in Hockey East, the conference picture is rather cloudy early in the 2007-08 season. But with the Massachusetts hockey team playing two games against Boston College this weekend, that picture could get clearer in a hurry as the Minutemen attempt to grab an early lead in what is always a competitive league.

The Mass Attack (4-2-1, 1-1-1 HEA) will play a home-and-home series with the No. 9 Eagles (7-2-4, 2-2-3 HEA). Friday's game takes place at the Mullins Center, then Saturday at Conte Forum on Chestnut Hill. Both games are slated for a 7 p.m. start.

The 14th-ranked Minutemen are coming off their best weekend of Hockey East play ever, grabbing three out of four points on the road with a win at Boston University last Friday and a tie with UMass Lowell the following night – the second tie against the River Hawks this season.

The Eagles are coming off a frustrating weekend in which they struggled to a 3-3 tie with Merrimack before falling to UNH, 5-2.

With seven points in the standings, UMass is currently deadlocked with BC, New Hampshire, Providence and Northeastern, making this weekend's two-step with the Eagles even more crucial to the Minutemen's season.

Friday's home match with BC has been dubbed "Operation 88," as UMass is attempting to attract a capacity crowd to the Mullins Center to pump up support for the program.

BC is also one of the top teams in the country and arguably will be one for years has been the best team in Hockey East. UMass coach Don Cahoon said "That's makes it a pretty big event. We're a team that's still trying to catch the top-tiers programs in the country. We think we've made big strides, and this is another opportunity to measure ourselves.

UMass has a strong recent history against those "top-tier" teams,

See HOCKEY on page 10

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 51
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Pelaquin
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Hyden
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COPIES EDITOR Adam Scagno
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jerom Bire
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marissa Wheaton
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan Mcskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olsen
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael Karg
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jon Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenmake
WEB EDITOR James Holt
PHOTO EDITOR Tom Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Pfaffe
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Feldler

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE ESTABLISHED MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIATE SCHEDULE. THE COLLEGIAN IS FREELY OWNED, OPERATED AND MANAGED BY STUDENTS. PUBLISHED CONTINUOUSLY SINCE 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS MASS. LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1892, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PURCHASED BY A NON-PROFIT NOT-FOR-PROFIT CORPORATION IN 1965, THE COLLEGIAN REMAINS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED AND OPERATED. THE OPINIONS EXPRESSED ON THE EDITORIAL PAGES ARE THOSE OF THE EDITORIAL BOARD OR THE AUTHOR.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Will McGuinness

COPY EDITOR
Nichole Auriat

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarles

Break-ins cause concern at UMass

WILL MCGUINNESS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Police Department announced a Washington residence hall break-in that resulted in the theft of electronic equipment from the unlocked rooms of students.

According to the UMPD's Web site and a public service announcement sent to student e-mail address at 10:51 a.m., the department's investigation is ongoing.

The announcement was "issued to make residents aware of these incidents, to seek your assistance in identifying the suspect(s) and hopefully prevent similar crimes from occurring. At this time the police have no description of the suspect(s), the investigation is continuing."

Police urge students to ensure that their doors are locked before leaving their rooms empty as the high-priced electronic equipment of others has inspired many to participate in criminal acts for personal financial gain.

The UMPD Web site also urges students to back-up information stored on their hard drives by using external devices or making use of the University's U Drive.

According to department officials, anyone with information that could be helpful in solving this case is encouraged to contact the University of Massachusetts Police Department's Detective Bureau at 413-545-0893 or 413-577-TIPS (8477).

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@student.umass.edu.

Washington tower residents were the recent victims of break-ins.

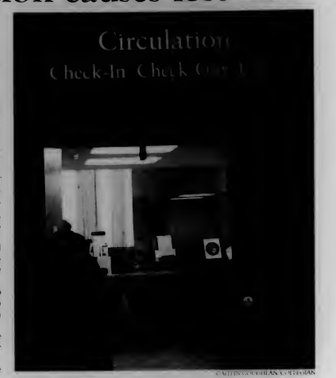
Library computer program malfunction causes lost info.

Rumors of virus dispelled

HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A computer program at the W.E.B. Du Bois Library was taken out of service last week due to a security problem.

On Nov. 5 and 6, IT staff, a document delivery system most often used by faculty and graduate students at the University of Massachusetts, suffered downtime and caused several requests to be lost, according to MJ Canavan, Coordinator for Library Systems and Web Development.



"We have put in place additional security measures to ensure continued service," said Canavan. "We did not have a virus."

Notices were put in place to inform system users of the need to suspend services while the problem was fixed.

Those whose requests were lost were alerted to resubmit their requests.

No one lost work done in the library at the time of this event.

Holly Seabury can be reached at hseabury@student.umass.edu.

The computer program which runs the document delivery system at the UMass library was taken out of service last week.

Prof. researches metal-rich deposits

Nodules found in NH lake

BY JOSHUA WATOVTICH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Researchers at the University of Massachusetts have discovered large, metal-rich sedimentary deposits in a New Hampshire lake.

These sedimentary deposits, more specifically referenced as "nodules," measured in at record sizes: 46 cm in diameter.

They are the first seen in any New England state, and they have a morphologically distinct form and the highest content of manganese in any nodule known so far.

Sean Werle, a professor of biology and a curator at the UMass Natural History Museum, discovered the deposits.

Werle was diving in the Second Connecticut Lake, N.H., searching for antique cans that attain value as they age. He joked that the discovery was "dumb luck."

Celeste Asikainen, an involved researcher with the nodules at UMass, agreed with Werle, saying the discovery was a "serendipitous find."

Asikainen, a Ph.D. in geosciences, has been analyzing the nodules in an attempt to "understand why the nodules grow where they grow."

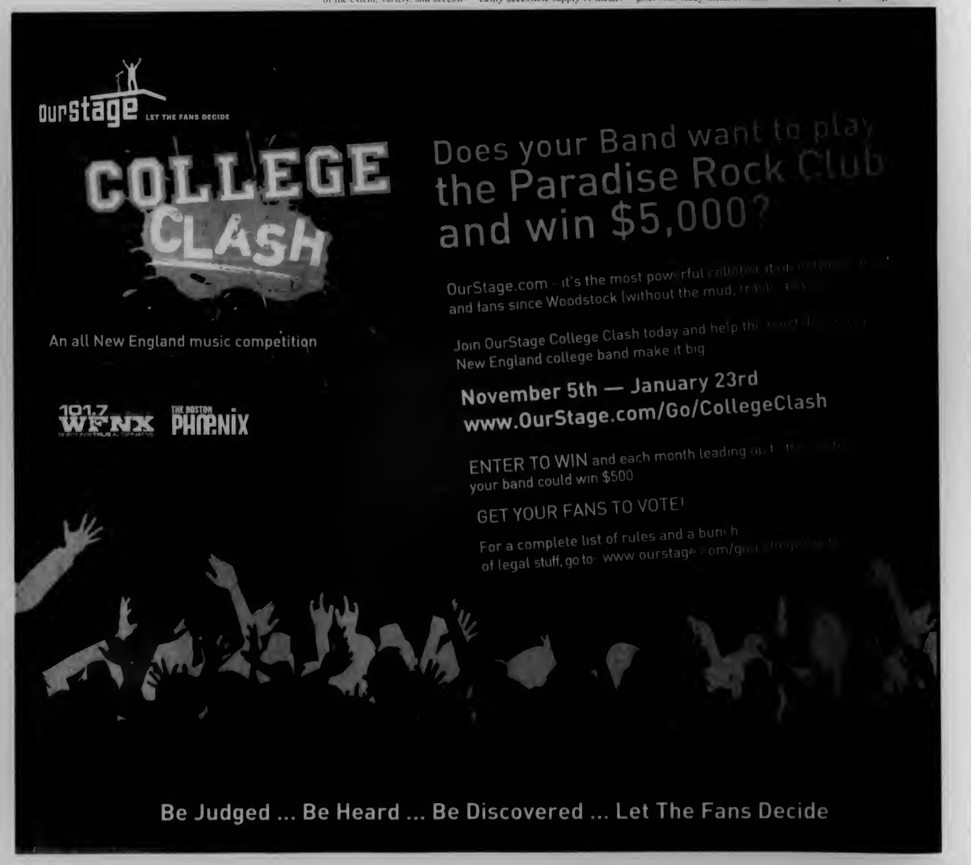
"Our discovery makes possible quantitative answers to these questions," said Asikainen. "Because of the extent, variety, and accessibility of these structures, problems that require integrated microbial-ecology, geological and geochemical methods of study are amenable to direct investigation."

The newly discovered nodules are being examined thoroughly by Asikainen in order to comprehend the environmental conditions that influence the creation of these structures. The nodules contain high percentages of nine major and 17 minor elements that could be helpful in discovering new metal sources. Manganese, one of the highly concentrated elements found in the nodules, is a metal that has important industrial, metal alloy uses and is used in the common coin.

Other elements found in the nodules that could provide a more easily accessible supply of metals are iron, oxide minerals, cations, anions and many rare earth elements. In this attempt to understand the geological conditions of the nodule growth the scientists can predict where the nodules will occur.

The sedimentary structures are rested loosely on the lake's base, forming an "underwater pavement" that has a distinct porous, pustule texture that forms the upper layer of the nodules.

The structures appear to be a flat sidewalk from above but when individual sections are removed you can see a series of joined, nucleated nodules. This suggests that these underwater pavements formed by nodule deposits are formed at many centers.



A common obstacle that geologists who study metal formations face is determining how old the nodules are.

In one case a nodule formed around a glass bottle dating back to the year 1929. The bottle's age has given the scientists the ability to determine the rate of growth – estimated at 26 millimeters every 100 years. This rate of growth is the fastest of deposits of this kind discovered in the United States.

This upcoming summer Asikainen and fellow researchers plan to continue their research in the two neighboring New Hampshire lakes that have yet to be excavated.

The findings of her works can be viewed at online at www.geo.umass.edu/grads/asikainen.

Joshua Watovtich can be reached at jwatovtich@gmail.com.

Students speak out against strike

ANTI-RALLY from page 1

poorer high school students in the Commonwealth while at the same time rolling back student fees would be illogical.

Collins also called the demand for an end to patrols of plainclothes policemen in residence halls "unjustified."

"The police presence in dorms is exaggerated," he said. "The police obviously target specific areas on campus which historically do have patterns of violence and destruction of property."

Ed Cutting, a graduate student and member of the Chancellor Search Committee, blamed the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) as being behind the strike, calling it "illegal."

"GEO can't strike, professors can't strike and can't let their kids skip class," he said. "They cannot require you to attend their protest."

According to GEO's Vice President Aaron Winslow, Cutting's information was incorrect.

"GEO cannot endorse a strike," he said. "GEO is not striking."

DeFlumeri disagreed.

"The grad student sentate, [teaching assistants], GEO are one and the same. They're inextricably linked," he said. "We feel as though GEO is behind the strike."

Cutting called on the University to fire graduate students who cancelled classes during the two-day student strike and told the crowd every student had the right to sue GEO over missed classes.

Cutting spoke in support of the presence of police officers in campus residence halls, and told the crowd that UMPD officers behave lawfully and students who possess guns or drugs deserved to get arrested "for being stupid."

"Cops are going in without any warrants and with no uniform," said Student Trustee Ruth Thompson. "Until [students] get arrested, they didn't even know that there are [plainclothes police officers] in the dorms dressed as pizza delivery guys. [The Republican club] did not even address concerns."

Thompson – who looked on with other members of the SGA during the rally – announced the list of events during the strike at the conclusion of the protest.

"Students who are out there [during the strike] and care about the issues are going to show the number of people who are for the strike and who are for student rights and about changing the issues," she said.

Thompson did not think the rally changed many students' minds about supporting the strike. The goal of the strike and the teach-ins scheduled throughout the two days of the class boycott was educating students on how the issues that had impacted the campus were also affecting academics and social life, Thompson said.

According to DeFlumeri, he had been contacted by alumni who opposed the strike as well as students in the past few days.

"I think they represent a silent majority of students, staff and faculty and alumni who are rational people who don't think the University should be shut down for two days over ridiculousness," he said.

Sophomore Michael Brescia, 20, attended the last half of the rally. Before the rally, Brescia said, he had been unsure about whether or not he would participate in the strike.

Greg Collins (left) speaks out against the rally while Republican Club President Brad DeFlumeri (right) holds a sign reading, "GSS's demands are bogus!"

Brescia had not been planning on striking, but had read a little on the issues surrounding the class boycott.

"I think [the rally] made me a little more concrete against the strike," he said. "I was kind of in the middle, but I'm a little more against it," he said. "If other people want to I'm not going to stop them. They have the right to express their own opinions."

Brescia said he would be attending class during the strike.

"I'm not going to be taking part of that," he said. "I'm going to go to class and do what I pull here to do."

Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins a student.umass.edu.

UMass faculty members support rally, teach-ins

ADMIN REACTION from page 1

dent and advise them to attend their scheduled classes."

Cole's statement made it clear that classes will be going on as scheduled. However, that contradicted the plans of many faculty members and graduate students who have agreed to either cancel classes or not penalize students for missing classes.

The anthropology department has taken the strongest stance and has urged all of their students to attend the rallies and teach-ins in their weekly newsletter.

"We are calling for all students – graduate and undergraduate – to refrain from both attending and teaching classes, and instead join together for a series of teach-ins, a rally and other activities throughout the two days," it read. "We ask that graduate teachers relocate their classes to the Student Union and Campus Center, where events will be going on throughout the day that pertain to the demands we have issued. This is not a labor strike; however, this is a call for all students – workers or not – to join."

A portion of faculty members in other departments have agreed to sign the agreement but are currently unsure of how the strike will affect their classes. Many professors and graduate students voiced their concerns about the strike's motives off the record decidedly taking a wait and see approach towards the strike. They said the strike seemed abrupt and gave them little time to plan proper reactions.

University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski has made it clear the University will look into handling faculty members who cancel classes or do not show up to teach according to their contracts.

"We expect classes to be taught and students to attend classes. If we do get complaints forwarded that students showed up to classes only to find their teacher or teaching assistant is not there, we will investigate according to the terms of their contracts. We'll review that and see what's appropriate," Blaguszewski said.

Frank Vitale can be reached at fvitale a student.umass.edu

Tim McCall can be reached at tmccall a student.umass.edu.

Space policies an issue for UM RSOs

RSO SPACE from page 1

for the use of all food and equipment. All food is required to be provided by UMass Catering Services unless a waiver is approved a month in advance.

All rented equipment must be University property. The equipment students pay for range from projectors to podiums.

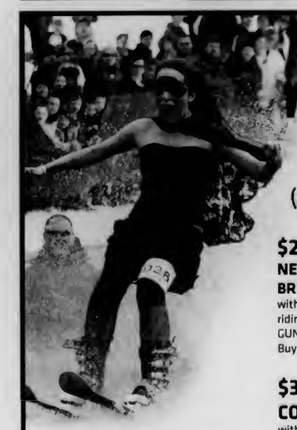
Auxiliary Services was unavailable for comment.

UMass junior Mohamed Vandi, secretary of the Black Student Union, said that most RSOs, especially culture-based ones, can't afford to hold events because of these fees.

"I very year the policy gets a little stricter," said graduate student Mishy Leiblum.

The information sessions offered by the SGA earlier this week noted that of the 280 RSOs that currently exist on campus, only four of them can afford a typical bill for holding events.

Another cause for student protest is that preschedule[illegible] funded by RSOs that take [illegible] in these buildings are [illegible] cancelled unexpectedly because [illegible] events outside of the [illegible] such as corporate meetings [illegible] booked.



The Graduate Student Senate Web site says, "The [illegible] privatization of services [illegible] the University has [illegible] student control of [illegible] designed explicitly for [illegible] use."

At the info session, it [illegible] that the reason these [illegible] have emerged is largely [illegible] a new fire code that requires [illegible] sprinkler systems in both [illegible] ings to be updated.

Lucas Carreiro can be reached at lcarreir a student.umass.edu.

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD
Special Student Rate
Local-National Placement
Includes Certification
1-800-357-3210
BostonBartender.com

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass on bus route)

Wilder than Daytona!
(AND EASIER TO GET TO)
$229
NEW HAMPSHIRE BREAKOUT COLLEGE PASS with UNRESTRICTED skiing and riding at MOUNT SUNAPEE, GUNSTOCK, and CANNON.
Buy before Dec. 21st and save!
$315
COLLEGE PASS
with UNRESTRICTED skiing and riding at MOUNT SUNAPEE, OKEMO, and STRATTON.
Buy before Dec. 21st and save!
#1 IN THE EAST FOR GROOMING
#2 IN THE EAST FOR SNOW QUALITY
- 2007 SKI Magazine Reader Survey
MOUNT SUNAPEE
mountsunapee.com
Visit Us at: myspace.com/mountsunapee
Available to full-time college students. Some Restrictions apply.

Thursday, November 15, 2007
Berkshire DC • 5–9pm
THE DELANEY HOUSE
NOVEMBER 13-15, 2007
RESTAURANT WEEK
Signature Menu:
Lobster Bisque
Portobello Balsamic Bruschetta
Savannah Belle Salad • Crab Cakes
Chicken Saltimbocca over Fettuccini
Filet Beaujolais
Risotto with Artichokes and spinach
Tortellini Carbonara
Grilled Asparagus • Vegetable Jardiniere
Key Lime Pie

GUEST CHEF:
Michael Corduff
RAFFLE FOR DELANEY HOUSE GIFT CERTIFICATES
Tuesday, November 13 — Worcester Dining Commons — GREAT WALL RESTAURANT
Wednesday, November 14 — Hampshire Dining Commons — EASTSIDE GRILL
Wednesday, November 14 — Franklin Dining Commons — BUTTERNUTS
DINING SERVICES UMass Amherst
2007 Grand Prize Winner
umass.edu/diningservices

NOV 15 2007

NOV 15 2007

Homophobia topic of Amherst rally

Students and community members gathered at Amherst College to rally against homophobia after the alleged incident involving harrassment of Amherst College students on Nov. 10.

AMHERST RALLY from page 1

community members amassed on the Valentine Quad – many of them dressed in purple as a gesture of solidarity – to express their disapproval of the harassment and to show support for the Hampshire students.

A large banner was erected that read "Please Come Back," echoing the administration's concern that the event, described by Cullinane as "acts by deluded and ignorant people," would be seen as representative of the Amherst College campus.

"This is not the atmosphere at Amherst College – it's an anomaly," he said.

"I personally was very surprised about what happened," said Trevor Lewis, an Amherst sophomore. However, Lewis said he had spoken to several friends who had seen or were familiar with acts of homophobia on the Amherst campus – "which is not my experience at all," he said.

"I was surprised that it became violent," said Gudren Juffer, an Amherst senior who attended the rally. "I was surprised it turned past the quiet, latent homophobia and became something someone acted on."

Lewis was surprised that the individuals who allegedly harassed the Hampshire students had used water balloons, which suggests that the harassment was premeditated.

Several Amherst students were also concerned that the incident could lead to larger problems.

"Any incident can be a catalyst, if this is going on all the time, then we need to show that it is an issue," said Alexa Catao, an Amherst sophomore.

Several Hampshire students declined to comment on the issue, citing the fact that they had come to the consensus to let unofficial spokespeople speak on the matter.

Most of the demonstrators dispersed by 1 p.m., as many of them were Amherst students and had to attend classes. Approximately 40 demonstrators remained until the end, including several administrators and Five College students.

"I think everyone just wanted to reiterate the message that this is not acceptable and we don't find it acceptable on campus, and I'm sorry that it did happen but I hope it won't happen again," said Caroline Hannah, director of media relations for Amherst College, regarding the rally.

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsulliv a student.umass.edu.

New RSO hosts prominent politician

By Hannah Nelson
Collegian Staff

A new Registered Student Organization at the University of Massachusetts, Advancing Democracy, will host speaker John Bonifaz, founder of the National Voting Rights Institute.

The young group has been able to draw in a big player in fair election rights for their event. Bonifaz will speak tonight on the dangers of the privatization and outsourcing of public elections and will also participate in an open question and answer session to follow.

"John has a long history of advocating the ideals of democracy in the judicial, political and non-profit spheres," said Steven Hoeschele, director of Advancing Democracy. "Advancing Democracy is pleased to host such a dynamic speaker at our membership meeting."

The basic principles behind Advancing Democracy are to bring awareness and education on the state and community level to the growing problems facing American voters today – including ones that they may not be fully aware exist.

Part of that includes the improvement of the Massachusetts voting system.

"One of the main concerns of Advancing Democracy is that elections are becoming less 'democratic' in the sense that all citizens should have equal voice," said Jameson Rust, communications director for Advancing Democracy. "John's experience in the field as well as his concern for the privatization of public elections makes him a perfect guest."

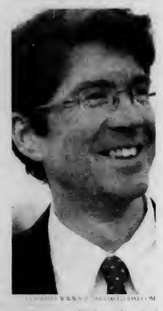
The Advancing Democracy group may be in its first semester, but doesn't show any sign of losing steam.

One of their goals is a statewide expansion of similar student-run organizations on other campuses and is on the agenda for upcoming semesters.

"We're always looking for people open to participation. It's a good event to attend to find out what Advancing Democracy is about," said Rust, who also noted that recruitment was not the main goal to the event.

Bonifaz founded the National Voting Rights Institute (NVRI) in 1994 by and he served as its director for 10 years. NVRI is based out of Boston and Bonifaz currently serves as general council. His work with NVRI has included being at the forefront of the recount of Ohio votes in the 2004 presidential election and was a candidate in 2006 for the position of Massachusetts Secretary of State.

NVRI's current work includes defending the need for campaign spending limits, working toward a specific Constitutional right to vote, and improving the accessibility of voting participation.



They work in cooperation with people such as Illinois Congressman Jesse Jackson, Jr. and foundations like the Center for Voting and Democracy which advocates for majority rule and fair representation.

Anyone involved with the five colleges or the Amherst area communities is welcomed to come to the event, which is not restricted to college students.

"It's geared toward the community," Rust said about the accessibility of the event. "The message is universal."

The event will be held in room 903 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m. this evening.

Hannah Nelson can be reached at hnelson a student.umass.edu.

The new RSO, Advancing Democracy,will host John Bonifaz.

EARN YOUR DEGREE, THE RESPECT OF YOUR PEERS AND MORE THAN $1,600 PER MONTH.

Students accepted into an accredited medical or dental school are eligible for our Medical and Dental School Stipend Program. In addition to more than $1,600 per month for living expenses, MDSSP gives you a head start on your career. Your Army Reserve training provides invaluable experience alongside outstanding medical professionals and a major advantage over your peers. Most importantly, as a member of the U.S. Army Health Care Team, you'll earn the gratitude of our Soldiers, their Families and your nation.

Gain your Strength to Heal. Contact SFC Bradley Paxton at 888-258-1098 or bradley.paxton@usarec.army.mil. For more information, visit healthcare.goarmy.com.

U.S.ARMY
ARMY STRONG.

2007 Paid for by the United States Army. All rights reserved.

OFF THE WALL GAMES

41 Russell St. (Rt.9) Hadley, MA 01035 Phone: 586-5451
Mon. 3-9pm; Wed., Thurs., Fri. 3-10pm; Sat & Sun 11am - 8pm

Weekly Gaming Schedule

Monday
World of Warcraft TCG 4pm - 6pm FREE
Board Game Night 5pm - 9pm FREE

Tuesday
CLOSED

Wednesday
Warhammer 40K 5pm - 10 pm FREE
Casual Magic Night 6pm - 10pm

Thursday
Warhammer Fantasy 5pm - 10 pm FREE
Warmachine/Hordes 5pm - 10pm FREE

Friday
Magic: The Gathering FNM Booster Draft 6:30pm
$10.00 Entrance
(You keep what you draft + Packs for 1st and 2nd Place)

Saturday
Magic: The Gathering Legacy Tournament 1:00pm
$5.00 Entrance

Sunday
Magic: The Gathering Constructed (type II)
Tournament 1:00pm
$5.00 Entrance

Tables are always open for gaming anytime during the week!
Free Wireless Internet Service

UNIVERSITY LIQUORS
Mon - Sat: 11am -11pm
Sun: 3pm - 9pm

UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT

1. Smirnoff 80* $25.99 1.75 Lt	7. Seagram's Seven $10.99 750 ml
2. Captain Morgan Spiced Rum $27.99 1.75 Lt	8. Grand Marnier $18.99 375 ml
3. Bailey Original, Mint & Caramel $24.99 750 ml	9. Hennessy V.S. $16.99 375 ml
4. Captain Morgan Parrot Bay: $16.99 750 ml (Coconut, Passion, Pineapple, & Mango)	10. Jose Cuervo Gold: $19.99 750 ml (Oranjo, Tropina, & Citrico)
5. Myers' Platinum Rum $19.99 ($9.99 after rebate) 1.75 Lt	11. Smirnoff Flavored Vodka: $13.99 750 ml (Vanilla, Raspberry, Blueberry, etc.)
6. KEY STONE LT. $13.99 + DEP.

BEER
WINE
LIQUORS
LOTTERY
CIGARETTES

LOW LOW PRICES

6 University Dr., Amherst, MA 549-5758 • Easy free parking

Executive lectures on media landscape

By Hayden Marx
Collegian Correspondent

Evan Shapiro, general manager and executive vice-president of the Independent Film Channel, spoke to a crowd of 70 people at Flavin Auditorium on the changing media landscape last night.

"The revolution is already over," he said. "It was a bloodless coup."

He said it happened in 2003 when consumers purchased more media than corporations and gained control of the entertainment market. He said that the film industry, however, has yet to take notice.

"These agencies, however, refuse to let these old paradigms die," he said. "The 30 second ad is dead. You can force it on me how much you want, but I'm not going to watch it."

He said if the film industry does not change, they risk going the way of the music industry, which he said made the mistake of trying to fight the changes in the industry caused by internet. He credited that mistake with making Steve Jobs the most important person in music.

"They fought it. They lost," he said. "If you ask anyone in the music industry, they will tell you they lost big."

Shapiro started his career at the University of Massachusetts where he enrolled from 1985 to 1989. During that time he lived in Orchard Hill, the Zeta Psi fraternity and delivered for Pinocchio's pizza.

He said he learned to produce while working at UMass Theater Guild. But he added that he didn't spend much time in class his senior year and dropped out of school.

"I ran to California and tried to make my way in film," he said. "In two weeks I was on my mom's couch in New Jersey."

Shapiro said his early career lacked direction in his career. He said he made some mistakes, but he learned from his experiences.

"You can make mistakes and still get to a really good place in your life," he said.

He joined the Independent Film Channel [IFC] in 2004 as the senior vice-president of marketing.

The Independent Film Channel's executive vice president and general manager spoke about the changing media landscape last night.

IFC is known for its unedited, uncut and uncensored content. Shapiro said his network's "Shark Week" was a four-part series called Indie Sex about sex in cinema. Lisa Ades, a University of Massachusetts communications professor, directed the series.

Shapiro said original content like that has increased the popularity of the network. He added over the past few years they have increased its sponsorship by 500 percent without a Nielsen rating.

He credits the network's popularity to commitment to content that offers truth, relevance and is engaging.

The channel showed that commitment when it funded 'This Film is Not Yet Rated', a film that challenges the way films are rated by the Motion Picture Association of America [MPAA].

The movie states that the MPAA favors films made by the six corporations - General Electric, News Corporation, Viacom, Disney, CBS and Time Warner - the same companies that own it.

Shapiro said no other company would back the film because it attacked the industry. He said it was successful for the same reasons. He said there was so much pent-up frustration with the system that when something finally came out that challenged it, there was a huge outpouring of support.

"You don't have to be a rebel and eat cat food," he said. "You can actually make pretty good money."

Shapiro said they sees open source material as the way of the future because 'no one is smarter than everybody.' He said they have a section of their website set up as a media lab where they host user created content. He said it's much different from YouTube.

"There are no cats jumping on trampolines," he said. There are no farts being lit."

He said the site currently breaks even in terms of revenue, but they have used it as a way to find new filmmakers. They hired the two filmmakers with the two most popular clips to work for them.

Hayden Marx can be reached at hmarx a student.umass edu

'Friday Night Lights' author lectures on non-fiction at UM

By Adrienne Benn
Collegian Correspondent

Pulitzer Prize winning author, H.G. "Buzz" Bissinger spoke on "The Art of Non-Fiction Storytelling" last night, and addressed the craft of writing as a sacred skill that has many non-writers questioning its future in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union.

"Writing is really hard," Bissinger said. "But there is nothing more sacred than the written word."

The lecture was hosted as part of the University of Massachusetts journalism program lecture series on Broadcast and Media.

Bissinger, a self-proclaimed "expert on nothing," spoke to a room of aspiring journalists of the many obstacles they face while writing.

While some writers believe the most important part of the story is the first sentence, Bissinger considers the last sentence more significant because it tells both the reader and the writer where they are going.

"If I know where I am going," Bissinger said. "It is easier to get there."

He described journalists as an insecure group who suffer from fear because of their delicate and vulnerable emotions. He said that finding the structure to a story is much like building the foundation of a house. The foundation will crumble if it is not built properly.

"The words will come," Bissinger said. "When you get in the zone and know where you're going, it's orgasmic."

The lecture's audience was a mix of students, UMass professors and friends from outside the University. The journalism program supplied 30 copies of Bissinger's book "Friday Night Lights" to an English class at Commerce High School in Springfield, Mass. who were also in attendance.

"His views on journalism were real," said Commerce student Kassaundra Woodall.

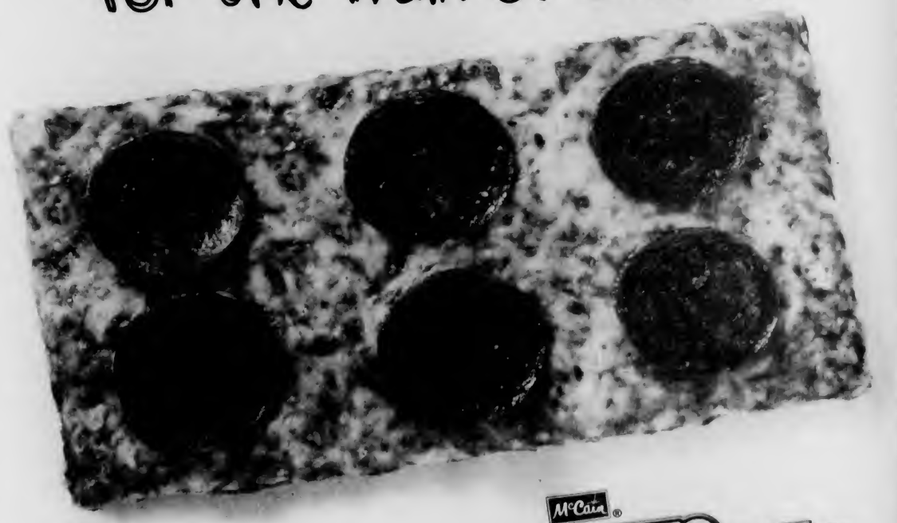
Too many non-journalists consider print journalism dead and its future non-existent, according to Bissinger. Most believe in something beyond a paycheck, since millions of newspapers and magazines are still printed everyday. He said that reporters are among the most flawed humans but are most profoundly virtuous.

"Nothing is more exciting than waking up every morning to a bundle of beautiful pages," Bissinger said. "It's why I became a journalist. It's a magical thing and an even more magical feeling."

Bissinger first made a name for himself by winning the Pulitzer Prize for investigative reporting in 1987 for his story on corruption in the Philadelphia court system.

He is most famous for his book, "Friday Night Lights" which portrayed the 1988 Permian Panther football season of Odessa, Texas.

This book was turned into the film "Friday Night Lights" and was adopted by NBC as a weekly series in 2006. In 1998, he wrote "A Prayer for the City," and New York Times' bestseller, "Three Nights in August" in 2005. He has been a contributing editor for Vanity Fair and has written for The New York Times. Currently, he is working on a memoir about his two sons.



This event was part of a series funded by David Kantor and his wife Teena. David Kantor is a 1979 alumnus of UMass Amherst and together the couple have brought prominent journalists and editors to campus to speak about special topics in journalism.

Adrienne Benn can be reached at benn a student.umass.edu.

H.G. "Buzz" Bissinger, the author of "Friday Night Lights" spoke last night as part of a journalism lecture series.

Essential vitamins & minerals for the walk of shame.

©2007 McCain Foods USA, INC.

McCain® Ellio's® GET IT.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2007

"It were best that we not all think alike; it is difference of opinion that makes horseraces." - Mark Twain

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Stand up for student rights

Students are on strike; this isn't news to our readers. It is news, however, to the rest of New England, as well as people across the country, as UMass students have been able to capture the spotlight for something other than rioting. While UMass students have grabbed media attention, it is important that we don't let it go to waste.

If UMass students really want their grievances addressed, campus-wide participation in the strike is imperative. Because while the reasons for the strike are many, and the motivations behind them slightly askew, certain things are undeniable. For starters, it's gotten the administration's attention.

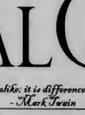
Although the Student Government Association (SGA) and Graduate Student Senate (GSS) have been somewhat cavalier in their willingness to tack on reasons for the campus-wide strike post-script, their motivation hasn't been entirely flawed. The strike certainly lacks focus; you'd be hard-pressed to find any layman who could name the entire laundry-list of complaints set forth by SGA.

But the strike organizers have covered their bases. Virtually anyone with a grievance against the administration can find their pet cause somehow related to the demands of the student strike. Among the various causes for this act of protest are the police presence in dorms, a lack of diversity funding coupled with a lack of transparency with the appropriation of existing funding and the ever-increasing student fees.

The term "strike" is also a sort of misnomer. The Graduate Employee Organization has not endorsed the strike because they cannot legally strike as employees of the University. Likewise, since the rest of the graduate and undergraduate population is actually refusing to attend classes they've paid for, rather than refusing to provide services paid for by the administration, this protest is more accurately described as a boycott.

Opponents believe students participating in the higher-education boycott are shooting themselves in the foot. This is not necessarily the case. Many forms of protest have roots in acts of self-deprecation, and have proven effective. Hunger strikes starve the afflicted, but history has from time to time shown them to be effectual.

Whether or not you agree with all of the points put forth by the SGA and GSS, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian encourages students to strike in solidarity. The administration has been unreceptive of student opposition to a number of its actions – from Andrew Card's much-disputed honorary degree to the proliferation of freshman housing. The SGA has asked its constituency to join them in taking a stand on a scale too large to be ignored.



We cannot in good conscience suggest that students who will suffer serious academic hardship should not cross the picket lines. But to those students who are considering simply making a four-day weekend out of this ordeal, we encourage you to defy the status quo of the "apathetic college student."

Take a stand.

Unsigned editorials reflect the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian editorial board.

We are the men in black

Brad Leibowitz

"Anonymity is your name. Silence your native tongue. You're no longer part of the system. You're above the system. Over it. Beyond it," Rip Torn told his fellow men in black in the 1997 movie of same name.

As things go, I am not one to care, inquire or show any interest in the personal lives of celebrities. Seinfeld once wondered why we congratulate actors for saying what a writer tells them to say or for pretending to be someone. I often wonder this also.

Nonetheless, for the sake of taking us away from the daily grind of our lives, we idolize and emulate our Hollywood movie gods. As a culture, we want to be them on screen and want to know everything about them off-screen.

Brad Pitt is a perfect example of this.

On the basic level of it all, I understand why we seek out these people and ask for their signatures. In some way, their chosen profession lets us escape from ours. When our day ends, theirs begin. On screen they provide a relief from our never-ending lives by providing us with neat stories and an eventual conclusion to it (even if it takes a few movies to reach one).

However, aside from their fame on screen, why do we seek them out privately? What is it about movie stars that make the majority of the American public lose their minds?

On a daily basis, the news reports on stories such as: Britney and K-Fed are officially divorced; Madonna adopts a kid; Lohan arrested again. Every time I see a headline like these, all I can think is, "Who cares?"

Good for K-Fed, good for that kid and good for Lohan, but I'm sorry, I just don't care.

To me, although I don't know the feeling, it seems that fame is more of a curse these days than a blessing.

To me, although I don't know the feeling, it seems that fame is more of a curse these days than a blessing.

Sure, everyone knows your face and you can make a difference in the world (look no further than George Clooney, Bono or Angelina Jolie), but for the most part it seems like one never ending flashing camera bulb which aims to revoke all privacy.

I don't know how Brad Pitt does it.

I used to think I was the only one who thought this way. But then, the most unlikely source aided my sentiments.

Try if you can to recall any personal family detail about Johnny Depp, Matt Damon, Al Pacino, Robert Deniro or Jodie Foster. Some of the best actors around, right? You can name their films and maybe which films each respective artist won an Oscar or a Golden Globe for. Yet due to their actions and efforts they have preserved their private life by not acting like, well, Lindsay Lohan.

We are attracted to Lohan and Paris because they live a life off-screen that runs them into more drama than they have on-screen. Sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll. Instead of protecting and nurturing their status in life, they seem intent on destroying it.

Lohan and her like appear to not care about their position in life which millions of people would kill to have.

In this aspect, celebrities like Depp, Damon, Pacino, Deniro and Foster all stand alone. They see their profession as one which exists only in it given realm: the silver screen.

Their outside lives are their lives – purposefully inaccessible to the world, guarded in secrecy and held in shroud.

They do this because one, in their minds it helps the viewer to believe the actor's role in a movie, and two, they see no need to pimp or whore out their daughters or wives to the American public in the pursuit of selling their latest film.

Why is it that when Tom Cruise and Katie Holmes refused to show their baby and wedding photos to the world, as a society we lost our minds? The consensus was, "That's just crazy!"

Why is this crazy? What's crazy about protecting the most sacred and loved thing in your life? What's crazy about protecting your family from the life which you lead? If anything, the actions of Tom and Katie (his religious beliefs aside) were an act of sanity among a community of chaos.

Where Lohan and crew believe themselves to be, as previously mentioned, "above the system. Over it. Beyond it," Depp and crew strive to disappear into it, to go unnoticed – they seek anonymity as their name.

In this regard, there is no better example then Dave Chappelle. He had a hit show on Comedy Central and was seen by the general public as the new Richard Prior, a genius of comedy. Adding to this, he was offered $50 million to continue to produce Chappelle Show. He walked away.

When the majority of us would have taken the money and continued on, he walked away. He chose his private life over his ever-growing public one. He chose his family over his fame.

For that rare breed of celebrity, for the ones who don't see the lights of Hollywood as a blessing, they yearn to be like Will Smith and Tommy Lee Jones' characters in Men in Black. Celebrities like him wish to have no identifying marks of any kind, to leave no lasting memory, to be a rumor, recognizable only as déjà vu and dismissed just as quickly.

In essence, they wish to lead a normal life. How about we leave them be and respect their wishes?

Brad Leibowitz writes on Thursdays. He can be reached at bleibowitz@student.umass.edu.

COUNTER-POINT

Where opinions clash

Student strike: picket or stick it?

A call to arms

Nick Milano

In case you have not seen one of the million posters hanging around campus, have been addressed by someone walking around dorm halls and in case your professors have refused to address the issue, there is a student strike today and tomorrow.

Do not go to your classes; take the two days off in support of your fellow undergraduate and graduate students. The University of Massachusetts has long ignored the voice of its students – it is now necessary to step up and demonstrate solidarity within the student population.

In recent years, the University's administration has taken steps against the student body largely in an attempt to create a new national image. The current leaders no longer wish the University of Massachusetts Amherst to be known as Zoomass or as a "safety" school to prospective students, alumni and employers. There is nothing cause; it is a shame that when most of us go to a job interview, the person across the desk will recognize UMass for its distasteful celebrations after the 2004 Red Sox World Series win or its disgusting riots after UMass' loss in the football championship last year. But the way in which the administration is trying to crack down blatantly infringes upon student' civil rights, as well as their rights as students.

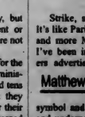
It sends a clear message to the University: The student body will no longer sit by idly.

Having police roam the halls of the dormitories is a violation of privacy. It is frightening for a school to endorse Orwellian tactics because it may foster a society in which daily intrusion into one's private life is not only accepted, but also viewed as status quo. The University's mission statement declares that the school strives to "improve the lives of the people of the Commonwealth, the nation, and the world." How does this correlate to teaching that the Fourth Amendment is not really that important?

Another issue the SGA is demanding be given attention is student control over student space. The Student Union and Campus Center originated as areas for student activities, but have been taken by the University for its own needs. Despite this, students are still paying for the maintenance of these buildings. Another issue is the growing number of freshman-only buildings. Why does the University give first choice to those students who have not even spent one day on campus? Upperclassmen and even sophomores deserve the right to choose a residential space before any incoming students.

Sure, a two-day strike will not magically grant the student government all the demands it wants, but it sends a clear message to the University: The student body will no longer sit by idly. At the least, it demonstrates that all students share concerns about the direction of the school. This is not the first time that the University leaders have overtly ignored an organization of people willing to provide valuable input. Recent Boston Globe articles and national studies have shown the University's clear and utter disregard for its alumni. UMass ranks among the worst in keeping their alumni in touch with the school. Why? As Jack Leader, a one-time UMass Alumni Association president told the Boston Globe, "The University wants our money, but doesn't want our involvement or our advice. Alumni relations are not important to them."

It appears the same is true for the general student body. The administration wants students to spend tens of thousands of dollars, but they do not want any input to hear their opinions. The committee charged with finding the next chancellor of UMass has not attempted to incorporate a loud student voice. Ruth Thompson, the SGA's nomination to the committee, lamented to The Daily Collegian that there are only three students "out of 20 plus people on their search committee."



There are a number of issues that the strike is meant to address, but space limits how many I can address. There is a call for a rollback of student fees as the Governor has dedicated over $1 billion in an education initiative. There are calls that more money be used to increase the level of diversity found at UMass. Even if the statistics add up, does anyone really think that the school is diverse? Who sits with whom at lunch and dinner? The school is still very clearly divided by races.

In too many ways, UMass ignores their very own ideals. The Mission Statement's first line reads that "The University's mission is to provide an affordable and accessible education of high quality." Demonstrate that you stand for real diversity, affordable education, student control over decisions that affect students and Fourth Amendment rights. Going on strike means standing up for what you believe in.

What could be more American?

Nick Milano writes on Thursdays. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu.

A shot in the foot

Matthew Robare

Strike, strike, everywhere a strike or a protest. It's like Paris or Berkeley in the '60s, only less drugs and more Marxism. In just about every classroom I've been in over the past week I have seen posters advertising Thursday's strike with the printed symbol and the words "Strike before recognition" and underneath, that the ambiguous slogan, "Unions for students, not for profit, not for privilege."

The strike, which was organized by the Graduate Student Senate, has the following demands: student fee rollback, funding and accountability for diversity, police out of dorms and student control over student space. The SGA also voted to support the strike. The action do they demand be taken? Basically, the strikers want the politicians in Boston to increase funding for the University, and when that funding inside it, University fees will drop.

The fact that this will cause Massachusetts to move its taxes yet again so the Commonwealth can redistribute the wealth of the poor to us richer people who can afford higher education is left unmentioned. Funding and accountability for diversity is a very vague and ambiguous demand. What it means is left up to the imagination of the reader, I suppose.

A boycott, at least right now, would be completely ineffective because, well, we already paid for this year.

Police out of dorms means police out of dorms. Student control over student space means that they want an end to privatization in an end to freshmen-only housing.

I for one, question the GSS's ethical motives. It seems to me that the Graduate Senate is fabricating those things as demands because they want to use the undergraduates to make the GSS appear more supported than it actually is, with hopeful secret final agenda: the Graduate Employee Organization's contract talks. I don't think that it is any coincidence that the GEO is also demanding an increase in diversity funding and fee rollbacks that would decrease costs precisely with its aim for a 2 percent increase. It would be to offset increases in graduate student fees. Also noteworthy is that the organization is not calling it a strike, and "strike" generally refers to an action by a union against an employer.

Likewise, this somewhat odd marriage of causes begs the question of what business the whole student body has going on strike. There is certainly precedent – in 1968 alone a general strike started by university students nearly toppled Charles deGaulle's government, [illegible] University was occupied and closed by student strikes.

But the question is not if students went on strike in the past, but if they should go on strike at present. To begin with, as much as schools like to think of themselves as haughty ivory towers of academia, schools are businesses. As businesses they exist to serve the consumer, namely the students (or more specifically, the students' families who are paying the costs and fees) and not special interest groups, like rich alumni.

In practice, however, because student interest is attracted elsewhere and most things the University does are of little interest to the people writing $30,000 checks annually, the special interests hold sway. Therefore, because the business's highest priority is to serve the consumer, the consumer should go on strike to demand their issues be addressed – this is ostensibly a "boycott."

Indeed, the University should encourage student strikes when it ceases to serve them effectively because unsatisfied customers take their money elsewhere. Or, as I overheard a business major say once, "A happy customer tells three friends, an unhappy customer tells 10."

But a boycott, at least right now, would be completely ineffective because, well, we already paid for this year. The whole point of boycott is to bring a business to its knees not through force, but by refusing to buy from it. Since we already paid the University for this year, a boycott does not make very much sense. Now, next year, if a series of undergraduate classes decide to protest University policies by not returning to the University of Massachusetts, then the administration would sit up and take notice.

If the graduate students want to go on strike because of their issues – representation on the Board of Trustees, GEO labor talks – then let them. But we undergrads should not let them take advantage of us. We have our own tensions and problems with the bureaucrats in Whitmore mismanaging the University; we should not be called upon to take the graduate students' burden on our own backs. I have an issue with the graduate students doing what they want to with the University, but when they decide to exploit me and my fellow classmates by pretending to sing for us, then I take notice.

I refuse to be exploited. I will not go on strike and I urge all undergrads to join me.

Matthew Robare is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mrobare@student.umass.edu.

It's time to tell politicians to stop the song and dance

C.A. Chase

The week of Nov. 11 brought with it, among other things, Benazir Bhutto calling for Musharaf to give up power, Veterans Day, the death of Norman Mailer, Italian soccer riots and the Nov. 15 Issue of Rolling Stone magazine. In this particular bi-weekly glossy, one article that stood out was an analysis of the presidential hopefuls' campaign songs, entitled "We break down the messages behind the candidates' tunes."

Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign song, Fleetwood Mac's "Don't Stop," is seen as the "gold standard of campaign music."

The three Democratic frontrunners, including Clinton's better half, fall short of Clinton's musical paragon of perfection. Hillary Clinton's, chosen via online votes (democracy in action), is Celine Dion's "You and I." Barack Obama's songs are Sam and Dave's "Hold on, I'm Comin'" and Jackie Wilson's "Higher and Higher," and John Edwards also has a double-barreled campaign song arsenal, with Foo Fighter's "Times Like These" and John Mellencamp's "This Is Our Country."

The thought of politicians throwing our music around is so particularly cringe-inducing because music is antithetical to what they are and to what they do.

On the red side of the political divide, Rudy Giuliani shows a bit of aural flip-flopping with three songs ("Eye of the Tiger," by Survivor, "Stand Back" by Stevie Nicks and "Fly Like an Eagle" by Seal). John McCain's campaign chose Darryl Worley's "I Will Hold My Ground."

I haven't heard of that either, and with lyrical gems such as "I am not afraid to fight for what I know is right," I am sure that it is no great loss.

Mitt Romney showed his secret affinity for the King with his pick of a techno remix of Elvis Presley's "A Little Less Conversation." As evidenced by these interesting choices of songs, it's clear that music and politicians mix uneasily at best.

The thought of politicians throwing our music around is so particularly cringe-inducing because music is antithetical to what they are and to what they do. Political campaigns, and especially the presidential race, are disenguous. And music, when it gets it right, is evidence of purpose in life. So of course politicians try to steal that and spin it.

Art, and music in particular, can attract or repel people from reality, while politics today does neither. Politicians drive a train that runs on a grimy and distorted track of semantics and semi-truths. How can picking a song for one's campaign address the abyss between the issues squabbled over and the concerns of the majority?

People have always been fed up with politicians, and their melting plasticity hasn't helped matters. When politicians try to connect with the youth, it's just creepy and sad. After he died, among Richard Nixon's personal affects were some Arlo Guthrie records, in what was perhaps a feeble attempt to connect with a younger, disillusioned generation. Guthrie's most famous song, "Alice's Restaurant Massacre," concerns how Guthrie was arrested for dumping trash, and how the subsequent blot on his record prevented him from going to Vietnam. The song was 18 minutes and 20 seconds long – the same amount of time as the gap on the Watergate Tapes. The image of Nixon playing the song over and over, alone, before his resignation, is just too sad and bizarre to contemplate.

But can we really blame politicians for lacking authenticity? Dealing with such intensity in music, with such purity and sincerity is just so blazingly antithetic to our way of life. In our labeling of any sort of emotional music as "emo," we cast sincerity and real emotions as something to be sneered at. Music is something beyond words, something that just is, and we can't deal with that. We have to debase it with being snobby about music and dole it out to dirty politicians. The realness that music can impart, the baseline of real, tremulous notes sliding up and down, capturing something that cannot be verbalized, cannot be said, cannot be welded to talking points and spin. You can use music to find something that says something to you about your life and God help you if you try to find out something about politics with it.

It would be a cheap and easy way, in analyzing the situation, to say, "How much does Hillary Clinton appreciate this? Does it sound authentic?" It's PR decisions, not a reflection of the candidate, and clearly not a reflection of the person separate from the machine. Politicians are throwing music around, trying to co-opt it, distanced from the purity and the beauty of music, because of what they are.

They dirty it – dirty the very concept of it – by using top-40 pop-schlock hits to stand in for a vision of a new country, a new world order, of their vision of peace and hope and prosperity.

What does this pop artist or that terrible hit song say to you about your life, about where you want this country to go? Could it really shake a generation out of political apathy? Could this bind us all together? Similar to the way crappy talk news shows are bringing down and degrading the level of rational discourse, this utilization of bad music brings down the level of something that could speak to you without words, of sincerity beyond the Eagles, of someone looking up and trying to get closer to the stars.

Clinton, McCain, Romney and Edwards need to stop trying to gate-crash the doors of perception and the gates of heaven.

C.A. Chase writes on Thursdays. She can be reached at cchase@student.umass.edu.

Music and politics have been intrinsically linked ever since the creation of the Parliament. However, some Clintons, such as George (above) have a much better idea of what good music is than others.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

ZOMBIES BITE BACK

Dear Editor:

Re: "It's a Nerfing shame" Brad Leibowitz, Ed/Op Nov. 7, 2007.

If Humans v. Zombies is the college equivalent to the game of tag, Brad Leibowitz's article was the college equivalent to sticking our heads in a big toilet or a "Brad doesn't understand why people like to have fun" bowl and giving us a big ol' swirly.

That's right, Brad. You're a bully. And you need to get over it. Also, please don't apologize to "all women out there" for the actions of over a thousand students who are playing a game. Not all of us take out our aggression by pounding Jack Daniel's and awkwardly hitting on girls until we find one who has lowered their standards enough to make out with us for a bit, then decide to go home because this is never what she pictured for herself.

You're right though, Brad, when I graduate I expect to have a husband by my side as a serious breadwinner so I can raise our children and find wallpaper to match the $80,000 piece of parchment I just bought. And I expect my husband to have no outlet to have fun – especially not one where no one gets hurt, including himself, and will cause embarrassment for me in front of my nosy book club. When what's really embarrassing is my husband's boss' wife's choice of a different Danielle Steel book every week, Brad. No one can read that much Steel, Brad. No one.

In short, you're jealous. And scared. And hate fun. Pick up a bandana and a bag of marshmallows, Brad, and you'll find it no harder to get a ladyfriend than you did before.

Natalie Baseman
UMass student

Dear Editor:

In response to Brad Leibowitz's article, "It's a Nerfing Shame", I have a few things to say, bear with me.

I'm not a participant in the game "Humans vs. Zombies" but I was a little offended by Mr. Leibowitz's column. Mr. Leibowitz feels inclined to apologize for the campus game since it is a blatant example of immaturity and damages the image of men on this campus. I don't think this game is immature at all. It's an entertaining, light-hearted and rather appropriate celebration of community spirit, and not to mention Halloween.

I think there are many other aspects of UMass campus life which display the immaturity of the youth today. I don't think I really need go into these forms of immaturity, I think they are rather obvious: rioting, skipping class, getting arrested, stealing iPods, binge drinking, etc.

I daresay there are things which every campus has; the fruits of immaturity. Remember when going to school used to be fun? Remember the days when time in between classes was more than a coffee and a cigarette? I see less and less communal spirit as we herd to class throughout the day.

This game has revived that spirit in a time when it is becoming increasingly important. Personally, I have enjoyed watching those who are playing. In response to the idea that women "are not looking for boys touting soft projectile guns," remember that women judge male character differently. Every woman is different; they aren't all looking for these perfect "mature, intelligent, generous, good-looking men."

Mr. Leibowitz and I both know how many women out there are just as immature as the men they date, if not more so. Lots of mature women like men who are active and surprising, and a little bit different. Being creative is a great way to attract women, and more importantly maintaining a strong relationship. I think it's just too easy for an outsider to label this game and its participants immature, and a disgrace to the majority; the upright, intelligent, good-looking and mature males who so obviously inhabit this campus.

Before we label the Humans and Zombies of our campus "geeks" or "nerds" who are lacking in social relationships, remember that they are having a lot more fun playing than you are complaining.

Michael Nicholls
UMass student

STRIKE IT FROM THE RECORD

Dear Editor:

You almost have to stand in awe of the stupidity of the student strike. The grievances (which I haven't looked into) aside, the idea that a strike will accomplish anything is insane. Think about it: You are skipping classes that you already paid for to protest how expensive they are. This is the equivalent of sauntering into a restaurant and ordering prime rib and a bottle of champagne, slapping down your credit card, and then refusing to eat because it's a rip-off. If students are unhappy with the cost of UMass, they should either suck it up or consider an alternative like community college for the first two years.

Zac Bissonnette
UMass student

Dear Editor:

I remember walking down the corridor in the Campus Center by the barber shop last week on my way to class, perusing the numerous fliers on the bulletin board and seeing a flier saying "Student Strike!" in large bold letters instructing students to – you guessed it – strike.

The poster listed the protesters demands: police out of dorms, lower costs, control over student space, and the ever popular, "supporting diversity." These demands will help ensure that this strike will accomplish nothing. By making this into a multi-issue protest they remove any power that it would have from focusing on one issue and demanding actual change. Now it's not just, say, "protect our right to privacy," but now, "do this, that, and this other thing." No gains will be made because the administration isn't going to do all those things, but maybe with pressure they might have done one of those things.

We paid this University for the privilege to take classes here. Does the administration care if we don't go to classes? No. It's like buying a car and leaving it at the lot to protest the diversity of people who buy it and the cost you paid for it. Really, look at this situation: we are upset over the costs we pay so we are not going to attend the thing we pay for. Brilliant logic there, it's like a "strike" I'd expect organized in a middle school or high school.

Now, perhaps you are on the strikers' side and think I'm some Coulter-esque figure alone in my views. Except I can assure you I'm not because everyone I've talked to about this so far has said they will not be striking (if they even knew about it). The reason? It's stupid and will accomplish nothing that pretty much sums it up. When everyone from Socialists to Libertarians think you're acting crazy, you probably are.

Derek Newhall
UMass student

A MORE COMPLEX ISSUE

Dear Editor:

Re: "Forgotten Refugees, Matt Hoffman, Ed/Op Nov. 9, 2007

Matt Hoffman accuses the Palestine Action Coalition, as the organizers of "Palestine-Israel 101" (a series of weekly talks about different aspects of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict) of "unfairness" for failing to mention the situation of Jewish refugees from other Arab nations. Hoffman then goes into a rambling, racist and truly unfair diatribe about how Arab people hate Jews, doing his best to portray Arabs and Muslims as inherently violent and Jews as victims that cannot also victimize. He even blames Arabs (meaning Palestinians) for their status as refugees, as if they forced themselves from their own villages in 1948 and were not ejected by an invading army.

Hoffman won't specifically refer to Palestinians or Palestine (only the Palestinian Authority) because he refuses to believe that such a people exist. Rather, he prefer to talk about "Arabs" so that he can naively pretend that Middle Eastern countries do not have distinct and separate governing authorities with diverging interests and alliances. He asks, "Why don't Arabs take care of their own refugees?" as if the Arab states are now and have always been united in their goals. In short, he's either poorly informed or has chosen to assume a position of ignorance and two-dimensional analysis to suit his own ends.

Hoffman writes that the Palestine-Israel 101 series blames Israel for the conflict, assuming that the point of the series is to cast blame. However, the purpose of this series is to start critical conversation about this conflict, not to quash it. I think anyone who comes to the series will find that there is no single source of "blame" for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and that there are no such things as "an Israeli side" and a "Palestinian side."

Hoffman's editorial isn't as bad as some pieces I've seen. However, it disturbs me that he can assume this either or, dichotomous approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Israel-Palestine, as I've come to know that region in my travels there, is not in either or place. I have met many Israelis who want to end the occupation for the sake of making Israel more secure, many Palestinians who, given the fact that they face day to day crises to obtain food and water because of the conflict, are willing to come to any number of agreements for peace. All this talk Hoffman makes about Jewish refugees from other Arab countries is only distraction. The fact that Jews have been forced out of other countries is indeed serious, but the question at hand, in Palestine-Israel 101, is the situation between Palestinians and Israelis and not Israel and the entire Arab world. I encourage Mr. Hoffman and everyone else to continue this conversation and debate at the next installment of Palestine-Israel 101, a talk with Professor Sayres Rudy from Amherst College about the role of the U.S. in this conflict

Amy Kent
UMass student
Palestine Action Coalition

PATRICK SHOULD PROTECT PARKS

Dear Editor

Re: "Protecting Massachusetts park system," Ed/Op Nov. 13, 2007

I wholeheartedly agree with the authors in their assertion that Governor Patrick must act to provide the Department of Conservation and Recreation (DCR) with the funding needed to maintain parks and forests in Massachusetts.

We do have some amazing places that have been preserved in this state. Unfortunately, many have fallen into disrepair. I am an avid runner and mountain biker who frequents places like Mt. Tom, Weindell State Forest, and other state parks and forests in the Pioneer Valley. I find many trails that are often littered, poorly marked, and sometimes, even unsafe.

There are several generous non-profit groups, such as the New England Mountain Bike Association (NEMBA) who volunteer their time to maintain trails in many parks. These groups do amazing work, unfortunately, groups like NEMBA do not possess the resources it takes to care for our state parks and forests in the long term. That responsibility can only be taken on by DCR.

In order for this to happen, Governor Patrick must come through on his campaign promises and provide the funding necessary for DCR to get our parks back on track.

Tim Austin
UMass graduate student
School of Education

LACKING CUSTOMER SERVICE

Dear Editor:

As a doctoral student who has attended UMass for seven years, I did encounter several weird things on campus. I would like to share a recent incident that made me feel stupid and frustrated.

Early in the morning, after dropping off my daughter at her daycare, I hurried to the W.E.B. Dubois Library basement, intending to copy some documents before heading to work. I swiped my student ID card on a copying machine. Nothing happened as the machine's light was not even on. I swiped my ID card again on another machine, but it repeatedly produced a "beep" sound. I switched to using my Guest Card but found it did not have money on it. I took out a $10 bill and went to the vending machine. I realized that I could only use five dollars and should save five dollars for the week's gas. I exchanged my $10 bill with a student for two five-dollar bills. I followed the instructions by inserting my Guest Card into the vending machine and then a five-dollar bill. Out came a brand-new Guest Card and a receipt for a four-dollar purchase. I felt upset because I already had a Guest Card. What I needed was a five-dollar value. Two years ago, I used my student ID to purchase a five-dollar value. Out came a brand-new Guest Card and a four-dollar receipt. I remembered that lesson well and so I used my Guest Card to add value this time. Unfortunately, the machine forced me to buy another Guest Card again.

I called the Guest Card Office. A woman asked me to hold on. I waited and waited. Finally I redialed the number. The same woman transferred my call to Mr. Tom Mahany, who said that he never ever had anybody receiving a Guest Card that was not intended. I politely told him that I needed to return the card for two reasons. I need the one dollar back for making copies and I already had a Guest Card. He explained, "Well, we can't take the card back. If you want to keep it, keep it. If not, just throw it away." To him, it was so easy to say that. For me, I budget very carefully in order not to live in debt. Every penny makes sense to me. He asked me to leave my phone number and he would investigate the situation later. At around 1 p.m., he called telling me that he had checked that machine, it had no problem, and I should be responsible for my own purchase.

I feel sad about the way that UMass Guest Card Office handled the situation. They should give us a learning opportunity as we all learn from trial-and-error processes. The way they deal with Guest Cards makes them sound like profit-making businessmen. Unconsciously, I compared their service to the ones of Target, Wal-Mart, or any other stores. Other stores never question us when we return an item mistakenly purchased. They build up their reputation by gaining clients' trust. Looking at the useless card, I could not help asking, "What kind of service does UMass Guest Card Office provide? Do they really help students or make a profit from students?" Other stores allow us to make mistakes in our purchase but this office never does.

Huihong Bao
U Mass graduate student

The Daily Collegian encourages reader responses. Letters to the editor should be no more than 350 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com. We regret that we cannot print all of the letters we receive; additional letters can be found online at www.dailycollegian.com.

NOV 15 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Psychedelic education to keep on truckin'

Weekend symposium set to look at Grateful Dead impact

BY CODY KALTER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Summing up the Grateful Dead in a few words is extremely hard. In order to understand the charisma, atmosphere and true "American Beauty" that is the Dead, one would have to listen and experience the band through not only its music but through the culture and fan base it created.

For those who want to experience the Dead for the first time, or for the "Dead Heads" who want relive it, this weekend at the University of Massachusetts is the place to be. "Unbroken Chain: The Grateful Dead in Music, Culture and Memory" is a public symposium, analyzing the band through its music and studying its cultural effect on American history. The symposium is the first major University-held conference on the subject of the Grateful Dead.

A variety of scholars, artists, fans, professors and members of the extended Grateful Dead family will be attending and speaking at an array of presentations, gallery exhibits, musical performances and other events to help study the mystique of the Dead.

"Unbroken Chain" is being brought to campus by the UMass history department, in unity with the semester-long graduate seminar "American Beauty: Music, Culture and Society, 1945-95" and the undergraduate course "How Does the Song Go: The Grateful Dead as a Window into American Culture."

The symposium features numerous panelists, including "Mountain Girl" Carloyn Garcia, the first wife of the guitarist Jerry Garcia and a strong member of the Merry Pranksters who helped formulate the early Dead scene, David Gans, who has been the host of the "Grateful Dead Radio Hour" for the past 20 years, Bob Bralove, the Dead's own tech genius, and Dan Healy, who is responsible for the band's improvisational sound.

A strong keynote speaker will be Dennis McNally, a 1978 UMass history graduate. Along with being the main publicist for the Dead, he is also the author of "Strange Trip: The Inside History of the Grateful Dead."

"The academic world is not as removed from so-called reality as people think, especially those in the academic world ... In the rock 'n' roll world, there are pockets of meticulous intelligence and literacy, people like Jerry Garcia and Phil Lesh," said McNally.

Though studying a legendary jam band doesn't seem to be very academic, it's quite the contrary. This symposium will be gathering various scholars from fields in humanities, business, social sciences and engineering, all to focus on what is known as "Dead Studies."

"Ultimately, the Dead phenomenon suggests a new way of looking at yourself, of what we are capable of in a modern Western Society that appears increasingly fragmented, media-driven, manipulated and alienating. In an era in which academics are increasingly aware of the need to collaborate across disciplinary lines, a topic with as broad-based an appeal as the Dead phenomenon should be fascinating and welcome," said Nicholas Meriwether, an oral historian at the University of South Carolina and the author of "All Graceful Instruments: The Context of the Grateful Dead Phenomenon."

Other scholars who will be speaking along with Meriwether will be David Dodd, editor of "The Complete Annotated Grateful Dead Lyrics;" Rebecca Adams, author of "Deadhead Social Science: You Ain't Gonna Learn What You Don't Wanna Know," UMass professor of comparative literature David Lenson, author of "On Drugs" and UMass English professor Nicholas Bromell, authors of "Tomorrow Never Knows: Rock and Psychedelics in the 60s." The list of scholars will also include psychologist and chaos theorist Stanley Krippner and ethnomusicologist Fred Lieberman.

"Is it possible that we'll take a hit for focusing this kind of intellectual talent on what Jerry Garcia himself called 'just a dance band?' Perhaps, but universities like ours need to be courageous in propelling serious scholarship in new directions, and in reaching out to communities far and wide. When we are timid in academia, we miss real opportunities. We hope that the Grateful Dead is just the beginning," said John Mullin, dean of the UMass graduate school. The graduate school is co-sponsoring the event beside UMass Department of History and the UMass Outreach program.

Various artists will be presenting galleries and discussions. Among

See GRATEFUL DEAD on page 9

Jerry Garcia and the legendary jam band the Grateful Dead have impacted both culture and music through their sounds and messages. This weekend, the UMass History department and Graduate School are co-sponsoring a look at the band through lectures, documentaries, art and two concerts.

UMass Power and Call goes national

The University of Massachusetts Marching Band is the invited exhibition performance for the Bands of America Grand National Championship this weekend in Indianapolis IN. BOA is a high school marching band competition featuring over 90 bands from around the country.

Greeno's offering hot service and food

Student-run sub shop has friendly feel

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Every day, thousands of students trudge along the lines in each of the University of Massachusetts Amherst's dining commons, lamenting their lack of choices and diversity. They just don't know where to look.

Since 1973, Greeno Sub Shop, a completely student run co-op located in the basement of Greenough residential building, has been providing students with new options in a laid-back atmosphere.

Liana Rasmusen, a senior who has worked at Greeno for five semesters, said that the comfort level has to do with "not having to deal with anyone who could ... get you in trouble ... [it has] a home feel rather than a business."

With tables covered with boxes of Trivial Pursuit questions and puzzles, couches to lounge in, and a big painted wall bearing the word "Greeno," customers automatically feel at ease. Each employee is a co-manager of Greeno, as is the case in all student run businesses at UMass, so there are no overbearing bosses to deal with, keeping the mood light and fun. Music is always playing, usually from employees' iPods, and enjoyable banter between co-managers and patrons can be heard from the counter.

"A vast majority [of customers] are regulars," said Ben Janas, also a senior.

This feeling of familiarity allows customers to relax while they enjoy one of Greeno's many subs, each of which was created by co-managers, past and present.

Sophomore Sherezad Contractor said she enjoys eating at Greeno because "it's friendlier, cheaper and tastes better than Blue Wall, [and] people working at Greeno are students themselves," so it makes hanging out more relaxed.

Other patrons, like L.T. Costin, said that Greeno is a "quaint little nook [that is a] nice change from the DCs."

Much of the laid-back atmosphere comes from the student-run aspect of Greeno's. There are different committees to handle different aspects of the business. These committees range from maintenance and purchasing to hiring and steering, which is the "big picture" committee, according to James Burbidge, another co-manager.

The hiring committee has the task of sorting through the hopefuls to determine who will fit in best with the Greeno community. Kitchen training isn't necessary, because "there are so many niches ... we need all sorts of majors and interests to get all the jobs done," said Rasmusen.

A variety of interests comes in handy when it comes time for elections. Each employee must run for and be elected to at least two committees.

"If you're not in a committee, you're not really that involved," said Regina Parkinson, a sophomore who only started working at Greeno this semester. "It's only a little bit intimidating" to campaign in front of the existing committee members, she joked.

Each week, all the committees get together to discuss issues that may have cropped up during the week. They "deal with things as a group, things that affect us all," said Burbidge. This way, each co-manager stays informed about the business.

Greeno does not stand alone, though. There are seven other student-run businesses on campus, and they all work intimately with each other through the Board of Student Business (BOSB). BOSB brings together two representatives from each of the eight student businesses with two undergraduate consultants from the Center for Student Businesses, a consult group that aides Greeno and the rest of the co-ops on campus.

At these meetings, they discuss any problems the businesses might be facing. According to the Board of Student Businesses section on the Web site of another student-run business,

See GREENO on page 9

Piano Man all alone

Billy Joel talks current tour and sharing with Elton John

BY JIM HARRINGTON
THE OAKLAND TRIBUNE

Billy Joel's stats are impressive. He's sold some 80 million records in the United States, which makes him the sixth best-selling artist in the country, right behind the Eagles and a notch above Pink Floyd.

That, however, won't stop him from hearing the question: "What have you done for us lately?"

The 58-year-old legend certainly hasn't been writing new pop songs. After dominating the airwaves in the '70s, '80s and early '90s with smash upon smash, Joel has been decidedly quiet in recent years. He hasn't released a new pop album since 1993's "River of Dreams," a disc that hit No. 1 on the Billboard charts, and has instead focused his attention on composing instrumental works.

He has remained active on the road, having toured for the better part of a decade on a co-bill with fellow piano man Elton John. In 2006, he finally ventured out on his first solo tour of the United States in years. That outing proved so popular that Joel is staging a second trek.

Recently, Joel took the time to discuss the new tour and other subjects during a phone interview from his home on Long Island, N.Y.

JIM HARRINGTON: You've been inducted into the Songwriter's Hall of Fame, the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and the Long Island Music Hall of Fame. Which one means the most to you?

BILLY JOEL: Probably, the Songwriter. I'm from Long Island, so that was a lay-down.

The Rock and Roll Hall of Advertisement Fame? You know, rock 'n' roll, that's what I do. But songwriting is the hardest part of the job, so that's probably the one I appreciate the most.

JH: After touring with Elton John for so many years, why did you finally decide to mount your own solo trek?

BJ: We were touring with Elton for about 10 years. ... I got to do his songs, he got to do my songs, we got do our songs together, he got to play with my band, I got to play with his band. There were whole different combinations of things. But after 10 years, we were pretty much doing a stock greatest hits show.

Elton was the opening act on the tour, he went on first. So, we'd be sitting backstage and Elton would be playing hit after hit after hit. We'd be sitting there saying, "Oh, my God, we have to follow this?" Well, if you try to go up there and do album tracks or obscurities, the crowd is going to go to the bathroom. So, we were doing greatest hits for 10 years, and that got a little old.

JH: What can fans expect from these set lists?

BJ: You have to have a balance. The majority of the audience is there to hear the songs that it's familiar with, which are the hits. But, on the other hand, if that's all we played then we'd get bored. ... So, when it was time to consider going on our own, we thought, 'Well, this is a good opportunity for us to dig back into the archives and do album tracks and songs we like to do songs that weren't hits.'

JH: People obviously liked it. Last year's tour was a big hit.

BJ: A lot of people came. We didn't really know what kind of business we were going to do. We just figured we'd give it a shot, but the demand was there.

That's why we are going out again, there seems to be a demand for us dinosaurs. We are kind of running the business these days, which is a sad statement on popular music, I guess.

JH: You recently released your first new pop single in more than a decade, "All My Life." How did it feel to get back in the singles game after all these years away?

BJ: I didn't intend to put that out as a single. I wrote it for my wife, as a gift, from me to her.

Columbia wanted to put it out as a single, and I said, "Well there's not even an album and this is never going to get airplay, it's like a Tony Bennett song."

JH: Still, could "All My Life" represent the tip of the iceberg in terms of a new batch of pop songs?

BJ: Nah. It was a one-off. It was meant to be a personal gift to my wife. Hey, look, if all of a sudden I decide to write a bunch of songs I'm not going to stop myself. But I have no plans to do that.

I don't want to say that my ability to write has dried up, because I've been writing all along. I write instrumental music these days. But I don't feel compelled to record it, to have it performed. It's for my own edification.

Billy Joel, performing at last year's Super Bowl, has been a mainstream name in music for over 30 years despite not releasing a new album since 1993. The 58-year-old is currently touring solo after a 10-year run with Elton John.

Trival Pursuit and a sandwich

GREENO from page 8

the People's Market, "in the past, these issues have been privatization of the University, the student businesses as a recognized learning community on campus, as well as ways we can unify the businesses and reach out to the campus, the local co-ops and the co-operative movement at large."

Greeno Sub Shop and the rest of the student business community is a tight knit group, and that comfort and compatibility can be felt throughout their shop.

"I'm glad I work here, because I met so many people I wouldn't have otherwise [met]," said Parkinson.

Burbidge agreed, saying that the co-managers really become friends rather than co-workers.

"We are ... just fantastic people," said Janas.

Greeno Sub Shop is worth a hike up the hill, and with a homey feel, a fun atmosphere, and the official motto of "hot people serving hot food," how could you resist?

Stephanie McPherson can be reached at smcphers@student.umass.edu

COURTESY AMANDA SUNG

Greeno Sub Shop is one of eight completely student run business on the UMass campus. Every employee is also a co-manager and a member of at least two committees that keep Greeno's operating on a daily basis.

Reliving the Dead experience

GRATEFUL DEAD from page 8

those scheduled are photographers Susanna Millman, Herb Greene and Lloyd Wolf as well as album cover and poster artists Mike Dubois and Mikio Kennedy.

Original prints of Jerry Garcia's own artwork will be on display and available for purchase. "Deadheads: An American Subculture" and "Sunshine Daydream" two previously unreleased documentaries about the Aug. 27, 1972 benefit concert at Ken Kesey's farm in Oregon will also be shown.

Since the weekend festivities revolve around the music of the Dead, there will be two opportunities to hear that music live. The American Beauty Project is playing Friday night and will be covering songs from the albums "American Beauty" and "Workingman's Dead." The Dark Star Orchestra, whose covers of Grateful Dead songs sound eerily similar to the originals, will hold a concert on Saturday night.

The Dark Star's rhythm guitarist Rob Eaton and keyboardist Rob Baracco will also be participating in several panel discussions. Both performances will be held at the Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m. with tickets ranging from $15-$30.

The symposium runs Friday through Sunday. Registration for the general public is $225, for students with a valid student ID it is $60 and an optional $18 for Sunday brunch. To register for the conference, go to www.umasscconnections.com/unbrokenchain.

Coby Kalter can be reached at ckalter@student.umass.edu.

GRATEFUL DEAD SYMPOSIUM
NOVEMBER 16-18
FINE ARTS CENTER
ONLINE REGESTRATION
$225 PUBLIC
$60 STUDENTS

Do you generally come in 15 minutes late, use the side door and space out at your desk?
Try writing for arts.
Email: arts@dailycollegian.com

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
WINE SALE 10% OFF 6 BOTTLES* OF WINE EVERYDAY!! MIX & MATCH *REGULAR PRICED 750 ML BOTTLES OF VARIETAL WINES
GIFT SETS ARRIVING DAILY!!! GIFT BASKETS MADE TO ORDER!!!
GIFT CARDS AVAILABLE!!! DON'T FORGET TO TREAT YOURSELF!!!

Liquor
Hennessy Cognac X.O 750 ml $119.99
Grand Marnier 100yr Centenaire 750 ml $99.99
Crown Royal Cask 16 Whiskey 750 ml $89.99
Glenmorangie Burgundy Wood Finish 750 ml $49.99
Jose Cuervo Platino Tequila 750 ml $49.99
Glenmorangie Madiera Wood Finish 750 ml $49.99
Ardbeg 10yr Islay Single Malt Scotch 750 ml $42.99
Tanqueray Gin 1.75 liter $34.99
Hennessy Cognac V.S.O.P. 750 ml $34.99
Grand Marnier Cordon Rouge 750 ml $32.99
Hennessy Cognac V.S. 750 ml $28.99
Jack Daniels Tennessee Whiskey 1.0 liter $28.99
Belvedere Pure Vodka 750 ml $26.99
10 Cane Rum 750 ml $26.99
Chopin Polish Vodka 750 ml $26.99
Captain Morgan Spiced Rum 1.75 liter $25.99
Jim Beam Bourbon 1.75 liter $20.99
Bailey's Original Irish Cream 750 ml $20.99
Bailey's Flavored Irish Cream* 750 ml $20.99
*Mint Chocolate and Caramel
Jose Cuervo Flavored Tequila* 1.0 liter $20.99
*Citrico, Tropeno, Oranjo
Meyer's Platinum Rum 1.75 liter $19.99
Pinnacle Vodka 1.75 liter $19.99
Godiva Caramel and Mocha Liqueur 750 ml $19.99
Jose Cuervo Gold 750 ml $18.99
Sobieski Polish Vodka 1.75 liter $16.99
Captain Morgan Parrot Bay Rum* 750 ml $14.99
*Including Coconut, Mango, Pineapple, Passion Fruit
Smirnoff Vodka 80° 750 ml $10.99
Smirnoff Twist Flavored Vodka* 750 ml $10.99
*Including Strawberry, Watermelon, Raspberry, Black Cherry
Sale 11/08 - 11/21
333 Russell St., Rte. 9, Hadley, MA
584-8174 • Mon.-Sat. 9AM-11PM • Sun. Noon-11PM

Auto Express
Fast, Quality Service
Student Discount 20% off oil change
SUNDAY SPECIAL (Every Sunday from 10am to 4pm): Full Service Oil Change $19.95
FREE WIRELESS INTERNET
Auto Express is your one stop for MASS STATE INSPECTIONS
with extended hours for your convinence!
Monday, Wednesday & Friday 8 am to 6pm
Tuesday & Thursday 8am to 7pm
Saturday 8 am to 5 pm
Sunday 10 am to 4pm
Axels • Brakes • Batteries • Mufflers • Tune-Ups • Full Service Oil Changes
118 South East St. Amherst, MA 01002
413-253-0056

IN DECIDING WHICH LAW SCHOOL TO ATTEND,
CONSIDER THIS:
Quinnipiac University School of Law ranks among the top 100 law schools in such categories as full-time student LSAT scores (median – 158); admission acceptance rates; student/faculty ratio (13:1); and employment rates after graduation. Not to mention, we offer merit scholarships ranging from $3,000 to full tuition. Before you decide which school to attend, make sure you review the facts. To learn more, visit law.quinnipiac.edu, email ladm@quinnipiac.edu or call 1-800-462-1044
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW
LAW.QUINNIPIAC.EDU | HAMDEN, CONNECTICUT

Dainton still the man

HOCKEY from page 1

winning the season series against two of the top-three teams in last year's standings. BC was one of those teams. The Minutemen beat the Eagles 2-1 at home in last year's early-season home-and-home set, then lost at Conte Forum, 5-2. In the rubber match in early February, UMass won a shocker on the road, jumping out to a 3-0 lead in the first period and holding on for the 5-3 victory.

Of course, none of that holds any bearing for Cahoon, but it certainly proves that the Mass Attack can hang with one of the nation's top teams.

"Vermont was the only other team in the league to beat [BC] in the season series, and Northeastern tied with them, but the other six opponents in the league, they were able to handle their business," Cahoon said. "That was last year, and it's a whole new set of circumstances, but it just speaks to the success that they've had in a very tough league."

Much of the success the Minutemen have had so far this season can be credited to sophomore forward Will Ortiz. He has scored a goal in each of the last four contests, a stretch in which the team is 2-0-2. He has five goals total this year, which leads the team.

"He's certainly a competitive kid," Cahoon said. "Even though he's not overly big, he's gotten stronger as a result of his strength and conditioning. I think that shows itself, as he's been able to fight through some checks and fight off some aggressive play to be able to make the plays that have enabled him to score."

It appears that Cahoon and the rest of the coaching staff are going with Paul Dainton as the indefinite starter in net, with Dan Meyers as the backup.

After splitting time during the opening weekend of the season, a groin injury sidelined Meyers, and Dainton has played admirably as the full-time net minder in his absence. Meyers has suited up for the past several games, but Dainton has gotten the nod every time.

"We're in a rhythm with [Dainton] a little bit, and the measure's got to be when's the time to break that rhythm and either give him a rest of give Danny a game, because he's certainly ready to go."

According to Cahoon, Dainton is simply the hot goaltender right now, and he expects to see Meyers back in net at some point.

"Danny Meyers is practicing, and better yet, practicing well, and so I know at some point in time, he'll factor in, but that's not our worry right now," Cahoon said. "Our worry is to make sure that we put the lineup that best suits the team to succeed on a game-by-game basis."

Sophomore center Brett Watson, who has battled injuries early this season, is expected to play this weekend after returning to the ice Saturday at Lowell.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Meyers, Watson return, bolster Mass Attack lineup

LANGERAAP from page 14

scored two goals over the weekend; including the game-winner against BU. He has now scored goals in four consecutive games. For this, he earned this week's UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week award.

His five goals lead both the team and Hockey East, but he is tied with four other players for the conference lead. No other UMass player has more than three goals on the season.

Ortiz is another player Cahoon can move around because of his talents. He has played on almost every line this season and brings explosiveness and grit to which group Cahoon pairs him with.

Back on the ice

Sophomore center Brett Watson suited up on Saturday for the first time since breaking a finger in practice before a weekend series with Providence. The Minutemen missed the play of their heady pivot.

Not only does Watson provide a calming presence in the middle of the ice, he excels on the penalty kill and in other situations that Cahoon demands defense in.

Without Watson, players like Michael Lecomte and junior Jordan Virtue filled in on the penalty kill and on the UMass depth chart behind top center Cory Quirk.

Watson centered a line featuring Crowder and Burto, providing the Minutemen with a talented trip capable of shutting down an opponent's top line. But also one more than able to create scoring chances.

Early in the season, Watson played between Alex Berry and James Marcou. Marcou and Berry are relentless offensive players who constantly try to push the puck up ice to create scoring chances. Watson's excellent positioning and understanding of defensive hockey, allowed him to offset any channels created by the aggression of his wingers.

Sophomore net minder Dan Meyers is also healthy after a battle with a pulled groin. Meyers dressed against Merrimack two weeks ago and in both matchups last weekend, but freshman Paul Dainton got the start in all three games.

Dainton has performed well in his action, holding opponents to 2.42 goals per game.

Freshman Matt Gedman dressed in Meyers stead during his injury but saw no playing time … UMass is 3-1 in its last four games against this weekend's opponent, Boston College … Langeraap was the fifth UMass freshman to score a goal this season … Ortiz leads the team with two game-winning goals … It is unknown why sophomore defenseman Martin Nolet didn't player either game last weekend and if he will play this weekend … The Minutemen scored three power-play goals this weekend after scoring three in their first seven games of the season.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

BC's Gerbe suspended for on-ice conduct

Good week for young goalies

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Boston College junior forward Nathan Gerbe was suspended by Hockey East Commissioner Joe Bertagna for the Eagles game on Saturday against New Hampshire.

The suspension comes from Gerbe's actions in Friday night's game against Merrimack. Bertagna said that the suspension was not because of Gerbe's actions on Friday night alone.

Bertagna had been informed several times of Gerbe's questionable behavior during the season. Going into Saturday's game, Gerbe had led the team with four goals in eight games.

Along with Gerbe, senior forwards Dan Bertram, Brian O'Hanley and junior defenseman Brett Motherwell sat out with suspensions issued by the team for violation of team rules.

Although Gerbe was not assessed a penalty during the game on Friday night, Bertagna viewed tape of the game and concluded that Gerbe had hit a Merrimack player with the butt-end of his stick.

Impenetrable Force

Three goalies posted career highs in saves this past weekend. UMass Lowell (2-2-3, 0-2-3 Hockey East) saw career highs from sophomores Carter Hutton and Nevin Hamilton. Hutton stopped 39 shots Friday night at UNH and Hamilton saved 36 shots, Saturday night against Massachusetts.

Hutton leads the conference in both goals against average (1.62) and save percentage (.935).

Hamilton's statistics are slightly more inflated than Hutton's because he has an extra game to his credit this season. However, even with only one more game than his counterpart, Hamilton has allowed 12 goals on the season, more than twice the goals allowed by Hutton. Hamilton's .906 save percentage ranks ninth in the conference.

The two net minders finished their freshman campaigns last season with Hutton notching more saves (418) and seeing more time on the ice (1096 minutes, 41 seconds) than Hamilton. However, Hamilton's .902 save percentage bested Hutton's .889 mark.

The other goalie to have a career night in terms of saves was Merrimack's junior goalie Patrick Watson. Watson notched 41 saves at BC (3-2-4, 2-1-3 Hockey East) on Friday night. Watson stopped 32 shots in the first two periods of regulation alone.

PC Flyers

The Providence Friars (3-5-1, 3-2-1 Hockey East) swept the Maine Black Bears (4-4-1, 2-2-1 Hockey East) at Maine this past weekend for the first time since Nov. 8-9, 1985. Providence senior goalie Tyler Sims recorded the fifth shutout of his career on Saturday. His five shutouts tie Mario Proulx for the most career shutouts by a Friar. His two shutouts at Maine are the most ever by a Friar at Alford Arena; Sims has shutout the Black Bears three total times.

He leads the conference with a 1.66 goals-against average. Sims is second in the conference in winning percentage against conference opponents (.667) and third in the conference in save percentage against conference opponents (.930).

Junior Defenseman Matt Taormina is currently tied with Boston College freshman forward Joe Whitney for the conference lead in points-per-game in conference play with 1.50 (five goals, four assists and nine points total). Taormina also leads the conference in goals scored in conference play. The fact that he's played in five conference games gives him a slight edge over the four players tied for second place, all of which have only played in four.

Taormina is also a valuable asset for the Friars in penalty-kill situations. Taormina leads the conference in short-handed goals, with two.

Along with Taormina, the Providence defensive front does more than stop opposing offenses. In Friday's win over Maine, the Friar defensemen accounted for nine total points (three goals, six assists).

Already with nine power-play goals this season, the Friars are on pace to surpass their total of 16 from last season.

Shots Find Their Mark

New Hampshire (5-1-1, 3-1-1 Hockey East) is making the most of its scoring opportunities. The Wildcats have the best scoring offense in the conference. Thus far in the season, UNH is averaging four goals per game, with 28 total goals in seven games played.

The Wildcats are finishing strong in the final period of play this season, scoring 14 total goals, their highest total in any period of regulation play. Four of its five wins this season, UNH has scored at least three goals in one period of regulation.

New Hampshire's leading scorer, senior forward Matt Fornataro, is tied for the conference lead in total goals with five. Fornataro has a point in six of UNH's eight games this season. He also is tied for the team lead in assists with five. This season, Fornataro has also demonstrated his ability to capitalize on power-plays, scoring three goals on the man advantage.

Junior defenseman Jamie Fritsch has also been clutch for the Wildcats this season, leading the team in game-winning goals with two.

The freshmen are also playing a pivotal role for UNH as well. Forwards James van Riemsdyk and Paul Thompson each have three goals on the season.

Streaks New and Old

BC extended its unbeaten streak against Merrimack to 17 games (14-0-3) on Friday night. The Eagles are undefeated at home in their last 20 games (18-0-2). Merrimack stopped a streak of its own in the 3-3 tie. Prior to Friday night's game, Merrimack had not won in the previous 18 games in Chestnut Hill.

Providence ended Maine's five-game winning streak on Friday night and started a two-game losing skid for the Black Bears when the Friars completed the weekend sweep. Freshman forward Andrew Sweetland scored the first two goals of his collegiate career in the Friars' night contest. Sweetland is the only Black Bear to have a multi-goal game this season.

Vermont snapped an 0-for-22 scoreless drought during power-plays when junior forward Peter Lenes netted a goal in the first period against Merrimack on Saturday night. Along with sophomore forward Brayden Irwin, Lenes holds the team lead in goals scored with three. Both players lead the team in points scored as well with four … UNH is 4-0-0 when playing a nationally-ranked opponent this season, while the Wildcats are 1-1-1 against unranked teams … Northeastern is 3-3-1 in its first seven games for the first time since the 1997-98 season … Boston University has scored a power-play goal in eight straight games … Terrier forwards junior Chris Higgins, and seniors Pete MacArthur and Brian Ewing combined for 11 of BU's 12 points this weekend

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Hockey East

HOCKEY EAST STANDINGS

	Team	Hockey East W	L	T	Pts.	Overall W	L	T
1	New Hampshire	3	1	1	7	5	1	1
	Boston College	2	1	3	7	3	2	4
	Massachusetts	2	1	3	7	4	2	3
	Providence	3	2	1	7	3	5	1
	Northeastern	3	3	1	7	3	4	1
6	Boston University	2	2	1	5	2	5	2
	Maine	2	2	1	5	4	4	1
8	Vermont	1	1	1	3	1	4	1
	UMass Lowell	0	2	3	3	2	2	3
	Merrimack	1	1	1	3	4	4	1

If you're majoring in procrastination, with a minor in indecision, times up! The deadline to purchase your College Season Pass at the best price of the year is November 21st.

With more than 100 après ski and restaurant options, the famous Killington Road nightlife, and a mountain known for its pipe, parks, vibe and scene, Killington is "IT" for college students this winter. The College Pass is valid for all full-time undergraduate and graduate students all season with no blackout dates (certain requirements apply).

COLLEGE SEASON PASS* ONLY | $329

BUY NOW AT KILLINGTON.COM/COLLEGE OR CALL 800-887-3257.

*Does not include sales tax. Restrictions apply. Go to www.killington.com/college for complete details.

Killington

Former Amherst Drop Zone
227 Russell Street (Route 9), Hadley, MA
Complete Liquidation
FINAL THREE DAYS!!!
UP TO 75% OFF!!!
ARMY-NAVY SURPLUS
SALE ENDS NOVEMBER 17!!!
All Sales Final
Sale Under The Management Of:
CRG Auction
Capital Recovery Group, LLC
Hours Of Operation
Thurs. - Sat.
10am - 7pm
www.crgauction.com • (800) 300-6852

Minutemen adjust in victory

Forwards offset guard fatigue

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Scoring in the paint will be an important part of the Massachusetts men's basketball team's offense this season, but it won't be the same kind of front-court scoring as last year's version of the Minutemen.

UMass excelled in the front-court during 2006-07 with dominant forwards Stephane Lasme and Rashaun Freeman. And the duo scored points the old-fashioned way.

The Maroon and White ran a methodical half-court offense with the primary goal of working the ball into the middle to one of its pair of big men.

This season, the Minutemen can't afford to get away from scoring underneath the basket. By necessity, the team must look for much easier baskets in the paint – those that are the result of its new up-tempo style.

As with its design, the Minutemen will score easy points off turnovers and defensive rebounds. But UMass scored a relatively small number of points from quick blitzes up the court last night against Yale. However, the team registered its first six points of the game by catching the defense off guard from turnovers and quick passes.

UMass coach Travis Ford blamed the team's inability to maintain its quick pace due to fatigue.

"We were a tired basketball team before the game started," Ford said. "We've been through a lot the last four or five days – playing three games in a row with a lot of traveling."

But the Minutemen still made their fair share of easy baskets, finding other ways to score without utilizing the full-out rush up the court. At one point in the second half of last night's game, Lowe quickly ushered his teammates toward the basket after a turnover. The Minutemen did not have numbers back, as the team's shooters were fully guarded on the outside. Consequently, Lowe penetrated toward the basket and fed a streaking Dante Milligan coming from the right corner.

Since his team wasn't running so much as he expects it to once the season evolves, his team turned to its second offensive weapon: the 3-point shot.

And with Ford eager to let his stable of shooters unload from beyond the arc, the tendency will be for players to congregate away from the basket. Consequently, this factor also brings opposing players out of the paint, creating open space in the middle.

Last night, that open space served as a driving lane to the hoop.

Even Chris Lowe took advantage of the gaps, sinking a characteristic one-handed floater while in mid-drive to the basket.

The lanes also allowed the Minutemen to create opportunities for teammates. As forward Etienne Brower moved toward the hoop near the midpoint of the second half, Yale's 2-3 zone defense collapsed in the center. Brower then fed Milligan with a pass on the right side for an easy lay-up.

Senior forward Gary Forbes created chances for himself at the line by forcing defenders to challenge him in the paint. The captain led the Minutemen in free throws, shooting 8-for-9.

Even with his ability to draw fouls, Forbes acknowledges that the he should have taken advantage of more opportunities from the Yale defense.

"They were definitely collapsing when I should have made some passes," Forbes said.

Yet if there is one player who can give the Minutemen a post presence, it will be Milligan. The center scored 17 points last night – third on the team.

"Dante gave us a huge lift – he made baskets are crucial times and rebounded the ball well tonight."

Ford knows he needs important offensive minutes from the center position if the team wants to maximize its offensive potential, especially in the paint.

"Between Luke Bonner, Milligan and Tony Gallney, one of them needs to step up and give us good minutes," Ford said. "It could be one of the three, and it's going to change different nights."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Redshirt senior Dante Milligan shoots over a Yale defender during UMass's win over the Bulldogs last night.

Playoff picture unclear

FOOTBALL from page 14

really exciting to be a part of."

The Minutemen can still gain some ground on other teams in an effort to secure a home game in the first round of the playoffs. On top of that, UMass is tied with Richmond at 6-1 in the CAA. If both teams win, they will be tied for the conference lead and be declared CAA co-champions.

Because they would be deadlocked in the three primary tiebreakers (head-to-head, common opponents, and non-conference wins) the automatic qualifier for the NCAA Tournament would be determined by a conference among the 10 athletic directors from the remaining schools, who would then decide which school earns the CAA's automatic bid.

However, if the Minutemen can't get over the hump this time against Hofstra, it won't matter anyway.

"Hofstra's had a great season," quarterback Liam Coen said. "They've made a big turnaround from last year. They're playing pretty hot right now, so we have to come in there with the right attitude and the right mind frame."

The Minutemen's only losses this season came against Boston College, 24-14, and two weeks ago at Rhode Island, in a wild, 12-6 overtime game. Their eight wins are likely enough to earn them at least an at-large bid into the tournament, but nine would get them closer to where they want to be – playing inside McGuirk Alumni Stadium next week in the first round of the NCAA playoffs.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Miles leads UM secondary

By Eli Rosenwaike
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown – the leader of the consistently strongest defense in the conference – often classifies his defense as opportunistic.

Perhaps no player on his team is more emblematic of that than Jeremy Miles, the starting free safety for the Minutemen.

Miles transferred to UMass after one year at Navy, a season that ended with the ECAC Freshman of the Year award and a Sporting News Honorable Mention Freshman All-American nomination.

UMass was a great fit for Miles, as they lost defensive back standouts James Ihedigbo to last year's National Championship runner-up squad and Shamont James the year before.

He's fit into Brown's high-pressure and aggressive defense right away, starting all but one game for UMass (8-2, 6-1 Colonial Athletic Association). He's helped this year's defense sustain the success that they had with James and Ihedigbo, and he did it right away.

In just his second game Miles terrorized Colgate's offense, recording three tackles, one pass breakup and two forced fumbles. It was a game that foreshadowed what was to come from the 6-foot-2, 207-pound sophomore.

"I just play hard every snap and I guess it's just the work ethic," Miles said, regarding how he always seems to be where the ball is. "I think I just naturally put myself into those situations, its nothing special, I just find a way I guess."

Miles has found the ball many times this year, with four forced fumbles, two fumbles recovered and an interception. And when he can't get the ball himself, he makes sure the opposing receivers don't either. His nine pass deflections rank him tied (with teammate Sean Smalls) for second in the CAA.

Almost half of those deflections came in one game, the four overtime thriller against Villanova played at McGuirk Stadium on Oct. 13. He saved three of those for the best possible time, with one coming in regulation.

His deflection in the first overtime came in the end zone and deflected right into the hands of linebacker Jason Hatchell for the interception – giving the Minutemen a chance to win with just a field goal. But running back Matt Lawrence fumbled a few plays later to prolong the game.

But his most pivotal play came in the fourth overtime, with the Wildcats desperately needing a touchdown. Trailing 32-24, Villanova quarterback Chris Whitney dropped back on fourth-and-goal at the 7-yard line with time and had receiver Anton Ridley in the back of the end zone.

At first it appeared that the game could be headed for a fifth overtime, but Miles came in and got his hands in there, forcing the ball through the hands of Ridley – preserving the victory for UMass. Miles was named UMass/Dinn Brothers co-Athlete of the Week for his efforts.

With his big-time plays and work ethic, coach Brown considers Miles to be somewhat of a leader to his core of defensive backs. But Miles says he looks up to the other guys.

"I think people look up to me for some of my positive characteristics, like my work ethic," Miles said. "But for me I look up to the other guys like Sean Smalls and Mike Meggett for leadership."

Miles made a name for himself at UMass in the big games against Colgate and Villanova, but he's been a steady force for the defense the entire season. He's helped out against the run, registering 51 tackles, which ranks sixth on the team. He had a big part in shutting down New Hampshire star quarterback Ricky Santos last week in the convincing 27-7 victory, recording eight tackles.

He set the tone for the defense in the passing game, as well, intercepting Santos in the end zone on the first possession of the game. Miles went up in the air on that play, and came down battling a UNH receiver for the football. After the officials gathered to discuss the play for a minute, they determined that Miles and the Minutemen had possession.

Despite his quick success this season, Miles insists that things weren't so easy for him and the defense at the start of the season.

"We have a pretty young secondary, so we just have to find our niche and just get it together and stay on the same page," he said. "That was something we struggled with at the beginning, but now starting to come together at the end of the season."

It's come together quite well for Miles and the Minutemen, as Brown's defense leads the conference in scoring defense – allowing 17.5 points per game.

Miles is just one of many opportunistic players on the defense, but he's been the leader of the secondary.

Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at emwayne@student.umass.edu

Domino's Pizza
AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am -3am Sun.-Wed
MY WAY® OR CHICKEN EXPRESS® 10 Buffalo Wings Plus Cheesy Bread $9.99 Limited Time Offer
THREE BREADSTICKS Any 3 Bread Sticks Items $9.99 Classic Bread, Cheesy Bread OR Garlic Bread
PIZZA & CHICKEN One 1-Topping Pizza & Six Pieces of Buffalo Wings OR Plus Buffalo Chicken Dipper MEDIUM $12.99 | LARGE $15.99 Medium adds 1 Topping for $1 Large adds 2 Toppings for $2 Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
555/777 DEAL Three 1-Topping Pizzas MEDIUM $5.55 | LARGE $7.77 Most Items • No Doubles Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
SALAD & BREAD Any Large Salad, Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water $7.99 Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
FAMILY MEAL DEAL 1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Bread & an Order of Buffalo Wings $18.99 Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

JAMAICA SPRING BREAK 2008
JAM FEST Spring Break '08
THE JAMAICA MUSIC FESTIVAL FEATURING ARTISTS SUCH AS: SHAGGY, BEENIE MAN, and much, much more!
Concert Dates: March 3rd, 10th, 17th & 24th
Book Your Trip Today! Contact:
1.800.426.7710
1.800.648.4849
JAMAICA

Milligan leads UMass

M. BASKETBALL from page 14

at the Mullins Center. The two teams consistently answered the opposition's made baskets, with the lead changing 13 times in the first half.

But the game ended with 15 lead changes with the Minutemen quickly answering the 11-2 run by the Bulldogs to open the second half. Trailing 55-50 after the Yale run, UMass went on an 18-5 run of its own to take an eight-point lead from which Yale couldn't come back. The closest it would get was to a four-point deficit, at which point the Minutemen built the lead back up.

"I thought my kids fought and battled for 40 minutes, but we just need to have some better decision making down the stretch to give us a better opportunity to win," Yale coach James Jones said. "We should have been a little bit more patient, and that's where the smartness comes in.

"You know, they go to Yale, but they're not the smartest kids in the world."

UMass changed gears a bit in the second half, going to more of an inside game than it was in the first half. Milligan was the beneficiary of this adjustment, getting easy baskets under the hoop. After attempting 14 3-pointers in the opening half, the Minutemen took nine in the second half – with Forbes and Harris attempting all but one of them.

The Minutemen started off quickly in the game, getting quick and easy baskets early. Etienne Brower was the beneficiary of two of them, scoring on a tip-in off a missed shot and again on a dunk from a pass by Chris Lowe. Gary Forbes was also involved early, driving to the lane frequently and passing to the open teammate.

UMass scored nine points on the fast break in the first half but only four after halftime.

"We were fatigued, but I was disappointed we didn't get to play our style of basketball for our fans on our first home game," Ford said. "But we beat a very good team and they played well tonight, so there's something to be said about that."

Kyle struggled to get shots off in the second half, scoring seven points after the break. It was Caleb Holmes who kept the Bulldogs within striking distance, scoring 15 of his 23 points in the second half.

Yale hit one fewer field goal than UMass but missed key opportunities by turning the ball over (17 turnovers) and missing foul shots (10-15).

Game Notes

UMass raised its Atlantic 10 co-regular season Championship banner prior to the game. Forbes led the team with nine rebounds, while Lowe and Brower paced the team with five assists … Milligan added three blocked shots.

Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at erosenwa@student.umass.edu

For breaking news,
live in-game updates and exclusive interviews with UMass athletes, check out From the Press Box.
www.dailycollegiansports.blogspot.com

THE FINE ARTS CENTER
LET'S GO GLOBE HOPPING!
CENTER SERIES 07-08 SEASON
Unbroken Chain: The Grateful Dead in Music, Culture, and Memory
As part of a public conference. November 16-18, UMass Amherst

The American Beauty Project
featuring Jim Lauderdale, Ollabelle, Catherine Russell, Larry Campbell, Theresa Williams & David Gans
Friday, November 16, 8pm, Concert Hall
Paying homage to the Dead's legendary sound, a "dream team" of acclaimed artists come together to recreate and perform songs from Workingman's Dead and American Beauty. Larry Campbell (best known as Bob Dylan's guitarist), Jim Lauderdale (Grammy award winning writer/performer for Dixie Chicks, Ralph Stanley) Teresa Williams (sings with Emmylou Harris), Catherine Russell (sings with David Bowie, Jackson Brown, Paul Simon), David Gans (host of the nationally syndicated Grateful Dead Hour) and Ollabelle (darlings of the NPR folky set)
$35, $25, $15 Five College Students $15 Youth 17 and under $15
Sponsored by the UMass Alumni Association, the Valley Advocate 93.9 The River, John R Lyman Co. and WGBY TV57

Dark Star Orchestra
Saturday, November 17, 8pm, Concert Hall
The Grateful Dead spirit is channeled as the musicians capture the excitement and innovation of the original performances and compositions
$30 $25 $20 Five College Students $20, Youth 17 and under $20
Presented in partnership with Unbroken Chain: The Grateful Dead in Music, Culture and Memory Symposium at UMass, Amherst.
Sponsored by the Valley Advocate 93.9 The River, John R Lyman Co. and WGBY TV57
Visit www.umassconnections.com/unbrokenchain.html for more info about the weekend

Shaolin Warriors
Tuesday, November 27, 7:30 pm, Concert Hall
The Shaolin Warriors kung fu tradition has been at the center of Chinese martial arts culture for more than a millennium. The masters' butt-kicking, amazingly graceful hand-to-hand combat and weaponry skills are on display in a performance that is part action flick part Cirque du Soleil
$35, $25, $15 Five College Students $15, $10, $7 Youth 17 and under $12
Presented in collaboration with the Asian Arts & Culture program
Sponsored by WRNX 100.9FM and The Recorder/Valley Kids
UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
For tickets call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMASS or go online to www.fineartscenter.com!

NOV 15 2007

Seniors struggle in win

W. BASKETBALL from page 14

Mickel Picco missed a jump shot as time expired, and the Minutewomen left with the three-point victory. In its two games this season, UMass's opponents have been down three with seconds remaining and still not attempted a 3-point shot.

Last game's hero was Rosanio; this time it was Stefanie Gerardot's turn. The junior guard came off the bench to score a team-high 20 points while going 8-of-10 from the floor.

"My teammates do the hard part of setting me up; I just knock down the open shot, which is the easy part," she said.

Gerardot did most of her damage in the second half. She connected on 3-of-6 3-pointers in the half, and 15 of her 20 points came in the second.

"She's a great, great shooter, and she always gets tense," Ducko said. "This is the way she shoots in practice every-day."

Ducko also credited the team for finding the hot hand, who happened to be Gerardot last night. She said the team sometimes fails to recognize that these players must continually be given the ball.

Center Carolyn Swords won Atlantic Coast Conference Rookie of the Week last week, and she showed UMass that it was no fluke. The freshman scored 14 points and grabbed nine rebounds for the Eagles, including six offensive rebounds. She was causing matchup problems in the low post; however, she picked up her fourth foul with 13:15 left and didn't score the rest of the game.

Offensive rebounds were a problem area for UMass. BC pulled down 22 offensive rebounds, while UMass grabbed 10 forcing the Minutewomen to win the game with 3-point shooting and free throws.

They went 7-of-17 from beyond the arc, while the Eagles converted on four of their 18 attempts. It's not often a team wins when it doesn't make a single foul shot, and BC missed all five of its attempts. UMass also hit all six of their free throws in the second half after going 4-of-9 from the line in the first half.

This was more than any other regular season win for UMass. The Eagles beat the Minutewomen five consecutive times prior to last night, including the last three years. In 2005, the Maroon and White were nearly doubled-up 83-44 in Chestnut Hill.

"Our seniors haven't beat them yet since they've been here, and we really wanted our seniors to be able to say that they've beat Boston College before they left."

One of those seniors, Kate Mills, struggled out of the gate. She went 3-of-11 in the first half from the floor, and couldn't seem to find her rhythm on her mid-range jump shot. But once the second half arrived, she couldn't miss. Mills hit all five of her shots to finish the game with 16 points, and was rivaling Rosanio with her intensity after the long awaited win over the Eagles.

NOTES

Kim Benton hit her first two 3-pointers but missed her final five … Mills, Benton and Young tied for a team-high four assists … UMass opened the game with a 7-2 lead … The largest lead in the game was six when BC pulled ahead 39-33 with 16:32 remaining in the game … Swords didn't score again after returning to the game with 8:56 left … Rosanio chipped in 11 points, going 2-of-11 from the floor.

Mike Conners can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Senior Pam Rosanio struggled from the field last night. She shot 2-of-11 and scored 10 points in the Minutewomen's second consecutive win to start the 2007-08 season.

Junior midfielder Tony Bassett and the Minutemen take on Dayton tonight in the first round of the A-10 Tournament.

Koch expects more from UD

SOCCER from page 14

sive defensive style, but Bassett is a heady player capable of using his superior positioning and ball skills to keep passing lanes closed. However, freshman Ben Arikian must keep more of a watch on his defensive responsibilities without DeSantis backing him up.

The Flyers did a good job of neutralizing UMass's threat in the air in the October matchup. Sophomore Bryan Hogan, senior Kenny Cook and redshirt junior Chris Brown look to score directly off set pieces with their heads. But a large Dayton defense – headlined by 6-foot-4 Florian DeCamps – can offset any strategy the Minutemen have on free and corner kicks.

UMass lost its final game of the season to Temple on Sunday and Koch feels the team got a taste of what a lack of focus can do. If UMass wins, a date with Rhode Island awaits them on Friday.

Charlotte and Fordham play in the other opening round matchup, today at 5:30 p.m. The winner of that game takes on top-seeded Saint Louis at 5:30 p.m. on Friday.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Redshirt junior Doug Rappaport scored two goals and handed out three assists during the regular season for UMass.

Injuries strike at worst time

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

It's certainly not the first time this season that the Massachusetts men's soccer team has dealt with injury. But with its first round Atlantic 10 Tournament match set for tonight, the Minutemen would rather have a healthy roster than at any other point in the season.

The team survived a minor injury to junior forward Price Ofosu's left ankle after the regular season game against Dayton. The Maroon and White also made due without junior midfielder Tony Bassett for an extended period.

This weekend, UMass will have another opportunity to prove that it can without one of its key players: junior midfielder Mike DeSantis.

According to Koch, DeSantis will not be ready for Thursday's game. But the coach left open the possibility of his return for a second round game, should the Minutemen advance.

"With Mike DeSantis hurt right now, the team is going to have to step it up," Koch said. "We've got our work cut out for us. The good thing is that I know the team will be able to adapt and get the job done."

Yet the junior is not a simple athlete to replace on the soccer field. DeSantis' impact is felt all over the field, especially on defense – where he excels at winning balls in the midfield.

His teammates also appreciate the value of DeSantis, as they named him the team's Co-MVP with goalkeeper Zack Simmons last season. To put that in perspective, it would have been fitting to give the award solely to Simmons as he had one of the best goalkeeping years in school history in 2006.

"It's not going to be one person – it's going to have to be a collective group that does it," Koch said, referring to how his team will attempt to replace DeSantis.

The coach expects his players to step up their play and fill DeSantis' void, though it remains to be seen who will replace the midfielder in the lineup.

However, the precedent of success for injured starter replacements has already been set. Bassett's three-game absence earlier in the season allowed for the development of midfielder Stuart Amick. The freshman has started nearly every game since that point.

Regardless of how the team responds without DeSantis on the field, the Minutemen have played nearly the entire season without one of its best players: Trevor Singer.

The senior defender entered the season recovering from off-season knee surgery.

He didn't take the field for the Minutemen until the season's seventh game – a 2-0 win over Northeastern on Sept. 22. But even in that match, Singer entered play in the 73rd minute after UMass had the game well under control.

After those 17 minutes on the field, his career was over. Singer reinjured his knee and hasn't played since that game.

"It's just a sad story because he's worked so hard," Koch said. "He's done everything the doctors have asked him to do with his rehab. There's no way he deserves this, because he's worked too hard to be ready to play."

Though Koch found an able replacement in sophomore Dan Lepone for the right back spot, Singer had the leadership experience to be an asset to the team in the backfield. He started all 19 games last year and saw action in 14 matches during the 2005 season.

Although it's an unfortunate way to spend a senior season, Koch has made it a priority to keep Singer involved with the team. The senior has served as a de facto assistant coach, continuing to aid in the team's development.

"He just wants to everything that he can in the situation that he's in to make the team better," Koch said. "He's been at every practice – he's a part of it."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Junior Prince Ofosu suffered a mild leg injury in UMass's win over Dayton on Oct. 12.

18 Plus College Night
Thursdays
The #1 Place to Party!
SKYPLEX
3 Different Rooms/3 DJ's spinning the best in Top 40, Dance, House and Select Mashup
THE ULTIMATE HOT BODY CONTEST
$100 Best Male $100 Best Female
The Hottest 18 Plus SATURDAY NIGHT Dance Party
PROMOTORS WANTED FOR 18+ SATUROAYS! TO SIGNUP VISIT: WWW.SKYPLEX.US
SATURDAYS
SkyPlex 10 Stearns Sq Downtown Springfield 413.827.9000 www.SkyPlex.us

THE ONLY THING GROWING FASTER THAN OUR GRADUATE PROGRAMS IS OUR REPUTATION.
Accounting
Cardiovascular Perfusion
Computer Information Systems
Education – Elementary Education – Secondary
Forensic Nurse Clinical Specialist
Interactive Communications Journalism
Law
MBA/CFA® (Chartered Financial Analyst)
MBA/HCM (Health Care Management)
MBA/JD (Joint degree in business and law)
Medical Laboratory Sciences/Biomedical Sciences
Molecular & Cell Biology
Nurse Practitioner
Pathologists' Assistant
Physician Assistant
Graduate Online Programs
Organizational Leadership: Higher Education, Human Resources, Information Technology, Insurance
Learn more: www.quinnipiac.edu
Graduate Programs: gradserc@quinnipiac.edu
Graduate Online Programs: quonlineadmissions@quinnipiac.edu
Law School: ladm@quinnipiac.edu
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY
1-800-462-1944 | Hamden, Connecticut

Ellio's wants you to Get It here!
-FRIDAY 11/16-
Men's Hockey vs. BC 7 p.m.
-SATURDAY 11/17-
Men's BBall vs. Wisconsin-Green Bay 7:30 p.m.
Free Ellio's Thursday 11/15
@ The Harp 10:30 p.m.-12:30 a.m.
Ellio's
ADVERTORIAL GET IT.

ENTERTAINMENT ON CAMPUS PRESENTS
The Real Chorus
plus Within The Ruins, Defiler, Farewell Radiance
FRI. NOV. 16 • 7:00 PM DOORS 6:00 PM CLUBROOM
BENEVENTO RUSSO DUO with Brad Barr of The Slip plus The Moanin Dove
SAT. NOV. 17 • 8:30 PM DOORS 7:30 PM CLUBROOM
theNEWDEAL plus NBFB
THU. NOV. 29 • 8:30 PM DOORS 7:30 PM BALLROOM
Bank Street 10 PEARL ST Nightclub NORTHAMPTON, MA an evening with WEEN CALVIN
10 KING ST NORTHAMPTON, MA
TUE. NOV. 27 • 8:00 PM DOORS 7:00 PM
TO PURCHASE TICKETS OR FOR MORE INFO VISIT OUR WEBSITE OR CALL:
WWW.IHEG.COM 413-586-8686

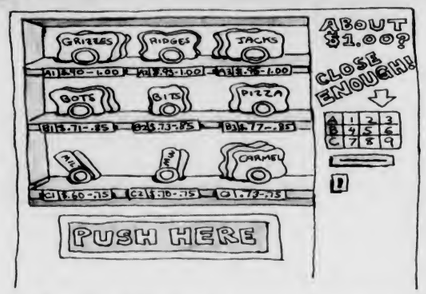
Anymore brain-busters?

		2			7	1
	6					8
2		1		3	4
2			4	3	6
		9		1
		3	8	6		7
	7	5		8		6
4					9
1	9			4

Quote of the Day

"Girls are always running through my mind. They don't dare walk."

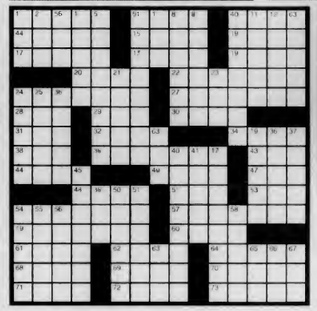
-Andy Gibb



Ecology By Jen Fill

Last Ditch Effort By John Kroes

Labrat By Richard Martelly



VENDING MACHINES IN A CIVILIZED WORLD.

ACROSS
1 "Nnoschka" star
6 Spadework
10 Selects
14 Man from Manchuria
15 Seldom seen
16 Okinawa port
17 Swayze film
18 Resistance units
19 October gem
20 Be ___ as it may
22 Repeating
24 Compress
27 Elul's consents
28 Divide the deck
29 Slammer
30 Mystery writer Gardner
31 Spot
32 Raw minerals
34 B C. buzz
38 Swallowed
39 In the most advantageous position
42 And I Love ___
44 Dress
46 Lock maker
47 Time period
48 Clytemnestra's mother
52 Toddler
53 Make a lap
54 Spray dispenser
57 Sketlike mousers
59 Pickster's sign
60 Small particle
61 Bathroom fixture
62 Actor Estrada
64 Nilpick
68 Outer limit
69 Swampy ground
70 Uniform fabric
71 Future plant
72 Pen fills
73 Overly full
DOWN
1 Choke
2 Grate stuff
3 ___ de Janeiro
4 Sew loosely
5 Taking care of business
6 Apprentices
7 Cheerleader's cry
8 Weasel cousin
9 Annoy
10 Requested but not yet delivered
11 Of the Vatican
12 Scottish feudal lord
13 Epsom ___
21 Bright blue shade
23 Lamprey
24 Scrawny person
25 Prescribed number
26 Say out loud
33 Swine residence
35 Thorax
36 Deserve
37 Jabber
40 Alternative to porridge
41 Storm
42 Hooves' neighbors
45 Closed off
49 NASA partner
50 Scale notes
51 Astronaut Buzz
54 Church parts
55 Slur over
56 Extent covered
58 Cornhusker city
63 Vex
65 Aging vessel
66 Like (50s slogan)
67 Pot top

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UPS $9.50/hour
Santa's Not the ONLY One Who Needs Helpers
UPS is now offering seasonal employment to earn extra money during the Holidays.
As a driver helper you'll assist our UPS driver delivering packages.
Apply on-line
Upsjobs.com
And Come to UPS
120 Wayside Ave
West Springfield MA
Tuesdays
@ 4 PM
Equal Opportunity Employer

Submit your comics!
collegiatecomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
To dwell on the crap in your life is like living in a pile of your own excrement.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
No more shenanigans, no more tomfoolery, and no more ballyhoo!

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
How did bologna get sucked into the unruly gang of words that rhyme with -ony?

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Maintain forward momentum in school, you're an academic juggernaut.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
I'm sort of going on strike, you don't get a horoscope today.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will fall victim to an attack by a vicious rogue goose with an eye patch.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Having no clue what you're writing about will not stop you from writing a great paper.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Go on strike against the Pita Pit, their cookies are harder than a male rabbit on viagra.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You must eat a well-rounded diet, lest you become a well-rounded beluga whale.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You are a polygamist conquistador, conquering marriage many times over.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Put on a funny hat and ride the Campus Center escalators all day, you're Jamiroquai.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Invite your friends to a 16-hour Roots mini-series party. Bathroom breaks prohibited.

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
Now Hiring
Counter/Cashiers and Drivers
HOURS
Sun - Wed: 3pm - 2am
Thurs - Sat: 3pm - 3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK-UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing Street
Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, MA 01002

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Montreal weekend from $99.00 complete motel, transportation and more. Montreal Express.net 781-979-9001. Lowest prices on campus.

Apt. for Rent

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlall@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

Employment

Hurry! Last day to apply to become a legal assistant a tthe Student Legal Services Office is Nov. 16th. Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable experience in the legal field. Stop by our office at 922 Campus Center or call 413-545-1995

Part-time teller opening in Amherst 11-2 M-Thurs, Friday 1-6 pm + Sat. 8:30-12:30 pm. $9.75/hr. Call 529-7100 or email mmisuraca@staffingnow.com for more info.

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Found

Ipod Nano SOM. Contact Prof. Weiss to identify. mweiss@northamptonlaw.com

Services

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

Services

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birth-control, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins welcome www.taperstryhealth.org

Travel

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Wanted

EGG DONORS WANTED Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Must be a non-smoking female between the ages of 21 and 32. For more information, please visit our website at www.robertnicholsesq.com or contact Julie at 781-551-0600

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

NOV 15 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Tis the seasons

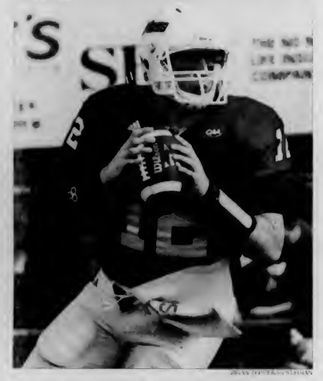
Maroon and White take on Hofstra in regular season finale

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Saturday's regular season finale between the Massachusetts football team and Hofstra has a little more at stake this year than it did last year, when the Minutemen knocked off the Pride at home, 22-16.

This year's matchup in Hempstead, N.Y., doesn't feature a UMass team that has already clinched the conference title outright against a Hofstra squad that had just two wins overall.

Instead, the Maroon and White (8-2, 6-1 Colonial Athletic Association) is the North division champion, looking to outrun South division champ Richmond to the overall conference title. And the 22nd-ranked Pride (7-3, 4-3 CAA) are fighting for their playoff lives.



Two years ago, it was the Minutemen whose postseason hopes were dashed by Hofstra, who upset UMass with a 21-10 defeat. That was the last time the Maroon and White played in James M. Shuart Stadium. Many current Minutemen, like Coen, still remember that game.

"Going down there, we were 7-2 and enjoying a good season," Coen said. "And then we go down there with playoffs on the line, the conference on the line and we don't get it done. I think once we set foot in that stadium guys will remember what it was like, and what it was like for that senior class that year – a group of guys that did a lot for this program."

UMass and Hofstra concluded their regular seasons together in 2004, a 40-30 UMass win, so for the fourth-straight time, the Minutemen play the Pride to cap their season. So far, the home team has won every time, something UMass will need to change to have any hope of a CAA title.

Already a Top-10 team, easily high enough to gain a playoff spot, Coen said the Minutemen are approaching this game with the attitude that there's still plenty to play for.

"We're trying to maintain the feeling that we haven't done anything yet, really," Coen said. "At 8-3, are we supposed to get into the playoffs? I don't know, I don't really know how it works, but our goal this week is to beat Hofstra and to solidify that position and get into that playoff run that's Redshirt junior quarterback Liam Coen leads UMass into its final regular-season matchup of the season this Saturday at Hofstra.

See FOOTBALL on page 11

Minutemen ride Harris' 23 to victory over Bulldogs

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In what was a back-and-forth game between the Massachusetts men's basketball team and Yale, it was the consistently solid play of Ricky Harris and Dante Milligan that led the Minutemen to a 89-80 victory at the Mullins Center Wednesday night.

Yale hung in with the Minutemen for much of the game, but Harris' outside shooting and the inside play of Milligan down the stretch was too much for center Matt Kyle (20 points) and the Bulldogs.

Harris and Milligan carried the Minutemen while others struggled, as they combined for 28 of the 41 points UMass scored in the second half. Both players had six points in the opening half, but Harris led all scorers with 23 points as Milligan finished with 17. Milligan was a perfect 5-of-5 from the field in the second half, while Harris was 5-of-9 and 3-of-5 from the perimeter.

"Dante gave us a huge lift," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "He made some big baskets at crucial times, and he rebounded well tonight. You got to give Yale a lot of credit, but we're very excited to win this basketball game."

UMass	89
Yale	80

UMass point guard Chris Lowe appeared to be favoring his ankle throughout the game and played seven minutes after halftime. That put the ball in Harris' hands more frequently, and he took full advantage of it.

The high-scoring duo for the Minutemen combined to hit 10-of-14 shots in the second half, while teammates connected on 4-of-12. UMass forward Gary Forbes had 13 points in the first half, but finished with 19 after shooting 1-of-7 from the floor after halftime.

The first half of play featured the fast-paced game that fans will see a lot of this year

Sophomore Ricky Harris led all scorers with 23 points in UMass's 89–80 win over Yale last night at the Mullins Center.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 10

Langeraap scores first-career goal

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The easiest way for a freshman to create playing time for himself is to do more than one thing well.

Freshman forward Chase Langeraap saw most of his action early in season as a winger on the Massachusetts hockey team's third or fourth line. Langeraap scored the first goal of his career – a power-play goal against Boston University last Friday. The Minutemen defeated the Terriers, 5-3, at Agganis Arena for the first time ever.

Before the win over BU, Langeraap had played in four of UMass's seven games and started each game at the left wing spot on the line. However, against the Terriers, Langeraap centered a line featuring senior Matt Burto and sophomore Scott Crowder.

UMass Hockey

Langeraap celebrated the start in the middle with the goal and also added the first assist of his career. He also won seven of the eight faceoffs he took in the game; the only UMass player to finish the game with a winning record in draws.

UMass coach Don Cahoon awarded Langeraap with another start in Saturday's matchup with UMass Lowell. In that game, he won four of the five draws he took, making him 11-for-13 on the weekend.

For the weekend, he was minus-3 despite his offensive success.

ORTIZ HONORED

Sophomore winger Will Ortiz

Freshman forward Chase Langeraap stuffs a shot past BU's Brett Bennett in Friday's 5–3 win over the Terriers.

See LANGERAAP on page 10

Dayton up first for UMass

DeSantis out against Flyers

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch laid out some goals for his team prior to the 2007 season opener against Maine on Aug. 31.

He talked about defeating Rhode Island and reestablishing UMass as a power within the Atlantic 10. But the most important goal Koch set for his team was to reach the A-10 Tournament.

The Minutemen earned the No. 3 seed in the tournament, despite a 1-0 loss to Temple in the season finale, and will take on sixth-seeded Dayton tonight in the opening round of the six-team competition.

"The first goal is done. We're the third seed and we're playing Dayton [tonight]," Koch said. "But now we have another goal and that's to play on Friday and to play on Sunday.

"We're on track, we're where we want to be, but we have a tough opponent. Everybody is 0-0 and the loser goes home. So it's a little different mentality."

Despite the higher seed, UMass will effectively play a road game since Dayton is hosting the tournament. The last time the tournament was in Dayton, UMass defeated the Flyers on their way to winning the program's last A-10 Championship.

Koch believes that the presence of a loud Dayton home crowd can work to the advantage of his team.

"It'll be a good atmosphere. You can look at it two ways sometimes it's tough to go somewhere where there are no home fans," Koch said. "I think it's better to go into a nasty atmosphere where you're going against the home team because now you know you're in a game.

"I think it will help our guys play better."

The Minutemen got a taste of a rowdy home crowd in their most recent victory at Saint Joseph's last Saturday. But they overcame the wild St. Joe's fans to earn the 3-0 win.

UMass defeated Dayton, 3-0, on Oct. 12 in its first A-10 action of the season. Sophomore Mark DeSantis scored the first two goals of his career in the victory and freshman Ben Arikian added another late off a penalty kick.

Redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons kept the Minutemen in the game early, making five first half saves before the three second half goals.

However, Koch believes that wasn't the Flyer team UMass will see tonight. He expects the more aggressive and direct Dayton attack that the Minutemen saw in 2006's matchup. The Minutemen still won that game, but the decisive goal didn't come until overtime.

"The team that we saw here at the beginning of the season will not be the same team we play [tonight]," Koch said. "I know that and I'm confident that the team knows that, so I think we'll be ready to take on a team that will give us a challenge."

Dayton's leading scorer, Alex Iorda, didn't record a shot on goal in the matchup with the Minutemen. Iorda, a midfielder, will have more open space if junior midfielder Mike DeSantis is unable to play.

DeSantis suffered an undisclosed injury over the weekend and Koch is unsure whether or not he will play tonight. Should DeSantis miss the game, junior midfielder Tony Bassett is most likely to replace him in the starting lineup. UMass will miss DeSantis' aggres-

Junior midfielder Mike DeSantis is doubtful for UMass's match with Dayton tonight.

See SOCCER on page 12

Gerardot's 20 off bench leads UM

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team has won their first two games with last-second free throws, and UMass coach Marnie Ducko isn't complaining.

"We keep telling them to learn how to win and expect to win," she said. "There was never any doubt, and that's what I'm so proud of."

The Minutewomen used clutch play down the stretch to once again escape with a small margin of victory, this time a 69-66 win over in-state rival Boston College.

UMass will travel to Boston to take on Northeastern on Saturday at 2 p.m.

The final minute of the game provided frantic action that began with a Stephanie Gerardot jump shot that put the Minutewomen in front 65-64 with 51 seconds remaining. Eagles forward Rebecca Miles responded 14 seconds later with a layup.

UMass	69
BC	66

BC made a costly mistake on the next possession. Alisha Tatham got open under the basket with 25 seconds left, and point guard Sakera Young found her for the easy layup.

After a BC timeout, Ayla Brown took a three pointer from the left corner but the ball rimmed out and was corralled by Pam Rosanio. She calmly knocked down both free throws to put UMass up 69-66.

Junior Stefanie Gerardot led all scorers with 20 points in the Minutewomen's 69–66 win over Boston College last night.

See W. BASKETBALL on page 12

MINUTEMEN ADVANCE TO A-10 SEMIFINALS | PAGE 10

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

WINDY : HI: 53 LO: 26 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2007

An estimated 800 students shutdown the Whitmore Administration Building as part of yesterday's all-student strike. After a rally in the Student Union Ballroom, students lead by elected officials of the SGA and GSS demanded meetings with the Chancellor to be open to the public.

Students take over in protest march

BY DERRICK PERKINS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Student leaders at the University of Massachusetts pledged to continue boycotting classes today during a rally celebrating yesterday's march on the University administrative building last night.

Student Government Association (SGA) President Aaron Buford, Student Trustee Ruth Thompson and several other student leaders met with members of the administration in what University Spokesman Ed Blaguszewski called a "discussion" after marching into the Whitmore Administrative Building.

Following three hours of talks with administration officials, student leaders secured a private meeting with Interim Chancellor Thomas Cole on Tuesday, Nov. 20th.

"We didn't get what we wanted," Buford said. "We want a public meeting, so we can get everything on the table. You have to be transparent."

Buford said they hoped to take the minutes during the planned meeting with Chancellor Cole and report back to the student body.

The crowd of student demonstrators, about 600 in all according to the official count made by the University, walked to the administrative building following a noon rally in the ballroom of the Student Union and demanded to hold an open meeting with the administration.

According to Blaguszewski, officials followed standard procedure and read the picketing act to the hundreds of students seated in the hallway floors of Whitmore. Most of the students dispersed at that point, Blaguszewski said. Student leaders agreed to leave the building at the close of business hours yesterday.

"This is just the beginning," said Thompson during last night's rally. "We are going to negotiate to have a public meeting."

According to Buford, the day's student action had "set a standard of expectations of the administration."

"We need to build on the momentum. They have to be responsive," he said. "[The administration] should be involved in the everyday lives of students."

Buford numbered the total of students occupying Whitmore at 1,000 and at least 1,500 at the rally in the Student Union.

"It set a tone for those who are skeptical about what we're trying to do," Buford said.

According to Buford, the amount of students who had participated in the strike and boycotted classes during the

See STRIKE on page 3

Teach-ins add to strike

BY ELIZABETH HAWLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

During yesterday's student strike, many students opted out of traditional classes and chose to attend 15 teach-ins on campus issues instead.

"The whole idea of the strike of normal classes is that you're coming here to re-educate yourself... in a way you're not really getting at this University" said Kerry Shields, a student who manned the strike table in the Campus Center Concourse yesterday. "It's not just a day to skip classes."

Student reaction to the teach-ins was largely positive with a high attendance rate.

Graduate student Theresa Hyland said she attended due to the high cost of graduate school. She said that the fee increases and the pay raises for graduate teaching assistants and researchers are not matching up.

"Much as I would like to, I can't live off of my research," said Hyland. "We need to have more support."

Hyland added the teach-ins "help people understand what's going on."

The topics of teach-ins were all related to the four reasons behind the decision for students to strike: the cost of higher education, campus diversity, police presence in private areas of dormitories and student control over student space.

"These aren't new issues," said Ali Wilson Pierce, a UMass senior who co-led a packed session called Popular Education yesterday morning. "These things don't happen overnight."

Pierce and Jess Rentsch, a UMass senior who helped run the same session, had students put on an interactive play about the founding of the popular education movement, which began in Latin America as a way of getting locals more involved in educating themselves.

The play was followed by a serious discussion about the ideals of popular education, contrasting the cooperative approach to the lecture style used by many professors.

Simultaneously, council members of the Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts (PHENOM) spoke about affordability and the movement towards free higher education in the United States.

Economics professor Stephanie Luce argued that even in case of a recession, the country is not only the wealthiest in history, but the wealthiest it has ever been in its own history. The council argued that the United States can afford to provide free higher education.

Lindsay McCluskey, a UMass student involved with Massachusetts Students Uniting, a coalition formed to statewide organization around student issues like high costs, sat on the PHENOM panel.

"I think it's really important to have space for students to teach each other," she said, pointing out that the teach-ins help in getting more people involved with different campus movements, as well.

Keith McHenry, of Food Not Bombs, also held a teach-in, and discussed his own experiences with activism and involvement.

See TEACH-IN on page 3

Sarah Morgan leads a group of protesters during yesterday's rally on Whitmore. Protesters toted signs and chanted.

UML tech building planned

90,000 ft. to Lowell science

BY ERIC TABER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It has been 30 years since the University of Massachusetts Lowell campus has seen a new academic building, but this is soon to change as a new science building is heading to Lowell.

The 97,000-square-foot Emerging Technologies and Innovation Center will house both nanotechnology and bio-manufacturing research, along with other leading-edge work in a "green" facility.

Robert P. Connolly, spokesman for the UMass President's Office, said, "The advanced research center will foster collaboration in the business world as well as improve the academic experience of students."

The new Technologies and Innovation Center will not come cheap. Construction costs for the new building are estimated to be $80 million. The state is providing $35 million, UMass is borrowing $35 million and the final $10 million will be coming from private and federal funding. The expected date of the center is 2010.

The center is a result of Governor Deval Patrick's plan to increase incentives and funding for science and technology-based research and industry in Massachusetts.

While visiting UMass Lowell to announce the awarding of $4 million toward the costs of building the nanotechnology and biomanufacturing center, Governor Patrick said, "The investment in this building is just a piece of a broader move to secure a leadership role in [nanotechnology and biomanufacturing]."

See BUILDING on page 3

Foundation finds 'driving drowsy' as a growing concern

BY MOLLY STRAMIELLO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A growing concern of driving drowsy sparked the launch of the National Sleep Foundation's (NSF) first annual Drowsy Driving Prevention Week last week.

This national campaign was designed to raise awareness of the dangers associated with drowsy driving and provide resources for advocacy at the state level.

Statistics released by the NSF, such as 58 percent of adults who reported driving drowsy at least once during the previous year and 28 percent who admitted they have dozed off at the wheel, have caused concern. Not just is the everyday citizen at risk, since 4.7 percent of long-distance and experienced drivers reported falling asleep while driving.

Officer Perkins of the University of Massachusetts Police Department said he finds similarities between drowsy and drunk drivers when pulling over a vehicle.

"You're looking for the same symptoms like red eyes," he said. Driving drowsy slows down your reaction time.

One study done by the Centre for Sleep Research in South Australia found that people who drive

See DROWSY on page 3

UMass Medical professor arrested for alleged 'research'

BY ANDY SMITH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A University of Massachusetts Medical School professor pled not guilty Tuesday afternoon after trying to pay for sex from an undercover female police officer this past weekend.

Dr. Peter A. Rice, a specialist in infectious and sexually transmitted diseases, was arrested around 12:20 p.m. Saturday afternoon on the corner of Main and Grand Street in Worcester, Mass., during a city-wide prostitution sting.

He allegedly pulled-up to the street corner where the female undercover officer, who was posing as a prostitute, was located and began engaging in conversation with the officer. At one point in the conversation, Rice allegedly offered the officer $40 in return for intercourse.

"Probable cause was established for the arrest as soon as the offer to engage in sex for a fee occurred," said Capt. Paul B. Saucier, commander of the vice and gang units of the Worcester Police Department. Rice was one of 21 people arrested by Worcester police arrested during the sting.

Dr. Rice said he was on the street corner conducting research for his study of gonorrhea in human subjects, titled, "Immunology of Infection with Neisseria Gonorrheae."

See DOCTOR on page 3

Environmentalist speaks at AC

Worster on Muir's trail

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the most important figures in the modern environmental movement has been largely ignored by mainstream historians, according to University of Kansas professor Donald Worster, who spoke at Amherst College last night.

Worster's speech "On John Muir's Trail: Nature in the Age of Liberal Principles" addressed the influence of John Muir, environmentalist and founder of the Sierra Club on contemporary conservationism.

Worster also addressed a possible correlation between liberal democratic principles and environmental awareness. The speech was this year's installment of the annual Hugh Hawkins lecture and was held in the Physics Lecture Hall.

Mainstream modern historians ignore John Muir and the early environmental movement," said Worster. He claimed that because Muir was concerned primarily with nature, and not other progressive causes of the time, historians tend to ignore Muir's contributions and focus instead on the social activism of his contemporaries, authors W.E.B. DuBois and political activist Eugene V. Debs.

"It would not be until the year 2005 that Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger would make him a state icon by placing his image on California's commemorative state quarter," said Worster.

Worster described Muir as having strong liberal values. However, according to Worster he held beliefs about human institutions that were controversial for their time and was not an activist for progressive causes.

Worster went on to say that Muir eventually rejected Christianity to focus on "the beauty and integrity of

See WORSTER on page 3

NOV 16 2007

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIII
ISSUE 52
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Nicholas Belanger
Managing Editor Katie Huston
Business Manager Dan Exley
Production Manager Chris Martin
Night Supervisor Meghan Murphy
Advertising Manager Alex Bender
Advertising Production Katherine Shea
Arts & Living Editor Tim McCall
Comics Editor Adam Scaggs
Editorial Editor S.P. Sullivan
News Editor Derrick Perkins
Sports Editor Jeremy Bice
Asst. Business Manager Eric Szymczak
Assistant Advertising Marwa Whouston
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Asst. Arts & Living Stephanie McPherson
Asst. Arts & Living Beau McAskill
Asst. Arts & Living Teresa Reilly
Asst. Editorial James Mathews
Asst. Editorial Melissa Garber
Assistant News Kate Olson
Assistant News Will McGuinness
Assistant News Holly Seabury
Assistant Sports Richie King
Assistant Sports Joe Mekosi
Assistant Sports Eli Rosenwaike
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Ben Trinh
Asst. Photo Editor Michael Phillis
Asst. Photo Editor Brian Tedder

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Alpha Literary. Because the College was founded in 1863, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Daily Collegian in 1950, it cannot claim any other. The Collegian has been published since 1890, except during 1994 for competitive bidding and publication, civil service strikes, and in 2003 and 2005.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nicholas Belanger

COPY EDITOR
Amber Vaillancourt

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

Politician protects voters' rights

By Kristen Healy
Collegian Correspondent

The new Registered Student Organization [RSO], Advancing Democracy, hosted politician John Bonifaz, the founder of the National Voting Rights Institute [NVRI], at a lecture on Thursday night.

Bonifaz has had much experience in politics as the director of the NVRI for ten years and as candidate in 2006 for Massachusetts Secretary of State. His lecture was focused on the dangers of the privatization and the outsourcing of public elections. He also talked of the general issues that our country faces when it comes time for elections.

He said using electronic voting machines results in a multitude of problems that arise from using them on election days. In the past two Presidential elections there have been technical issues with the voting materials used, according to Bonifaz. He said voters in certain parts of the country in the 2000 election were not able to successfully vote due to faulty paper ballots, and voters in the 2004 election had technical problems with the electronic touch screens.

Bonifaz said the initial argument for the electronic voting machines were that they are easier to vote on, without the hassle of paper, and they are able to be more accommodating to voters with disabilities. However, he added that all of these arguments have been proven false, though, because the machines have made for longer lines and waits at the polls, the disabled community says the machines are not as accessible as they appear to be and the system is susceptible to hacking.

Bonifaz's NVRI organization consists of pro-bono lawyers who aim at helping voters, who he claims have been wronged by the system, get the justice he said they deserve. He feels that investigations need to be made into the companies manufacturing the systems the nation uses to vote.

"There is a danger when it comes to outsourcing to private companies because in turn we lose our public control of democracy," Bonifaz said. "We need to reclaim public control of the public election process."

Bonifaz noted that U.S. voters need to be confident in their voting methods and having faulty equipment that has the potential of having serious effects on the outcome of the election is no way to increase voter turn-out at the polls.

Bonifaz also said election integrity is also cause for concern in U.S. elections. Whether or not the manufacturers are aware of the faulty equipment, he said thousands of influential votes are lost or unable to be counted each election, which can have dramatic results on the outcome.

Bonifaz said there are alternatives to the problems at hand. One of which he noted is paper ballots with optical scan technology, which enables people who count the votes to have the actual ballot in their hand rather than losing a voter's information within possible faulty computer systems. He adds that it's also important for the public voters not to be controlled by these private companies.

"We have to get to a place where we control the process, not the manufacturers of the equipment," Bonifaz said. "It's also not safe to feed our votes into the black holes of these computers because there is no way to trace any one person's specific vote."

Bonifaz touched upon the upcoming election of 2008 and how America will be affected by this evidently faulty equipment.

He believes that legitimate investigations need to be made into the manufacturing companies of the voting equipment.

"Our nation is moving into another national election where some people are worried that their votes will not be counted," Bonifaz said. "We shouldn't have to live in a democratic nation where we cannot trust the outcome of our elections."

Kristen Healy can be reached at khhealy@student.umass.edu.

Clinton says rivals are mudslinging

By Beth Fouhy
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — Under pressure in a feisty debate, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused her closest rivals Thursday night of slinging mud "right out of the Republican playbook" and leveled her sharpest criticism of the campaign at their records.

"People are not attacking me because I'm a woman, they're attacking me because I'm ahead," Clinton said, striving to protect her standing as front-runner in an increasingly competitive nominating campaign.

"What the American people are looking for right now is straight answers to tough questions, and that is not what we have seen from Senator Clinton on a host of issues," said Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois in the opening moments of a debate seven weeks before the first contest of the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"There's nothing personal about this," said former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who joined Obama in bluntly accusing Clinton of forever switching positions on Social Security, driver's licenses for illegal immigrants and other issues, turning aside the suggestion that she was seeking to hide her positions. Long an advocate of universal health care, she said Obama's current proposal leaves millions uncovered and that Edwards did not support health care for all when he first ran for president in 2004.

The three-way confrontation at the beginning of a lengthy debate reduced the other Democratic presidential hopefuls on the debate stage to the uncomfortable role of spectator, yet it perfectly captured the race for the party's nomination. Clinton leads in the nationwide polls, but recent surveys in Iowa show she is in a virtual dead heat with Obama and Edwards.

For Richardson, Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, the opening moments were frustrating – and they repeatedly tried to break in.

"Oh, no, don't make me speak," Biden said in mock horror when moderator Wolf Blitzer of CNN called on him roughly 15 minutes into the proceedings.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who has campaigned in Nevada more than any other presidential hopeful, took verbal shots at Clinton and her two closest pursuers in the polls.

"Let's stop the mudslinging," he said.

He said Edwards is engaging in class warfare, Obama was trying to start a generational war and Clinton "with all due respect with her plan on Iraq doesn't end the war. All I want to do is give peace a chance."

Richardson was in the minority when the candidates were asked whether human rights could ever trump national security.

He said it could; Clinton said it could not, and Dodd said "obviously national security." Obama challenged the question, saying "the concepts are not contradictory."

Clinton seemed intent on redeeming what even she conceded was a sub-par performance at the previous debate, turning aside criticism from her rivals and answering questions with practiced ease.

Asked whether she was guilty of playing the "gender card" in her drive to become the first female president, she said she had not.

"I'm not playing the gender card here in Las Vegas," a magnet for gamblers. "I'm trying to play the winning card," she said.

Obama was the first to challenge Clinton, saying it took two weeks to "get a clear answer" on whether she supports or opposes issuing driver's licenses for illegal immigrants. "The same is true on Social Security," he said.

For the first time in a debate since the campaign began, Clinton swiftly answered in kind. "When it came time to step up and decide whether or not he would support universal health care coverage he chose not to do that," she said of Obama. She added his plan would leave 15 million people without coverage – the population of Iowa and three other early voting states in the nominating campaign.

Bomb Squad called to Dwight

'Blinking disk' in toilet forces evacuation

By Ryan McAskill and Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

Dwight Hall residents were evacuated from their rooms last night due to a suspicious device found in one of the hall's basement bathrooms.

The University of Massachusetts Police Department received a call about a "disk-like object" at 8:04 p.m. Upon arriving at the scene, police investigated, established a command center and called for the Massachusetts State Police Bomb Squad.

"We got a call for a suspicious item in the basement bathroom. It was concerning for the officers because it was a disc-like object with duct tape and wires on it, and it was submerged in the toilet," Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor said. "Even though it was submerged, it was still flashing a light."

The police then evacuated Dwight in the Northeastern Residential Area, quartered off the area and closed down Eastman Lane from North Pleasent Street to the Sylan Residential Area bus stop. Students who were forced to vacate their rooms were moved to the basement of Leech and Thompson Halls.

After examination by the State Police Bomb Squad, the device was deemed to be non-threatening, and the area was at cleared at 10:04 p.m. Students were then allowed to re-enter the building though many were unsure as to why they had been evacuated at all.

"Given this day and age, its better to be safe then sorry. I never really felt the community was at risk it was standard precautionary measure to [corner] off the area," O'Connor said. "The State Police Bomb Squad evaluated it and X-rayed it and deemed it to be safe."

Domenic Poli contributed to this report

Lucas Correia contributed to this report

Derrick Perkins contributed to this report

Ryan McAskill can be reached at rmcaskil@student.umass.edu.

S.H.A.R.E
Student Helping Area Reach-out Efforts

NOVEMBER 17
TURKEY TROT
5 K Race/Walk Benefiting Food Bank Farm
REGISTRATION BEGINS AT 9:00 AM on the South Steps of the Student Union
THE RACE IS AT 10:00 AM
•First 50 People Get Turkey Trot T-Shirts
•Entree Fee : $10 or $5 AND 3 Cans of Non-Perishable Goods.
•Awards For Top Finishers

Students storm Whitmore

STRIKE from page 1

day numbered in the thousands.

"It's really hard to tell," Blagaszewski said. "We have no percentage [of students striking] as of yet."

The campus remained open for the day, and classes did meet, according to University officials. Blagaszewski said that the University had heard that several classes having been cancelled, but most of the classes had gone on as scheduled.

"What we need to do is review what info comes into us and assess it," he said. "The provost office will look into it."

"My classes were cancelled today," said Spencer Ross. "I think more students are skipping and it definitely delegitimizes the cause. If they don't go they get a day off."

Interim Chancellor Cole told students and parents in an e-mail sent out yesterday that the University respected the right of free speech on campus.

"Students who decide to participate are fully responsible for their behavior and also remain responsible for any material they miss while intentionally not attending class," he said.

According to reports from around campus yesterday, despite the planned boycott and rain students continued to attended classes in large numbers. Protestors could be heard throughout the morning in classrooms across campus.

Student leaders in the SGA and Graduate Student Senate are demanding a rollback of student fees, accountability of diversity funding, increased funding towards outreach programs for lower income students in the community and the bringing to an end to plainclothes police patrols in residence halls.

"I completely respect [the strike], but it does not really affect me too much," Ross said. "The problem with striking is that it appears more like whining. 'Kids don't want to pay as much, etc.' Direct confrontation is better."

Collegian Staff writers Stella Cernak, Ben Williams, Hannah Nelson, Danielle Kahn, Lisa DeBenedictis, Shruti Sehgal, CA Clause and Collegian correspondent Ryan Lidoni contributed to this report.

Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins@student.umass.edu.

Students march up Whitmore Administration Building's ramp yesterday. Students braved the rain to turn out in force against policies of the administration.

Building awarded to UML

BUILDING from page 1

Governor Patrick's plan is also bringing a $109 million Integrated Science building to the UMass Amherst campus, which is currently under construction. The Board of Trustees approved a $2.9 billion, five-year capital projects plan for 2008 -2012 in Sept. This includes plans for eight other science/research facilities at UMass sites throughout the system.

The President's Office feels there will be a benefit to the location of the new science building, "given its location at the end of a soon-to-be revamped University Avenue bridge," said spokesman Robert P. Connolly. "It will be a new gateway to the UMass Lowell North campus, symbolizing the University's commitment to advancing technology."

The new Innovation Center "allows us to provide appropriate clean room, ventilation and vibration control necessary for this kind of research in a more cost-effective manner" Connolly added.

The UMass President's Office feels "[the] new center is an example of the type of state and university investment that will attract additional research dollars and create new businesses in the Commonwealth."

UMass President Jack M. Wilson has said consistently, "The path to economic development in Massachusetts goes through the University of Massachusetts."

Erik Taber can be reached at etaber@student.umass.edu.

'Research' lead to arrest

DOCTOR from page 1

Rice, a member of the infectious diseases and immunology staff at UMass Memorial Medical Center and a professor at the UMass Medical School, told the Worcester Telegram & Gazette he was "gathering information" when he was arrested, stating adamantly, "I'm not guilty." Rice has since been placed on paid leave from the University and the medical center.

"He doesn't agree with that set of facts," Anthony Salerno, Rice's lawyer, said yesterday of his client, according to the Telegram. "He maintains that he was out there innocently trying to gather information to assist him in his work."

"He's got no history of any of this," continued Salerno. "He's not some drunken conventioneer or lonely hearts guy. He doesn't fit that stereotypical role that you would think would be the person out there soliciting."

Salerno added that the officer's interpretation of the situation and Rice's are "miles apart."

"He wasn't looking to secure sex from her. He wanted information from her," Mr. Salerno said to the Telegram. Salerno went on to say it would be foolish for Rice, given his knowledge and experience with sexually transmitted diseases, to approach a prostitute with the intention of soliciting sex. However, Rice did say he had interviewed sex workers in the past for his research but has never approached them for sex.

Neither UMass President Jack Wilson nor the UMass Memorial Medical Center could be reached for comment yesterday.

"I don't think that his arrest had any connection to his work with the University," said UMass spokesman Mark Shelton to the Boston Globe.

According to the Globe, the gonorrhea study is one of two of Rice's research studies that involve human subjects.

"I don't have any information or reason to think that Dr. Rice was working on either of these research projects," said Shelton.

According to the Worcester Telegram & Gazette, Rice has been conducting the same gonorrhea study since 2004 and has received more than $2.1 million in funding from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases Extramural Activities.

His case has been continued until Dec. 17.

Andy Smith can be reached at ajsmith@student.umass.edu.

Students say SGA and GSS teach-ins a big part of strike

TEACH-IN from page 1

"Food Not Bombs traditionally supports people's movements," McHenry said of his decision to get involved, citing universal education as a basic human right.

With three to four teach-ins occurring at any given time around the Campus Center and Student Union, each session consistently had 20 or more students in attendance. After the teach-ins, students joined a rally beginning in the Student Union Ballroom and eventually traveled to the Whitmore Administration Building where the Bursar's Office is located. Eight more teach-ins were held after the rally.

There were multiple sessions about diversity throughout the day, including one at which History Professor Jose Hernandez spoke about the lack of diversity inside the history department, a notion he described as "a crisis."

"Diversity is more than just a simplistic phrase that we can throw around," Hernandez argued while pointing out that it took the actions of minority scholars to change the focus of history as it is taught in the United States.

Hernandez also discussed the lack of minority doctoral students graduating with degrees in history.

Nerissa Balce of the comparative literature department also spoke at the same session, relating her own experiences as an international graduate student and now faculty member in the United States.

"Whenever you face an international graduate student, or a minority graduate student or a professor with an accent, remember that that person has traveled far," Balce said, pointing out the hardships and struggles minority students and professors face in getting their education.

Representatives from student businesses, including Earthfoods Cafe, Greene Subshop, the Bike Co-Op and the People's Market held an informational session, and explained the co-operative model that most student-run businesses on campus follow. The session also discussed the difficulties of obtaining more space and altering the space already in use by student businesses.

I Mass Senior Katey Tobin said the teach-ins "make people aware of why this [strike] is happening." She said that the seminars help get recognition and educate the students.

Other teach-in sessions included one on student debt, a book discussion about grassroots journalism, a session on intellectual and political diversity on campus, a session about student rights when dealing with police, a discussion about the role activist students can take after graduation and screening of the films "Life and Debt," "The Wind that Shakes the Barley," and "Grain of Sand. One session, about the four demands of the strike, was cancelled for today and will be held tomorrow instead.

The teach-ins began at 9:30 a.m. and lasted through 5:30 p.m. They will continue tomorrow with fourteen teach-ins between 9:05 a.m. and 3:20 p.m.

Elizabeth Hanley can be reached at ehanley@student.umass.edu.

Many students made their own signs during yesterday's strike adding a personal touch to an all-student rally.

Worster on Muir at AC

WORSTER from page 1

nature."

"His church became the outdoors, and his testament was a better understanding of nature," said Worster.

Worster said that Muir was not alone in his spiritual connection with nature, which was shared by poets Robert Byrnes and William Wordsworth, transcendentalist authors Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau and philosopher John Jacques Rousseau. Worster described Rousseau as "the harbinger of Muir's religion of nature."

Worster then posited the question of a possible correlation between a nation's embracing liberal democratic values and its concern for environmental protection.

He said that the United States was the first nation to create a national park in 1872 with the establishment of Yellowstone National park. He said that Scandinavian countries such as Norway and Finland, as they became more liberal and democratic, began to embrace the environmental movement. Costa Rica, according to Worster, has 28 percent of its territory protected, which is even more than the United States.

Worster acknowledged the negative effects of economic imperialism and expansion on the environment but pointed out that conservation movements have mostly flourished in nations that were not hostile to dissent and had "strong democratic countercurrents."

He pointed out that Burma, a nation that has gained a lot of media attention recently because of alleged human rights violations "probably has the worst history of environmental protection" and drew similar parallels with Stalinist Russia and present-day North Korea.

Worster spoke of an importance in acknowledging John Muir's contributions to the modern "green" movement and said he encouraged further research into the correlation between democratic principles and conservationism.

His speech was sponsored by the Amherst College department of history and Dean of the Faculty.

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsulliv@student.umass.edu

Study: drowsy drivers are deadly

DROWSY from page 1

after being awake for 17 hours have a heightened risk of crashing, equivalent to driving with a blood alcohol reading of 0.05. After being awake for 24 hours, the risk rises to be equivalent to 0.10 blood alcohol level.

The NSF isn't the only organization researching the costs and injuries associated with driving drowsy.

The National highway Traffic Safety Administration estimated that 100,000 police-reported crashes, 1,550 deaths, 71,000 injuries and and $12.5 billion are the direct result of tired drivers every year.

When asked about if driving drowsy has presented a problem on campus, Officer Perkins said, "The drives are too short."

UMass students, however, disagree.

"People think they can make the short drive," said sophomore, Malcolm Pradia. "The consequences are the same as drunk driving. You can still hurt yourself or others. One should not drive impaired."

Whether or not drowsy driving in the area has become a problem, nationwide drowsy driving is becoming a growing concern.

However, New Jersey is the only U.S. state with a law designed to persecute those who harm others with their drowsy driving. Maggie's Law, passed in 2003 is named after a 20-year old college student, Maggie McDonnell, who was killed by a driver who had admitted to being awake for 30 hours. Maggie's Law has a penalty of 10 years in prison and a $100,000 fine.

Molli Stramberg can be reached at mstramb@student.umass.edu

www.DailyCollegian.com

Domino's Pizza
AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs -Sat
11am -3am Sun.-Wed

MY WINGS OR CHICKEN KICKERS
10 Buffalo Wings Plus Cheesy Bread
$9.99
Limited Time Offer

THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items
$9.99

PIZZA & CHICKEN
MEDIUM $12.99 | LARGE $15.99

555/777 DEAL
Three 1-Topping Pizzas
MEDIUM $5.55 | LARGE $7.77
Deep Dish Extra · Limited Time Offer

SALAD & BREAD
Any Large Salad, Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water
$7.99
Deep Dish Extra · Limited Time Offer

FAMILY MEAL DEAL
1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Bread & an Order of Buffalo Wings
$18.99
Deep Dish Extra · Limited Time Offer

WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

Our idea of a study break.

College Students
Get 15% OFF full-price items.
Must show valid college ID. Restrictions apply, see store for details.
Hadley
Mountain Farms Mall
351 E. Russell St.
estri ninth spris

NOV 16 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2007

"It were best that we not all think alike; it is difference of opinion that makes horseraces."
-Mark Twain

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Letter from the SGA and GSS

A first-hand account of the student strike

Dear Editor:

In a remarkable display of solidarity, thousands of students struck classes yesterday. A growing coalition of both undergraduates and graduates organized this strike for four key demands, including the rollback of student fees, funding for diversity outreach and accountability, an end to unwarranted and unconstitutional police patrols in dorm hallways and regaining student control over student space. Grassroots organizing has been taking place over the past two weeks to galvanize the student body and ensure student participation.

The strike began at 8:45 a.m. as picketers protested across the campus. Throughout the day alternative educational teach-ins were held on topics varying from issues of state funding in higher education to policing of dorms. The sessions ran from 9:30 a.m. to 12 p.m. then resumed later in the afternoon. At 11 a.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge organizers held a press conference to present the demands of the student strike. At noon the Student Union Ballroom was home to a massive rally, as close to 1,500 students stood shoulder to shoulder and chanted to express discontent with the administration. Several speakers took the microphone and offered their personal reasons for supporting the strike.

In spite of the cold and miserable day, nearly the entire crowd then marched from the Student Union to the Whitmore administrative building – entering energetically to flood the second and third floors. The 90-minute occupation successfully broke the administration's stonewalling by securing a promise in writing to meet about the students' demands, despite the Interim Chancellor Thomas Cole Jr.'s vacation leave and Vice Chancellor Gargano's convenient absence.

The rally then left Whitmore and students marched along North Pleasant Street to restate the demands to the administration that they need to reverse course and seriously negotiate with student representatives. In a powerful show of solidarity and control, hundreds of highly motivated students marched peacefully through the rain to the Campus Center. The marchers concluded in the Campus Center restating their demands and directing interested parties to the afternoon teach-ins.

As students and allies we delivered a loud wake-up call to the snoozing administration to fund and be held accountable for diversity, address the astronomical and unsubstantiated rise in student fees and acknowledge the spaces built with student fees as rightfully for student use and the growing concern over the unwarranted invasion of police in student dorms.

The rally and the teach-ins held in the Student Union were a reminder of the true intention of the building, which was built in 1957 and funded entirely by student fees. However, through the decades, Auxiliary Services and the administration have slowly privatized student space, giving outside businesses priority for rooms and charging exorbitant equipment fees. We showed for a day that this space still belongs to us, not for the profit-making schemes of the university.

The inspiring turnout for yesterday's events is only the beginning of the development of a student movement. Today the strike will continue with increased picketing across campus and more alternative educational teach-ins. This strike – a tremendous step towards building the power – needed to hold the administration accountable to student demands. During the Whitmore occupation, Joyce Hatch and other administrators agreed to begin to negotiate with elected student leaders. Next Tuesday, November 20 at 3:30 p.m. in conjunction with the first in a series of negotiations, organizers are calling on students to speak out and continue to address our demands.

Most of all, we have been encouraged by the outpouring of student support and passion. Yesterday's strike, rally and occupation of Whitmore shook the administration, yet they are only a beginning. We will continue to fight until our demands are met.

Representatives from the SGA and GSS

This letter does not necessarily reflect the opinions of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian editorial board.

HvZ: More than a game

Eli Gottlieb

During the past two weeks, our school has born witness to one of the best-covered sporting events ever to take place outside a stadium. A full five percent of our campus participated (which means that everyone knew someone playing), and the Daily Collegian has featured coverage nearly every day. I speak, of course, of the campus-wide tag game Humans vs. Zombies.

But beyond merely providing an additional amusement for UMass students, the game actually teaches us an important lesson about survival: we can only survive together. Yes, it sounds awfully like an old cliché, but it only became clichéd by showing itself true time and time again.

In the original rules for Humans vs. Zombies, a single tag by a zombie (a "bite") could "feed" three zombies at once, keeping them in the game for another 48 hours. This led to a more realistic trend in the number of zombies over time than we've experienced at UMass, with the number of zombies increasing exponentially with each passing day.

According to those rules, it would only take a few days to a week before most players shambled and groaned, especially at a school like Goucher (the original home of the game) with only a small number of off-campus students.

So with risen corpses swarming every residential area except for Southwest, humans have either learned teamwork or fallen to the undead hordes.

Here in college we all find new ways to differentiate ourselves, to make ourselves stand out in a crowd.

Until the end of last week brought massive starvation upon the campus's zombie population, humans absolutely needed to move in groups if they wanted to stay alive. They provided each other with cover fire of Nerf darts and marshmallows. I myself became one of the infected by going back into the parking garage alone for my lost dart.

One might think that only a common enemy united the disparate humans, but that fails to explain human performance in last Wednesday's mission. Upon hearing that a "scientist" had discovered a "cure" for the zombie virus, the humans banded together to save the scientist and her research.

Despite leaked information on human positions at the beginning of the mission, the zombies' insufficient teamwork and the humans' superb efforts actually managed to obtain five "vaccine" cards that could return a recently zombified player to human status.

Here in college we all find new ways to differentiate ourselves, to make ourselves stand out in a crowd. Sometimes, however, we need to remember that only united can we stand against the challenges of our lives. My favorite rapper, during a live performance of what I believe to be his greatest song, interspersed a chorus into his performance: "Together we survive, apart we fall." Humans vs. Zombies has demonstrated exactly how right he was.

I think we can find applications for that sentiment in much broader domains than tag games and the support of our school sports teams. Everyone from New York Times columnists to Sean Hannity has come out against the "polarization" of our society in recent years, but none of them have admitted their own part in causing that.

They all demand that the entire country unite behind their pet cause, agree with all of their opinions and live by their moral system. We have gone beyond petty things like race and sex to begin fighting each other over the important things, like how we should force everyone to behave and exactly who should receive money forcibly extracted from everyone else's pockets.

We all think like that we've lost our sense of common ground, of a shared stake in a shared world. Political right-wingers consider the left traitors, and the left considers the right an evil cabal headed by a real-life Lex Luthor and the Learned Elders of Zion.

Students have become enemies of the police force, now suspecting anyone walking alone to a party on a Friday night of being an undercover police officer out to ruin their fun, and in return the police have begun conducting illegal warrant-less searches of student dormitories.

Atheists and very religious Christians now consider each other mortal enemies battling for control of society. Tom Lehrer should be rewriting his old song "National Brotherhood Week" (originally about racial and religious prejudice) this very instant just to get in on the new fad while it lasts.

Sages of ages past have always given us the injunction to treat others as we want to be treated, but that doesn't seem to hold any sway over those who sincerely believe that everyone should live like they live and that if they didn't live in the "correct" way they would deserve it forced on them as much as anyone else.

For one day, then, how about we think a little differently? For one day, with our little apocalyptic game behind us, I want everyone to think to themselves: how would we act towards each other when locked inside a mall – with our lives at stake; a limited supply of food and guns; and the living dead chewing on the doors? When we need that vaccine to save our bitten family and friends, what will we do?

Eli Gottlieb is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at egottlie@student.umass.edu.

Parental control

Katherine Marr

Ask most college students and they will swear up and down that they savor the complete independence that coincides with college life. They enjoy having control over everything from whether their dorm room floor is visible, to staying out all night and sleeping all day.

They relish that every decision, from what activities they partake in to who they associate with, can be made without a parent looming over their shoulder. That college students take full advantage of their freedom would be the expected consensus.

Yet although this historical understanding of the college experience may persist in our minds, reality proves otherwise. Today's college students are less independent and self-sufficient than in the past, and the blame falls upon technology.

Even as we leave the house and go further and further away, communication with our parents perseveres. From first year students to seniors, what have been dubbed "helicopter parents" because of their hovering tendencies are playing too-significant roles in students' lives.

According to the 2007 National Survey of Student Engagement (NSSE), 13 percent of freshmen and eight percent of seniors reported that their parents "frequently intervened" to solve problems at college, and an additional 25 percent of freshman and 21 percent of seniors said that their parents "sometimes intervened."

When you factor sophomores and juniors into the mix, and add up all of the numbers, the result is a significant amount of students whose parents are very involved in – and threatening – their college experience.

Of course, there are seemingly annoying, unnecessary times when, much to our chagrin, technology allows parents to impede on our lives. You know the story: you innocently enough post the online away message saying, "not feeling so well," unaware that miles away, you have sparked alarm at home.

But you aren't in the dark for long, because almost immediately, Instant Messages are popping up rapid-fire on your computer screen.

xxHiTechMomxx: You're not feeling well?
xxHiTechMomxx: What's wrong?
xxHiTechMomxx: Is it anything serious?
xxHiTechMomxx: Don't be afraid to go to the infirmary if you're sick.
xxHiTechMomxx: Answer me, or I'm going to worry about you all night!
xxHiTechMomxx: Never mind, I'll just call you.

That brings me to the cell phone, the other persistent link between the home and the dorm. Parents are a mere speed dial away, especially when many students are on family network plans, where calling home is convenient and inexpensive. So, actually, if you feel like spending a lot of time ranting about that completely ridiculous exam professor/ex-girlfriend/ex-boyfriend/whatever, it is indeed most economical to call home.

This ease and frequency of communication between students and parents causes college to become more like an extension of high school. Students seem to forget that college is their opportunity to branch off on their own. This becomes an issue when students view incessant parental involvement as the norm, and as a result, indirectly or explicitly encourage parents to act on their behalf.

We may deny it, but in practice, do students actually rely on parents for constant advice and prodding in the right direction? Parents have a strong invisible influence on campus, as indicated by the NSSE results that students with involved parents are more likely to be engaged in academic and extracurricular activities.

Parents have a strong invisible influence on campus.

One explanation is that parents urge their sons and daughters toward these high levels of participation. Is it true – do we depend on parents to advise us as to when we need to get more involved, or through supposedly unwanted IM conversations that we should go to Health Services?

More problematic, though, are blatant interventions by the helicopter parents, who should best have been left back at high school with the permission slips and signed report cards.

As for high school, I am completely pro-parent involvement. If my parents were willing to meet with the principal over an obnoxious teacher, I gladly had the school's phone number for them in a millisecond.

But it is an entirely different story when parents of undergraduates are calling Housing Services to complain about their daughter's roommate and request an immediate room swap. The same applies for parents who deal with the Bursar's Office because their children are incapable of walking to Whitmore to clear up a simple financial misunderstanding.

Soon enough we will be living in our own apartments and relying completely on our own bank accounts. Everyone would unanimously agree that it's foolish if we were to expect our mothers to call our landlords about disruptive tenants or to balance our checkbooks for us.

These days, technology makes it second nature for us to continue turning to our parents with every mini-crisis and relying on their instruction and intervention. I don't deny that a family support system is beneficial, but one that is too strong can undermine what students reap from their four years at college.

The significance of college transcends the education and diploma. It is equally about the experience of leaving home and acquiring a taste for independent living. We need to begin acting wholly on our own initiative at some point, and college, at the very latest, seems like an appropriate starting point.

Katherine Marr is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at kmarr@student.umass.edu.

Godfathers play God

Hannah Nelson

I actually laughed out loud the moment I read the following headline: "Mafia's 'Ten Commandments' found." The oxymoronic quality of it alone is enough to make anyone do a double take, but that isn't even the half of it.

The moral code of how to be the world's best mobster was found in the home of a Sicilian mob boss Salvatore Lo Piccolo after a police raid. Lo Piccolo is suspected to be the "boss of the bosses" and has been at large for two decades.

The opening line of the text reads "I swear to be faithful to Cosa Nostra. If I betray, my flesh should burn." Maybe it's just me, but that sounds an awful lot like selling your soul to the devil. But I don't think that even Mephistopheles himself would have thought up conditions like number five, "You have a duty at all times to be available to Cosa Nostra, even if your wife is about to give birth."

Isn't the Mafia supposed to be a textbook example of immoral behavior?

But don't worry, in true 10 Commandments style, it's morally impermissible to covet another member's wife. Though if your wife has made a cuckold of you, sorry, but she has just disqualified your chances of becoming one of the Cosa Nostra elite. And you better pray your godson doesn't become a cop.

Numbers two, five and seven give particular attention to wives. Five and two, of course, as mentioned above, state that members cannot covet each others wives, thus the cuckold comment. And number seven states simply, "Wives must be respected."

It seems to me that five and seven conflict each other. Perhaps I just woke up on the American liberal feminist side of the bed this morning. Also on the matter of internal loyalty is number nine, not stealing money from others within the circle. How lovely, now your wife and your investments are safe – wish I could say the same about your future.

Of course there are the expected commandments like number three, to never ever be seen with a cop. I am actually a bit surprised it doesn't read something more like "don't ever be in the presence of a cop."

I suppose that it is all a matter of interpretation, a bit risky for the mafia of all people to leave a loophole though. By the way, Lo Piccolo has recently broken this commandment himself, as he had quite an impressive police escort to bring him down to the station.

And for that matter, according to number 10, you're out of the selection pool if you have a cop in the family and any family betrayal, which is basically a reiteration of several of the other commandments. But it also adds that membership is off limits to "anyone who behaves badly and doesn't hold to moral values."

At this point if you are on the same train of thought as me, your first instinct is: What? Isn't the mafia supposed to be a textbook example of immoral behavior? Especially when you consider the $118 billion that Cosa Nostra can make in a single year from shady practices, including threats, loan sharking and instating protection rackets.

To refinse such "offers" in many parts of Sicily can literally be a death sentence and about eight out of 10 businesses in the region have to make such a choice.

To me it seems that the most straightforward commandments would have the most frightening consequences if broken. Take four, the typical Sicilian's worst nightmare. Four states that pubs, clubs, and bars are off limits.

Six says that you have to be on time to scheduled meetings and appointments. And eight is, "When asked for any information, the answer must be the truth." In layman's terms, a hand written list of your top 10 best excuses why your midterm paper is late won't cut it as a resume. At least we won't have to worry about any Cosa Nostra Mafiosi recruitment tables finding their way into the campus center any time soon.

I've saved number one for last, which may baffle some at first, but all you have to do is remember the value that secrecy holds. "No one can present himself directly to another of our friends. There must be a third person to do it."

To me that reinforces my movie influenced imagery of the mob in a nutshell. Men meeting in back rooms and greeting each other with their best intimidating stares while tapping cigars and asking the youngest one present why he wants "in" which is received by some made for Hollywood response.

The only question that I am left with is whether or not brand new Mafiosi recruits had to sign in blood. For my own sake, I certainly hope that there are no Mafia members who read the Daily Collegian. I would rather not find a horse head in my bed tomorrow morning.

Hannah Nelson is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at hnelson@student.umass.edu.

DAILY COLLEGIAN READER POLL

There has been a campus-wide call for a student strike against police presence in dorms, lack of diversity funding and increasing student fees, among other issues. Will you be striking Thursday and Friday?

☑ Yes, I'll be attending the rally.	☐ No, I'll be going to class.	☐ No, I don't support the strike.	☐ No class on Thursday and Friday? Sweet!
44%	26%	17%	14%

Collegian Reader Polls are unscientific and do not necessarily reflect the opinions of the University campus.

NOV 16 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fashion from the streets

Bethany Fong sometimes bases her outfits off of clothes and accessories she has made.

By Emma Liefvergren
Collegian Columnist

It's hard not to notice all of the inspirational style walking down the streets of the University of Massachusetts Amherst, Amherst and Northampton.

Even in the coldest, rainiest weather, I find myself in awe that so many people still look great. That kind of fashion dedication is exactly the kind of thing that I want to capture, so each week I'm going to photograph everyday people with not-so-everyday style.

I want to know what makes people tick in terms of what they put on their back in the morning (or whenever they happen to wake up). Fashion isn't just about couture and tiny models, and despite what Meryl Streep said in "The Devil Wears Prada," great style doesn't always start in an editor's office; it starts with ordinary people who inspire designers every day. This week, communications majors seem to be paving the fashion path for UMass students.

My column will run every Friday, so keep wearing awesome stuff and keep a look out for me around campus! (I'll be the short girl with the camera.)

Name: Bethany Fong
Year: Senior
Age: 21
Major: Communications

What do you think about when getting dressed in the morning?

First I check the weather, and then if I get something new I'll have an outfit around it. Usually I make my own clothes, so I'll make something and plan an outfit around it, whether it's a dress or an accessory or something.

Has communications influenced your style?

Not really, but I love art and movies and music, so that's a big influence in how I dress. And of course I love fashion, so I keep up to date with runway shows and all that, and street fashion.

What are you wearing right now?

I got my jacket from Target, my boots from Wet Seal, tights from Target, my dress from the Salvation Army and my beret from a store in New York.

Is there anything that you own that you could never part with?

I don't know. I've always thought about this like, if my house were to burn down and my closet were to be totally in flames, what would I be most upset about? I mean, I would be upset that all my clothes are gone, but fashion is something that's innate, so I feel like if I had to restart my whole wardrobe again and start with just T-shirts and jeans I could somehow make it my own and just recreate it all over again. So I'd probably be able to part with all my clothes if I had to.

Allison Roberts hopes to someday take her quirky style to work at Bloomingdale's.

Name: Allison Roberts
Year: Junior
Age: 20
Major: Communications

Is there anything in particular that comes to mind when you get dressed?

I try to think what's going to be the most comfortable, while looking cute still, and I like getting people's attention. Even if it's negative and people are thinking, "I don't like her outfit," I don't really care what they think.

Has being a communications major influenced your style?

Yeah, I love fashion; my biggest aspiration is to work at Bloomingdale's, maybe in management coordination organizing the clothes in photo shoots.

What are you wearing now?

My boots are from a small store in New York they went out of business and I don't even remember what the store was called. My shirt, I think it's from Bloomingdale's, and the leggings ... I don't remember where they came from. I got them a few years ago.

Is there anything you own that you could never give up?

I'd have to say my Uggs. I've had a few pairs and some of them ripped, and it's so hard to let go because they're so comfortable and you can wear them with any outfit. They're probably one of my favorite things, but, oh, my cowboy boots, they're starting to get old, and they look vintage but I don't want to throw them away.

Emma Liefvergren can be reached at eliefvergren@student.umass.edu.

The Source

(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of Western Mass.

Friday November 16

OPEN MIC NIGHT
The Craft Center, in the basement of the Student Union, hosts an open mic night. Sign-in starts at 6:00 p.m. and the show begins at 7:30 p.m. The event is free and open to the public. All types of talents are welcome.

A CAPPELLA
Mount Holyoke College hosts "Cold Night, Hot A Cappella," an a cappella concert in Blanchard Hall. The show starts at 8 p.m. and tickets are free.

DANCE
Smith College and Mount Holyoke College join together in presenting a dance recital featuring excerpts from two American dance works, a piece by Smith Professor of Dance Susan Waltner and an Afro-Brazilian modern work by Rosangela Silvestre. The show starts at 8 p.m. in Theatre 14 in Mendenhall at Smith College. Tickets are $5 for students/seniors and $9 for the general public.

Saturday November 17

MUSICAL
UMass Theater Guild presents "The Wild Party," a musical about one crazy night of debauchery in a Manhattan apartment at 8 p.m. at Bowker Auditorium. Tickets are $6 for students and $10 for non-students.

MEMOIR READING
Amherst author Leslie Garis reads from her memoir "House of Happy Ending" at 1 p.m. in the Trustee's Room at the Jones Library in Amherst Center. The event is free, and followed by a book signing. Refreshments will be served.

Sunday November 18

FILM
The Mount Holyoke Film Board presents a screening of "Broken English," a 2007 comedy-drama staring Parker Posey as a woman trying to deal with getting older and finding love, at 10:30 p.m. in Blanchard Campus Center, lounge 227. The event is free and open to the public.

FLORAL
Smith College's Fall Chrysanthemum Show continues this weekend with a display of floral of unusual size, shape and color. The show is open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at the Lyman Conservatory, College Lane in Northampton.

Compiled by Allie Roth, Collegian Staff

Young continues unpredictable career with newest CD release

By Ben Edmonds
Collegian Arts Desk

Ever since the Beatles introduced self-determination into the pop music process, pop's insatiable desire for more of the same has been challenged by a series of inspired musical chameleons who've pushed the music forward by refusing to stand still. Think Bob Dylan, Marvin Gaye, David Bowie, even Madonna.

Neil Young takes a backseat to none of them. Having left Buffalo Springfield after too much creative head-butting with Stephen Stills, the first thing Young did upon achieving solo success in 1969 was to accept the invitation of his nemesis to join Crosby, Stills & Nash. That set the tone for a zigzag odyssey that has careened over the decades from gentle folk melodies to activist rock anthems to entire albums of savage feedback.

"Neil never turns corners," an associate once said. "He ricochets around them."

His superb new album, "Chrome Dreams II," almost could be a primer for his extraordinary range. And the format of his current tour – acoustic and electric sets and a band composed of alumni from his most beloved backing units (Crazy Horse, Stray Gators, Bluenotes) – allows for maximum capacity to surprise.

To celebrate rock's quirkiest change artist, we've unscientifically selected five of Neil Young's greatest left turns. Throw a dart at his crazy quilt career, and wherever it lands will be different from everything surrounding it. The secret of this ceaseless change is that when he happens to alight in a musical place he's visited before, it makes even the familiar feel fresh and slightly exotic.

1. "Expecting to Fly" from Buffalo Springfield Again" (1967)

This was recorded the month before the release of "Sgt. Pepper," and there are those who'll think the entire Beatles masterpiece for these 3 minutes 45 seconds of hallucinogenic art song. Young's first collaboration with composer and Spector Wall of Sound arranger Jack Nitzsche established that Buffalo Springfield's dark horse was capable of anything.

2. "Tonight's the Night" (recorded 1973)

Having built a handsome platinum boy bordered by electric Crazy Horse on one side and acoustic "Heart of Gold" on the other, Young smashed it to pieces with this dark, drunken meditation on rock's seamy underside. Prompted by the overdose deaths of two colleagues, this remains as harrowing a document as pop music has produced.

3. The Ducks (1970")

When he should have been out promoting a new album, Young disappeared for several months to recharge his batteries by playing coastal dives as a semi-anonymous sideman with this Santa Cruz, Calif., bar band. It worked. His bursitis's holdup was followed by two classics, "Comes a Time" and "Rust Never Sleeps."

4. The 1980s

After delivering his new label the unfathomable mechanistic techno of "Trans," followed by the camps rockabilly of "Everybody's Rockin'," Young was sued by Geffen Records for making atypical representative albums. Young's reaction? He shrugged, released a traditional country album and embarked on a tour of county fairs supported by Waylon Jennings and the Judds. The message: Don't fence him in.

5. "Mirrorball" (1995)

Young spent much of the '90s interacting with modern music. He brought Sonic Youth and Social Distortion on tour, collaborated with Booker T. & the MG's on "Sleeps with Angels" and recorded "Mirrorball" with Pearl Jam. Successful supporters often spell success with veneration. Here, Young turned the table to challenge the young bucks and reveal himself to keep up. Long may he run.

Neil Young has had a career full of "left turns," consistently leaving his fanbase wondering what he will do next. His newest album "Chrome Dreams II" follows along that trend.

NOV 16 2007

SEVERE WEATHER OR EMERGENCY CLOSING INFORMATION
UMASS AMHERST

Closing Options*	Delayed Opening M W F: 10 AM Tu Th: 9:00 AM Monday to Friday 11:00 AM or 5:30 PM (exam period 10:00AM or 1:00PM)	Closed All Day	Closed During Day	Cancellation of Evening Activities
		Campus closure in effect until midnight unless campus officially reopens on same day
Watch or Listen...	starting at 6:00 am	starting at 6:00 am	when decided	Starting at 2:00 pm
	STAY TUNED TO YOUR RADIO/TV FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION
For Information	Call Emergency Closing Hot Line 545-3630, watch Housing Service Cable Network (HSCN), or go to www.umass.edu
To Radio/TV Stations...	Amherst (WFCR, WRNX) ~ Greenfield (WHAI) Northampton (WHMP) ~ Pittsfield (WBEC) Springfield (WHYN, WGGB-TV, WWLP-TV) ~ Campus Dorms (HSCN) (see alphabetical listing below for frequency numbers)
What will be affected by a closing	Classes ~ Day Care ~ Offices ~ Activities ~ Textbook Annex ~ Meetings ~ University Store ~ Convenience Stores ~ Continuing Education ~ Bluewall ~ Hatch ~ Snack Bars at Physical Plant, Whitmore, and Hampden
What remains open (Designated ESSENTIAL PERSONNEL will report to work)	Dining Commons ~ Coffee Shop ~ Health Services ~ Police~ Hotel ~Physical Plant ~ Garage ~ Conference Services ~ University Operator Other areas as pre-designated (consult your Department Head)
Athletics Fine Arts Mullins Center	Athletics, Fine Arts, and Mullins Center events will take place as scheduled unless a separate announcement is made on local radio stations. Call or go on-line as follows: Athletics Information: 545-2439 or www.umassathletics.com Fine Arts Information: 545-2511 Mullins Center Information: 545-0505 or www.mullinscenter.com
Bus Service	Buses will run unless announced separately on local radio stations. Call 545-1633 for recorded message or www.umass.edu/bus for details.
Library	go to www.library.umass.edu/index.html for updated operating status
Academic Calendar and Intersession	SAME AS UNIVERSITY
Exam Period	Delayed Opening Until 10:00 AM or 1:00 PM	The Library will make every effort to open. Call Library Hours Hot Line: 545-0414
Sat/Sun/Holiday	Listen to radio or call Library Hours Hot Line: 545-0414

If there is no vertical line, the information applies for each closing option

AM				FM
WBEC	1420	WHMP	1400	WBEC 105.5	WHAI 98.3	WHYN 93.1
WHAI	1240	WHYN	560	WFCR 88.5	WHMP 99.3	WRNX 100.9
				WAMC 90.3

WGGB – TV Channel 40 WWLP – TV Channel 22 WHSM – TV Channel 3

PARKING SNOW POLICY (UMass Amherst Campus)

In Effect from 12/01/07 to 04/01/08

The Amherst Campus Parking Snow Policy affects OVERNIGHT parking (1:00 a.m. to 7:00 a.m.) and parking during a SNOW EMERGENCY CLOSING period.

OVERNIGHT PARKING (1:00 a.m. to 7:00 a.m.)

PARKING ALLOWED (Please park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles)

Lot 24	Lot 62	Lot 25 (north of roadway to Yellow lot only)
Lot 30	Lot 63	Lot 32 (west of Lincoln Avenue only, closest to Prince Dormitory)
Lot 41	Lot 65	Lot 43 including Thatcher Way (except at meters)
Lot 42	Yellow Lots	Lot 46 (except at meters)
Lot 52

PARKING ALLOWED - ONLY WITH APPROPRIATE PERMIT (Please park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles)

Lot 21	Lot 49	North Village
Lot 22	Lot 50	Lincoln Apartments
Lot 29	Lot 54	Any posted reserved space
Lot 44

PARKING NOT ALLOWED

Lot 26	Lot 40	Lot 25 (south of the roadways to Yellow lot)
Lot 27	Lot 64	Lot 32 (east of Lincoln Avenue only)
Lot 31	Lot 66	Lot 45 (except by special permit only)
Lot 33	Lot 67	Lot 47 (park in Lot 27 or Lot 44 from 1:00 a.m. to 7:00 a.m.)
Lot 34	Lot 68	Any campus roadway (including Southwest horseshoe)
Lot 35	Lot 71	All parking meters, including Fearing Street meters

SNOW EMERGENCY PARKING - ESSENTIAL PERSONNEL - ONLY WITH APPROPRIATE PERMIT

During a snow emergency closing period, essential personnel who report to work may only park in the following areas:

Lot 21 (west of Southwest)
Lot 25 (west of Physical Plant and north of roadway to Yellow lot only)
Lot 30 (adjacent to Power Plant)
Lot 31 (north of Engineering and Lederle Graduate Research Center)
Lot 32 (west of Lincoln Avenue only, closest to Prince Dormitory)
Lot 34 (south of Isenberg SOM)
Lot 62 (south of Morrill Science Center)
Lot 63 Worcester Dining Common lot only (west of Worcester D C)

SUGGESTIONS / IDEAS FOR PARKING "SMART" ON A SNOW DAY ...

1. Park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles.
2. Use the UMass bus service.
3. Car pool rides whenever possible.
4. Walk if possible.
5. Have someone drop you off.
6. If space is not available in your assigned lot, go to either Lot 25 (north of roadway) or Yellow lot (both west of Physical Plant). During snow conditions, it is not possible to guarantee normal lot capacity will be available.
7. If you receive a parking citation and believe it was improperly issued, you may appeal it at Parking Services within 14 days from the date issued. Appeals can be submitted in writing, appealed in person to the Hearing Clerk, or appealed online at https://parking.umass.edu

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS - FALL 2007

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day Hot Line is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

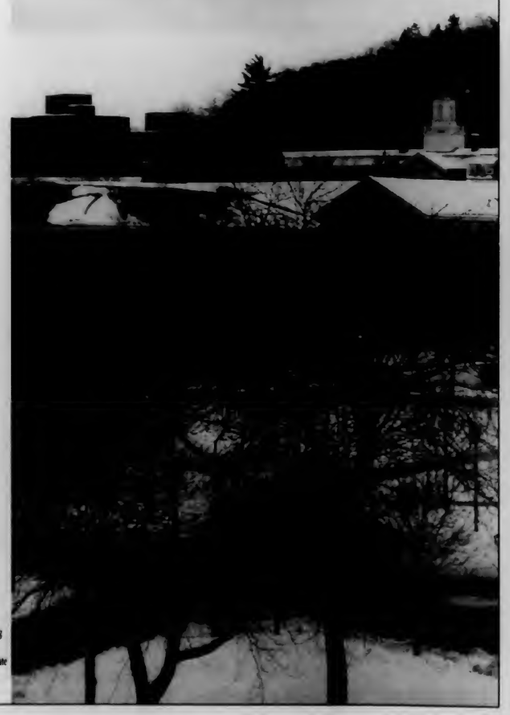
If the University is closed until 10:00 a.m.

8:00 am ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am ..... held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm ..... held as originally scheduled
4:00 pm ..... held as originally scheduled

If the University is closed until 1:00 p.m.

8:00 am ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am ..... rescheduled to 8:45 pm same day
1:30 pm ..... held as originally scheduled
4:00 pm ..... held as originally scheduled

If the University is closed all day but open in the evening:



8:00 am ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm same day
10:30 am ..... rescheduled to 8:45 pm same day
1:30 pm ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
4:00 pm ..... rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 8:00 am Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 10:30 am Dec. 22

If the University is closed all afternoon and all evening:

8:00 am ..... held as originally scheduled
10:30 am ..... held as originally scheduled
1:30 pm ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
4:00 pm ..... rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 8:00 am Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 10:30 am Dec. 22

If the University is closed all day and all evening:

8:00 am ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm next exam day
10:30 am ..... rescheduled to 8:45 pm next exam day
1:30 pm ..... rescheduled to 6:30 pm exam day after next
4:00 pm ..... rescheduled to 8:45 pm exam day after next
except:
1:30 pm Dec. 20 ..... rescheduled to 8:00 am Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 20 ..... rescheduled to 10:30 am Dec. 22
8:00 am Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 8:00 am Dec. 22
10:30 am Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 10:30 am Dec. 22
1:30 pm Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 1:30 pm Dec. 22
4:00 pm Dec. 21 ..... rescheduled to 4:00 pm Dec. 22

Invitational to provide test

Newcomb expects Boston meet will gauge where team stands

By Sam Ehrlich
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams are taking it easy in preparation of their first big hurdle of the season: the Boston University Terrier Invitational.

The three-day event will be their non-dual meet of the season, and will be an apt test deciding their readiness for their overall goal of winning the Atlantic 10.

According to UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb, the tournament will provide a good glimpse on the progess of the team.

"[It will be] a real important step to see where we are, that's the bottom line," Newcomb said. "We use a lot of this for evaluation to see what kind of response did we get from the training they've had, and how do they handle a three-day format.

"And, especially for the freshman that I have, I need to see them in this kind of situation," he added.

Unlike normal dual meets, the Invitational will be a longer event, lasting the entire weekend while facing multiple schools in competition. A total of nine schools will be attending the event hosted by Boston University.

One of the biggest opportunities of the weekend will be another shot at BU, a team that both the men and women lost to in their first dual match of the year.

For Newcomb, this can only give both sides motivation to do well.

"[BU is] the only school that we've competed against that's at this meet," he said. "Here's a chance to sort of get a shot back at a team that's beaten us already."

Newcomb and men's coach Russ Yarworth have been resting their players a little more than usual in an effort to prepare their swimmers for more time in the water.

"We're letting them rest a little bit, giving their legs a chance to rest, their bodies a chance to rest a little bit," Newcomb said. "We've cut back on our workouts, and it's just an opportunity to see where we are and what we're doing."

However, according to Newcomb, this strategy is consistent with the rest of their results, and will not be either an advantage or disadvantage.

"I think everyone's going to be at the same state of a little bit of rest, but not what we call a full taper tend of the year when you let the body completely rest and recover)," he said. "It's just a little rest, and I think it's going to be interesting to see how we respond."

Regardless, Newcomb believes his team is ready for the event, and is well on their way to their goal of a second A-10 championship.

"I think we're prepared as much as we need to be for this event," he said. "But we go into this eyes open, and see where we are and what we're doing and I talk, and I listen to what they're saying and I do a lot of evaluation based on performance from this next weekend."

Newcomb has also been assisting preparing the men, and likes what he sees.

"They have great spirit, great enthusiasm, and I think they are doing very well," he said. "They're doing the same thing: they're letting them rest a little bit, and this is a really good indication of where they are."

However, while he believes both sides are good for this point in the season, Newcomb doesn't fool himself into thinking that either team is ready for the A-10.

"I think both programs are better for the championship format; we gear the team towards the championship meet," he said. "Everything we do is trying to prepare for A-10s. But this event will help me do a lot more to help we need to do fully to prepare for Atlantic 10."

Sam Ehrlich can be reached at sehrlich@student.umass.edu

Sophomore freestyle swimmer Juan Mebiere and the men's and women's swimming and diving teams will compete in the Boston University Terrier Invitational this weekend.

Jones passes on UM

M. BASKETBALL from page 10

last Monday against Ohio State Wisconsin-Green Bay lost handily to the Buckeyes, 91-68, in a first-round game of the NIT Season Tip-off's Midwest Regional.

The team returns its leading scorer from last season, 6-foot-9 forward Mike Schachtner. The Wisconsin native averaged nearly 15 points last season as one of the Phoenix's primary scoring threats.

Though Schachtner was one of the Horizon League's top performers, he and the rest of the conferences best players were overshadowed by the outstanding season of A.J. Graves and Butler.

However, the Phoenix graduated its leading scorer from 2006-07, Ryan Vyschko.

Recruiting Update

Heralded recruit Kevin Jones will not be calling Amherst home next season. The 6-foot-8 forward signed with West Virginia, electing to play for coach Bob Huggins. The senior announced the decision at a press conference at his high school in Mount Vernon, N.Y.

According to multiple sources, the Minutemen were considered to be one of the final seven schools on Jones' list. The forward was also considering Indiana, Pittsburgh, Seton Hall and Rutgers, among others.

Ford was one of the first coaches to begin recruiting Jones and his brother Gerard played football at UMass. Jones was considered by many to be one of the top remaining high school big men who had not yet verbally committed to a college program.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Ricky Harris led the Minutemen in scoring Wednesday with 23 points on 8-of-15 shooting from the field. Harris is second on the team in scoring after four games, averaging 20.3 points per game.

Charles River site of season finale

Rowers travel to Cambridge to wrap up fall schedule

By Coley Michalik
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's rowing team heads into its last meet of the fall season this weekend at the Foot of the Charles in Cambridge, Mass.

The fall season has been successful, with the young squad placing in the top three in the majority of events.

They head into the Foot of the Charles one week after they were given an NCAA award for academics, as well as for a strong performance at the Dartmouth Invitational.

The Foot of the Charles takes place in between Boston and Cambridge on the Charles River. The event is hosted by Boston University and will take place this weekend (Saturday and Sunday) at the DeWolfe Boathouse.

Last year the UMass Open A boat took 12th place with the B and C boats taking 30th and 31st, respectively.

The novice eight also plugged the A boat in 12th-place, while the B and C took 26th and 30th, respectively.

In the varsity eight, the Minutewomen came in fourth place with a time of 15:32.1, behind Boston College, Northeastern and MIT. The team looks to improve upon these results and finish the fall season strongly.

The novice eight has consistently placed in the top three in the majority of the meets, while other boats have made their appearances on the leaderboard.

Last weekend the team placed second overall in the Dartmouth Invitational behind Radcliff and ahead of Northeastern. The Minutewomen came in 5th seconds behind Radcliff with a time of 33:48.

Two weekends ago the Minutewomen came in with a strong performance at the Head of the Fish in Saratoga, N.Y. The varsity eight and lightweight four both came away with first-place finishes.

The varsity eight crossed the finish line with a time of 12:02.92, while the lightweight four crossed with 13:57.55.

The novice eight saw UMass boats take third and 13th with times of 13:20.74 and 15:14.26, respectively.

Also this past week the Minutewomen were recognized with a prestigious award by the NCAA for academics by athletes. In order to receive this award the team must be in the top ten percent in academic progress rate in their respected sport.

Nationally, UMass crew has had 19 Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association National Scholar-Athletes since 1999 and 19 A-10 Academic All-Conference athletes during that same time span.

Not only does the team stress training off-water to make the team a stronger group in meets, but they also stress academics as equally as the sport in which they compete.

After this weekend the team has a break from competing, but no break from training. The meets pick up again in the spring, but the off-water training never stops as the team looks to always improve in some aspect.

Coley Michalik can be reached at cmichali@student.umass.edu

The Daily Collegian is always looking for writers of all kinds to cover important news and events.

NOV 16 2007

Final meet for runners in '07

Teams head to Bronx, N.Y., for season-ending competition

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams will compete in their last meet of the 2007 season when they travel to New York this weekend for the ECAC/IC4A Championships.

The men's team will participate in the IC4A Championship and the women will compete in the ECAC Championship on Saturday morning. The races are hosted by Fordham University and will take place at Van Cortlandt Park in Bronx, N.Y.

"I compare it [IC4A Championship] to the NIT of college basketball," men's coach Ken O'Brien said. It's the teams that don't make it to the NCAA tournament."

The Minutemen look forward to a successful race this weekend, hoping for a seventh or eighth-place finish. Last year the men took 11th place.

They will compete against Division I teams from Maine through North Carolina. There are a total of 82 teams that can compete in this meet. Of these schools, five of them made it to the NCAA Championships, which will be held on Monday, so they won't be participating this weekend.

The toughest competition for the Minutemen will likely come from William & Mary, Georgetown, LaSalle, Dartmouth, Brown, Cornell and Syracuse. The Orange placed second last year.

Last weekend the men competed in NCAA Regional Qualifier and placed 11th overall.

Also last week junior Jesse Regnier was named the Atlantic 10 Student-Athlete of the Year. This award was voted on by the conference's sports infonnation directors. Last week Regnier placed second for Massachusetts and 13th overall at the A-10 Championships on Oct. 27.

"We've been getting good races from 50 percent [of the team] and it's a different 50 percent every week. We need 80 to 90 percent [of the team to have a good race]," O'Brien said.

This past week in practice the Minutemen have used their time to sharpen and polish themselves for Saturday's meet, instead of having hard running practices. The Minutemen had a tough race last weekend at the NCAA qualifiers, where they ran 10,000 meters, which is the longest they've ran all year.

"I think our best race still rides ahead of us," O'Brien said.

The women are coming off of a 28th-place finish in the NCAA Regional Qualifier.

The Minutewomen look for senior Christina DeRosa to lead the team on Saturday for the last time. DeRosa will be ending her impressive season on Saturday. She finished in the top five in all but one of her six races this season, earning many nominations including the Atlantic 10 Student-Athlete of the Year. She was also named Most Outstanding Performer at the Atlantic 10 Championships on Oct. 27, where she finished first overall.

Following DeRosa will be red-shirt freshman Shiyi Zan, who has been a consistent No. 2 runner for the Minutewomen. Zan was also named to the Academic All-Conference team with DeRosa.

Last week at the Regional Qualifiers junior Beth Harlow, freshman Kristin Darling, freshman Erin Megan and freshman Elisabeth Fisk rounded out the women's top five in their 28th-place finish.

Melissa Turtinen can be reached at mturtine@student.umass.edu.

Senior Christina DeRosa and the women's cross country team will compete in the ECAC Championship Saturday morning. The men's team will participate in the IC4A Championship.

Senior forward Alisha Tatham scored 14 points in the 69-67 victory over Boston College Wednesday night at the Mullins Center. UMass travels to Boston to play Northeastern Saturday.

UM starting strong

STRONG START from page 10

thus far. They jumped out to an early 11-5 advantage over Vermont, and continued their quick starts with a 7-2 run to begin the game against the Eagles.

Despite her team's early season success, Dacko know there's still areas that can use improvement.

"We're still a work in progress," she said. "We've got a lot of things that we've got to work on, I mean rebounding, boxing out, being able to effectively run our break, and being able to finish on layups."

The Minutewomen did have a handful of missed layups against the Eagles, and were also outrebounded 52-36, including 22-10 on the offensive glass.

It's difficult for a team to win a rebounding matchup when two of the team's opposing starters are 6-foot-6 and 6-foot-4. Freshmen Stefanie Murphy and Carolyn Swords combined for 15 rebounds, while 6-foot Ayla Brown grabbed 10 boards.

The Minutewomen have no regular rotation player taller than 6-foot-2, so properly boxing out and positioning themselves on the glass becomes more important when the opposition holds distinct height advantages.

UMass was also outrebounded against Vermont and must improve in this area if they want to consistently win games throughout the season. Whitney McDonald and Kate Mills, their starting center and power forward, respectively, have combined for 13 rebounds in the two games.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen take on NU

W. BASKETBALL from page 10

players must concentrate on their own performances.

Junior Stephanie Gerardot registered a career-high 20 points in the win against BC Wednesday. She went 8-of-10 from the floor, including 4-of-6 from the perimeter. She also played well defensively, recording three steals.

"Stephanie has the ability to do that every night," Dacko said. "We have to get her the ball more when she's in the zone. We missed her a few times. We probably took some bad shots at times and not given Stephanie the ball but she had big buckets for us to beat a very good team."

Senior guard Pam Rosanio struggled against Eagles. Though she managed to score 10 points, she was 2-11 (1-2 from the 3-point line) and 5-7 from the free-throw line.

Dacko said the senior double-pumped when going in for layups instead of just driving in, which led to the off-night. Rosanio did, however, drain two clutch free throws with 10.6 seconds left.

But, like captain Alisha Tatham said, Northeastern is not focusing UMass's win Wednesday night and the Minutewomen shouldn't be either.

"I'm pretty sure they're going to come out ready and fired up because they know that we just came out from a big win, so we're just going to have to match that and we're going to have to be on top of our game," she said.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is looking for a new Distribution Manager

Are you an early riser with some time before class?

Are you organized, efficient, and professional?

Do you want to be a part of the largest daily college newspaper in New England?

Apply now:
113 Campus Center Basement
Daily Collegian Offices
(413)545-3500

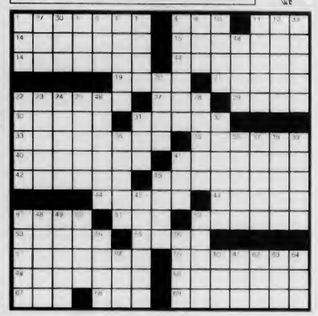
What is The Score
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Annual Sports Magazine
Coming soon to a sports event near you!

amherst cinema
FRI 11/16-THU 11/22
"Bloomerfingers" Entertainment Weekly
BEFORE THE DEVIL KNOWS YOU'RE DEAD
OPENS FRI 11/16 2:00 4:30 6:50 9:30
No 2:00 show Sun 11/18
OPENS FRI 11/16 5 DAYS ONLY! DEEP WATER
Fri-Tue 1:45 3:45 6:00
COUNTRY OLD MEN OPENS WED 11/21
1:45 4:15 7:00 9:45
JACOB THE LIAR Sun 11/18 2:00
INTO THE WILD 1:15 6:20
LARS AND THE REAL GIRL 4:00 9:15
LUST CAUTION Ends Tue 11/20 8:00
SAT DEC 1 ONE DAY SALE! In Box Office Only! $5 MOVIE PASSES IN PACKS OF 20
28 AMITY ST. DOWNTOWN AMHERST
413-253-2547
www.AmherstCinema.org

Have fun being productive.

		2			7	1
	6					8
2		1		3	4
2			4	3	6
		9		1
	3	8	6			7
	7	5		8		6
4					9
1	9			4

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!



ACROSS
1 Wall and Basin
8 Sonic boomer briefly
11 Divine comment
14 Seven Dwarfs chant
15 Sky Harbor or Dulles
17 Brought to light
18 Quarters
19 Writer Angelou
21 Old radio Fibber
22 Confident step
27 Jackie's second hubby
29 Hawaiian coffee
30 Wooden peg
31 Light refractor
33 Gave a makeup exam
35 Lounged about
40 Impressionist Manet
41 Lights out
42 In a cordial manner
43 Sane
44 The present
46 Exemplar of slowness
47 Optimistic
51 Christmas drink
52 Egg extenors
53 Beanie
55 Small isthmus
57 ABC for one
59 Pasta dish
65 Portuguese nobleman
66 Venetian or Hanneman
67 Ballance organ
68 Work undercover
69 Having a propulsion

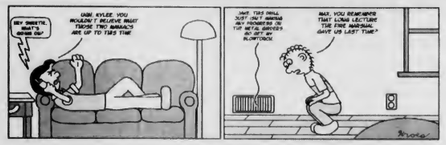
DOWN
1 That lady
2 Singer Reba
3 Actor Turn
4 Sense of self
5 Expressions of confusion
6 "Schoor paper?"
7 Whiskey fivers
8 African trek
9 Table of keepers
10 Prune
11 Hand drum
12 Shakespearean forest
13 Out of port
16 Quick kiss
20 Scotland in London
22 Fling about
23 Actress Bara
24 Dynamo part
25 End of the small intestine
26 Process sea water
28 Coral formation
31 Food buff
32 In vogue
34 Check the bill of
36 Make amends
37 Ultimate
38 Online messages
39 Some desktops
41 Hound sound
43 Road anger
45 Domestic ass
47 Extent
48 Music drama
49 Ravi Shankar's instrument
50 Tiredness indicator
52 Rollerblade
54 Silent assents
56 Shear
58 Sale's sgl
60 Paulo Brazil
61 Swiss peak
62 Hodges of the Dodgers
63 Dundee denial
64 "Pride ___ Prejudice"

Ferrets are sneaky animals that enjoy stealing eye-catching possessions. They also have a strong, unpleasant smell because of their glands.

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes start January 2nd
Plan Now for Winter Break
Get ahead this Winter wherever you are!
Online classes or on campus classes?
YOU DECIDE!!!
Registration begins Tuesday Nov. 13th
www.UMassULearn.net

Quote of the Day



"Women need a reason to have sex. Men just need a place."

-Billy Crystal

419 By The President

Last Ditch Effort By John Kroes

New Toons By William Doucette

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Spread love upon this campus like an oil spill on an Alaskan sea shore.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Perform a social experiment by living in a cardboard box all weekend.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Your professor knows that you are only on strike so you can sleep in.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Chew with your mouth closed, you have a very intimidating tongue.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Host a nude chocolate pudding wrestling match in your landlord's driveway tonight.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Why waste money on expensive exploits when all you really want is free time?

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Make like a basking shark and rollick in the many successes of your week.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Don't deny yourself the pleasure of picking a wedgie simply because you're in public.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
If you want to be touched, wrap yourself in bubblewrap. It's irresistable.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You have many eye-catching possessions, watch out for kleptomaniacal ferrets.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Remember, Madame heartbreaker, you break it, you buy it.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Plan a covert operation to spike Earthfoods' meals with MEAT!

My name is comics... but you can call me anything you want.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

Montreal weekend from $99.00 complete motel, transportation and more. Montreal Express.net 781-979-9001. Lowest prices on campus.

Apt. for Rent

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlall@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

Employment

Today is the last day to apply to become a legal assistant at Student Legal Services Office! Earn 12 undergraduate credits while gaining valuable experience in the legal field. No experience necessary. Contact us at 413-545-1995 or stop by our office at 922 Campus Center.

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Found

Ipod Nano SOM. Contact Prof. Weiss to identify rmweiss@northamptonlaw.com

Housing

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

Services

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

Services

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birthcontrol, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment Located at 27 Pray Street Amherst Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins wecome www.taperstryhealth.org

Travel

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations 800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Simmons saves the day

UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons stopped the shot of Dayton's Alex Torda in the first round of penalty kicks last night. The Minutemen won the game, 4-3, in a shootout after tying through two overtimes.

UMass advances with 4-3 penalty-kick win

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dayton forward Joe Olwig beat Massachusetts men's soccer team goalkeeper Zack Simmons in the 28th minute to give his team a 1-0 lead.

So when he lined up for the Flyers' fourth of five penalty kicks with UMass ahead 4-3, he was pretty confident the game would continue after his shot.

But he sent the shot to the right side of the net and Simmons guessed wrong, diving left. Yet the game ended anyway. His attempt clanged off the left post, clinching UMass's 4-3 win in penalty kicks after the teams played to a 1-1 tie through two overtimes.

UMass	1
Dayton	1

Simmons also saved the first shot Dayton took in the shootout. UD leading-scorer Alex Torda fired the ball to Simmons' right, and he timed the dive perfectly and knocked it away.

"We went over penalty kicks [Wednesday] in practice," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It's a very individual situation since it's you against the goalkeeper. The pressure is on the goalkeeper since most penalty kicks are scored.

"But on the flip side, it puts the pressure on the shooter because he's now expected to score. Our four guys put it in and [Simmons] made the big save when we needed it."

Fellow upperclassmen, Kenny Cook, Chris Brown and Doug Rappaport converted on the PK chances for UMass along with sophomore right back Dan Lepone. Freshman Ben Arikian would have taken the fifth shot had Olwig beat Simmons.

Junior Mike DeSantis started at the central midfield spot after Koch speculated he may miss the game due to a calf injury sustained in the final weekend of the season.

Brown tied the game for UMass in the 50th minute, heading it past UD goalkeeper Zac Gibbens.

Rappaport sent the ball into the box and Cook headed it over to Brown and nodded it home.

"It's good to have players that have been there before, being able to help the younger players that haven't been there," Koch said. "It's even more important since it was a playoff game and it's so important not make a mistake."

The Minutemen were close to ending the game in regulation when Bryan Hogan got open in the penalty area and fired the ball on net. Gibbens was late reacting and his dive fell far short of the post, but the ball sailed wide to uphold the draw.

In the first overtime, Mark DeSantis headed a shot off the crossbar after Arikiran lobbed the ball into the penalty area.

Koch acknowledged that the Minutemen played the role of aggressor in the second half after a slow first period. The Flyers forced more shots on goal, but the Minutemen created the higher quality chances.

By virtue of the win, UMass advanced to the semifinals of the A-10 Tournament against Rhode Island today at 8 p.m. UMass has not defeated URI since Oct. 18, 2000 and has never heat the Rams in postseason play.

Charlotte defeated Fordham, 2-1, earlier in the day. The 49ers will take on Saint Louis at 5:30 p.m. tomorrow.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Little time for rest

Ford hoping offense quickens pace vs. Wisconsin-Green Bay

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After his team's win over Yale Wednesday night, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford was concerned about the fatigue and lack of health of his squad. With a quick turnaround for UMass, there's little time for the Minutemen to get ready to play at its best.

The Minutemen (3-1) play Wisconsin-Green Bay (2-1) at the Mullins Center Saturday night, a week removed from a three-game set in Iowa.

"Our guys need a rest; we've got a big game Saturday [Wisconsin-Green Bay] is very good," Ford said. "I would never give a team a day off two days before unless I had to, but I'm going to give them a rest [Thursday]. Their legs need some rest."

The coach gave his team a break yesterday, focusing more on the non-physical aspects of the game during practice. Since Ford prefers to play an up-tempo style, it's important for his athletes to be able to play at a high level for the whole game.

"We figured ont a way to win on a night when we were fatigued," Ford said about his team's victory over Yale. "I was disappointed that when didn't get to play our style of basketball for our fans in our first home game."

The Minutemen shied away from its up-tempo style, as the team's fatigue limited its effectiveness as the game progressed. Ford expects his team to score more than the 13 fast break points and 14 points off turnovers it scored against Yale when the offense is operating more efficiently.

Ford also will need his team to play better defense, especially from his bench. UMass pressed on defense before it became apparent that it was further enhancing the team's fatigue.

"I didn't get to go to my bench as much in the second half," Ford said. "As bad as our first five were defensively, the guys off the bench weren't any better. I had to shorten our bench, which wasn't good. We need to play 10 or 11 guys every game."

All of the Minutemen's starters saw significant time last night, with Gary Forbes, Ricky Harris and Etienne Brower seeing 32 minutes each. In contrast, starting center Luke Bonner saw only 13 minutes last night.

Meanwhile, the Phoenix experienced their first true test

See M. BASKETBALL on page 7

Coach Travis Ford and the Minutemen welcome Wisconsin-Green Bay to the Mullins Center Saturday night. UMass is 3-1 in the early stages of the 2007-08 season, beating Yale, 89-80, Wednesday night.

Huskies await Minutewomen

Rosanio, Gerardot look to keep momentum against NU

BY DOMINIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will head to Boston to face Northeastern for a 2 p.m. start Saturday. It will be the first road game for the Minutewomen this season.

While UMass (2-0) is coming off a 69-66 win over Boston College Wednesday night at the Mullins Center, the Huskies (1-1) have not seen action since their 82-51 loss to Texas Tech on Sunday.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko said last year's 58-50 victory over Northeastern was an ugly game and cautioned her players to not let it happen again. She said the Huskies are a bunch of big, aggressive athletes that like to get inside.

"What they do well, we don't do well. We don't close out well and they want to go down the gut and the seam and penetrate," Dacko said. "We've got to be able to stop them one on one. They're athletic. They all penetrate. It's kind of helter-skelter out there."

Junior Ashlee Feldman has played 64 minutes this season for NU, averaging 12 points per game. She is 8-of-19 from the floor and 6-of-15 from the 3-point line. Dacko said she is a very talented shooter, especially from the perimeter, and that she is someone UMass needs to look out for.

Lucia Pablos, averaging 14.5 points a game, is Northeastern's leading scorer. She has seen 70 minutes so far and is 11-of-31 from the free-throw line, a spot where she is the most dangerous.

A guard, she often takes a pass and drives to the hoop to get fouled. Though NU lost to Texas Tech, the strategy went off without a hitch. She was 9-of-9 from the charity stripe.

"She wasn't afraid of [Texas Tech]. She's not going to be afraid of us," Dacko said. "So we have to be able to play tough without fouling."

Senior Stephanie Hodell is the Huskies' leading rebounder. In 52 minutes of play she has racked up 12 boards, four offensively and eight defensively. Dacko said Hodell is "hungry" under the glass and very smart about how she rebounds.

She added that she also wants her squad to be aware of senior Shaleyse Smallwood. The senior has played 75 minutes, the most of any Huskie, and averages eight points per game.

But, as usual, Dacko said her

See W. BASKETBALL on page 8

Senior guard Pam Rosanio had a career-high 25 points in the season-opening victory for the Minutewomen over Vermont last Friday. She also added nine rebounds and seven assists in the 69-66 win.

UM starting strong with close victories

Non-conference wins over BC, Vermont to open season

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Early non-conference games are made to prepare teams for conference play. The Massachusetts women's basketball team has started off in the right direction and looks to improve upon their quick start.

"I think it's important that we go out and execute better everyday at practice and every game, and learn from the games that we've just played," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said, the day after her team won a 69-66 non-conference game over Boston College.

Beginning the season strong in non-conference play is nothing new to the Minutewomen. They started out the 2006-07 campaign winning 9-of-11 games, including victories over Vermont, who they've beat already this year, and Northeastern, who they'll play Saturday.

After losing three of their four remaining non-conference games, they split their 14 conference games before losing to St. Bonaventure in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

UMass (2-0) still has a long way to go, but it beat Boston College for the first time in 10 years, and it was the first win over the Eagles for Dacko.

A hard-fought victory like that can give a team confidence early in the season. BC went to the NCAA Sweet Sixteen two years ago, and it's a big win for the program.

Dacko believes these early games are important because they prepare the team for the tough conference play that lies ahead. She hopes her team is able to break out this season and surpass the .500 A-10 mark they reached last year.

It's only two games into the season, but Dacko has liked what she's seen so far from her team in these tough games. Both games have come down to the last minute, and her team has responded with key free throws and tough defense.

In practice, she wants her team to shoot 40-50 free throws but there's not always time for that and it's tougher in games with the crowd and pressure.

The free throw practice was evident in yesterday's second half. After going a shaky 4-of-9 in the first half, they hit all six of their free throws in the second half, including Pam Rosanio's two free throws in a one-point game with 10 seconds remaining.

The Minutewomen also limited the Eagles to five free throw attempts, and BC only hit one.

Getting out to early leads has also helped the Minutewomen

See STRONG START on page 8

UMASS BACK IN NCAA TOURNAMENT | PAGE 8

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

PARTLY CLOUDY : HI: 43 LO: 28 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 2007

Senate back to BASICS

BY KATE OLESIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The faculty senate met in Herter Hall on Thursday to go over regular business but also discussed the successful impact of the BASICS program at the University of Massachusetts.

Sally Linowski, associate director of University Health Services, went before the senate to share data with faculty members in 2006 and returned to update the members on Thursday.

Linowski's talk, titled "Success and Sustainability: BASICS at UMass Amherst," showed a myriad of statistics from surveys conducted between 1997 and 2007 of over 2,000 students who had been through the BASICS program and many students who had not.

Across the board, Linowski said she is very pleased with both the results of the BASICS program, which was installed in 2005, and other community efforts. The random surveys and the success of MyStudentBody (MSB), the required online quiz, have showed that UMass is still higher than the national average in various areas, but that number is gradually declining.

The heavy episodic drinking rates – identified as a major public health problem among college students – have decreased considerably since BASICS was instituted at UMass. In 2005, the rate was 64.2 percent. It moved to 57.6 percent in 2006 and finally to 55.3 percent in 2007.

Opinions about campus policies rewarded much for future consideration.

"The results show that students want stricter sanctions," said Linowski. "And they're asking us to do more."

The surveys asked students what they thought their peers were thinking in addition to what they, as individuals, thought.

Results showed that 65.9 percent of students believe most UMass students think the administration's alcohol policies are "too strict." But the results show that only 24.5 percent of students actually think the policies are too severe.

In addition, 27.5 percent of students had the notion that most of their peers thought UMass's policies were "about right."

See FACULTY on page 2

After effects: Students on the strike

BY CAITLIN QUINN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

As the student strike continued Friday, its success and effectiveness drew a range of mixed reactions around campus.

"I think the student body all knew about the strike," said strike organizer and student trustee Ruth Thompson. "I don't think they all participated, but a good part did. There were a lot of empty classrooms, and many students went to the teach-ins instead of class."

Teach-ins on Friday included a forum titled "Discussion Forum Evaluating the Strike and Future Actions," for which about 80 to 90 participants and sympathizers of the strike gathered in the Earthfoods Cafe to discuss their reactions.

Thompson spoke and captured the attention of the cafe while answering students' questions about the effectiveness of negotiations after the march to Whitmore Thursday afternoon.

"What they gave us was a meeting for undergrads on Tuesday and grad students on Wednesday," she said. "We told them we wanted an open meeting, but they only want to meet with representatives."

"The faculty was supportive of the action," said Eve Weinbaum, a labor studies professor.

Students and teaching assistants in attendance were concerned with the strike's results and said many undergraduates were afraid to come to the rally, some were still sleeping and some went home because they didn't know enough about the strike to join in.

Graduate students and TAs lead students ask about the strike because they said they were not informed about the reasons for it.

Sophomore Conor Sullivan felt that the apathy among the student body as a whole needed to be addressed.

"People don't realize that we can win," he said. "They don't think we have power against the system. Go out and tell your friends; we can only do this through unity."

But others were more supportive of the strike and expressed their pride in student leadership.

Following the forum, approximately two thirds of those in attendance marched to the flagpole across from Whitmore and attempted to raise a flag that read, "I Mass belongs to the students."

See STRIKE on page 2

Students line the Whitmore ramp on a rainy Thursday. The University estimates 800 took part in the rally.

Protesters march from a rally held in the Student Union Ballroom. Last week's strike inspired mixed emotions from students.

Springfield noted in chancellor search

BY GISEL SAHLANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The next University of Massachusetts chancellor should help promote a campus that can use its resources to create strong ties between UMass and Springfield, or so said the search committee charged with finding that chancellor for UMass's flagship Amherst campus.

The search committee held its 20th meeting Tuesday night at Springfield Technical Community College, and Henry M. Thomas III, a member of both the committee and the UMass Board of Trustees, presided.

Forming a strong link between UMass and Springfield is currently a task assigned by Governor Deval Patrick to Thomas. "There is a substantial connection [between Springfield and UMass], 'a little' is a bit under the radar," Thomas said.

The attendants were asked what attributes the UMass chancellor should have in order to bring success to the UMass campus.

"There has to be a chancellor who fills the gap between the University and urban centers," said Allan W. Blair, president-CEO of the Western Massachusetts Economic Development Council. He added the University should tackle local issues and use its resources to develop the surrounding communities that some say it ignores.

"The first thing the new chancellor has to do is give a damn," said Steven I. Bradley, vice president for government and community relations at Bay State Health Center. According to Bradley, the University needs to genuinely care about the surrounding communities and the under-supported children living in Springfield.

Bradley suggested that UMass create a plan in which the school of education and the Isenberg School of Management would have a decade-long partnership with the city of Springfield.

See SEARCH on page 2

A voice for choice:

VOX aims to raise awareness

BY LORAINE BUEGER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Vox students for a choice a nationwide pro-choice group that started about five years ago at the University of Massachusetts presented many gruesome but true facts during its discussion on abortion, titled "The Beta Project."

The group is a student-run son of Planned Parenthood and means "voices" in Latin. It put on a production that consisted of a half-hour audio segment of women's and men's narratives of their experiences with abortion, followed by an hour of reactions, opinions and discussions from the audience.

"Our goal is to provide information about safe sex, contraception, positive body image, emergency contraception, communication between partners and adoption," said Vox Secretary Kate Fontaine, a senior at UMass. Treasurer of Vox, Irene Ilshoutsky, added, "And to end these taboos we have, which I think is something we did a little bit today."

The stories told were from women receiving abortions prior to 1973 and the landmark Roe v. Wade case that legalized abortions. Their experiences were often described as gruesome, unsafe and unsanitary.

"I thought parts of it were disturbing," said freshman Aaron Lifton. "Especially the story about the woman locked up with nothing but a bed just because the issue was so taboo. It makes you think how much abortion really needs to stay legal."

The pro-choice group also aims to eliminate stereotypes associated with abortion, such as the conceived notion that pro-choice means being in support of all abortions. Vox said it is about the women's right to choose what is best for herself, her body and her life.

I didn't expect it to be as graphic," said senior Serene Baldwin. "I've always been pro-life because I know there are

See VOX on page 2

Three to face drug charges

On Nov. 16 Amherst Police concluded a two-year investigation with the arrests of two UMass students. Investigators carried out a search warrant at 6:43 a.m. for 108 Rolling Green Apartments Friday morning and arrested resident Benjamin Macneil, who was 20 years old at the time of the crime he is accused of. Macneil was arrested after the investigators discovered marijuana and several hundred dollars in cash in the apartment.

Stephen Ballow, 20, the second resident of the Rolling Green apartment, was arrested later that afternoon near 1:40 p.m.

Ballow and Macneil were both charged with possession class D (marijuana) with intent to distribute. Both are expected to be arraigned on Monday, Nov. 19 at Eastern Hampshire District Court.

The APD also arrested Daniel Moses, 22, after APD allegedly discovered a package with LPS carriers containing a large amount of marijuana.

The marijuana was allegedly being sent to North Carolina before Amherst Police intercepted the package. The police then apprehended Moses at 1:13 p.m. on University Drive in Amherst.

Moses was charged with possession class D (marijuana) with intent to distribute.

Despite the coincidence of the three arrests, investigators state that Moses' arrest is not related to the arrests of Ballow and Macneil.

According to Amherst Police, Moses' arrest will remain under investigation in conjunction with North Carolina authorities. Moses is expected to be arraigned at the Eastern Hampshire District Court on Monday.

Jennifer Heshion

Minutemen win first A-10 Championship since 2001

UMass beats Rhode Island, Charlotte to capture crown

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

From the beginning of the season, UMass men's soccer coach Sam Koch said that his team's goal was to qualify for the Atlantic 10 Tournament. But the Minutemen accomplished something even greater in the 2007 season: winning the Atlantic 10 Tournament Championship.

The team won the A-10 title for the first time since the 2001 season after a weekend of soccer that was undoubtedly one of the most important in program history. The Minutemen defeated Charlotte 2-0 yesterday afternoon in the tournament final.

But the team's semi-final win was perhaps just as significant for a different reason. The Maroon and White defeated its nemesis Rhode Island, 1-0, for the first time since 2000, ending a streak of eight consecutive losses.

"The team was ready. The first time we met maybe we were overconfident," Koch said. "It awakened us and we didn't forget it – they're our biggest rival. We were ready to play [Saturday] when we needed to. It takes a while to sink in. The team played fantastic soccer over the weekend."

Whether it was his penalty-kick save against Dayton in the quarterfinals or one of his 11 saves against Rhode Island, at no point during the five tournament games was any player more valuable to his team than goalkeeper Zack Simmons.

The redshirt junior stopped an aggregate 23 balls over the weekend and earned the tournament's Most Outstanding Player honors. Senior defender Kenny Cook also made the A-10 All-Championship Team.

By virtue of winning the league title, UMass qualified for the NCAA Tournament with the conference's automatic bid. The Minutemen will learn this evening where and whom they will be playing in the first round.

"There's no better feeling than going to practice on Tuesday," Koch mused about the extension of his team's season.

In the A-10 final, UMass earned its first win over Charlotte in program history. The victory also avenged a 1-0 loss to the 49ers in the regular season.

See SOCCER on page 5

An own goal and a Prince Oboai score give UMass a 2-0 win over Charlotte in the Atlantic 10 Championship game yesterday in Dayton, Ohio. The Minutemen also defeated Rhode Island over the weekend, redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons won Most Outstanding Performer for his play.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 53

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Ester
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Scaglin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.E. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marsea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenzuaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FEATURED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1996. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nicholas Belanger

COPY EDITOR
Greg McCarthy

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

Students opine on stike's success, cause

STRIKE from page 1

They were stopped by two police officers who stood blocking the Hag pole after approaching and grabbing the flag rope out of one student's hand. Students who lingered had a peaceful discourse with the officers. A couple of students walking past the march on the way to class yelled "Go to class."

Many classes continued to have full attendance on Friday, while many large lectures saw dwindling numbers. TAs from Intro to Women's Studies decided to cancel discussion sections, declaring "As students, we strike," in a statement read to their students in lecture on Wednesday. Professor Miliann Kang of Intro to Women's studies was one of several professors who held teach-ins on Friday. Weinbaum was included in this group, as well as Associate Professor Dean Robinson.

UMass undergrad Dave Welch decided to attend class.

"I had a paper due," he said. "And I didn't go to any of the teach-ins. A lot of kids use the strike as an excuse not to go to class. They're not really active."

"[The strike] will get attention," said Dave Abronian, also an undergrad. "Maybe even from the large media, but I don't think its going to change anything. If they lower student fees, they will raise prices somewhere else."

Thompson closed her statements at the forum by saying, "Our issues are still not being addressed. This is the perfect time not only to let the student body know but also the state and the nation know. You all have made history."

Caitlin Quinn can be reached at cquinn@student.umass.edu.

The search continues

SEARCH from page 1

"I do see a lot of competence, like the school of education [and] school of business here to a build business infrastructure," Bradley said.

"A new chancellor needs to be comfortable in his or her skin [and] embrace culture," Elaine H. Anderson said. Anderson is the director of UMass Amherst Outreach and has an office at STCC. According to Anderson, the chancellor must embrace the changing demographics of the Springfield-Holyoke area.

"I am asked frequently, 'Aren't you afraid to work in Springfield?'" Anderson said. She said these questions are proof to her that there is a resistance to becoming involved in the urban area at the University.

John Brigham, both a political science professor at UMass and committee member, shared his thoughts on the different language that needs to be used when describing the relationship between UMass and Springfield.

"The challenge is to overcome fear... I would love to see caring on both sides," Brigham said. He added this relation needs to become a transforming relationship that benefits both UMass and Springfield.

The search committee is hosting its last public meeting in Boston later this week. This meeting will allow more suggestions to be considered as the preliminary candidate interviews begin early in the year.

During the spring semester, three candidates will be selected and presented to UMass President Jack M. Wilson. President Wilson will in turn recommend one candidate to the Board of Trustees for final selection.

Gisel Saillant can be reached at gsaillan@student.umass.edu

Faculty senate meets

FACULTY from page 1

However, from the survey results, 61.1 percent of students believe the policies are just right.

As of Nov. 12, Linowski said that 96 percent of the class of 2011 passed MSB, while the 300 students who have not currently have registration holds in place.

"88 percent say that the course is average to excellent; 86 percent say it increased my knowledge of alcohol and 89 percent said it answered [students'] questions about drinking," read Linowski's PowerPoint.

Linowski said the involvement of the faculty and their knowledge of UMass's programs and her data is imperative for students to succeed.

"Faculty members are a key part of supporting students' responsible decisions," she said. "I'm sharing the information so people have an accurate picture of what's actually going on...so faculty can refer students to different programs."

Her half-hour presentation – in which she shared an overwhelming amount of information with those present at the meeting – also provided an overview of the campus's Alcohol and Other Drug plan and strategies.

College drinking received even more national attention in 2002 with the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism 2002 report, "A Call to Action." It showed there was an increase in student deaths and unintentional injuries and that 31 percent of students met the criteria for diagnosis of alcohol abuse.

Linowski hopes to change this – starting with the college environment.

She highlighted the ecological framework of UMass, college life and the community, and where its problems lie.

"We have an architecture problem on this campus – it's called Southwest," she said.

Advertising, institutional, individual, peer, community and public policy factors have a huge impact on how college students and community members perceive consumption of alcohol.

BASICS is currently funded by a grant, which ends in June 2008. But Linowski, who has been with UMass since 1993, has high hopes for the program's continuance into the future.

"I think we'll get funding from different sources," she said. "We hope to achieve diversified funding."

Other faculty senate business included the presentation of the annual report of the Graduate Council for 2006-07, presented by graduate program director and professor of marketing Linda Shea. She said they instituted 15 new courses and five new programs over last year. She briefly touched on the subject of funds for diversity recruiting, which were a point in the general student strike last week.

The Research Library Council for academic year 2006-07 hinted at expanding the W.E.B. DuBois learning commons or the creation of a "teaching commons."

The University Writing Committee said that it plans to do a five-year review of the Junior-Year Writing program, which is a requirement for graduation.

There was a short discussion on the movement of the alumni donor database to the president's office, a move which many faculty members seemed opposed to.

A number of new, three-credit courses were also approved by the faculty senate: CE-ENGIN 211, "The Art of Structural Engineering;" CE-ENGIN 410, "Public Transportation Systems;" LEGAL 260, "Law in the Historical Context;" LEGAL 375, "Slavery and the Law;" LEGAL 470, "Race, Gender and the Law," and SPANISH 475, "The Story of Romance Language."

State representative Benjamin Swan (D-Springfield) was supposed to give an address but could not make the meeting.

Kate Olesin can be reached at kolesin@student.umass.edu.

VOX raises awareness on pro-choice issues in workshop a lot of unwanted children out there, but both males and females need to be educated." She added, "I try to see both sides, but I'm still pro-life. Women are able to speak their opinions; I'm more concerned about the child who doesn't have a voice."

VOX from page 1

According to pro-choice groups, abortion has come a long way. It is described as a generally safe procedure with a clearly-defined time range in which it can be done. In May of 2007, it became illegal for this procedure to be done during the third trimester of pregnancy, otherwise known as a partial birth abortion.

State legislation passed shortly after Deval Patrick was in office, called "The Buffer Zone Law," forced abortion protesters to stay thirty-five feet from abortion clinics as patients entered the building.

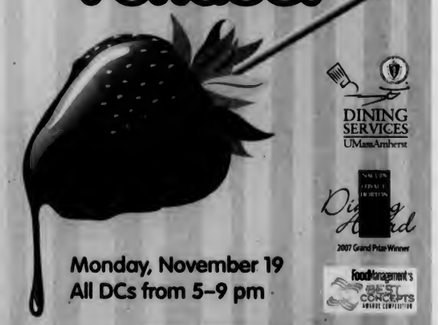
"At this event, I was really excited to see how many people participated," said Ushomirsky. "I just wish we could have talked more. I would have liked to elaborate on some of the things we touched on. Where we are now is extremely liberal, so it's hard to think outside of that [framework]."

Although Vox said many improvements have been made, it added there is still more to be done. Being educated at a young age about sex is a rarity that, according to the group, would make a big difference toward spreading knowledge about these issues. Another factor is the lack of abortion clinics in many central and southern states. Group members discussed women who have hard times not only finding a clinic, but also making an appointment before it is too late in the pregnancy to do so.

Loraine Burger can be reached at lburger@student.umass.edu.

Let us know what you think
Online at www.DailyCollegian.com

TO THE WORLD'S BEST CUSTOMERS:



IT'S BEEN A PLEASURE TO SERVE YOU!

	Wednesday, Nov. 21	Thurs Nov. 22 – Sat. Nov. 24	Sunday, Nov. 26
Worcester DC	Closes at 6:30 pm	Closed	Open at 11:00 am
Franklin DC	Closes at 2:00 pm	Closed	Open at 11:00 am
Hampshire DC	Closes at 6:30 pm	Closed	Closed
Berkshire DC	Closes at 2:00 pm	Closed	Open at 11:00 am

You can use your meal plan at the Bluewall Eateries on Friday, November 23, and Saturday, November 24 from 8:00 am to 7:00 pm.

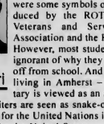
DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
2007 Grand Prize Winner
Be A Local Hero Buy Locally Grown
FoodManagement's BEST CONCEPTS AWARDS COMPETITION
umass.edu/diningservices

Indulge in Healthy Chocolate Fondue!

Monday, November 19
All DCs from 5–9 pm

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
2007 Grand Prize Winner
FoodManagement's BEST CONCEPTS AWARDS COMPETITION

Enjoy the Rich Taste of Dark Chocolate with:
Fresh Fruits Pound Cake Biscotti
Marshmallows Pretzels



umass.edu/diningservices

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
EDITORIAL OPINION

"If were best that we not all think alike; it is difference of opinion that makes horseraces." – Mark Twain

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 2007 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Veterans day at UMass

Brad DeFlumeri

Lost among the hysteria resulting from last week's unsuccessful radical student-led strike was the fact that Nov. 11 was Veterans Day. Sure, there were some symbols of patriotism produced by the ROTC detachments, Veterans and Services Members Association and the Republican Club. However, most students were blindly ignorant of why they had last Monday off from school. And because they are living in Amherst – where the military is viewed as an annoying pariah, military recruiters are seen as snake-oil salesmen, and where respect for the United Nations is more prevalent than respect for the United States – college students who fail to properly commemorate the sacrifice of our nation's heroes are themselves not entirely to blame. Nevertheless, the school's lack of an official effort to commemorate Veterans Day – while certainly not surprising – was very distressing. In light of this, I feel an obligation to belatedly highlight one of our nation's most important holidays and the brave men and women for which it was named.

Veterans Day is a holiday honoring both living and dead military veterans. It is celebrated on the same day as Armistice Day (or Remembrance Day) in other parts of the world, falling on Nov. 11, the anniversary of the signing of the Armistice that ended World War I. It was not until a 1954 executive order by President Eisenhower that the holiday became known as "Veterans Day."

The final paragraph of that executive order read: "I, Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States of America, do hereby call upon all of our citizens to observe Thursday, November 11, 1954, as Veterans Day. On that day let us solemnly remember the sacrifices of all those who fought so valiantly, on the seas, in the air, and on foreign shores, to preserve our heritage of freedom, and let us reconsecrate ourselves to the task of promoting an enduring peace so that their efforts shall not have been in vain."

In light of the president's profound words, Veterans Day has indeed become a day when patriotism cannot be viewed as political, a day when those in uniform routinely receive gratitude and hugs from complete strangers, and a day when cities and towns across the United States hold ceremonies to commemorate local veterans of all wars and all ages.

All across the nation last Sunday, patriotic melodies such as the "Battle of Hymn of the Republic" and tearjerkers such as Tim McGraw's "If You're Reading This" (a touching song about a dead soldier's last letter to his family) moved veterans, politicians and ordinary citizens to tears.

And as exhilarating as these annual experiences are for veterans, I submit that we do far too little on the other 364 days of the year for our society's most brave, noble and selfless warriors. And as a veteran here at UMass, perpetually worried about the advocacy of veterans, let me look at this matter in light of the situation on campus.

Yes, SGA, if you want to diversify UMass … why aren't you personally inviting more veterans to attend school here?

Our veterans should be empowered and supported by this University. It is our veterans abroad who routinely defend the freedom of strangers back in America who don't even respect what they are doing, or worse, hope that their mission flat-out fails for political reasons. It is our veterans who so consistently return home from the horrors of warfare with myriad psychological and physical wounds, some of them so severe that a lifetime's worth of rehabilitation and counseling will not erase the trauma one experiences in combat. Those veterans – like myself – who were actually fortunate enough to avoid combat on active duty and return home free of any physical and mental deficiencies can look forward to coming to a school like this illustrious University, where men and women in uniform are looked at with suspicion and those charged with advocating on behalf of veterans conveniently have too many other responsibilities.

It is a shame that the University does not do anything at all to make veterans feel welcome upon arrival, to organize and empower them like it does to so many other groups, or to even provide specific services and academic tools for veterans like so many other schools across the country – including UMass Boston – do with breathtaking success.

The school and the SGA can keep talking in their disingenuous and politically correct language about diversity accountability and reaching out to the disadvantaged in the inner-city. Here's an idea about diversity for our magnificent Student Government Association. Let's diversify UMass by recruiting more of a severely underrepresented segment of the population; a group that knows more about diligence and determination than any high school student; a group that comes to college not to go on strike like a bunch of lawless hooligans, but comes with the utmost appreciation for the fact that they are no longer living on a ship or in a foxhole. Yes, SGA, if you want to diversify UMass – where veterans comprise roughly only 200 of 25,000 undergraduates – why aren't you personally inviting more veterans to attend school here?

On Veterans Day, with American Flags implanted mostly by veterans outside its office on the student union lawn, the SGA plotted its impending strike. One of the supposed reasons for this strike was a lack of University-generated diversity on campus. However, we have a veterans' RSO on campus in the form of VASMA that is fighting tooth and nail with the SGA in order to get its first budget. Does the SGA believe there are already too many veterans' RSOs and that funding another would throw off the diverse balance of student groups? Clearly not, and the only thing for the SGA and the University to do at this point is stop the useless rhetoric intended not to offend anyone and start funding and empowering veterans' groups on campus.

Brad DeFlumeri is the Republican Club President. He can be reached at bdeflume@student.umass.edu.

Politics as usual for democrats

The democratic debate in Nevada last Thursday night, proved to be more entertaining than most democratic debates in the past. The Democrats have been accused of playing the "when in doubt, blame the Republicans' card for too long now, and in the last election, they seemed weak and unable to lead the country on a host of issues. The focus has been on how great it is for a woman, an African-American and a Hispanic to be running. Contrary to popular belief, that doesn't mean progress per se.

Sada Farah

There have been a host of African Americans who ran for president before Obama, a technicality that is often ignored. Shirley Chisholm in 1972, the Rev. Jesse Jackson sought the Democratic nomination in 1984 and 1988, and the Rev. Al Sharpton sought it in 2004. Lenora Fulani ran as an independent in 1988 and 1992. Alan Keyes sought the Republican nomination for president in 1996 and in 2000. However, it does seem that Obama is less polarizing than Sharpton, more popular than these other candidates, and is able to bring in the big bucks for fundraising. And while he has been criticized for many things in the past few months, including the likeliness of his last name to 'Osama,' Obama seems to be more similar to his opponents in class, education and experience than any black candidate that has run for the highest office. And although it's caused some criticism from the black community, he hasn't used his race in this campaign; he promotes himself as an American, albeit a rich one.

The attacks at the Nevada debates against Clinton had nothing to do with gender and everything to do with responsibility and accountability.

According to CNN, Hillary pollster Mark Penn subsequently said in a conference call that the image of six men beating up on Hillary would play well with female voters. And anonymous Clinton advisers told the Associated Press, "there is a clear and long-planned strategy to fend off attacks by accusing her male rivals of gathering against her." But no one has been as vocal as Geraldine Ferraro, the Democrats' vice presidential candidate in 1984.

In a front page story in Monday's New York Times she stated, "John Edwards, specifically, as well as the press, would never attack Barack Obama for two hours the way they attacked her. It's OK in this country to be sexist. It's certainly not OK to be racist. I think if Barack Obama had been attacked for two hours – well, I don't think Barack Obama would have been attacked for two hours." She later said, "we have got to stand up. It's discrimination against her as a candidate because she is a woman." Wow Ferraro, way to hit them with a double whammy, the race card and the gender card in one swoop. These types of comments are not only ignorant, bigoted and utterly stupid, but the sad thing is that they set women and minorities back.

Then there is the widespread criticism about the Clinton camp planting questions in Iowa. CNN, as well as other news channels, have been trying to get to the bottom of this by interviewing the college student from Grinnell who was told by campaign staffers to ask as a specific generic climate change question at an event. The college student told the press that she was going to ask Hillary about her energy policy in comparison to the other candidates, but was told that Hillary doesn't know the other candidates' plans well enough to answer that question. She stated that when she asked how the process worked, she was told that she would raise her hand, and Hillary would call on her. Now I'm not sure what is more disturbing, the fact that Hillary Clinton isn't competent enough to answer questions on major issues and is ignorant about her competition, or the fact that this and seemingly other college students are dumb enough to go along with something they know is corrupt without questioning it.

When questioned about this at the debate, she said that she understood the attacks were coming because she was ahead, not a woman. So I guess she didn't know her campaign was playing the gender card, or planting questions to college students in Iowa. Ignorance is bliss, unless you're Hillary Clinton, and now might actually have to face these issues. Her new slogan is "turn up the heat," and that's exactly what her opponents have done to her.

Sada Farah is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at sfarah@student.umass.edu

DAILY COLLEGIAN READER POLL

Several hundred students participated in rallies Thursday and Friday to make their grievances clear to the administration.

Was this strike effective?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Cast your vote online at www.dailycollegian.com!

ed/op wants YOU to draw comics.

editorial@dailycollegian.com

No business like the police business

Imagine returning home one night and being really tired. You live alone and have an alarm system in place. You enter your house, but forget to disarm the alarm, and fall asleep on the sofa. A few minutes later the police arrive in response to a call from your security company about an alarm going off, bust down your door, and find you asleep on the sofa.

Matt Robare

Instead of waking you up and asking for identification, they tase you. When you explain to them it's a misunderstanding, they tase you again. After yelling at them a second time that you are in your home and they examine your wallet, they tase you a third time. Then they remove the tasing pellets from your back, arrest you without reading you your rights, and keep you in a jail cell until 5 a.m. Then the police department investigates itself and clears the officers of any wrongdoing.

Sound like some Orwellian nightmare, like something out of 1984, or Nazi Germany, or the Soviet Union, or Tony Gilliam's Brazil? Think again. It actually happened in late July this year in Pennsylvania.

On Nov. 9 in Alabama, a man unconscious because of diabetic shock was tasered three times and charged with DUI despite not having a drop of alcohol in his system.

And then there is the case of Lillian Fletcher, an 82-year old grandmother from Chicago. Two police officers without a warrant forced their way into her apartment. She grabbed a hammer to defend herself and her home and was tased. She was hospitalized for five days and may have to undergo surgery for fluid on the brain.

Earlier this year a man was tased and beaten by police officers for asking John Kerry a question at a Q&A session at a Florida university while Kerry cracked jokes. Again the police department investigated itself and cleared the officers of doing anything wrong. And in West Memphis a police officer shot and killed a 12-year old boy while he ran past his police car.

On our own campus, undercover police officers try to catch students breaking the law, then threaten and interrogate us in our dorms, then offer us plea-bargains where we escape punishment by ratting on our friends (an old New England tactic, going back to Ye Merry Olde Witchcraft Trials in Salem and frequently employed by the likes of Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson and Joe McCarthy.)

It's time to face the facts: police forces are totally out of control, and private citizens do a better job than police at protecting their rights and property. During the LA riots in the mid 90's, (after Rodney King was beaten by police officers and a mostly white jury found them not guilty) the Korean shopkeepers and their then-legal semiautomatic weapons were the first to respond to the riots as they protected their homes and businesses on the second day of rioting. It was not until the fifth day that federal and state forces could launch a concerted effort to restore order.

It's time to face the facts: police forces are totally out of control, and private citizens do a better job than police at protecting their rights and property.

More recently, several New Orleans police officers joined in the looting in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina while Gretna, Miss. officers turned away people fleeing from the chaos at gunpoint.

Sadly, the police forces of this country are out of control. It has almost become routine to hear that an innocent citizen has been attacked in some fashion by the police – the people paid to "serve and protect." Some action must be taken before the incidents become more than isolated.

I do not know what should be done around the country, but I do know that one option is absolutely useless: creating oversight committees. Making more bureaucracy is like wanting to catch HIV/AIDS – an incurable disease that will bleed you dry. If a new bureaucracy is made to oversee anything, it quickly realizes that actually solving the problem will lead to its own demise, so it makes recommendations that don't do anything or maybe even hinder the problem in question. When the problem remains or is worse at the end of the fiscal year, the bureaucrats ask for more money and generally get it, then they hire more bureaucrats and the cycle continues.

Again, I do not have any ideas nation-wide (I would venture that the violence is a result of backfiring training, but I don't know), but here at UMass I have a suggestion: privatize the police department.

Police departments essentially constitute a service industry and so it is vital that police be responsive to consumers (like any business), but a central police department cannot be responsive to the actual consumers of the service – students. It responds to the administration that hires it. Because once the student pays the university, the university owns that money and becomes the consumer of the police service. So instead of a university monopoly on police protection, competition should be legalized and the students could hire their own security.

It's a simple step to go from ADT alerting police to ADT being the police.

Matt Robare is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mrobare@student.umass.edu

NOV 19 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Quirky Canadian twins to perform at Calvin

Tegan and Sara will showcase newest CD

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tegan and Sara, identical twins from Canada, will be headlining at the Calvin Theater as part of their fall North America tour to promote the release of their newest CD, "The Con." This fifth recording for the duo stays true to their original sound, making use of the easily distinguishable voices of the sisters, as well as interesting instrumentals.

"I'll take the blame for naming the [CD] 'The Con,'" Tegan said in a recent blog entry on the group's Web site. "I felt feel like a con from time to time. It was my attempt at suggesting that perhaps we all...have different sides."

The sisters showcased their many talents on "The Con," with all original tracks full of impressive lyrics and instrumental ideas. The songs on the new album have enough of the group's familiar sound to keep their fans happy, but each track is different enough to avoid redundancy. Each song is a chapter of the album, rather than a track number, giving the album a storybook feel.

Tegan and Sara got the idea for this unique CD design from their set director, Emily Storey.

"We saw the album as a story," Tegan said. "All the songs were recorded in sequence when possible so it felt like a novel, in a way, as we worked our way through it."

The format also could reflect Tegan's other interests. "I'm very interested in writing a book," she said. "Being a published author would be really cool."

For now, Tegan and Sara are sticking with their original passion. They began making music when they were 15 years old. Together, they formed the punk rock band Plunk. According to the sisters on their Web site, they were, "kind of wussy punk [no drums or bass], and we were really bad."

Plunk evolved into Sara and Tegan, under which they won a Canadian garage band contest in 1998.

From their winnings, they recorded their first three demo tapes, "Red," "Yellow" and "Orange," and their first independent album, "Under Feet Like Ours." This was later re-released under the current band name of Tegan and Sara.

Since being signed to an official label, Tegan and Sara have released four albums and two DVDs and have been nominated for a number of awards, including the YTV Achievement Award and the Western Canadian Music Awards, both of which they've won. They have scored magazine covers and TV appearances, including on the Late Show with David Letterman, and their songs have been featured on the soundtracks to many popular television shows and movies, from "Grey's Anatomy" to "Monster-in-Law." They have opened for artists like the Killers, Weezer and Neil Young and have headlined tours throughout North America.

These experiences gave the sisters time to grow musically.

"I think we're older, more mature, more confident and more seasoned. I find it easier to relate and translate these days," said Tegan.

Now that Tegan and Sara are veteran performers, they have their own superstitions and rituals before each of the shows they headline. "We have 10 minutes of band quiet time. No guests back stage. Then we dance side stage to one song before we go on," Tegan said.

Touring with the twins are a group of three friends from Long Island, New York. They call themselves Northern State, and they released their third album, "Can I Keep This Pen?" this past August. For seven years, Sprout, Hesta Prynn and Spero, the girls of Northern State, have entertained with a rap/hip-hop style, with some rock 'n' roll thrown in for good measure.

Northern State has shared the stage in the United States and Europe with acts like the Roots, Le Tigre, Talib Kweli, De La Soul, The Gossip, Gym Class Heroes and Cake. They seem to be following in the same vein as their headliner – "Better Already," a song about the trio's friendship off of their August release, was played on a recent episode of "Grey's Anatomy."

The collaboration of these two groups of quirky women has proved successful throughout the tour. Most of the dates listed on the Tegan and Sara Web site are sold out. After Dec. 6, when they wrap up their U.S. tour in Berkeley, Calif., Tegan and Sara will move on to Australia and other locations across the globe. Many of these shows are sold out also, a testament to the twins' global fame.

The talents of Tegan and Sara and Northern State can be seen on the Calvin Theater stage at 8 p.m. on Tuesday, Nov. 20. Tickets are $25.

Stephanie McPherson can be reached at smcpherson@student.umass.edu.

Identical twins Tegan and Sara will showcase their newest CD release "The Con" on Tuesday night at the Calvin Theater. They got their start in a garage band contest and are now headlining a national tour.

TEGAN AND SARA

NOVEMBER 20

CALVIN THEATER

$25

Murphy promises laughs, discusses career

BY PETER RIZZO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Depending on your taste for world of pop culture, you may know the comedian Charlie Murphy for different reasons. Some might recognize him as the brother of the actor and comedian Eddie Murphy. Others may know him from his integral role on one of the decade's best and most missed sketch comedy series', "Chappelle's Show."

As an actor, Murphy rose to the height of his popularity carrying some of the latter show's most infamous skits, most notably, his star-making recounts of his misadventures with celebrities in "Charlie Murphy's True Hollywood Stories." Among those stories chronicled were his fights with Rick James and a basketball game against flamboyant pop star Prince.

Fame was not instantaneous for Murphy, as he toiled for years in the Hollywood underground prior to "Chappelle's Show." He gained headway in the business by playing parts in major movies, including Spike Lee's early works "Jungle Fever" and "Mo' Better Blues." He also appeared in the cult classic "CB4" with Chris Rock.

Any indication that Murphy rose to fame on the shoulders of those stars is instantly dismissed upon starting a conversation with the actor. It would have been easy to write off Murphy for the image he portrays on TV. However, in person he is adept at playing the character that made him a star – himself.

Charlie Murphy has successfully made a name for himself in comedy through "Chappelle's Show" and his own stand-up tour.

In conversation, Murphy's disposition is not very different from that of his TV persona. Throughout the interview he remained relaxed and genial, giving good-natured answers to questions and punctuating his jokes with laughter that seemed genuine. And despite the fact that he was on a street corner in Colorado, Murphy still found time for an interview.

When asked about his childhood, living in a house that spawned two comedy stars, he talked of how he was "perplexed" by the question and the idea that people seem to believe his childhood was similar to the lives of the kids on "The Cosby Show."

He was quick to turn the question into his own brand of humor, saying he and Eddie "weren't at home swinging on trapeze all day." He said there was nothing out of the ordinary about their youth.

Murphy is no stranger to being among larger-than-life personas and the relationships that exist between the average Joe and the stars. He recounted a story where he sat beside Kareem Abdul Jahbar on an airplane, and the Lakers basketball star sat with his head down the entire time. Murphy described his attitude as one that said to everyone "just leave me alone."

This same scenario has happened to Murphy with increasing regularity ever since he became somewhat of a cult icon. He said "people don't get the wrong impression" of him from TV, but that sometimes people's expectations of him differ.

When people come up and they're excited to see you, misunderstandings can happen, Murphy explained. He said the biggest thing people ask him is "why he isn't smiling." He described his reply as "no reason to smile. I'm not your bobble head doll."

Over the course of the interview, Murphy never missed a beat. The actor is used to being asked about the stars and his answers to questions about Eddie Murphy and Dave Chappelle were far from thorough, but were funny and personal.

What he would say about the show and the tales that made him famous was that they are "99.9%" true, and that "the rest is just acting."

[My jokes]," he said, "are based on truth, and that's what [my audience] relates to."

Murphy guaranteed a good time full of laughs at his upcoming show, and when asked what people can expect, the actor joked, "people don't come to see me to see a basketball game, they come to laugh."

He was also quick to promote one of his many upcoming projects, the movie "The Perfect Holiday." The film puts the actor alongside such Hollywood heavyweights as Queen Latifah and Terrence Howard in a warm-hearted Christmas tale.

The actor is bringing his comedic skills to the Hu Ke Lau in Chicopee on Nov. 24. Doors open for the event at 5:30 p.m. and the show starts at 7 p.m. Anyone under 21 who is hoping to see the actor will have to wait, as the Hu Ke Lau is 21+. Tickets are $30 and can be purchased online through the restaurant's Web site.

Peter Rizzo can be reached at prizzo@student.umass.edu.

CHARLIE MURPHY

NOVEMBER 24

HU KE LAU

21+

$30

Nothing 'spectacular' on MGMT release

BY EMMA REED
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

MGMT's full-length debut "Oracular Spectacular" (Columbia 2007) has haunting melodies and psychedelic synthesizers that put rock 'n' roll jokesters Andrew VanWyngarden and Ben Goldwasser into the acclaimed world of disco-electronock. "Oracular Spectacular" resembles something straight from the soundtrack of an LSD-based indie flick. With the help of Flaming Lips producer Dave Fridmann MGMT, commonly known as Management, has taken the over-used and quite frankly repetitive genre of electronic pop/rock and given it a jump start.

Duo VanWyngarden and Goldwasser have accepted their status as satirical pioneers within the music business. The duo's aloof attitude about the Hollywood life and music in general is the driving force behind this album.

The album's opening track "Time to Pretend" (which is also the title track of the bands debut EP) sets listeners up for a bumpy ride through the cluttered minds of VanWyngarden and Gosward. "Time to Pretend" presents sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll in one line: "Shoot some heroine, f with the stars." But an explosive start is muffled as the album progresses.

The Brooklyn based MGMT tries and fails to create a compelling innovative album. Following the opening (and by far the best) track on the album is "Weekend Wars." The track is a failed attempt to recreate David Bowie in robotic form. "Electric Feel" and "Kids" provide a break from the redium of "Oracular Spectacular," with disco-like sounds and beats perfect for dancing, and, yes, strutting.

Putting aside the repetitive nature behind "Oracular Spectacular," points are awarded to MGMT for courage. Each song on the album is flooded with critical rhetoric. "The Youth" begins with "This is a call to arms to live, and love, and sleep together," and flows through subtle electronic breakdowns. Each song touches on topics generally not mentioned within this "genre." "Of Moons, Birds and Monsters" provides an edge to the album with Led Zeppelin-style guitar breakdowns and lyrics ("Cold black shadow, are you mad at your walls?").

"Oracular Spectacular" is an example of cross pollination within music, adopting sounds from bands like the Bee Gees, the Gorillaz, David Bowie during the "Ziggy Stardust" days, and DJ Montreal (who the band is touring with later this year). The album's combination of synthesizers and natural drum beats and guitar riffs pack a mean punch. Seriously, it is mean the way each song travels out through the speakers, enters your ears and lulls you to sleep. There is a monotony that lingers within this album. "Piece of What" and "The Handshake" resemble each other in such a way that it is hard to distinguish between the two.

Although there is a lack of distinguishable qualities in the songs of this album, the raw provocation of the lyrics acts as a wake-up call. "Oracular Spectacular" – innovative? Yes. Powerful and exciting? No. Psychedelia and experimentation reign over "Oracular Spectacular" and solidity is lost because of it.

Emma Reed can be reached at egreed@student.umass.edu

ORACULAR SPECTACULAR

MGMT

COLUMBIA RECORDS

2/5

Teams thrive at BU

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams competed in their first invitational-style meet of the season this weekend at the Terrier Invitational at Boston University. The Minutewomen finished fourth out of nine teams with a final point total of 449. The Minutemen won the invitational with 1216 total points.

The women's team placed fourth without a first-place finish in any event in the finals. Junior Christa Narus had the best overall performance in the meet, according to women's coach Bob Newcomb.

Narus finished first in her heat in the 100-yard butterfly event. In the finals, Narus finished with a time of 57.76 seconds, breaking her own school record by almost a full second. Coming into this weekend, Narus was ranked fourth in the Atlantic 10 Conference in the 100-yard butterfly. She was also ranked third in the 200-yard fly. Narus placed second in the finals in that event as well.

Sophomore Kathryne Chaliklis placed fifth in the 50-yard freestyle event, earning the Maroon and White 14 points. Senior captain Allison Volpe and junior Cecelia Jenkins also earned points in that race, finishing in ninth and 10th place, respectively. Jenkins made the finals after winning a swim-off that broke a tie between her and two other swimmers in the preliminary race.

Freshman Jessica Starosielec led all Minutewomen in the 100-yard breaststroke event with a fifth-place finish.

Despite disqualifications in the 200-yard freestyle and 200-yard medley relays, Newcomb was pleased with the effort exerted by his swimmers at this juncture in the season.

"Top to bottom, I think that we had an outstanding weekend," Newcomb said. "I think that it really bodes well for the rest of the season."

Newcomb believes the disqualifications are something his swimmers will eliminate by the end of the season.

"You have things like that that happen in November and you learn from them so that they don't happen in February," Newcomb said.

On the boards, junior Karen Upperco led all Minutewomen divers with second place finishes in both the one and three-meter dives, earning 34 points for the Maroon and White.

Last season, the Minutemen beat the Terriers and Holy Cross to win the invitational with 1,324 total points on the weekend. UMass came into the weekend with swimmers in the top five in the conference in many events.

Coming into this meet, junior Nate Bromage led the conference in the 100-yard butterfly event. Sophomore Michael Berthiaume and senior captain Zack Priest held third and fourth place in the conference in the same event, respectively.

Bromage swept in the 100-yard butterfly, taking first place in both the preliminary and final events. Berthiaume and Priest were right behind Bromage, finishing second and third, respectively.

Senior co-captain A.J. Vozella also contributed to the win for UMass. In the 200-yard freestyle, Vozella took first place in the preliminary race and third place in the finals.

Sophomore Juan Moliere went one-two with Vozella in the preliminary race for the men's 100-yard freestyle event. Moliere won in the finals, while Vozella took fourth place.

Freshman Brian Schmidt swept in the 100 and 200-yard breaststroke events while Berthaume notched one more individual first-place finish for the Minutemen with a win in the 200-yard butterfly.

The Maroon and White also dominated the relay events. Bromage, Vozella, Moliere and sophomore Trevor Zeigler combined to win the 200-yard freestyle relay, earning the team 40 points. UMass took first and second place in the 400-yard medley relay event, earning 74 points. The Minuteman also took the 200-yard medley relay.

UMass capped its win with a close victory in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

Senior co-captain R.J. Rappe again led all Minutemen divers in each event. Rappe took second place in both the one and three-meter dives. He earned 34 points for his efforts.

Both UMass teams will compete next at home, with the Minutemen competing in the intrasquad Maroon vs. White Pentathalon and the Minutewomen competing in a dual meet against Northeastern. Divers from both teams will compete on the same day at the Galbraith Diving Invitational in New Brunswick, N.J.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

UM Claims A-10 title

M. SOCCER from page 1

The Minutemen scored their first goal in the 31st minute in a usual fashion. Charlotte goalkeeper David Martin attempted to clear a UMass free kick from a 49-yard foul just outside the 18-yard box. Forward Mark DeSantis blocked Martin's attempted clearance, which then deflected off the back of a Charlotte defender into the goal.

Junior forward Prince Oliosi added another goal with 15 minutes left in the second half. Forward Michael Jejna headed a rebound toward the net from inside the 18-yard box, after a shot by freshman Ben Arikian hit the crossbar. Jejna's header looked to be going in the net, but Oliosi was in position to authoritatively make sure the ball crossed the plane.

"[Prince] has had a nagging injury that's really slowed him down," Koch said. "For him to score, it was great. He had a nice goal last week at Saint Joseph's. He's been able to help us even when he's not at 100 percent."

Against Rhode Island Saturday, the Maroon and White needed only a single goal behind the team's overall strong defensive effort. Though UMass was outshot 24 to 5, the team's defense focused on limiting the dangerousness of each scoring chance.

"Zack [Simmons] made two unbelievable saves to keep us in the game," Koch said. "But give credit to the back four and the midfield. A lot of the shots were from 40 to 50 yards out, so those were easy saves for Zack to make."

One of the Minutemen's offensive strengths this season has been the ability to score off set pieces. In the third minute of the second half, right back Doug Rappaport scored a rare unassisted corner kick goal.

The attempt skirted past Cook's head and missed everyone in front of the net. Since the UMass kicktakers bend the ball in a curve that starts toward the net, the attempt hit the ground and bounced sideways into the goal.

Despite the hard fought match with the Rams and the history between the two programs, Koch said his team had a group of special fans at yesterday's finale.

"The URI players were at the game rooting for us," he said. "And I thought that was a class act. It was nice for them to support us even though they wanted badly to win the 'A-10 title'."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Playoffs next for Minutemen

FOOTBALL from page 8

automatic bid.

The Spiders made it into the 16-team bracket anyway, and were given a home game in the first round of the playoffs. Richmond will host Ohio Valley Conference Champion Eastern Kentucky.

The winner of UMass-Fordham will play the winner of fourth-seeded Southern Illinois against Eastern Illinois.

Of the 16 Football Championship Subdivision teams that will play for the NCAA Championship, five are members of the CAA. UMass, Richmond, Delaware, James Madison and New Hampshire will extend their season this weekend.

New Hampshire (7-4, 4-4 CAA) surprised many by getting into the tournament with just seven wins.

"I was really surprised that New Hampshire got in with a 4-4 conference record," UMass coach Don Brown said. "They made some crazy things happened down the stretch, and they did have that [1 IAA] win over Marshall, but to be candid I was very surprised that an at-large team could get in with seven wins."

Brown said the fact that the tournament is so CAA-heavy this year shows how much respect the conference has gained for the quality of its football.

"I think it does speak volumes about how good our conference is and the type of football that we've played over the last few years," Brown said.

Although Fordham is an annual Atlantic 10 rival of UMass in most sports, the schools have never met on a football field. Regardless, Brown was impressed with the turnaround new coach Tom Masella has conducted.

"Obviously, they struggled a year ago, but coach Masella has done a nice job of turning their program around," Brown said. "They're very skilled at quarterback [John Skelton]. He's a big guy, 6-6, 220 [pounds]. They're skilled at running back, not a big guy, but quick and agile. Defensively they've been pretty solid."

The Rams share common opponents Colgate and Holy Cross – both Patriot League members – with UMass. Both teams finished 2-1 against the common opponents.

Fordham was undefeated in its conference until the final week of the season, a 38-24 loss to Bucknell.

"Obviously they're a quality football team," Brown said. "They wrapped up the Patriot League early, so we know we're going to have our hands full with a good football team."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jcrice@student.umass.edu

UMass handles BC

HOCKEY from page 8

and located Mike Kostka slowly pinching forward into the slot. No BC defenders noticed the UMass captain, and Ortiz fired it in front of the net where Kostka one-timed it past Muse.

BC's goal also came on the power play. Freshman Joe Whitney held the puck at the left point. UMass's defenseman tried to clear the area in front of Dainton to prevent a screen, but Whitney got his seam quickly. Nathan Gerbe quickly moved from behind the left face-off circle to the left of the crease. Whitney quickly nailed the puck over to him and he banged it past Dainton. The Eagles appeared to have doubled their lead later in the period, but the net slid off its moorings before the puck crossed the line.

The 7,319 in attendance witnessed a battle of two of college hockey's premier young goaltenders. The game went to overtime where each net minder made three saves to preserve the 1-1 draw. Both coaches praised the work of the young goaltenders after Friday's matchup.

Dainton kept the Minutemen in the game in the third period. BC outshot the Minutemen 14-6, but Dainton kept the game tied to force overtime.

Joe Melanie can be reached at jmelanie@student.umass.edu

UMass goaltender Paul Dainton made 30 saves in Saturday's victory over Boston College, including 13 in the final period. Dainton has started all but one game this season for the Minutemen and has a 4-2-4 record.

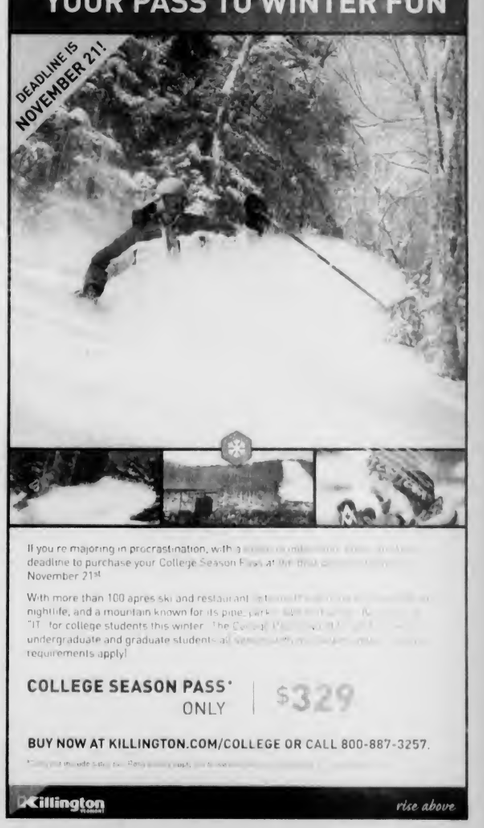
Frequent ties concern coaches

OVERTIME from page 8

teams take turns attempting penalty shots, but that seems to be the least popular option among players and coaches alike.

"I like when we're in playoffs and we play until there's a winner," Cahoon said. "But it's pretty difficult to play a 40-game schedule and play until there's a winner at a pace like that. You're probably putting guys in a position where they could get hurt because of fatigue."

"I shiver at the thought that you could have a shootout to decide the winner," York said.



Cahoon is not alone when it comes to indecision on games with no decision. His players, however, seem a little surer of how they'd like to finish their games.

"I don't like shootouts, personally," said defenseman and captain Mike Kostka. "I don't think it's a fair way to decide a game. I like 4-on-4 in overtime, even 3-on-3. I think if you just narrowed the numbers down, I know in the NHL they do that, it creates more opportunities. But at the same time you're testing the whole game and not so much just testing someone's shootout ability."

UMass goaltender Paul Dainton agreed with Kostka.

"If it came down to a shootout, so be it. I love shootouts," Dainton said. "I'd much rather have a 4-on-4 or 3-on-3. It's a lot more exciting and there's a lot more [scoring] chances."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jcrice@student.umass.edu

Mills dominant in loss to NU

Senior forward scores 28, but UMass drops game to Huskies

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The twenty-eight points from Kate Mills weren't enough to propel the Massachusetts women's basketball team past Northeastern Saturday afternoon.

The Huskies (2-1) went 11-of-20 from three-point range and also had four players with at least 15 points in their 86-81 victory.

"When you're giving up 55 percent shooting from the three, we've got significant problems defensively that we need to step up and recognize," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

The Minutewomen head to Greenville, N.C. this weekend to take on Jacksonville Friday and either East Carolina or Winthrop Saturday in the East Carolina Lady Pirate Invitational.

NU Guard Ashlee Feldman and forward Kendra Walton combined to go 9-of-12 from beyond the arc and combined for 40 points. Walton also had a game-high 12 rebounds and three steals. Dacko said she scouted these players before the game, and was displeased with how they were defended.

UMass	81
NU	86

Freshman Teya Wright had her first big collegiate game for the Minutewomen (2-1). She scored 11 points and pulled down nine rebounds, and was 3-of-3 from the field and 5-of-6 from the free throw line. Dacko liked what she saw from Wright and continues to hope her game progresses.

Kate Mills tied her career high with 28 points, was an efficient 13-of-19 from the field and added four rebounds.

"There were still many opportunities for us to get the ball into her more," Dacko said, "but Kate is a very good shooter, and we have very good shooters, but the minute they hesitate they shouldn't shoot the ball. If they hesitate, they're not confident going in."

The offense was in sync for the Minutewomen all game – they shot 50 percent in the first half and 58.8 percent in the second half, but the three-pointers were the difference. UMass hit 2-of-10 beyond the arc, including a combined 1-of-7 from Kim Benton and Stefanie Gerardot, two of their most reliable outside shooters.

The Minutewomen also outrebounded the Huskies, 37-29. However Dacko is still looking for more rebounds from Mills and Whitney McDonald, her starting power forward and center, respectively. Mills grabbed four boards and McDonald didn't get any in her 10 minutes of game action.

"I'd like to see them both average about seven or eight rebounds a game," Dacko said. "We've got to make up for the loss of Tamara Tatham, and we haven't done that yet."

Tatham averaged nine rebounds per game last year before graduating and moving on to play professionally in Finland.

Point guard Sakera Young picked up two quick fouls less than three minutes into the game, and this was problematic for the Minutewomen because Northeastern's Lucia Pablos could slash and shoot from the outside, and Young is a good defender. She also picked up her third foul late in the opening half.

In the first half, the Minutewomen went down by as many as 12 before cutting it to eight by halftime. They trailed by as many as 16 in the second half, and were unable to play from behind and win the game.

"It's tough because we never got over the hump," Dacko said. "We cut it and then we could never tie them."

Dacko was also unhappy that her team missed a lot of layups, even though they shot 55 percent. Missed layups has been a problem for UMass early this year.

In addition to Mills, Pam Rosanio and Alisha Tatham both scored in double figures for the Minutewomen. Rosanio scored 13 points and Tatham did one better, tying her personal best with 14. Both joined four other teammates with four rebounds, and this was good for second on the team behind Wright.

Michael Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

Senior Pam Rosanio scored 13 points for the Minutewomen in the 86–81 loss to Northeastern Saturday. Her close friend, Ashlee Feldman, scored 21 points on 5-of-7 shooting from the 3-point line for the Huskies.

DeRosa, runners end season strong

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts cross country teams competed this weekend at Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y., in their final meets of the season.

The men took fifth place at the IC4A Meet and the women placed eighth at the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championship Meet.

The Minutemen were paced by the consistent effort of sophomore Andy McCann, who took 13th place overall in a field of 15 teams. The men improved greatly from their 11th place finish in last year's competition. Six out of the seven competing Minutemen finished ahead of half of the field of 148 runners.

Freshman standout Jeff Hill finished second on the team to McCann with a 15th place overall finish. The rest of the top five were all younger runners as well. Sophomore Nicolai Naranjo capped off his second season with a 26th-place finish. Regnier finished fourth on the team and 45th overall. Freshman Kris Carle brought up the tail-end of the top five UMass runners, finishing in 62nd place.

Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien noted that the fifth place finish was particularly impressive for his runners because of the relative inexperience of the team and the ability of the freshmen and sophomores to step up and perform when it counts the most in a season.

"I think that it's a real credit to [the returning runners] and the younger kids on the team in the way that they responded because when you're a freshman or sophomore, you don't have a lot of experience to draw on," O'Brien said. "I thought that the tribute goes to the fact that the younger kids on the team responded very well. We had three great leaders this year in Ryan Durkin, Jesse Regnier and Joe Czupryna."

As a co-captain, Durkin provided invaluable leadership for the younger runners on the team. Durkin missed his entire senior season this year due to mononucleosis. Czupryna, the other senior on the team, missed the last half of the season due to the same illness.

Freshman Kevin Johnson won the Coach's Race, with a finishing time of 26 minutes, 29 seconds.

The Minutewomen also improved from last year's 12th place team finish in the final meet of the season.

The Maroon and White returned three runners from last year's top five team finishers at this race. However, only one of them competed this weekend.

The women's team was again led by senior captain Christina DeRosa. Second on the team with a 27th-place overall finish was redshirt freshman Shiyi Zan. Zan began the year coming back from a leg injury which caused her to miss her entire freshman season but worked to become one of the team's most reliable runners. Third on the team, finishing 40th, was freshman Lauren Stocker. Rounding out the top five for the Minutewomen were junior Beth Harlow (71st) and freshman Kristin Darling (74th).

DeRosa finishes her collegiate cross country career having finished first on the team in every race that she participated in as a member of the Maroon and White.

Women's coach Julie LaFreniere is confident that the team is ready to start the post-DeRosa era with a strong crop of runners led by Zan, Stocker and Harlow.

"She will show you what hard work will get you," LaFreniere said of DeRosa. "It's not easy to replace an athlete like Christina DeRosa but I think that I can see the excitement in the eyes of the underclassmen [to follow DeRosa's lead]."

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

Brower lights it up from deep in win

M. BASKETBALL from page 8

"Tonight was as close to how I want to play that we've played thus far," Ford said. "Not that we're there yet, but the pace of the game was there."

On the defensive end, the Minutemen successfully kept scoring threat Mike Schachtner in check during the second half. The senior scored only five points in that half, after scoring 15 in the first.

Ford knew he was a concern heading into the game and designed a portion of his game plan to neutralize the forward.

"We wanted to go at Schachtner immediately to hopefully draw a quick one or two fouls early with some one-on-one [offense directed at Schachtner]," Ford said.

Ford was also pleased with the effort of Etienne Brower, whose 25 points and eight rebounds were both game highs.

"I've said all along that I could play with five Etienne Browers," Ford said. "He just does everything well."

And what he did very well Saturday was shoot the 3-pointer. He attempted 10 shots from beyond the arc, only missing three.

Brower's success on offense was indicative of the team in general, as the Minutemen made 47 percent of their 3-pointers.

Coming into the game, it looked like the absence of point guard Chris Lowe might be an issue for UMass. But Forbes and freshman Gary Correia split time at the point, while Forbes ran the offense for most of the contest.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Forbes displays offensive versatility

BY ELI ROSENSWAIG
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts basketball coach Travis Ford describes starting point guard Chris Lowe as, "the fastest point guard in the country, from end-to-end."

With that in mind, the Minutemen could have severely struggled running the up-tempo offense in his absence – Lowe did not play with an injured ankle against a good Wisconsin-Green Bay team Saturday night.

But senior captain Gary Forbes wouldn't let that happen. Playing in front of his father for the first time in college, Forbes moved from his normal perch as the starting forward to run the point without Lowe in the lineup.

The most impressive part of his performance running the offense wasn't the seven assists. It wasn't the seven rebounds, three blocks and two steals. And it wasn't even the 25 points he scored on impressive shooting (9-of-16 overall, including 4-of-7 from 3-point range).

It was the fact that, despite having the responsibility of being a point guard on an up-tempo offense, he also did the things that make him a terrific forward. He still shouldered the scoring load and helped out with rebounding in addition to his duties as the point guard.

After filling up the stat sheet, Forbes walked into the press conference and was immediately razzed by teammate Tony Gaffney.

"I mean, 25 [points], seven [rebounds] and seven [assists] is good, but we need that triple double," Gaffney joked.

"You need to represent your man Stephane [Lasme]," Gaffney added, referring to the four triple-doubles Forbes' teammate from last year recorded.

Although Forbes had perhaps his best all-around game as a member of the Minutemen, he did have some struggles. He turned the ball over four times, and it could have been at least three more had the ball not bounced favorably when Forbes was stripped and on errant passes.

But considering how fast they play on offense, the 6-foot-7 forward-guard did a solid job managing the game. So much so, that Gaffney changes his tune a little bit when talking with reporters.

"Gary did an unbelievable job filling in that role tonight," he said. "It's tough when you lose someone like Chris Lowe, because he runs our team. But Gary did a great job running our team."

Ford was equally impressed with how well Forbes handled himself as the floor general, especially considering the circumstances.

"Gary was great tonight; I don't know if you guys know, tonight was the first college game his father has ever seen him play," Ford said. "It was special for him; I think he played a little more focused; harder. Sometimes it can go both ways, you can press a little bit. I was really excited he played well.

"And I think his mentality changes a little bit when he goes to the point," he added. "He does look to get other guys involved a little bit more. He's big, he really zips his passes, and he really finds open people when he wants to. He's a great creator."

When Forbes was on the floor, the Minutemen outscored the Phoenix by 23 points. While he was getting a breather, UMass was outscored 12-4. And when the Maroon and White needed a lift, Forbes delivered, hitting big shots and finding the open man.

His back-to-back 3-pointers late in the first half from well beyond the arc effectively ended any hope for the Phoenix to come back. Forbes mixed in his low-post game and also penetrated into the lane, sometimes driving for the lay-up while other times looking for open teammates.

"When any one of our teammates go down, we have to play a lot better," Forbes said. "Someone has to pick up on cheering on the bench, or someone has to pick up rebounds. Today I had to play a lot of point guard."

And he played it pretty well.

Eli Rosenswaig can be reached at erosenswa@student.umass.edu.

Senior captain Gary Forbes had his best all-around game for UMass this season, filling in for injured starting point guard Chris Lowe.

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

IN DECIDING WHICH LAW SCHOOL TO ATTEND,
CONSIDER THIS:
Quinnipiac University School of Law ranks among the top 100 law schools in such categories as full-time student LSAT scores (median – 158); admission acceptance rates; student/faculty ratio (13:1); and employment rates after graduation. Not to mention, we offer merit scholarships ranging from $3,000 to full tuition. Before you decide which school to attend, make sure you review the facts. To learn more, visit law.quinnipiac.edu, email ladm@quinnipiac.edu or call 1-800-462-1944.
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW
LAW.QUINNIPIAC.EDU | HAMDEN, CONNECTICUT

Domino's Pizza
AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am -3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 593-9500
MY WINGS OR CHICKEN KICKERS
10 Buffalo Wings Plus Cheesy Bread $9.99
THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items $9.99
PIZZA & CHICKEN
Medium 1 Topping Pizza $12.99 | Large $15.99
555/777 DEAL
Three 1-Topping Pizzas Medium $15.55 | Large $17.77
SALAD & BREAD
Any Large Salad, Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water $7.99
FAMILY MEAL DEAL
1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Bread & an Order of Buffalo Wings $18.99
Dine-In Only Extra - Lunchtime Time Offer
WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

FAX A PHOTO OF YOURSELF WITH YOUR COMPLETED SUDOKU OR CROSSWORD AND SEE YOURSELF ON THE COMICS PAGE
COLLEGIANCOMICS@YAHOO

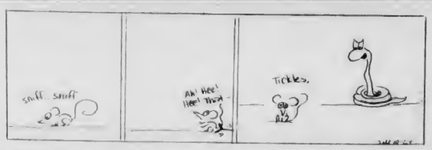
For people with too much free time.

			8	1
		5	7			6	8
		2				3	7
5				4	3			7
3								2
7			6	9				4
	3	8				1
	9	6			1	7
					6	4

ACROSS
1 Totally swamp
7 ___ Cruces, NM
10 Golfers' norms
14 Metcalf or Anderson
15 Be obligated
16 Hydrox rival
17 Put on for show
18 "Oedipus ___"
19 Hourglass contents
20 Wine choice
21 Changes one's residence
23 Harring's kin
25 Chum
26 Male progeny
27 Mighty long time
28 Change to fit
30 Brought to heel
34 Sumo
37 Judd Hirsch sitcom
38 "The Faerie Queene" author
39 Frustrates
41 Holm oak
42 Of the pelvis
44 Rock bottom
46 Art medium
47 Lennon's love
48 Acoustic organ
50 Golfer's peg
51 Aardvark munchies
52 Hatallul objects
56 Mineral deposit
57 Rani's garment
58 Actor Lindan
59 "Respect" singer Franklin
62 Chip in chips
63 European peak
64 Breathed in short gasps
65 Satisfies a debt
66 Arthur or Lillie
67 Goes into

DOWN
1 RRs on trestles
2 Journalist Hantoft
3 Promised
4 Incited
5 Told a whopper
6 Govt. agent
7 Rhyne terpgrass
8 Leaves slack-jawed
9 Genders
10 After birth
11 Caspian's neighbor
12 Actress Russo
13 Lays turf
21 Dilapidated dwelling
22 Little tyke
23 Becomes arerancrhad
24 Funters
25 Layars
28 Smith and Gora
29 Makes another attempt
31 Puppet with strings attached
32 Still existing
33 '70s nightclubs
35 Worries
36 Gives off bright light
40 Humor
43 Indian bean tree
45 Yay, saam!
49 Ford Clinic: e g
51 Looks everything
52 Rush letters
53 Anna Sten bio
54 Boneman
55 Manly
56 Agenian port
59 Siman
60 Thai girl
61 Circulars, briefly

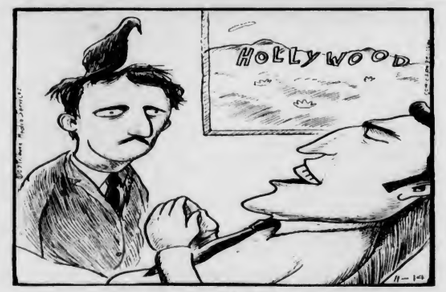
Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM



Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I'm so horny the crack of dawn better watch out."
-Tom Waits



ECOLOGY BY JEN FILL

LAST DITCH EFFORT BY JOHN KROES

THE QUIGMANS BY BUDDY HICKERSON

"I read your treatment, Mr. Poe. The pendulum I get, but you lose me on the pit."

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Whistling while you work is not cute during a test; it's simply annoying.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Your car is fast and furious. You are the Wizard of Noz.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Betty Ford would be very disappointed in your actions this weekend.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Give thanks that your teachers don't really care if you leave three days early.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
The great irony of Alanis Morissette's life: she got freaky with Joey Gladstone.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
You will trip over your own feet but land face down in a pile of Sacajawea dollars.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You're so smooth that when silk was a little kid, he wanted to be just like you.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
The majority of American's feel that democracy is dead.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Trip the light fantastic with a graceful and scantily clad exotic dancer.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Your tendency towards distraction is...Oh, hi Katie, wanna hang out and grope?

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
You're so damn cliquey, you could be a metronome.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
I'm still on strike; I will not back down until my demands are met.

Motivational, comics-themed thought of the day:

When push comes to shove,
Comics rise above.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Montreal weekend from $99.00 complete motel, transportation and more. Montreal Express.net 781-979-9001. Lowest prices on campus.

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing. 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

HOUSING

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birthcontrol, EC, pregnancy testing. GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing. STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins wecome. www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/ Reservations. 800-648-4849/ www.ststravel.com.

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

NOV 19 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Looking forward to Fordham

The Massachusetts football team looks on alongside coach Don Brown during yesterday's NCAA FCS Playoff selection show. The Minutemen will host the Fordham Rams noon Saturday at McGuirk Stadium in the first round of the playoffs.

After claiming share of CAA title, UMass preps for playoffs

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

A day after knocking off Hofstra to claim a share of the Colonial Athletic Association Championship, the Massachusetts football team knows where it will be in the first round of the NCAA playoffs.

UMass (9-2, 7-1 CAA) will host Fordham noon Saturday at McGuirk Stadium. The Rams finished 8-3 and claimed the Patriot League Championship with a 5-1 conference record, a year removed from a 3-8 overall record.

UMass	27
Hofstra	5

The Minutemen defeated the Pride, 27-5, in Hempstead, N.Y., Saturday. Liam Coen went 22-for-34 for 309 yards passing and four touchdowns in the victory. He also threw two interceptions.

Running back Matt Lawrence recorded his eighth 100-yard game this season with 101 yards on 25 carries. Lawrence finished his first regular season as a full-time starter with 1,306 yards and 13 touchdowns. He had 450 career yards entering the season.

UMass jumped out early with two first-half touchdowns passes. Coen hit each of his two favorite receivers this year. J.J. Moore reeled in a 7-yarder in the first quarter to put the Minutemen up, 7-0. Then, Rasheed Rancher caught a 35-yard bomb from Coen to give UMass a two-score lead. Hofstra would get a field goal before halftime, closing the gap to 14-3.

Coen hit Moore again in the fourth quarter with a 42-yard touchdown, capping a 72-yard drive that took just three plays to complete.

He added insurance with his fourth touchdown pass, this one to tight end Ian Jorgensen. But the extra point was blocked and Hofstra's DeWayne Whitaker returned it 99 yards for a two-point score, creating the unusual final score of 27-5.

UMass and Richmond finished with identical records and shared the first-ever CAA title. A conference call among the league's athletic directors (not including the AD's from UMass and Richmond) to determine who would receive the automatic bid to the tournament resulted in a stalemate, as the teams were determined indistinguishable. The Maroon and White won a coin flip and were awarded the

See FOOTBALL on page 5

Frequency of ties a hot topic of debate

Hockey East coaches, players looking for possible alternative

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team has failed to win six of its 11 games this season. Moreover, the Minutemen have won just three of eight Hockey East contests, and yet UMass is in second place in the conference.

It may not seem possible, but it is due to the Mass Attack's four ties this season. The Minutemen's overall record is actually 5-2-4, including a 3-1-4 ledger in Hockey East. Since ties count for one point in the conference standings (a win is two points), UMass has compiled 10 points in the standings.

Counting an overtime win over St. Lawrence during the opening weekend of the season, UMass has participated in five games that have gone to an extra frame. However, 10 overtime games in the conference have ended in a draw, which is 20 points attributed to ties in the league.

UMass, Boston College and UMass Lowell each have four ties. The River Hawks, at 6-3-4 in the conference, have tied more than half the Hockey East games they've played.

BC, which tied UMass, 1-1, Friday night, have five total ties, including one against North Dakota. After the game, BC coach Jerry York and UMass coach Don Cahoon seemed to agree that although they would like to see ties eliminated, neither coach is enticed by the possible alternatives.

"The NCAA is trying to figure out a way to solve these ties for next year," York said Friday after the game. "I still can't figure out how to do it. I don't like going to a 4-on-4 or shootouts. I don't know how to break ties, and you can't just keep playing because you'd be here forever."

Cahoon felt similarly, saying he would support finding an alternative to ending hockey games with an even score, but wasn't sold on any particular solution.

"In the game of hockey, you play for 65 minutes [in an overtime game], and I honestly think, if you want to settle it on a shootout, I don't think I like that part of it," Cahoon said.

The biggest concern with extending games is the risk of injury. As games get longer, players get more tired, lose focus and end up in dangerous situations. The fastest way to settle things is a shootout, where

See OVERTIME on page 5

BC can't solve Mass Attack

UM tops Eagles in Chestnut Hill after tying in Amherst

Senior captain Mike Kostka scored the only goal in Friday's 1-1 tie against Boston College. UMass topped BC Saturday, 3-2.

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Jordan Virtue scored the first goal of his collegiate career to cap a three-goal surge from the No. 14 Massachusetts hockey team in its 3-2 win over No. 11 Boston College Saturday night in Chestnut Hill. The Minutemen and the Eagles battled to a 1-1 tie in Amherst on Friday.

Senior defenseman David Leaderer and freshman forward James Marcou also scored in the second period. BC entered the frame with a 2-0 lead after Ben Smith and Matt Lombardi beat Paul Dainton in the first period.

UMass	1
BC	2
UMass	1
BC	1

Dainton held the Eagles scoreless the rest of the way, making 30 saves, including 13 in the third period. Dainton gave up three goals in the pair with BC after allowing three in each contest last weekend.

BC freshman John Muse was equally impressive in the games, stopping 63 UMass shots. Although it looked like 64, according to BC coach Jerry York. After the game, York commented that he saw on video that the puck did not cross the goal line. UMass's Leaderer took the shot from the left point and it found its way through a screen and over the right shoulder of Muse.

The goal was the first of the season for Leaderer; sophomore Justin Braun received credit for an assist on the play. Braun leads all UMass defenseman with seven points and is second overall behind Marcou's 10.

Just over three minutes after Leaderer's goal, Marcou took advantage of some sloppy play from BC in its own zone. He intercepted a clearing pass from an Eagle defender and skated in on Muse. He briefly hesitated before firing a shot past the glove of the BC goaltender.

The three UMass (5-2-4 3-1-4 Hockey East) goals came in a 6 minute, 13 second span, ending with Virtue's tally.

Scott Crowder held the puck behind the net and saw an open Virtue drifting into the slot in front of Muse. Crowder slid it to his teammate who one-timed it past Muse, giving UMass its first lead of the game.

The Minutemen scored their lone goal on a similar play Friday night. Sophomore forward Will Ortiz had the puck behind the BC goal with BC up 1-0 and the Minutemen on the power play.

Ortiz waited for a seam to open

See HOCKEY on page 5

Living behind the arc

Brower hits seven 3-pointers in Mullins Center drubbing

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

In the first half of Saturday night's game, the Massachusetts men's basketball team demonstrated its potential. The team ran and shot its way to a 93-78 victory over Wisconsin-Green Bay Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

The Minutemen executed its up-tempo offense to near perfection in the first half, while making just under 60 percent of its 3-pointers. With UMass's shooting percentage failing to keep pace with its first half number, it allowed Wisconsin-Green Bay back into the game. But at no point was the game in doubt for UMass; the team took advantage of its first-half lead and cruised to victory in the second half.

The Minutemen have an 11-day layoff before they travel to Syracuse to take on the Orange one week from Wednesday.

Against the Phoenix, the Minutemen used a strong defensive effort to excel on the offensive end. UMass succeeded at forcing turnovers in transition, scoring 21 points off changes of possession.

UMass	93
UWGB	78

"I thought our defense created a lot of our fast breaks," UMass coach Travis Lord said. "Our defense helped us to create some offense which we haven't been getting in the first four games."

In the few possessions when the Minutemen weren't sprinting up the court, forward Gary Forbes dominated on offense. The senior created offense from all parts of the court, scoring 18 in the first stanza. At times, he challenged defenders by launching 3-point shots, despite being closely guarded.

"Coach [Lord] told me that if I felt comfortable to just shoot the ball," Forbes said. "I felt like the team needed it and the crowd got into it."

Forbes also kept the Wisconsin-Green Bay defense off-guard by venturing into the paint to periodically post up players in the lane.

At one point late in the first half, the captain hit pull-up 3-pointers on consecutive possessions, both times right in front of his defender. The shots decidedly swung what little momentum the Phoenix had to the Maroon and White.

"We took a lot of steam out of them with the 3-point shot," Lord said. "When you make two or three in a row, it's very demoralizing."

The Minutemen's up-tempo offense didn't help Wisconsin-Green Bay's cause once things started to get moving for UMass.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 6

Ricky Harris scored 10 points Saturday night in the 93-78 victory over Wisconsin-Green Bay for the Minutemen at the Mullins Center. Harris ranks second on the team with 18.2 points per game.

GRATEFUL DEAD SYMPOSIUM HELD AT UM | PAGE 4

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

CLOUDY/RAIN : HI: 41 LO: 33 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 2007

Noho hospital advances technology

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton is now offering advanced imaging technology to help battle cancer.

Many people have heard of PET scans and CT scans, both used to find where cancer is growing in the body, among other things. Until recently, the scans were done at separate times by separate machines, but now, new technology allows the scans to be performed by one machine and creates a single image.

The PET scan is used to determine how the body is functioning while the CT scan provides an anatomic image of the body.

According to radiation oncologist Robert Stein, "Using PET-CT scanning means we can determine the exact location of cancerous tissue and also rule out the benign tissue. If we find a tumor is localized (i.e. not spread to other organs), we can treat it more aggressively."

Medical oncologist and medical director of the CDH Cancer Care Program George Bowers calls the ability to perform the PET-CT scan "a major advance for the organization and for the patients" served by the hospital and its physicians.

Radiologist David Rifkin noted that the process is more convenient for patients, who traditionally had to come in for the scans on different dates.

The machine is also larger, which allows for more flexibility when positioning larger patients, and will hopefully help those patients who experience claustrophobia.

Alan Calhoun, medical director at the University of Massachusetts Health Services, says a PET-CT scan is only used for special situations, not many of which are needed by college students. Calhoun says he's only had two patients who needed a PET-CT scan in the past year, both of whom were over 60 years old.

In addition to being used in cancer treatment, a PET-CT scan can also be useful in detecting neurological disorders and cardiac diseases, according to Caritas Imaging, the health system that runs some of the scans at Cooley Dickinson.

Ben Williams can be reached at bwilliam@student.umass.edu

UM hosts new tech. contest

By Danielle Kahn
Collegian Staff

A competition at the University of Massachusetts is now supporting business plans for new technology through financial grants that total between $50,000 and $85,000. Their goal is to raise it to as much as $100,000 by the end.

This is the third year of the competition known as the Technology Innovation Challenge (TIC). Two of its major funding supporters are the law firm of Wolf, Greenfield & Sacks and Saint-Gobain High-Performance Materials. Other sponsors are Artiman Ventures, Joseph Bohan, Forge Partners, LCC, Lyric and Candy Janszen, Scott Perry, Karen Lauter Utgoff Consulting, Michael Turnstall '82, Revolabs, Tom Gray '87, Tripp Peake, Bart Stuck and Mary-Jane Cross '66. It is supported by the Isenberg School of Management at UMass and is open to undergraduates, graduates and other alumni.

The competition was created by Michael F. Malone, Ronnie and Eugene Isenberg and Soren Bisgaard. They designed it to be a way for students to interact with faculty and external advisors to come up with a product and a business plan for its commercialization.

The competition consists of two parts. The first part is an Executive Summary Competition for the fall semester. This year, the judging will be held on Dec. 6 and four prizes will be awarded. The second phase is in the spring and will be held on May 5 next semester. More than $60,000 in prize money will be given out. Contestants don't

See TIC on page 2

UMass to host BU in NCAA Tournament opener

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

After winning this past weekend's Atlantic 10 Championship, the Massachusetts men's soccer team gathered at the Hangar Pub and Grill on University Drive in Amherst to watch the NCAA Division I selection show on ESPN News last night.

As A-10 Champions, the Minutemen were guaranteed an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament. The Minutemen were among the first teams named and will host Boston University Friday in the opening round. UMass has not played in the tournament since 2001, when it defeated Creighton in the first round before losing to St. John's.

"The last time we had to watch [the selection show], I hadn't even sat down when we were announced," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "I made sure I was sitting this time when they announced the first teams. I didn't know if it was going to be us or not, but it was and we're excited."

The winner of the game will take on the 32-team tournament's top seed Boston College. The Eagles defeated Wake Forest, 2-1, to capture the Atlantic Coast Conference Championship the same day UMass clinched the A-10 title.

The Minutemen hosted the Terriers earlier this season and defeated them, 1-0. The win was the first of a six-game winning streak.

"[Having already played it] I will certainly help us," Koch said. "The funny thing is that I talked to [BU coach] Neil Roberts earlier today. I told him to let me know if he could help me with any scouting."

The Massachusetts men's soccer team celebrates its NCAA Tournament berth at the Hangar Pub & Grill on University Drive last night. The Minutemen defeated Charlotte on Sunday to clinch the program's first conference title since 2001.

See MEN'S SOCCER on page 6

Morey announced CAO at Amherst College

By Timothy Sabin
Collegian Correspondent

Amherst College announced on Nov. 5, that Megan Morey had accepted the position of Chief Advancement Officer.

In December, Morey will step down as director of leadership at Williams College in Williamstown and embark on her new role at Amherst.

As CAO, Morey will direct Amherst's new advancement efforts and design a fundraising program that will correspond to the college's plan for renewal and growth.

"Amherst's compelling vision and ambition, combined with a very talented and experienced staff, make this a most exciting opportunity," she said.

At Williams College, Morey is a well-known leader. Currently, she serves in the $400 million Williams campaign and works with the senior staff of the college to create objectives for fundraising during the school year. Morey is very active in her duties as CAO, and as a result, Williams has gathered over $20 million in gifts during the past four years in fundraiser.

"Amherst College is pleased to receive such a leader.

"I have been impressed by Megan's vision and leadership, as well as by her nearly 20 years of fundraising experience in higher education," said President Anthony W. Marx. "She brings with her a real passion and appreciation for the value of a liberal arts education today and for an academic experience steeped in tradition. I am truly thrilled at the prospect of working with her in the months and years to come."

Morey will come to Amherst with a lot of experience in the leadership field. Prior to her position at Williams, she held positions at the University of Redlands, Barton College, Denison University and Ohio Wesleyan University. As the countdown for December begins, Morey will continue to serve at Williams, and Amherst College will continue to buzz with anticipation.

Inside the reference section

By Jennifer Reed
Collegian Correspondent

James R. Kelly, the little-known humanities bibliographer at the University of Massachusetts, works on campus choosing books for students and faculty in subjects including English, communication, journalism and history.

Kelly works in room 1967 of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library to make sure faculty and students have the books and periodicals they need for their research and classwork.

Kelly majored in English at the State University of New York Brockport. During this time, he made three lifelong friends, whose pictures sit in a frame on his bookshelf. He spent one year in Sherwood Forest, England, studying abroad.

"It was the best year of my life, but don't tell my wife," said Kelly. After graduation, Kelly was accept-

See KELLY on page 2

UMass fraternity raises money for national children's fund

By Frank Godinho
Collegian Correspondent

Alpha Phi Omega, a national coed community service fraternity, raised $421 for the United Nations Children's Fund, more than doubling their goal of $200.

The fraternity began collecting money door-to-door across the University of Massachusetts campus as part of Alpha Phi Omega's National Service Week, held from Nov. 4 to Nov. 10. This year's theme was service to youth.

The fraternity, which was established on campus in 1952, became the only coed service fraternity at UMass in 1982.

As a community service organization, Alpha Phi Omega recently found out that UNICEF has created a new Registered Student Organization at UMass and jumped at the opportunity to work with them in their Trick-or-Treat for UNICEF program.

UNICEF's Trick-or-Treat program, originally designed for

See FRAT on page 2

Members of APO, a co-ed fraternity, help serve the community by raking leaves in the fall. The frat will dedicate itself again for events set next semester.

Wealthier women do less housework

By Stella Cervas

As the financial and economic crisis continues, women's paycheck clouts the time they spend doing housework do nothing, according to a study conducted by University of Massachusetts economist Sanjiv Gupta.

Gupta's study emphasizes that the amount of housework done by women, still, full-time jobs do not equally weigh both husband and wife in terms of time affected by the equation. Specifically, the point in time between husband and wife acts as a roadblock to understanding household dynamics.

"Up to this point, people have thought that the important thing was how much money a woman makes compared to her husband. But the only thing that matters is how much in real-life terms," said Gupta in a Reuters interview.

Gupta's studies are based on information obtained from 915 women and data on double-income families in the United States in 1985, 1992, 1994 and in 2003. His research reveals that for every $1,000 a woman earns annually, she performed one less hour of housework per week. Women making $30,000 or less per year spend nearly one hour more on housework each day than women making $40,000 or more, according to the National Survey of Families and Households.

His study also recognizes that the modern annual labor market earnings of U.S. women rose from about $9,800 in 1965 to more than $30,000 in 1995, according to the U.S. Bureau of the Census. At the same time, the hours married women spent on weekly routine chores plummeted from 30.4 to 18.8.

Gupta's findings, recently published in the Journal of Marriage and Family, suggest that women can use their income to make the time they spend on household duties more balanced with their spouse.

However the article also points out that equality still does not exist when dividing household duties between husbands and wives. Other researchers in the Journal support this claim, linking the rea-

See HOUSEWORK on page 2

NOV 20 2007

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIII
Issue 54
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Nicholas Belanger
Managing Editor Katie Huston
Business Manager Dan Exter
Production Manager Chris Martin
Night Supervisor Meghan Murphy
Advertising Manager Alex Pender
Advertising Production Katherine Shea
Arts & Living Editor Tim McCall
Comics Editor Adam Staugn
Editorial Editor S.P. Sullivan
News Editor Derrick Perkins
Sports Editor Jeremy Rice
Asst. Business Manager Eric Szymczak
Assistant Advertising Mamea Whooten
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Asst. Arts & Living Stephanie McPherson
Asst. Arts & Living Ryan McAskill
Asst. Arts & Living Teresa Reilly
Asst. Editorial James Mathews
Asst. Editorial Melissa Garber
Assistant News Kate Olesin
Assistant News Will McGuinness
Assistant News Holly Seabury
Assistant Sports Michael King
Assistant Sports Joe Melone
Assistant Sports Eli Rosenswaike
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Evan Trinh
Asst. Photo Editor Michael Phillis
Asst. Photo Editor Brian Tedder

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been recognized since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 413-545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Murphy

COPY EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

TIC winner to recieve cash prize

TIC from page 1

need to have participated in the first phase to be in the second.

Recent plans that have been invented range from nanotechnology that can deliver cancer-destroying agents into the body to make chemotherapy more effective, invented in the fall of last year, to failure-warning systems that help inform people about weather early enough that disasters like Hurricane Katrina can be prevented, invented in spring 2007.

The competition is open to any and all ideas from people in any major.

"I would be really inspired to invent something if I could win prize money that could go towards my invention," said UMass student Terri O'Brien. "I think it's a really good idea to raise the stakes this year."

Danielle Kahn can be reached at dkahn@student.umass.edu.

Last year's winners of the TIC, the condition engineering team, won the $45,000 phase of the challenge.

Correction:

The article entitled "New RSO hosts prominent politician" in last Thursday's edition (11/15/07) incorrectly identified the Advancing Democracy group as a registered student organization. Advancing Democracy is currently not a registered student organization.

Clarification:

The cutline underneath the photograph of last week's student strike in Friday's edition (11/16/07) labeled the demonstration an "all-student strike." In no way was this intended to mean that all students at the University of Massachusetts participated in the strike, rather, that the strike consisted solely of students.

Alpha Phi Omega provides community service on campus trick-or-treaters to bring a carry-along box with them as they collect candy on Halloween, was fully embraced by the coed fraternity despite the fact that the holiday has been over for weeks.

FRAT from page1

"Children who are desperately in need of aid are something that everyone can sympathize for, and we [Alpha Phi Omega] were glad to be able to help UNICEF in their efforts to improve children's lives," said Alana Einhorn, president of the UMass chapter of the fraternity.

"Most residents were very generous and strongly supported our efforts. In fact, we spoke to many that said they had collected for UNICEF in previous years and were really happy to see us doing it," said Einhorn.

The fraternity, which includes 20 student members, brought 13 members together to help collect for the fundraiser.

While collecting money for UNICEF, Alpha Phi Omega helped "educate people on the purpose of UNICEF and reminded students that every little bit of help you give makes a big difference in the lives of others," said Einhorn.

All proceeds from the collection have been donated directly to UNICEF. The global organization will use the money donated to help provide better healthcare and education to needy children.

Last week, the fraternity held a raffle to help raise money for the Boy Scouts of America and Locks of Love.

"There was great participation from our chapter alumni and local businesses, who generously donated sporting event tickets and gift certificates to be raffled off," said Einhorn.

In the upcoming semester, Alpha Phi Omega will also host an event called Merit Badge University, in which about 350 boy scouts will come to UMass for two days of classes. Members and volunteers will teach them the skills they need to help them achieve badges to become Eagle scouts. And on May 1, they will be holding their second annual Locks of Love Hair Drive.

"With great support from our members, alumni and the community, we will be able to organize a great service schedule throughout the year," said Einhorn.

For those interested in becoming a member of Alpha Phi Omega, an information session will take place at the beginning of the spring semester. Interested students can also contact Samantha Taft, membership vice president of the fraternity, in room 409 of the Student Union building, with any questions about becoming a member.

Study shows income reflects chore load son for this gap in equality to slowly fading stereotypes and gender roles people learn at a young age.

HOUSEWORK from page 1

For instance, in one study from 2005, it is pointed out that if a woman's mother took on the majority of domestic work, she will likely feel the need to take on a similar role in her marriage.

This study also suggests that men take on less domestic work to pick up the slack for their working wives than women do in a similar situation. Husbands increase their domestic work by around 2 hours per week when wives enter full-time jobs, while wives reduce their domestic work by four to eight hours per week. Husbands eventually do increase their domestic work over time, but this change is inconsistent. These gaps are believed to often lead to spousal conflict.

Gupta's article does not focus much on spousal differences in domestic work but instead concentrates on the differences between women and housework, particularly women with different incomes. He points out that the difference in time spent on domestic work between women making more money ($40,000 or greater) with women making the least amount of money ($10,000 or less) is just as great as the average difference in time spent doing housework between men and women.

"In general, especially among women who have more egalitarian-type ideas, the more equitable division of labor gives a better outcome of equality and satisfaction," said Gupta.

"It's not that straightforward and there is no bottom line. Someone who does more housework isn't necessarily less happy than someone who does less housework."

Stella Cernak can be reached at scernak@student.umass.edu.

Writers wanted!
news@dailycollegian.com

Librarian shares his journey

KELLY from page 1

ed to the University of Chicago graduate school to study 20th-century prose fiction. Only five out of 75 students graduated from the program. Kelly stayed in the program only one year, not realizing how competitive it was.

In 1973, Kelly moved back to Rochester, New York, where he worked as a law clerk. He also met the woman who would become his first wife. She suggested Kelly become a librarian.

"You like books," she said. "Ever consider being a librarian?"

Kelly took her advice and enrolled in the library school at SUNY Geneseo in the fall of 1973, earning his M.S. degree in 1974.

Kelly had several jobs over the next 15 years. He worked at a Roman Catholic Seminary in Rochester for four years and the College of William and Mary from 1978 to 1980.

Kelly and his wife moved to Texas in 1980, where he enrolled in the Library Science Ph.D Program at the University of Texas. He then spent his last year in Texas as a proofreader for the Texas Legislative Council.

"Strangest job I've ever had ... dull, ultimately," he said.

In 1983, his marriage broke up and Kelly moved to Washington D.C., where he catalogued for the University of Maryland. He worked there for five years, all the while trying to become a reference librarian.

After, he worked at George Washington University for six years, where he was in charge of purchasing books. Toward the end of the six years, Kelly worked at the reference desk, a position he really wanted.

In December 1983, Kelly met his current wife, Carol, at a party in Canada. She teaches culinary arts at vocational high schools and has two children, who were young at the time when the couple met and grew up with Kelly as their stepfather. The grown children now live in Belchertown and Florence, not far from Kelly and his wife in South Deerfield.

Kelly first worked for the Du Bois library as a cataloguer, but within a year became a bibliographer and reference librarian.

In addition to these positions, Kelly is a professor of library science at Simmons University. He also teaches at the University of Rhode Island during his summers and is co-editor of the Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature.

A humanities bibliographer, Kelly wakes up at 5:30 a.m. to a strong cup of Gevalia coffee, then is off to UMass for another day on floor 19.

"Every day, I'm happier with my job," says Kelly.

Study shows that Americans read fewer books each year

By Hillel Italie
Associated Press

The latest National Endowment for the Arts report draws on a variety of sources, public and private, and essentially reaches one conclusion — Americans are reading less.

The 99-page study, "To Read or Not to Read," is being released on Monday as a follow-up to a 2004 NEA survey, "Reading at Risk," that found that an increasing number of adult Americans were not even reading one book a year.

"To Read or Not to Read" gathers an array of government, academic and foundation data on everything from how many 9-year-olds read every day for "fun" (54 percent) to the percentage of high school graduates deemed by employers as "deficient" in writing in English (72 percent).

"I've done a lot of work in statistics in my career, and I've never seen a situation where so much data was pulled from so many places and absolutely everything is so consistent," NEA chairman Dana Gioia said.

Among the findings:

In 2002, only 52 percent of Americans ages 18 to 24, the college years, read a book voluntarily, down from 59 percent in 1992.

Money spent on books, adjusted for inflation, dropped 14 percent from 1985 to 2005 and has fallen dramatically since the mid-1990s.

The number of adults with bachelor's degrees and "proficient in reading prose" dropped from 40 percent in 1992 to 31 percent in 2003.

Some news is good, notably among 9-year-olds, whose reading comprehension scores have soared since the early 1990s.

But at the same time, the number of 17-year-olds who "never or hardly ever" read for pleasure has doubled, to 19 percent, and their comprehension scores have fallen.

"I think there's been an enormous investment in teaching kids to read in elementary school," Gioia said. "Kids are doing better at 9, and at 11. At 13, they're doing no worse, but then you see this catastrophic falloff ... If kids are put into this electronic culture without any counterbalancing efforts, they will stop reading."

Publishers and booksellers have noted that teen fiction is a rapidly expanding category in an otherwise flat market, but the NEA's director of research, Sunil Iyengar, wondered how much of that growth has been caused by the "Harry Potter" books, the last of which came out in July.

"It's great that millions of kids are reading these long, intricate novels, but reading one such book every 18 months doesn't make up for daily reading," Gioia said.

Doug Whiteman, president of the Penguin Young Readers Group, a division of Penguin Group (USA), said sales of teen books were the strongest part of his business. But he added that a couple of factors could explain why scores were dropping – adults are also buying the "Harry Potter" books, thus making the teen market seem bigger on paper, and some sales are for non-English language books.

"There are so many nuances," Whiteman said. "Reading scores don't necessarily have any relevance to today's sales."

The head of Simon & Schuster's children's publishing division, Rick Richter, saw another reason why sales could rise even as scores go down – a growing gap between those who read and those who don't. Richter considers it "very possible" that the market is driven by a relatively small number of young people who buy large numbers of books. Test scores, meanwhile, are lowered by the larger population of teens who don't read.

"A divide like that is really a cause for concern," Richter said.

The report emphasizes the social benefits of reading – "literary readers" are more likely to exercise, visit art museums, keep up with current events, vote in presidential elections and perform volunteer work.

"This should explode the notion that reading is somehow a passive activity," Gioia said. "Reading creates people who are more active by any measure ... people who don't read, who spend more of their time watching TV or on the Internet, playing video games, seem to be significantly more passive."

Gioia called the decline in reading "perhaps the most important socio-economic issue in the United States," and called for changes "in the way we're educating our kids, especially in high school and college. We need to reconnect reading with pleasure and enlightenment."

"'To Read or Not to Read' suggests we are losing the majority of the new generation," Gioia said. "The majority of young Americans will not realize their individual, economic or social potential."

NOV
TO THE WORLD'S BEST CUSTOMERS:
2007
2007

IT'S BEEN A PLEASURE TO SERVE YOU!

	Wednesday, Nov. 21	Thurs Nov. 22 – Sat. Nov. 24	Sunday, Nov. 26
Worcester DC	Closes at 6:30 pm	Closed	Open at 11:00 am
Franklin DC	Closes at 2:00 pm	Closed	Open at 11:00 am
Hampshire DC	Closes at 6:30 pm	Closed	Closed
Berkshire DC	Closes at 2:00 pm	Closed	Open at 11:00 am

You can use your meal plan at the Bluewall Eateries on Friday, November 23, and Saturday, November 24 from 8:00 am to 7:00 pm.

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst
2007 Grand Prize Winner
Be A Local Hero! Buy Locally Grown
Food Management's Best Concepts Awards Competition
umass.edu/diningservices

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
Editorial Opinion
"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie
Tuesday, November 20, 2007 Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Respecting our peers

Joshua H. Wilder

The last four years at this university have provided students, alumni and administrators with a handful of memories they would like to forget. Between post-game riots, late night stabbings and last week's student boycott, UMass just can't seem to find enough mascara to cover up each black eye.

These public relations nightmares portray our university in a bad light, but even worse is the way our student body has seemingly come apart at the seems. Aside from the classic tofu-eating liberals versus George Bush-loving war mongers arguments, students are fighting now about how to spend leisure time.

The Humans vs. Zombies craze seemed to force students to choose sides, with those participating in the game being labeled as nerds and those condemning the game as closed-minded bullies.

With the holiday season right around the corner, this humble columnist was about to give up hope on UMass. An "us vs. them" mentality appeared to be permeating to all aspects of campus life, and things seemed dire.

But an event this weekend gave me hope.

"Unbroken Chain," a weekend symposium celebrating the music and influence of the Grateful Dead, came to campus and revived this columnist's hope for the University. Along with multimedia exhibits and lectures, the weekend featured two concerts in the Fine Arts Center.

On Saturday night, the Dark Star Orchestra performed, and this is when I had my epiphany. The band recreates historical concerts in Grateful Dead history, but perhaps the most interesting sight to see took place outside the show in between set breaks.

There you could find people from all walks of life – students, alumni and others – hanging out and talking about both the Grateful Dead and UMass. While an older gentleman with a tie-dyed shirt and a beard talked about seeing Jerry Garcia as a student at UMass in the 1980s, a current student explained what the scene is like now.

A sense of nostalgia was inescapable that night, as the music and atmosphere seemed to bring everyone to a special moment in time. Speaking of music, the performance was fantastic – a classic Grateful Dead set with sing-along favorites and intense jams.

Interestingly enough, however, the music only played a minor role in my realizations about UMass. While dancing during an awesome version of "Not Fade Away," I looked around and realized that this was the first university event that I had attended in which there was no major conflict.

That's right. No students with megaphones shouting at me. No police in riot gear shooting me with rubber bullets. No stabbings or baseball bat attacks. No bombs, either. Instead there were students, alumni and others respecting each other and having a good time.

It is hard to find UMass students respecting one another or people unaffiliated with the University.

In fact, I was blown away after making this realization. It is hard to find UMass students respecting one another or people unaffiliated with the University. I do not mean any disrespect here, but after all, this is the same student body that will walk across the street in front of a car without even acknowledging the person stopped at the crosswalk. In short, we don't care about a whole lot other than ourselves.

And yet, the best part about Saturday night was that it was a truly selfless event. UMass students there put the music first, and actually respected the older alumni and what they had to say. When an old timer spoke, we listened, and actually learned a thing or two.

There will undoubtedly be some agitators who read this column and immediately dismiss it as a bunch of washed-out hippies listening to bad music while "high on the wacky tobacey." This brings us to the root of our problems here at UMass – labeling one another.

If for one night, alumni, students, old and young, could coexist together respectfully and without major violence, a first for UMass, then what else could happen? And it's not about hippies or liberals or any other bogus title.

Instead of labeling, we listened to one another and had truthful, real communication. No Facebook messaging, but actual human engagement.

The end result was a concert, some dancing and a fun night for all. Not every event has to end with a riot, hard to believe, but true.

Obviously, the Grateful Dead cannot save UMass, but for at least one night there was no major incident to make students look bad. And if it takes the Grateful Dead, the epitome of anti-establishment, to make our school look normal, then you really know we have ourselves one unique university.

I let's keep on trucking, without riots.

Joshua H. Wilder is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jhwilder@student.umass.edu

Defining diversity

Greg Collins

In the wake of the recent student strike, don't be fooled by the grievances voiced by the leaders of the Graduate Student Senate and the Student Government Association. One of these complaints is that the University of Massachusetts does not have a diverse student body and is not accessible to low-income students.

If we take this claim as legitimate, and not as a veneer to hide the real issue of graduate students' failure to secure a new contract, it is safe to say the statement is plain wrong.

In this context, GSS and SGA leadership cannot obfuscate the hard fact that our student body is already incredibly diverse, regardless of race and socio-economic status. Moreover, the additional factors that contribute to this diversity are more important than skin color and financial background. They reflect students' power to pursue individual interests that are not dictated by external elements they cannot control – like race.

One unwavering foundation of our diverse student body is the high number of RSOs on campus, ranging from 30 academic clubs, 21 art clubs, 25 ethnic cultural clubs, nine media outlets, and 12 religious organizations, according to the UMass Web site.

For instance, how many other college campuses in the United States can lay claim to the vibrancy and diversity of student activism pertaining to faith and spirituality on this campus? Personally, I have experienced these differences firsthand, as every Monday students gather in my dormitory for Bible study. Also, I am friends with open atheists and have had classes with people who are active in the Muslim Students Association and Hillel.

There is a sharp difference between how their leaders narrowly define diversity and how it is practiced in reality by students.

Furthermore, the GSS and the SGA overlook the diversity of academic subjects pursued by undergraduate students here. Compare the availability of majors and minors at this school with those offered by surrounding area colleges, as well as at other private universities in Massachusetts and throughout the country.

You will find that UMass offers substantially more diverse academic programs, including some I did not realize college students would pursue after high school, like fruit and vegetable crops and kinesiology. Even though this is a land-grant institution, I still did not expect as many people as there are to be members of the Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

The fact that I assumed students pursued more liberal arts programs in college, rather than these unconventional programs, indicated how my mindset expanded due to encounters with people who pursued these wide-ranging courses of study. Specifically, I realized that the pursuit towards nontraditional majors reflected the simple truth that different people think differently and have different interests, regardless of race and money.

This liberated mindset exhibits why UMass is already diverse in areas more meaningful than those identified by the SGA and the GSS. In particular there is a sharp difference between how their leaders narrowly define diversity and how it is practiced in reality by students.

In reality, diversity at this school is not limited to how people look on the outside or whether the community he or she comes from is rich or poor. Rather, religious and academic diversity reflects the presence of the freedom students use to pursue studies and embrace faiths in accordance with their individual preferences instead of those determined by biology and other forces outside their control.

Yet let's assume that racial and socio-economic diversity is very important. Unless 10 street academy and disciplinary standards in Springfield and Holyoke high schools will do more to make students qualified to attend college than pouring additional money into social outreach programs.

Therefore, a commitment to academic achievement will better expand availability and affordability to this school. Moreover, if high school students are convinced to value education, then they will continue to enrich the academic diversity present at UMass if they do decide to attend it.

Still, diversity is more than putting black students next to white students to create unity. It is true that perhaps the most significant ways to go beyond political differences as well as superficial ones is through the campus. Yet other factors strengthen the notion that race and money do not necessarily determine why diversity is so important in compromises to reduce arguments.

Academic and religious differences as well as cultural and artistic diversity document the personal journey of individuals to pursue answers to questions not confined to race or money.

How can we remain united when we are all struck by the same faculty or financial aid issue, but have differences arising from the many academic or individual preferences shows that diversity originated by individual will, and not by leaders proclaiming it? If there ever was an immutable feature of humanity, it is the universality of the human soul and spirit.

So don't be deceived by SGA leaders who claim that this campus is not diverse enough. Real diversity – that is, diversity which transcends how one looks physically and how much money their parents make – does exist at UMass Amherst in a tangible and profound way.

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu.

Banning all forms of torture

John Gruenenfelder

Torture – it's the debate that just won't end. How sad is it that our country must even have this argument? Many of the worst techniques have since been ended by the administration, yet they refuse to put a full stop to it.

Recently, pending the confirmation of Michael Mukasey, the new Attorney General, Congress solicited information regarding torture. This included the current torture hot-button issue, waterboarding. While Congress keeps poking at the issue, Senator McCain has made opposition to torture an important part of his campaign.

Congress learned, no surprise here, that waterboarding is, in fact, torture. Malcolm Nance, a former Navy survival instructor, was put through waterboarding as part of his training and is in a particularly good position to comment on the subject.

He was fully aware that this process of simulated drowning would be brought to an end before he was harmed. Yet the torture is so frightening that survival instincts kick in and your brain tells you to do whatever is necessary to make it stop.

This is, of course, the practical problem with torture. History has shown time and time again that, in general, it just doesn't work. Torture makes our country look bad to the rest of the world. Our torturing of prisoners allows for the same to our own captured forces and makes it that much harder for us to protest. And, finally, interrogators rarely get what they want by using torture.

Detainees are willing to say anything to make the torture stop and the odds of getting useful information are remote. Congressman Franks, a Republican from Arizona, said that sometimes these sorts of harsh techniques need to be used in emergencies. He also said that Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged architect of the 9/11 attacks, gave important information to the CIA after only a minute and a half of waterboarding.

But in Nance's testimony, he disagreed, saying that somebody like Mohammed would know how to resist torture and likely give information to the CIA which would, at the time, seem like a "gold mine," but would in reality be information no longer useful to al-Qaeda.

When this issue finally came up during Michael Mukasey's confirmation hearing, he evaded the question, saying that he wasn't familiar with the technique. As the Daily Show's Jon Stewart said, "How could you not know that would be on the test?"

When the president says, "We do not torture," there should not need to be an asterisk after it.

While that was surely a stupid thing for Mukasey to say, he later said that he personally found the technique "repugnant," but could not issue an opinion on its legality. Strange as it may sound, this was probably the best course of action for him to take. He's not being confirmed as a judge, so the problem of having to rescue himself in the future from some issue is not a problem.

Still, Congressional testimony is a very serious matter. He certainly knew plenty about waterboarding but likely lacked the in-depth research to issue an opinion on the matter. And if, in the future, his actual Attorney General opinion should differ from his testimony, there will be big trouble. Perhaps it is unfortunate that such equivocation is necessary, but that is how our system works.

Some people do have the luxury of making definitive statements. On the campaign trail, Senator McCain is putting his opposition to torture front and center and he strongly believes what he is saying. It also helps to differentiate him from his opponents who are practically tripping over each other to find new phrases to describe the unspeakable horrors they would visit upon terrorist suspects.

McCain is one of the only Republicans I have ever voted for and it is because of commitments like this. He was also the sponsor of 2005's Detainee Treatment Act, which attempted to state that, in no uncertain terms, does the United States torture, and that any instances of it are illegal.

Even after that law, and Military Commissions Act in 2006, here we are, still arguing over whether or not we should allow torture. Congress has spoken, the Supreme Court has spoken, what is holding this up? It's the president. Through his own orders and opinions and those of like-minded people in the Justice Department, he keeps making an end run around the issue.

Congress may soon act to make waterboarding explicitly illegal, but they shouldn't have to. Treaties, agreements, conventions, laws and opinions have all been delivered on the subject and all have been squarely against torture. Only the administration seems intent on dehumanizing other people.

The Constitution does not spell out every single way in which the first amendment protects free speech, and, similarly, when the president says, "We do not torture," there should not need to be an asterisk after it.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jgruenen@student.umass.edu.

Advocating open student forums

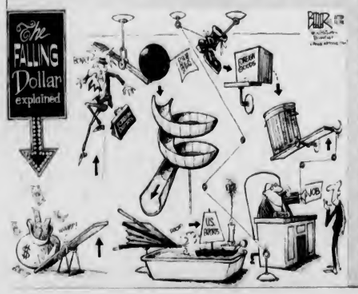
Dear Editor:

We are writing in regards to the General Student Strike that occurred last Thursday and Friday. Over 1,000 students and faculty showed up in support of our four demands – rollback student fees, get police officers out of dorms, increase diversity outreach and accountability, and allow more student control over student space. However, we are disheartened that the administration, particularly Interim Chancellor Cole and Vice Chancellor Gargano, refused to have a public meeting with the people of their constituency.

Organizations such as the Student Government Association have tried previously to convince the administration to serve the constituency by having a meeting where students can address their concerns. They have been denied every time. To deny students a meeting is unfair because doing so is neglecting their concerns.

Does the administration care about the students that give their jobs purpose? Does the administration care that hundreds of students have to drop out every year because they can't afford the student fees? Does the administration care that students of color and students of the LGBTQ community do not feel supported at this school and have to constantly deal with discrimination? Does the administration care that their students are being harassed by police officers who are supposed to be protecting them? Does the administration care that places such as the Student Union are shutting students out because of new regulations? It doesn't seem like they do.

Over the last ten years, the Board of Trustees has increased undergraduate tuition and fees by 39 percent, most of which came from student fees. The 39 percent increase is making it harder for students coming from working-class families to stay enrolled at the university. Part of the University of Massachusetts mission "is to provide an affordable and accessible education," according to the Trustee Document T05-024. They are clearly not living up to their mission statement.



Since 2001 ALANA (African-American, Latino, Asian/Pacific Islander, and Native America) Success Center operating budgets were cut by over 50 percent, and staffing was cut from 17 to 10 full-time staff members. The Stonewall Support Center, which supports the LGBTQ community, has also experienced great cuts in their budget. Meanwhile, the administration has been cutting the budgets of programs designed to ensure the retention of students from disenfranchised backgrounds; instead, they have been increasing their own salaries. Between 2004 and 2006, there was a 51 percent increase in their total salaries.

We simply want a public meeting where we can speak to the people whose job it is to support us in a way that ensures that we graduate and become professionals. However, they are refusing to do this.

How will they ever know what we need if they will not listen to our concerns? The purpose of the strike was to bring these concerns to their attention. Although they refuse to hear our voices, we are happy to say it is not over. Elected student leaders will meet privately with administrators today, Tuesday, Nov. 20 at 4 p.m.

They will not be discussing our demands, but advocating for an open forum for students to discuss concerns. Students will be rallying outside the meeting. We will continue to put pressure on administrators until they take responsibility and live up to their job descriptions. Students should be involved in this cause even if they have not experienced these injustices because with the path this university is going down, it may get worse.

Yurleni Velez
UMass student
Shaneka Davis
UMass student
ALANA Caucus member

The FALLING Dollar explained
BAILOUT
BAILOUT
BAILOUT

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

NOV 20 2007

By Coby Kalter
Collegian Correspondent

It's hard to sum up the lives, experiences and thoughts of a community whose hearts have been touched by the Grateful Dead, but this weekend's "Unbroken Chain: The Grateful Dead in Music, Culture and Memory" public symposium came close.

The symposium was a phenomenal experience that took attendees on a journey through the life of the band as well as through the life of its fans and the culture it spawned. Through different aspects of the Grateful Dead's life and culture, a vast amount of lessons in the arts, social sciences, engineering and business fields were to be learned. Dean John Mullin said it best when he explained how he was trying to "cross-fertilize" different academics through the Grateful Dead in order to bring a new type of class to the University of Massachusetts.

Rebecca Adams, professor in sociology at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro and co-author of "Deadhead Social Science: You Ain't Gonna Learn What You Don't Want to Know," helped start off the weekend with a look into the Deadhead society. With firsthand experience in the field from following the Grateful Dead around the country on tour, she was able to give different reasons for their difference from any other band. She also gave insight into the different kinds of fans there were and included a map of what areas fans can be found in at shows.

One panel during the weekend was about the media and its perception of the Grateful Dead of "hardly ever cool," as Steve Silberman, co-author of "Skeleton Key: a Dictionary for Deadheads," explained.

David Gans, host of the Grateful Dead hour radio show, explained that some journalists would sometimes only go to the parking lots of shows and find a story there and never actually go into the show. This often led to bad criticism of the band.

A solution to this problem was creating media by Deadheads that would go out to other Deadheads. John Dwork, a Hampshire College graduate, helped to do just that as the creator of Dupree's Diamonds, a magazine that reported on happenings within the Deadhead community.

Further into the symposium, Dan Healy, the band's tech specialist, spoke about his time with the Grateful Dead and how his understanding of sound technology affected the band. He explained that what he and his crew were doing with the band was "frontier work" because they were trying to incorporate many different visions with one sound system, which had never been done before.

He went on to say that the "audience was always part of the show" because they were trying to put them on the same "sound trip" that they were on. Healy said that Jerry Garcia, the lead guitarist of the band, would call the sound they produced "quintaphonic sound" which is now known as surround sound.

Other panels during the symposium included a deeper look into the lyrics of the band's works, a breakdown and search for meaning in the band's improvisational style and an introspective into 1960s counterculture and society. These panels further helped piece together what the Grateful Dead were truly all about.

Another keynote speaker was the Grateful Dead's own publicist and a UMass graduate, Dennis McNally. He described the Grateful Dead experience as "both dionysian and improvisation." These two terms really capture the essence of what the Grateful Dead were all about.

A "rich and complex phenomenon" is how McNally described the Dead's cultural and musical effects on America. He then went into his experience with the members of the band, saying that they "prized thought" and were "a cult of intellect."

"We were all the Grateful Dead," he said.

The highlight of the conference was a panel consisting of Carolyn Adams Garcia (Mountain Girl), Jerry's first wife, Dan Healy and former NBA great and notable Deadhead Bill Walton. They discussed their trip to Egypt and other memorable times they shared on tour. As they reminisced, the audience felt the joy of these experiences and laughed right along with the panelists. It was this highlight event that really echoed the presence of the Deadhead family that had gathered on campus.

Throughout the conference, galleries were open, displaying photographs taken by Susanna Millman, Herb Greene and Lloyd Wolf of the band and fans at concerts; paintings commemorating the essence of the Grateful Dead by Mikio Kennedy and Mike Dubois and Jerry Garcia's own paintings.

The array of panels, speakers and galleries really captured the Grateful Dead's impact on many peoples' lives. Learning from different experiences of how they encountered the band and how they affected the Deadhead community was truly inspiring to any fan. These presentations also displayed the effect the band itself had on American culture. For any Deadhead, this was truly a historic weekend.

Coby Kalter can be reached at ckalter@student.umass.edu

Writers still striking

TV networks begin to cut popular shows

By Rick Kushman
McClatchy Newspapers

Shows such as "Heroes" are running out of episodes to air due to the writers' strikes. The strikes have no end in sight.

So the writers' strike continues in Hollywood, late night shows are in repeats, big name producers are carrying picket signs and ... yeah, I know, most people don't really care, at least not until their shows run out.

It all sounds selfish and vague. As "30 Rock" creator and star Tina Fey says, it seems that some lucky people are fighting with some very lucky people.

In truth, the fight is important to everyone, and not in a justice-for-the-oppressed-writer way, though as a guy who writes for a living, I'm always ready to make that argument. This strike, and how things might play out, will eventually reach all of us, because it's about the future, theirs and ours and anyone's who watches anything with moving pictures.

That's partly because of what they are fighting over, and partly because it could change everything about the way we watch TV.

Now it's starting to sound major league. That's because it is.

First, the issues. Stay with me and I'll be brief. In overly simple terms, writers now only get a tiny piece of DVD sales, between 4 and 5 cents per DVD sold. They wanted to double that to about 8 cents.

They have been willing to drop that demand, but are adamant that they get paid something when shows they write get streamed, downloaded or used on Web sites. Now, they get nothing. All those iTunes downloads, for instance? Zip.

The writers sound reasonable enough, and you can understand their anger. Their DVD deal basically got made back in 1988, before there were DVDs. They don't want to miss the boat on the digital world, too.

The studios and networks say that evolving digital world of streaming and downloading has made their profits smaller and more volatile, and that no one has figured out where it's going or how to make the big bucks off it they make now off TV, movies and DVDs.

The studios say they don't want to lock into a deal when things are so uncertain and erratic. That sounds reasonable, too, though it's hard not to reflexively mistrust Hollywood moguls, or the world's largest corporations, or in this case, a combination of both.

So that's what they're fighting over the future.

Here's how it could play out for all of us if the strike lasts a while, which is looking more and more likely. The last writers strike in 1988, by the way, went five-months plus.

Already, the late-night shows are repeats. By mid-to-late January, most of the scripted series on prime time will be repeats, or there will be mid-season replacements with six or eight fresh episodes before they repeat, too. Daytime soaps may go dark, or they may get written by producers and executives, and won't that be good?

You've probably heard all that. And what it will do for most people is break the connection to network TV, to "Grey's Anatomy" or "24" or "Heroes," shows many people rarely miss now. At first, it'll be weird, but then it'll be like summer, a vacation from having to show up every week. The habit will be gone. We'll be doing other things.

There will still be reality shows, but with the rare exception of an "American Idol," or a "Dancing with the Stars" or "Survivor," the lure won't be the same. Network ratings will drop, maybe 5 to 10 percent in January, then more and more, according to some analysts.

Meanwhile, all the new scripted shows that would have premiered in fall 2008 will be wisps, just ideas or half-done scripts. In normal times, the networks sell those shows to advertisers in May, to the tune of $8 billion or more. This May? Nothing.

So where will the advertising go? Where will viewers go?

Probably, online. I give you the root of the fight: Welcome to our digital future.

A pause for some perspective. This world of digital entertainment, streaming video, on-demand viewing, downloads and who-knows-what's-next, is coming, no matter what.

The technology is getting better exponentially, and we're only in the first generation or so of devices like digital video recorders and phones with video-download capacity. Those things, and new things, will get better and simpler, and everyone will use them, the way we use that once-newfangled thing called a computer. Or a TV.

But if the networks keep control, that world will probably resemble something like the world we know now. The changeover would possibly go from CBS now providing us a week's worth of shows on the network that are available when we hit the "on" button, to, maybe, CBS offering a week's worth of shows, and us deciding to buy them show by show on demand, or online, the way we can buy single movie viewings now.

Or maybe we'd subscribe to a service the way we subscribe to cable, or maybe it would just be cable, and we'd get access to all those CBS shows. May be it would be something else.

But if this strike continues, if the current TV world breaks down, we may just get chaos. The business model will be a wreck for advertisers. The compensation model will be a mess for writers and directors and stars. They will all look elsewhere, and try anything. It could be like the wild West, with all sorts of programming options out there, online, on-demand, as buyable downloads, as packages floating in the ecosystem that we can gather and watch. Who really knows?

For viewers, that means we're going to have to go find stuff, instead of having it brought to us as it is now. There might be thousands of options, and we'll have to sort through them. (And good luck to people overwhelmed by TV listings now.)

This spreading of home entertainment options may mean the advertising and the profits will be spread thinner. Maybe that's good. More people cash in. But it'll also mean there will be fewer big-money studios to fund blockbuster films like "The Lord of the Rings" and the coming "Indiana Jones and the Kingdom of the Crystal Skull," or high-end TV shows like "Lost" and "24." Production values cost money.

We're already seeing a start to all this on sites like YouTube, Break.com, Revision3 and the rest. And a big step got taken forward last week with "Quarterlife," a social Web site built around a near-network quality series of eight-minute episodes from respected producer/directors Marshall Herskovitz and Edward Zwick.

"Quarterlife," the Web series, started last week and tells the story of some mid-20s folks focusing their lives. It feels like a blend of "My So-Called Life" and "Thirtysomething," which makes some sense because Herskovitz and Zwick created both of those.

"Quarterlife" was headed for the Web long before the writer's strike, just as the digital video has been exploding on its own for a couple years. And the technological changes driving all that exploding have been coming and increasing at a seemingly insane pace. A digital world is our future, for entertainment and everything.

As for the strike, you can see why writers care so much about money from digital delivery, that's where everything will eventually go. That's also the reason the studios care so much, that's where their money will come from.

The strike itself is pushing writers toward that digital future even faster. They're putting daily updates, rants, skits and communiques online on YouTube. Some of them may decide, at some point, to turn those into a series, sell a couple ads, and, voila, they'll not only be competition for the studios, they'll be keeping all the money they make.

Both sides still have some ability to control their digital futures, at least for a while. But soon, writers, studios, networks and all the rest of us will be facing a world of digital anarchy. Or maybe they'll settle the strike, and we'll get anarchy, anyway.

And maybe that will be a great thing for viewers, maybe it'll just be that chaos. That's the thing about changing technology, and about the future, the primary law is the law of unintended consequences.

Tina Fey, the creator of the NBC series "30 Rock," pictured above, thinks the strike is the lucky fighting the very lucky.

Domino's Pizza
AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs-Sat
11am-3am Sun-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 583-9500
2XTUESDAY
Buy Any Large Pizza at Menu Price & Get a 2nd Pizza of Equal or Lesser Value FREE
Valid Tuesdays Only
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items $9.99
Limited Time Offer
PIZZA & BREAD
One 1-Topping Pizza & Choice of Breadsticks
MEDIUM $10.99 | LARGE $12.99
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
WHAT A DEAL 1
Medium 1-Topping Pizza & Two 20oz Sodas $9.99
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
YOUR CHOICE
One Large 1-Topping Brooklyn-style Pizza or A Medium Philly Cheese Steak Pizza $9.99
Limited Time Offer
WHAT A DEAL 2
2 Medium 1-Topping Pizzas $13.99
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer
WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

Patrick Dempsey enchants in new Disney feature film

By Rick Bentley
McClatchy Newspapers

BEVERLY HILLS — Patrick Dempsey's enthusiasm is high even though it is early on a Sunday morning. He explodes into the room on the second floor of the Beverly Hilton Hotel sporting a huge, melt-you-in-your-shoes grin. He offers a big "Good morning!"

His energetic arrival comes after two days of doing interviews for his new feature film "Enchanted," a late night with his sick twins and all of the hubbub surrounding the writers strike. The television series that has made Dempsey a household name and put him on almost every "top hunks" list, "Grey's Anatomy," will only be able to shoot a couple more episodes before having to shut down.

Dempsey, 41, has reason to be happy. After an acting career that saw him fall into near obscurity for several years, Dempsey is the darling of the small screen. You can't have a character nicknamed "McDreamy" and not be turning a few heads.

And now he is in a feature film that is getting great early reviews, especially for him. He plays a New York lawyer who gets reminded about the power of love by Giselle, a princess (Amy Adams) who has fallen from her cartoon world into the real world.

He talks in honest terms about his first brush with fame and his rediscovery.

"I think at first you're not sure you're worthy of the attention. I think it kind of threw me off. I wasn't quite prepared for it because I was doing it for the sake of doing it and not worrying about the end result," Dempsey says. "I don't think you realize how much responsibility you have once you get into that position of either green lighting movies or things like that and the choices that you make.

"If you're not making money for people, you're going to be pushed aside. So I wasn't really clear on how the business operated. And I don't think I was really confident in who I was as a person."

He feels more confident these days. That's because he worked his way through the hardships. That gives him a deep appreciation of where he is today.

Dempsey was one of Hollywood's rising stars in the late '80s with movies like "Can't Buy Me Love" and "Loverboy." Then he was relegated to guest-starring roles. That changed in 2002 when Dempsey was cast in "Sweet Home Alabama." He didn't get the girl, but his character was so sympathetic that he caught the attention of the public and Hollywood.

Then came "Grey's Anatomy." He's so popular on that show that it was difficult to shoot the scenes for "Enchanted" in Times Square.

"Women kept yelling for Patrick. They would shout 'We love you Dr. McDreamy'," says "Enchanted" director Kevin Lima.

Those women may have to go see "Enchanted" several times to get their dose of McDreamy. Because of the writers' strike, there are only enough scripts of "Grey's Anatomy" to shoot 11 episodes and new episodes will run out soon.

A modest Dempsey's theory as to why "Grey's Anatomy" has found such success has nothing to do with his own popularity. He suggests it is because the ABC drama has a lot of different archetypes that people can identify with.

Just to be clear: Those women at Times Square were not shouting "We love you Dr. McArchetype."

It is a different Dempsey facing this current wave of fame and fortune.

"I get the joke of the business. I'm under no illusion of what's going on here and why certain attention is coming my way and you have to be careful of that. There are good people and there are bad people and I think it's a question of how you just keep your feet on the ground and stay focused and not buy into all the hype," Dempsey says.

He credits his family with helping him keep such a grounded outlook. Dempsey married make-up artist Jillian Fink in 1999. The couple have three children: a daughter and twin boys.

His family is one reason Dempsey said yes to "Enchanted."

"I just wanted to be a part of it because it's hard to find stories that are original and different. But yet there was something about this that was timeless and familiar as well. So it felt like it was entertaining on a lot of levels," Dempsey says. "As a parent, it's a nice family film, but also it's a good date movie as well."

Dempsey's big on romance. He won't offer many secrets only to say that romance takes more than candles and flowers.

He leaps at any chance to talk about how happy he is the film, his television series and family life are all going so well.

Maybe the ultimate sign Dempsey is back in the celebrity spotlight is the fact he has been released in doll form for "Enchanted." The mention of the doll gets an embarrassed smile from Dempsey.

"It's really surreal when your daughter's playing with Giselle and yourself," Dempsey says. "But I'm having a blast. I'm really enjoying everything. I think at this point in my life, it's been a long road to get to here and the steps that I'm taking hopefully will allow me to have a nice career."

Patrick Dempsey made filming for "Enchanted" difficult as hoards of women lined the streets of NYC screaming for McDreamy.

THE FINE ARTS CENTER
LET'S GO GLOBE HOPPING!
CENTER SERIES 07-08 SEASON

Shaolin Warriors
Tuesday, November 27, 7:30 pm Concert Hall
The Shaolin Warriors' kung-fu tradition has been at the center of Chinese martial arts culture for more than a millennium. The masters' butt-kicking, amazingly graceful hand-to-hand combat and weaponry skills are on display in a performance that is part action flick, part Cirque du Soleil
$35 $25 $15; Five College Students $15 $10; Youth 17 and under $12
Presented in collaboration with the Asian Arts & Culture program
Sponsored by WRNX 100.9FM and The Recorder/Valley Kids

Blind Boys of Alabama
Friday, November 30, 8pm Concert Hall
The Blind Boys of Alabama have spread the spirit and energy of pure soul gospel music for over 60 years winning four Grammies along the way. Opening the concert will be local choir Mighty Men of God under the direction of Marcus N. Pitts III from the St. John's Congregational Church in Springfield. The UMass Gospel Choir will perform in the lobby from 7:15 - 7:45pm
$35, $25, $15; Five College Students $15; Youth 17 and under $15
Sponsored by Finck & Perras Insurance/Realty World Service, WFCR 88.5FM and The Valley Advocate

Cherish the Ladies – A Celtic Christmas Celebration
Wednesday, December 12, 7:30 pm Concert Hall
With a spectacular blend of instrumental talents, beautiful vocals, captivating arrangements and stunning step dancing, this powerhouse group combines all facets of Celtic culture in an immensely warm, humorous and entertaining event
$35, $25, $15; Five College Students $15, $10; $7, Youth 17 and under $12
Sponsored by Cooley Dickinson Hospital/Easthampton Savings Bank, The Rainbow, Timeless and 93.9 The River

UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
fac.umass.edu
For tickets call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMASS or go online to www.fineartscenter.com!

Young Wildcats scoring early

HOCKEY EAST from page 8

advantage, the Catamounts started the season in a 1-for-30 slump on the man advantage.

Besides the scoring of Lenes and the leadership of Strong, this Vermont team has little to boast about. The Catamounts are ninth in the league in scoring offense and their 17 goals scored are last in the league by a margin of four.

FRESHMAN IMPRESSIONS

Wildcats forward Paul Thompson ranks first in the nation in goals per game (0.75) by a rookie. Teammate James van Riemsdyk and Thompson rank third and fifth, respectively, in the nation in points per game with 1.33 and 1.25. Thompson's performance this past Saturday night was the first time that a UNH freshman had five points in a game since Justin Atkins accomplished the feat on Feb. 11, 2005.

Van Riemsdyk leads all Wildcats with 12 points (four goals and eight assists) this season.

Thompson is right behind his counterpart with 10 points, tying him with senior forward Matt Fornataro for second on the team. The combined goal totals of Thompson and Van Riemsdyk account for almost a third of the team's goals on the season.

Thanks in part to Thompson and van Riemsdyk, the Wildcats have now won three straight and eight of their last nine games against Providence (3-6-2, 3-3-2 Hockey East). Friday night's game against the Friars marks the first time that New Hampshire has won on the road against Providence since Jan. 7, 2005.

... The River Hawks tied for the their third game in a row on Friday night against Providence, a first in UMass-Lowell history.

... BC is winless in its last three games against Massachusetts at the Mullins Center. Friday night's tie marked the first tie in 20 meetings between the two teams in Amherst ... All 20 BU players that have taken the ice in one of the Terrier's wins this season have scored at least one point ... After scoring 16 total power-play goals last season, Providence already has 12 this season.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

HOCKEY EAST STANDINGS

	HOCKEY EAST				OVERALL
TEAM	W	L	T	PTS.	W	L	T
1 Northeastern	5	3	1	11	5	4	1
2 Massachusetts	3	1	4	10	5	2	4
3 New Hampshire	4	2	1	9	6	2	1
4 Boston College	2	2	4	8	3	3	5
Providence	3	3	2	8	3	6	2
6 Boston University	3	3	1	7	3	6	2
Merrimack	3	4	1	7	6	4	1
8 Vermont	2	2	1	5	2	5	1
Maine	2	4	1	5	4	6	1
10 UMass Lowell	0	3	4	4	2	3	4

UNH squeaks in

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

New Hampshire will be heading to the NCAA Division I Football Championship, in large part to Ricky Santos' play against Maine on Saturday.

After back-to-back losses to Northeastern and Massachusetts in which Santos threw four interceptions and one touchdown, the senior quarterback bounced back and threw four touchdowns in the Wildcats (7-4, 4-4 Colonial Athletic Association) 39-14 victory over Maine.

The Wildcats will head to Cedar Falls, Iowa, to take on top-seeded Northern Iowa on Saturday at noon.

It's rare for a team with a 7-4 record to get into the postseason, but with the combination of their tough schedule, and losses from Colgate and Georgia Southern, UNH got selected as the last team in the playoffs.

"We had planned just to have the seniors and just a couple of guys in the locker room and that's what we did," UNH coach Sean McDonnell said in this week's CAA teleconference. "And we're sitting there, and the minute it came up on the board, you know I tilted my head and wanted to make sure I was seeing that I saw that we had got in. Just to see the looks on our senior's faces, knowing they get another opportunity to play another football game, knowing they get an opportunity to play for a national championship."

If the Wildcats are going to make any type of run at a national championship, they are going to have to defeat a Northern Iowa team that went undefeated this year, including a 24-13 road victory over Football Bowl Subdivision's Iowa State.

It will be an interesting matchup, with Santos trying to lead UNH's offense against a Panther defense that allowed opponents to score more than 17 points once in 2007.

FIVE TO PLAYOFFS

In addition to New Hampshire, the CAA, in its first season in existence, leads all conferences by sending five teams to the playoffs. No conference has done this prior to this year.

Massachusetts earned the automatic bid by winning a coin flip with Richmond. The Minutemen and the Spiders both finished the season 9-2 overall and 7-1 in conference. Both are still conference co-champions, but this procedure was done to determine the automatic bid.

The Minutemen will host Fordham (8-3, 5-1 Patriot League) this Saturday at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Richmond has been led all season by running back Tim Hightower, but he wasn't completely healthy this weekend and carried the ball 15 times for 60 yards. However, backup Josh Vaughn picked up the slack and ran 28 times for 137 yards in the Spiders' 31-20 victory over William & Mary.

Similar to UMass, Richmond will host its playoff game this weekend. Eastern Kentucky will travel to Richmond Stadium on Saturday.

"[Eastern Kentucky's] only two losses were to [I-AA] teams, Western Kentucky and Kentucky," Richmond coach Dave Clawson said. "It looks like they pretty much steamrolled their way through the [Ohio Valley Conference]. The only game that was really competitive was their Eastern Illinois game, which is another playoff team."

CAA Football

BATTLE FOR DELAWARE

Despite their disappointing season-finale loss to Villanova, Delaware will host in-state foe Delaware State on Saturday.

The Blue Hens (8-3, 5-3 CAA), who put up at least 30 points in 9-of-10 games prior to Saturday, struggled to score against the Wildcats and look to rebound from consecutive losses.

The Hornets' 110-1, 8-0 Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference) sole loss came on Sept. 15 against FBS opponent Kent State. Delaware State didn't blow any opponents out over the course of the season, but used a stingy defense to limit their opposition's points.

Omar Cuff led the Blue Hen offense this year with 1,391 yards and 29 rushing touchdowns. Along with quarterback Joe Flacco, who threw 17 touchdowns and five interceptions, the Hornet defense will have lots of film to study.

JAMES MADISON HITS ROAD

In a matchup of two quarterbacks who can throw and pass the ball, JMU will head to Boone, N.C. to try and knock off the defending national champion, Appalachian State.

The Mountaineers (9-2, 5-2 Southern Conference) running back and quarterback both rushed for nearly 1,000 yards this season. Quarterback Armanti Edwards ran for 928 yards and threw for another 1,221, and running back Kevin Edwards ran for 1,030 yards.

Appalachian State became a household name when they beat Michigan at the Big House earlier this season, but are fat from unbeatable – it lost to Wofford on Sept. 22 and also was defeated by Georgia Southern on Oct. 20, this time at home.

The Dukes (8-3, 5-3 CAA) have a double-threat quarterback of their own. Rodney Landers passed for 1,554 yards during the regular season and rushed for another 1,144. He amassed 24 touchdowns between these two categories and didn't make many mistakes either, throwing four interceptions.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Gordon scores 21 in Hoosier victory three assists. Providence was able to capitalize off of Arkansas's 32 turnovers, scoring 34 points and 14 in the paint.

TOP 25 from page 8

The Razorbacks avenged their loss with a victory over Virginia Commonwealth on Sunday, 70-60. Senior guard Sonny Weems had 16 points, eight rebounds and three assists while Beverley added 13 to bring Arkansas' overall record to 3-1. The Razorbacks took an early lead, and outrebounded the Rams 41-28. VCU's next major conference opponent is on Dec. 2 against Maryland.

YOUNG HOOSIERS WIN BIG

Freshman sensation Eric Gordon scored 21 points, including five 3-pointers, as eighth-ranked Indiana crushed Longwood, 100-49, on Sunday in the opening round of the Chicago Invitational Challenge.

Junior college transfer Jamarcus Ellis added nine points, 11 rebounds, and five assists to help the unexperienced team dominate the Lancers. Another junior college transfer, 295-pound DeAndre Thomas, got his first start and added 10 points. Indiana has five freshmen this year, including the two junior college transfers.

In Gordon's first collegiate game, the guard had a record 33 points in a 99-77 win over Chattanooga last week.

Indiana had six players in double figures, and led by as much as 56 points. The Lancers were held to 26 percent shooting, and had the ball stolen 11 times.

NC STATE LOSES

New Orleans forward TJ Worley banked in a 3-pointer with 1.7 seconds left to lead the Privateers over No. 22 North Carolina State, 65-63.

With three lead changes in the last 15 seconds, New Orleans scored eight straight points in the final 1:48 to erase a seven-point deficit.

The Privateers took a 62-61 lead when senior guard Bo McCalebb hit a pair of free throws with 14.9 seconds left.

The Wolfpack regained the lead after senior forward Gavin Grant hit a layup to put NC State up one with 8.3 seconds left.

McCalebb got the ball on the inbound, but lost it. Worley was there to recover, and threw up a shot over three defenders. The shot went in, and Worley broke up the Wolfpack inbound as time expired, capping the victory for New Orleans.

McCalebb, last season's Sun Belt Player of the Year, scored 20 points, while junior forward Kyndall Dykes added 12.

The Privateers snapped its six-game losing streak against ranked opponents by outscoring the Wolfpack 14-2 in the second half and overcoming an 11-point deficit.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team receives the A-10 Championship trophy after defeating Charlotte 2-0 on Sunday. UMass learned yesterday it would host BU in the first round of the NCAA Tournament Friday.

Simmons sets more records

SOCCER from page 1

This is UMass's second appearance in the NCAA Tournament since Koch took over the program in 1991.

SIMMONS ON TOP

Zack Simmons earned the A-10 Tournament's Most Outstanding Performer award for his weekend. The redshirt junior began his time with the team as a sophomore academically after spending his first season at UMass on the club soccer team.

"It's a pretty unlikely story I guess, but I had a lot of support from my coaches and the other 10 guys in front of me," Simmons said. "Obviously, I could not have done it without them and the 25 other guys on the team."

Simmons played every minute of every game for UMass this season. In the process, he became the school's all-time leader in saves (278), shutouts (23) and is on track to set the single season goals-against average record at .74.

He can break the school record for career wins if the Minutemen win four games in the national tournament. However unlikely that may be, Simmons has marked himself as arguably the best goalkeeper in school history.

Like most upperclassmen in the program, defeating Rhode Island on the way to the A-10 Championship made the whole experience more enjoyable. Simmons was 0-4 against the Rams for his career before the semifinal on Friday night.

"Before the game, we knew it was going to be one of the hardest games of our career," Simmons said. "We knew we could beat them if we did the things we needed to do."

He made 11 saves in the match-up with the Rams and despite the intense rivalry between the teams, developed a lot of respect for the entire Ram team in his time at UMass.

WIN OR LOSE

The win over Dayton in the first round of the A-10 Tournament went into the books as a tie since UMass won in penalty kicks. The Minutemen did not tie a single game throughout the regular season for the first time since 1999.

In fact during the regular season, UMass only played in overtime four times, compared to six times last season.

The last time UMass won a game on penalty kicks was the A-10 Championship Game against Richmond on Nov. 11, 2001. Then-senior John Lytton converted the decisive attempt for the Minutemen, who won the shootout 4-3 like they did on Thursday.

Joe Melvin can be reached at jmelvin@student.umass.edu.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

is looking for a new

DISTRIBUTION MANAGER

ARE YOU AN EARLY RISER WITH SOME TIME BEFORE CLASS?

ARE YOU ORGANIZED, EFFICIENT, AND PROFESSIONAL?

DO YOU WANT TO BE A PART OF THE LARGEST DAILY COLLEGE NEWSPAPER IN NEW ENGLAND?

APPLY NOW:
113 CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT
DAILY COLLEGIAN OFFICES
(413)545-3500

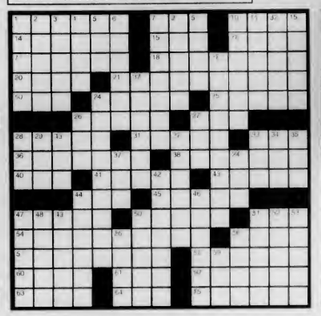
NOV 20 2007

GIVE US YOUR COMICS OR WE'LL TAKE THEM BY FORCE.
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

...because math is fun.

			5				2
	5		7				1
	2			9		5	6	3
		6	8				1
1								8
	8				3	6
9	1	4		6			8
2					9		7
6					5

ACROSS
1 Maneuver
7 Buzzing insect
10 Sepiolite
14 Second largest continent
15 ___ Marie Saint
16 Curved molding
17 Pilfered
18 Sky above
20 Hiker's shelter
21 End
23 Alore
24 Farn
25 Bugs of comics
26 Winnie the Pooh creator
27 Recipe amt.
28 Art supporter
31 Necktie with wide ends
33 Lyric poem
36 Onion relative
38 Mythic know-it-alls
40 Tap gently
41 Lacking ability
43 Family member
44 Ripen
45 Central New York city
47 Beef source
50 Buttery lemonai
51 Crow's cry
54 Enlarged epiglottis
56 Isle near Corsica
57 Final
58 Overseas
60 Words of understanding
61 Bro's sibling
62 Passé emissary
63 Quayle and Marino
64 Perform
65 Stirs up, as a fire



DOWN
1 Sample
2 Subsequent to
3 Old hag
4 Pinball violation
5 Chill
6 Stamp a stamp
7 Helm for hesmmen
8 Force out
9 Chief Justice Warren
10 Appears unexpectedly
11 Once more
12 Mil. probe
13 Really small
19 Matter
22 Excessively decorated
24 Unit of mass
26 Tonne or Gibson
27 Rocky pinnacle
28 Paranormal insight
29 Now I get it!
30 Occupied a chair
32 Preacher Mather
33 Cheer for a matador
34 Yule mo.
35 Wind dir.
37 Small bill
39 Successor of the OSS
42 Weakest
44 Lofty nests
46 Models of excellence
47 Calaman
48 Oklahoma city
49 Consumed
50 Upstairs storage room
51 ___ and dagger
52 Stack off
53 Walks in water
55 U.S. rocket launchers
56 Cogito ___ sum
59 Wager

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

FORTY-SEVEN DOWN: CALAMARI

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I was so ugly my mother used to feed me with a sling shot."
-Rodney Dangerfield

ECOLOGY By Jen Fill

LAST DITCH EFFORT By John Kroes

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
A fresh haircut is like prostitution: generally overpriced and not so good-looking.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Feign importance by labeling all future written compositions as memos.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You are more refreshing than the juicy wave once found in Starburst commercials.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Even the sweetest fruit tastes bitter if you savor its flavors before it's ready.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Most people would be happier if all their mirrors were just pictures of you.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Bite your friend's jugular before he gets too frisky...the best defense is a good offense.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
The early bird catches the worm; the laid-back wolverine eats the bird at like 1:30.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
The '80s (your conception included) were just a big mistake.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The above horoscope was harsh but true. Hate the game, not the playa.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
On the outside you act like the big spoon, but on the inside, you are the little spoon.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You're pregnant with affection but be careful your feelings don't emerge prematurely.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Listening to Meatloaf can turn any menial task into the most epic event of a lifetime.

Motivational, comics-themed thought of the day:

Comics is weakness leaving the body.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

Montreal weekend from $99.00 complete motel, transportation and more. Montreal Express.net 781-979-9001. Lowest prices on campus.

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

HOUSING

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906.1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101.

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birthcontrol, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins welcome. www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips Low prices guaranteed Group discounts for 8+ Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 2007 — SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen off until next Wednesday

BY ELI ROSENWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's basketball team has started the 2007-08 season strongly, finishing a five-games-in-nine-days stretch with a 4-1 record.

But UMass has to wait until Nov. 28 to return to the court, a road game against No. 21 Syracuse at the Carrier Dome. Despite playing at a high level right now, the long layoff could work to the advantage of the Minutemen.

UMass Basketball

Junior point guard Chris Lowe has missed two games this season with an injured ankle – including Saturday's matchup with Wisconsin-Green Bay – and will use the time off to get back to full strength.

It also enables coach Travis Ford to institute new plays into the offense, something he's been unable to do with the busy game schedule.

"Coming off a great game like I thought we played [Saturday], I'd like to turn around and play again," Ford said. "But this team needs a little time off for the fact that we haven't put everything in. Not only do we need a little bit of rest, but there are some offenses that I want to put in that will help us a little bit."

The layoff certainly will prove useful in preparation against the Orange; likely the toughest game on the schedule this season for the Minutemen.

A 3-POINT BARRAGE

UMass has executed Ford's new brand of basketball very well in the early going. Even without Lowe in the lineup, the Minutemen have played at the fast pace the coaching staff was looking for. And not even Ford could have hoped they would shoot this well (38.6 percent on 51-for-132 shooting) from the 3-point line.

Etienne Brower leads the way with 15 made 3-pointers on 24 attempts – good for 62.5 percent. Gary Forbes has 10, Ricky Harris has nine and Luke Bonner has seven made shots from the outside.

Against the Phoenix on Saturday, UMass connected on 15-of-32 from the 3-point line, including Brower's 7-of-10 performance. Take out the one poor shooting night in the loss to Northern Iowa on Nov. 11, and the Minutemen have hit 44.2 percent of their outside shots (46-of-104).

One of their top shooters, Ricky Harris, has struggled with his shot to start the season. He's hit on 9-of-32 attempts. But if the Minutemen continue to shoot at around the 40 percent mark, they will be a tough team to beat.

FORBES HONORED

After a week averaging 24.3 points, eight rebounds and four assists, the 6-foot-7 senior captain was honored with the Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week on Sunday. The Minutemen went 2-1 during that stretch.

Forbes reached 1,000 career points in the loss to Northern Iowa to start the week. He scored 29 points in that game, to go along with nine rebounds and two assists.

Forbes had his best all-around game Saturday in the 93-78 victory over the Phoenix at the Mullins Center. He tied Brower for a game-high 25 points (on 9-of-16 shooting, 4-of-7 from the 3-point line) and led the Minutemen with seven assists. He also added seven rebounds, three blocks and two steals ... As expected, the Minutemen have struggled with rebounding. They have been outrebounded by 5.6 rebounds per game ... Despite the up-tempo offense, the Minutemen have limited turnovers. They have 77, compared to the 103 their opponents have committed. UMass has a positive assist-to-turnover ratio with 79 assists.

Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at erosenw@student.umass.edu

Vermont hosts Mass Attack

UMass takes on struggling Catamounts in Burlington

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If today's pre-Thanksgiving game between the No. 10 Massachusetts hockey team and Vermont looks vaguely familiar, it's because the two teams squared off last season at the same time, a game that resulted in a 3-0 loss for the Minutemen at the Mullins Center.

UMass (5-2-4, 3-1-4 Hockey East), a normally stellar home-ice team, struggled in the game, getting outshot 27-15 and going 0-for-4 on the power play.

The Catamounts (2-5-1, 2-2-1 Hockey East) got the better of the Minutemen last season, winning two of three contests, including being one of just three teams to steal a win at the Mullins Center last season.

The other two games came on Feb. 16 and 17, a 3-2 UMass win, followed by another 3-0 loss. UMass was shut out three times last season, two of them coming at the hands of Vermont – the third was another 3-0 defeat, this one at Merrimack two weeks after the first loss to UVM.

Vermont struggled out of the gate this season, going the first five games without a win, but has gotten hot over the last two weeks, winning two out of its last three. A 2-1 win over Merrimack and a 5-4 victory over Boston University sandwiched an embarrassing 9-1 loss to the Terriers.

Corey Carlson scored a pair of goals and Viktor Stalberg recorded a goal and two assists in the win over BU. Stalberg is now tied for the team lead in points with six on two goals and four assists.

The Minutemen are riding a six-game unbeaten streak into Burlington, Vt., going 3-0-3 in that span. This past weekend's home-and-home series with Boston College helped launch the Mass Attack up the Hockey East standing this week.

Entering the weekend, five teams, including UMass and BC, were tied atop the conference standings. Following a 1-1 tie at home Friday and a 3-2, come-from-behind win on the road at Conte Forum, the Minutemen are in second place with 10 conference points, a point behind the surprising Northeastern Huskies, who have won four of the last five.

The three-point weekend lifted UMass from No. 14 in both the USCHO/CSTV and USA Today polls to the 10-spot this week. BC fell from No. 9 to No. 13 in the USA Today poll and from 11th to 14th in the USCHO poll.

With the game-tying goal Saturday against BC, freshman James Marcou continued his stay atop the UMass scoring leaders. Marcou leads the team with 10 points in the young season on three goals and seven assists.

Defenseman Justin Braun (two goals, five assists) and forward Chris Davis (one, six) share second place with seven points each.

In net, freshman Paul Dainton appears to have earned the starting job, but UMass coach Don Cahoon has said the incumbent sophomore Dan Meyers will see some ice time in the future.

Dainton holds a 4-2-4 record in his rookie campaign with a .923 save percentage and a 2.23 goals-against average. Dainton made 64 saves against BC in two games over the weekend, giving up three goals.

Meyers started in the win over Saint Lawrence during the opening weekend of the season, making 22 saves and giving up one goal in a 3-1 win on the road.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

BRIAN TUTTLE/COLLEGIAN

Freshman James Marcou leads the Minutemen with 10 points on three goals and seven assists this season.

Warriors sweep stumbling Black Bears

Five-game unbeaten streak puts Northeastern in first place

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Merrimack swept Maine for the first time ever this past weekend. Before the weekend series, Merrimack was 0-15-2 against Maine, dating back to 2002.

The last time that the Warriors swept a Hockey East opponent was on Feb. 18 and 19 of 2000, when Merrimack swept Northeastern.

The five goals scored in Friday night's contest was the Warrior's highest total since Merrimack defeated RPI, 5-3, on Oct. 29, 2005.

The Warriors (6-4-1, 3-4-1 Hockey East) started the season strong, winning their first three games of the season.

However, the team hit a wall when it encountered Boston College (3-3-5, 2-2-4 Hockey East) in Chestnut Hill, losing the weekend series. Since then, Merrimack has won three of its last six games, all against Hockey East opponents.

The success of the Warriors is due in large part to junior forward Rob Ricci. He is tied for third in the conference in point scoring with 12 on four goals and eight assists. All four of Ricci's goals came against conference opponents. Ricci was 45 of 65 on face-offs over the weekend.

Yet Ricci is not the only reason for Merrimack's success.

Sophomore forward Matt Jones is tied with Providence's Pierce Norton for the conference lead in goals scored, each with seven.

LOSING NOT AN OPTION

Northeastern is 4-0-1 in its last five games, its longest unbeaten streak since the Huskies had the same record from Oct. 13 through Nov. 14 in 2004.

Northeastern's longest unbeaten streak is a 12-game winning streak that the Huskies held from Nov. 25, 1980, until Jan. 20, 1981. Northeastern's last unbeaten streak was a 5-0-1 streak that the Huskies held from Jan. 6-25 of 2002.

The Huskies have five wins against Hockey East teams before Thanksgiving for the first time since 1989-90.

NU was flawless this weekend on the penalty kill, holding New Hampshire (6-2-1, 4-2-1 Hockey East) and UMass Lowell (2-3-4, 0-3-4) scoreless on power plays. In 6-of-10 games this season, the Huskies rendered penalty opportunities useless for the opposition.

Northeastern has outshot its opponents in eight games this season. However, the Huskies' 26 goals scored rank sixth on the conference. Northeastern's forwards are giving the team a balanced attack this season.

The Husky defense is led by sophomore goaltender Brad Thiessen. Making a season-high 37 saves against New Hampshire and totaling 58 stops this past weekend, Thiessen is playing a pivotal role in Northeastern's current unbeaten streak.

EFFORT REWARDED

Vermont junior forward Dean Strong can now add the title of captain to his resume. Catamounts head coach Kevin Sneddon also named junior forward Peter Lenes an assistant captain this past week.

Strong's contributions came at pivotal times for Vermont this season. Two of the Catamounts' four power-play goals came off of assists by Strong. He is the active team leader in career scoring (58 points) and is one behind Lenes in career goal scoring, with 23.

Lenes' six points tie him with two other players for the team lead in points scored. He also has a share of the team lead in goals with three, one of which came during a power-play.

Vermont scored five goals on Saturday night against Boston University (3-6-2, 3-3-1 Hockey East), its highest total since scoring six against Colgate in last year's season opener at the Icebreaker Invitational. Three of the goals came on power plays. Before the scores on the man

See HOCKEY EAST on page 6

BRIAN TUTTLE/COLLEGIAN

Merrimack center Rob Ricci led the Warriors to their first-ever sweep of Maine this weekend.

BRIAN TUTTLE/COLLEGIAN

No. 3 Memphis and head coach John Calipari defeated UConn, 81-70, last week.

Crew season ends at meet in Boston

BY COLEY MICHALIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts rowing team ended its fall season this weekend at the Foot of the Charles Regatta in Boston.

The Minutewomen competed in the Varsity 4 and the Novice 8 in their last meet of the fall season and had a strong showing against some quality competition. The A Boat finished 13th in the Varsity 4 with a time of 16 minutes, 53 seconds while the UMass B came in 28th with a time of 17:37.1.

The Novice 8 held three boats from UMass with the A, B and C boats placing fifth, eighth and 16th, respectively. The A Boat finished with a time of 16:52.1 while the B and C Boats crossed with times of 17:30.4 and 18:56.8, respectively. This season was promising for the young team as it prepares for the spring. The fall season was, for some, the first season at UMass as the team boasts 18 freshman and 14 sophomores.

The fall started off with the Head of the Textile Regatta in Lowell, where the Minutewomen dominated taking first place in the Novice 8, Open 8, Lightweight Single, and the Quad. Next came the Head of the Housatonic Regatta in Shelton, Conn., where the Minutewomen placed second in the Novice 4, Lightweight 4, Open 8 and the quad. Next was the toughest competition of the season at the Head of the Charles Regatta in Boston. The largest race in the world pegged the Minutewomen in 13th and 27th place for the Lightweight 8 and Varsity 8, respectively.

After this the team headed out to Saratoga, N.Y., to take on the competition at the Head of the Fish Regatta where it had to defend the Varsity 8 title won the previous year. The Minutewomen were successful as they won the Varsity 8 as well as claiming the Lightweight 4.

The second to last meet of the season was the Dartmouth Invitational in Hanover, N.H., where only the Novice 8 boats competed. With just the one event, the team placed second behind Radcliff by .50 seconds. The two best UMass times gave the team a final time of 33:48 and a second-place finish, placing them ahead of Northeastern, Boston University and Vermont.

With this past weekend's strong performance, in addition to the overall season performance, the Minutewomen have a lot to look forward to this spring. They will have to wait until March 22 before they get to compete again.

Coley Michalik can be reached at cmichali@student.umass.edu

No. 3 Memphis beats Connecticut

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last week's college basketball slate was full of surprises and upsets, but one of the biggest stories had to be the reunion of two coaches who shared a rather long and eventful history.

When third-ranked Memphis defeated Connecticut, 81-70, it marked the first meeting in 17 years for Memphis coach John Calipari and UConn coach Jim Calhoun. The two coaches have a history stemming from Calipari's days at Massachusetts, and the recruitment of current National Basketball Association player Marcus Camby from junior forward Jeff Adrien.

Top 25 Basketball

The Tigers knocked off the Huskies in the finals of the 2K Sports College Hoops Classic on Friday night. Freshman phenomenon Derrick Rose had a career high 24 points in the Tigers victory, but also looked a bit inexperienced with five turnovers.

Tournament MVP Chris Douglas-Roberts added 33 points, while senior forward Joey Dorsey added 12 rebounds and three blocks. Memphis had a 15-point lead early in the game with the score 18-3 five minutes into the first half.

However, the Tigers found themselves trailing by one going into the half, thanks to a pair of free throws with nine minutes left in regulation and the game tied at 60.

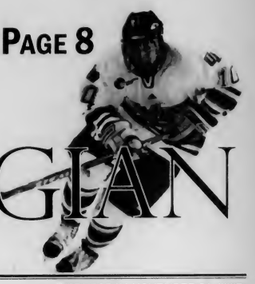
Douglas-Roberts hit consecutive foul shots to break open a second-half run and hit a jumper with just under four minutes to put the game out of the Huskies' reach.

Junior guard A.J. Pierce led UConn with 23 points and two steals, while sophomore guard Jerome Dyson added 17 points, going 5-for-13 from the field and 7-of-10 from the line. Hasheem Thabeet, the Huskies' 7-foot-3 center, added nine rebounds and eleven points. The Huskies dominated Memphis on the boards, outrebounding them, 11-3.

HOGS UPSET

No. 18 Arkansas was upset by Providence Friday night in the semifinals of the O'Reilly ESPNU Puerto Rico Tip-Off Tournament, 67-51. Friar's guard Brian McKenzie had 18 points, five rebounds and two assists while junior forward Geoffrey McDermott added 15 points, eight rebounds and three assists.

The Friars led by 10 points late in the first half, but the Razorbacks closed the gap to 32-28 at halftime thanks to guard Patrick Beverley. The sophomore had 14 points and



See TOP 25 on page 6

MASS ATTACK FALLS TO CATAMOUNTS | PAGE 8

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

CLOUDY : HI: 49 LO: 40 — WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM — WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2007

Discount drug card launched

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The United Networks of America announced the launch of a new and inexpensive drug card program in Massachusetts last week.

UNA CEO Ryan Jumonville started the non-for-profit company that uses drug cards to give customers affordable prices for prescriptions.

The card is free to all residents, regardless of age or income. Savings for the card depend on the medicine bought. Discounts can reach 75 percent by downloading and printing out the card from the Web site, MassachusettsDrugCard.com.

"We're launching programs similar to this all over the country," said Weber Mansur, the UNA Vice President of Sales and Marketing.

There are currently 700 pharmacies across Massachusetts, but the list will eventually narrow down to pharmacies promising to give discounts so consumers unable to connect to the Internet will still be eligible for the savings.

Students from the Five Colleges will benefit from the program as well because

See CARD on page 2

Here comes Winter

Elise McHugh enjoys Amherst's first snowfall of the season near the University of Massachusetts with a pair of horses yesterday morning.

Group offers sober car rides

Drivers club provides weekend transportation for students

BY KATRINA CESSNA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Two friends are looking to revolutionize the way University of Massachusetts students get home from the parties and gatherings that earn their school the nickname "ZooMass."

The Designated Drivers Club of Amherst, when fully operational, is expected to provide a solution to a classic college student grievance while also benefitting non-student residents and business owners in surrounding towns.

Matthew Ray Alvey, a senior studying communication and journalism, explained that a sober ride home is "safer than a lot of alternatives." Readily available rides home are expected to result in a decline in the number of acts of vandalism committed each year.

"A lot of that stuff happens because people are drunk and get angry that they have so far to walk," Alvey said.

Still in its trial phase, the Designated Drivers Club of Amherst (DDCoA) currently exists only on Facebook, which, combined with flyers distributed around campus, has so far been the sole means through which group members learn when rides will be available.

Alvey co-founded the group with friend Marquis Hunt, a UMass alum. Alvey, 21, and Hunt, now 23, met during Alvey's freshman year when both students lived in Central's Gorman dormitory.

Alvey said the idea for the designated driver service was sparked by a frustrating experience Hunt had while still at UMass in which he was stranded in Northampton in the early hours of the morning. Aware that the next bus for Amherst would not come for several hours, Hunt was compelled to temporarily "borrow" an unattended bike so he could make the 9.1-mile trip down treacherous Route 9.

Hunt ultimately made it home safe, and promptly returned the bike the next day to the spot he found it, but the inconvenience of that night was not easily forgotten.

The fledgling system has a few kinks to work out before it can operate the way its founders envision. One major obstacle is that neither Hunt nor Alvey owns a car, meaning they depend on sporadic support from volunteers

See RIDE on page 2

New funding for MA diabetes research

Grant to provide for three years of hormone studies

BY JOSH WALOVITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dr. Alan Schneyer, a senior faculty member at the Massachusetts General Hospital and associate professor of medicine at Harvard Medical School, has been awarded a $737,000 research grant.

The "Physiologic Roles of Activin and Myostatin Antagonists" grant will provide Schneyer with funds to research diabetes over the next three years. Schneyer currently works for the Pioneer Valley Life Sciences Institute (PVLSI).

"My research focuses on looking for hormones that lead to more and better-functioning insulin-producing cells," said Schneyer.

He believes would ultimately lead to cheaper and more accessible treatments. Schneyer is planning to study a protein called Follistatin (FS1). Follistatin plays an important role in normal development and appears to cause proliferation of insulin-producing cells.

Proliferation is the expansion of cells by the continuous division of single cells into two identical daughter cells. Different versions of FS1 will be examined to determine the function of each.

The results of those studies will lead to a new understanding of the roles of FSTL3 and FST as well as the ligands they regulate, in maintaining normal glucose metabolism and reproduction in adults. Researchers hope this provides the basis for development of new pharmaceutical approaches for treating diabetes and insulin resistance.

The studies have shown one particular form of FS1 seems to enhance the body's sensitivity to insulin and to cause proliferation of B cells.

Diabetes is a disease in which the body doesn't properly control the amount of sugar in the blood neglecting or not producing the proper insulin. As a result, the level of sugar in the blood is too high. This lack of insulin, a hormone needed to convert sugar, starches and other food into energy, is needed for daily life.

There are 20.8 million children and adults in the United States, or 7 percent of the population, who have diabetes. While an estimated 14.6 million have been diagnosed with diabetes, 6.2 million people do not know they have it.

Diabetes can be treated but there are currently no cures for it. The available treatment has cost $132 billion annually. If diabetes is left untreated or improperly managed, it can result in complications, including heart disease, kidney disease, eye disease, impotence and nerve damage.

The studies have shown one particular form of FS1 seems to enhance the body's sensitivity to insulin and to cause proliferation of B cells.

The University of Massachusetts, in cooperation with the Baystate Medical Center, created the PVLSI in 2002. PVLSI's mission is to improve human health by developing creative new approaches for the diagnosis and treatment of disease.

"We are delighted to have Dr. Schneyer working at the Institute. He is an outstanding addition to our new diabetes and metabolism group. His work has basic research and clinical implications that fit well with PVLSI's focus and strengths, as well as with the high-quality bench science of the University of Massachusetts Amherst and the research clinical work of the Baystate Medical Center," said Larry Schwartz, PVLSI's science director.

Josh Walovitch can be reached at jwalovit@gmail.com

A senior faculty member at the Massachusetts General Hospital, Dr. Alan Schneyer received a $737,000 research grant to study diabetes.

UHS offers vaccinations as flu season starts

BY HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University Health Services will be conducting two clinics in the upcoming weeks to vaccinate the University of Massachusetts community just in time for flu season.

According to UHS, many students do not know the difference between the common cold and the flu. The average person gets between one and six colds each year, recognized by the tell-tale signs of a fever, sore throat, headaches, nasal congestion and cough. Colds can last from a few days to several weeks, and are caused by one of more than 200 viruses passed on by being close to someone with a cold.

Influenza, on the other hand, starts with a high fever, shaking chills and intense muscle aches, and is usually followed by headaches, nasal congestion, sore throat, cough and weakness. Like colds, they're spread by close contact with an infected person and happens more frequently in the winter months when people are more often indoors – hence flu season, which typically lasts from November to March, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Preventing a cold can be as easy as washing hands, eating nutritiously, sleeping well and avoiding contact with sick people. Preventing the flu is as easy as getting vaccinated.

The flu shot is an inactivated vaccine, containing killed virus that is given with a needle usually in the arm. Each vaccine contains three influenza viruses: one A (H1N2) virus, one A (H1N1) virus and one B virus. The viruses in the vaccine change each year based on international surveillance and scientists' estimations about which types and strains of viruses will circulate in a given year, according to the CDC.

In general, anyone who wants to lessen their chances of getting the flu can get vaccinated.

According to the CDC, if vaccination supplies are limited or delayed, the following groups are prioritized: children ages six months to five years old; pregnant women; people ages 50 and older; and people of any age with certain chronic medical conditions; also, people who live in nursing homes and other long-term care facilities are at high risk for the flu.

On a campus as big as UMass, it is hard to avoid other people, whether they are 100 percent healthy, are sick with a small cold, or are in the early stages of the flu.

According to Ann Becker, the public health nurse at UHS, there

See FLU on page 2

Elise Rotkiewicz closes her eyes as she receives a dose of this year's flu vaccine at a University Health Services clinic.

RSO helps out locally disabled

BY EDEN CANFIELD AND CARA GRANDMANN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

Best Buddies, a new Registered Student Organization at the University of Massachusetts, is creating friendships through community service.

According to Samantha Semlitz, an associate member of the organization, Best Buddies is a non-profit organization with over 1,300 chapters nationwide and internationally. There are six different programs within the organization: Best Buddies Middle Schools, High Schools, Colleges, Citizens, e-Buddies and Best Buddies Jobs.

College Buddy, according to the Office of Community Learning Services Web site, is the program run through UMass.

In this program, students are matched up with someone in their community with an intellectual disability.

According to the official Best Buddies Web site, bestbuddies.org, there are chapters of Best Buddies on over 160 college campuses worldwide.

According to the Office of Community Learning Services Web site, "pairs, which are matched based on common interests, spend time going to movies, out to meals, attending sporting events and doing those things that both people enjoy."

On top of group events, the Best Buddies RSO at UMass requires that "members meet their buddies twice a month and call them weekly," said Semlitz.

At a group event Sunday, buddies came together to watch the Patriots game, do crafts, socialize and eat, said Semlitz.

According to the Web site the qualifications for the program are a CORI check and that the applicant is willing to make a one-year time commitment.

Cara Grandmann can be reached at cgrandma@student.umass.edu. Eden Canfield can be reached at ecanfield@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 55

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Ester
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COPYEDITOR Adam Staigin
EDITORIAL EDITOR N.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Seymezak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marsea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATION Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olsen
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Melosi
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenzweke
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Joan Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FALL AND SPRING SEMESTERS. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATED AND MANAGED BY STUDENTS. ESTABLISHED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED NINE ASSOCIATED COLLEGIATE PRESS AND INTERNATIONAL CIRCULATION. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Murphy

COPY EDITOR
Domenic Poli

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

www.DailyCollegian.com

The Massachusetts
Daily Collegian
is looking for a new
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER

ARE YOU AN EARLY RISER WITH SOME TIME BEFORE CLASS?

ARE YOU ORGANIZED, EFFICIENT, AND PROFESSIONAL?

DO YOU WANT TO BE A PART OF THE LARGEST DAILY COLLEGE NEWSPAPER IN NEW ENGLAND?

APPLY NOW:
113 CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT
DAILY COLLEGIAN OFFICES
(413)545-3500

Obama admits to drug use as a teen

BY PHILIP ELLIOTT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Presidential hopeful Barack Obama on Tuesday told high school students that when he was their age he was hardly a model student, experimenting with illegal drugs and drinking alcohol.

Obama stopped by a study hall at Manchester Central High School and answered students' questions about the war in Iraq and his education plan. But when an adult asked about his time as a student, Obama spoke bluntly.

"I will confess to you that I was kind of a goof-off in high school as my mom reminded me," said Obama, an Illinois Democrat who grew up in Hawaii

"You know, I made some bad decisions that I've actually written about. You know, got into drinking. I experimented with drugs," he said. "There was a whole stretch of time that I didn't really apply myself a lot. It wasn't until I got out of high school and went to college that I started realizing, 'Man, I wasted a lot of time.'"

Obama has written about his drug use in his memoir, "Dreams from My Father."

"Junkie. Pothead. That's where I'd been headed: the final fatal role of the young would-be black man," Obama wrote. Mostly he smoked marijuana and drank alcohol, Obama wrote, but occasionally he would snort cocaine when he could afford it.

Drugs, Obama wrote, were a way he "could push questions of who I was out of my mind, something that could flatten out the landscape of my heart, blur the edges of my memory."

Obama told students he developed his sense of social justice at college – he attended Occidental College in Los Angeles for two years before transferring to Columbia University in New York. Before he got to Columbia, he said, he lived a naive life.

"I went to high school in Hawaii, so there was a lot of opportunity to goof off because the weather is really good all the time," he said. "I did well in school, but I didn't really apply myself. I did what I needed to do to get into college and it came fairly easily to me."

His biggest interest was in sports and girls.

"I was big on basketball. We were state champs. I thought I was better than I was," said Obama, who finds time on the campaign trail to still play a pickup game.

He then added: "I thought about girls a lot, I won't lie."

During a campaign stop in Chicago, Republican presidential candidate Rudy Giuliani was asked if he thought Obama's comments to the students were appropriate.

"I respect his honesty," Giuliani said.

"One of the things that we need from our people that are running for office is not this pretense of perfection," said Giuliani, who has faced questions about his own personal life marked by three marriages and estrangement from his two children. He said of the candidates, "we're all human beings."

"If we haven't made mistakes, don't vote for us," Giuliani said.

Associated Press Writer Deanna Bellandi in Chicago contributed to this report.

JESSICA HILL/AP

Presidential hopeful Barack Obama, endorsed by Massachusetts governor Deval Patrick last month, spoke with high school students about his own teenage years.

Local pharmacies participate in plan

CARD from page 1

Amherst has four pharmacies participating in the program.

"I've always had problems affording prescription drugs," said UMass freshman Aleksandra Terentiva. "I'm glad there's finally something that will make my medicine cheaper."

Mansur said the company figures to cover every state by the end of the year. Fifteen states are currently signed on to the program, while 85 percent of the Web sites are currently under a "soft launch" – meaning they are up, but not ready for the program to officially be implemented in that state.

UNA's Web site states that in 54,000 national and regional pharmacies, an estimated 30 million consumers saved $688 million through participation in the program.

According to Mansur, UNA is still on target with their plans to meet the company's goals at year's end.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@astudent.umass.edu.

Turkey pardoned by Bush

BY BEN FELLER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

The turkey at the White House really draws a crowd. When President Bush stepped into the Rose Garden on Tuesday, he found visitors in every coveted seat, reporters standing three rows deep and staff members craning for just one good glimpse. They came for one of those signature White House moments: Bush saving the life of a huge, white, gobbling bird.

Bush granted his yearly pardon to the national Thanksgiving turkey, named "May," and a backup turkey who went unseen, who goes by "Flower."

The names were chosen in an online poll that drew more than 28,000 votes. It was close; people also liked "Wish and Bone," and "Wing and Prayer."

"They're certainly better than the names the vice president suggested, which was 'lunch' and 'dinner,'" Bush said.

Bush and the bird coexisted peacefully, although the turkey interrupted the president three times with gobbles, much to the delight of the audience.

After the pardon, the president petted the bird gently and then encouraged some young children to gather around him and do the same.

The White House made clear that the national turkey and its alternate were raised under "normal feeding" conditions. The one exception is when the birds were given some extra interaction with people so that they would be ready for their big moment at the White House.

May and Flower are now headed to Disney World in Orlando, Fla., to be honorary grand marshals at Disney's Thanksgiving Day Parade.

"May they live the rest of their lives in blissful gobbling," Bush said.

The president and first lady Laura Bush, meanwhile, flew off to the presidential retreat in Camp David, Md., for the holiday week.

Number of flu cases average

FLU from page 1

is plenty of vaccination left for anyone who attends the upcoming clinics. The previous clinics, the first of which occurred earlier in the school year, vaccinated approximately 2,200 people.

Each year for the past 10 years, UHS donates its flu surveillance statistics to a national registry that studies flu patterns. Every season is different, and the peak of activity changes as well. For this year, activity currently is low, according to Becker, which is usual for late November.

"By this time, anyone who wants to be vaccinated may do so before health care faculty and first-priority groups," she said. "We encourage a lot of people to get vaccinated."

UHS has a partnership with the UMass School of Nursing, which allows nursing students to help with the vaccinations. Though the nursing students are completely supervised by trained professionals, patients are allowed to waive their help to get treated by a UHS professional.

While not likely, it is possible that a case of the flu could turn into pandemic influenza. As a plan for preparation, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and the CDC have recommended that all colleges and universities develop a plan for pandemic illness, like Middlebury College in Vermont has done.

The Middlebury campus has already sought out a plan for the worst-case scenario, according to their Web site.

"The Emergency Planning Steering Committee has concluded that the safest response during a potential pandemic would be to close the College – ideally before the illness strikes – and all students would be required to vacate the campus until it was deemed safe to return," the site says.

The clinics, which will be held Nov. 30 and Dec. 12 from 8-11:30 a.m. at UHS, will prepare everyone by preventing the diagnosis and spread of influenza. The vaccination costs $25.

More information about how to spread awareness about the pandemic is available at www.studentsprepamerica.org.

Holly Seabury can be reached at hseabury@student.umass.edu.

Safe car rides home provided by new student organization

RIDE from page 1

Another problem is that demand for rides is already high, so the sober ride service is currently only available to students in Amherst and Hadley. Finally, the buddy system of two sober members per vehicle, though safer for volunteers, has led to scheduling conflicts, so rides have so far been offered on only a handful of occasions.

Last week, the DDCoA submitted a formal application to the University to be recognized as a Registered Student Organization in a process that included drafting a constitution, formulating a mission statement and obtaining signatures from official members, of which Alvey estimates there are 30.

RSO status "kind of legitimizes us," Alvey said. "It will make it easier for us to book rooms where we can hold meetings."

Hunt and Alvey hope gaining RSO status will facilitate a greater volunteer participation.

Funding will be problematic for the group until it gains outside financial aid. Rides will have to remain free of cost, or drivers could potentially be charged with operating an illegal taxi service.

In the meantime, the group has employed innovative strategies to defray the soaring cost of oil, such as asking riders to make a $1 "donation" to the fund.

Despite these challenges, DDCoA has had promising student turnout on its first few trial runs. Alvey drove Friday and Saturday last week, bringing home 30-35 and 40-45 students, respectively. According to Alvey, only about 10 of the riders were personal friends of his and Hunt's. The remaining riders were "a lot of class of 2010 kids, which is great," he said, "because we don't want too many seniors to get dependent on the ride home and then suddenly not have it [when they graduate]."

Alvey explained that younger students are also better equipped to contribute to the ride share program's goal of sustainability, expressing hope that the group will be active on campus for many years.

In the meantime, he is cautiously optimistic about the group's success so far in advertising its services. The high turnout of Southwest residents during one of the past few weekends – despite that flyers were only placed in Central and Orchard Hill dormitory clusters – encouraged Alvey and Hunt.

"We are trying to put the word out slowly, because the worst thing that could happen is people call and we can't help them out," he said.

Part of the remedy to this problem will be that all potential riders will eventually be required to become members of the Facebook group in order for the co-founders to keep track of demand and recruit volunteers accordingly.

Rides are typically offered on Friday and Saturday nights between 11 p.m. and 3:15 a.m. The Facebook group is open, listing multiple suggestions of ways students can help the DDCoA, even those not interested in driving or lending their cars.

Students interested in volunteering as drivers must have a valid license and a clean driving record.

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD
Special Student Rate
Local-National Placement
Includes Certification
1-800-357-3210
BostonBartender.com

Nude causes crashes

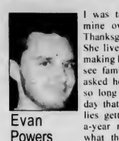
Delaware State Police have arrested a Chester, Pennsylvania, man who they said was running naked and drunk on Interstate-95 and caused three accidents.

Police said Ardonas Gilbert, 26, was running along the southbound lanes near Marsh Road about 10 p.m. Monday. He is charged with two counts of assault and a single count of being drunk on the highway.

Two citizens tried to help Gilbert, but police say he began to assault them. Then police said he ran back into traffic and caused three accidents when cars tried to avoid hitting him.

No one was seriously injured.

Gilbert is being held at the Howard Young Correctional Institute in Wilmington.



Associated Press

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself"
Sir Salman Rushdie

And they call this a break?

Evan Powers

I was talking with a friend of mine over the weekend about Thanksgiving break coming up. She lives in Nebraska, and she's making her first trip back home to see family in over four years. I asked her why it had taken her so long to go home for a holiday that's centered around families getting together in a once-a-year reunion to catch up on what they've been doing, how they've been, and to just be able to take some time to be with parents, children, aunts, uncles and other family members, as they've all been apart for the majority of the past three months, or more. She simply said, "It just hasn't been worth the cost for me to go home for such a small amount of time."

It's now Wednesday, the day before Thanksgiving, and you're probably reading this article wondering when your last class gets out so you can pack your car up and get home and stuff yourself with food and relax for a few days before you enter the dreaded final three weeks of the semester, when the workload really starts to weigh down on your shoulders. It's either that, or you're not reading this article because you've already skipped out of town and out of classes to squeeze in an extra few days with your family and friends, and to justify spending a large sum of money on a plane or train ticket home if you live far enough away from campus.

The fact that classes run up until Wednesday afternoon, the day before Turkey Day, leaves students in a tough decision: do I stick around in town and go home for three days and then worry about having to get back to school, should I skip one, two, even three days of classes so I can actually go home to relax and rest up for the final weeks of the semester, or is it too much money and too much of an inconvenience to fly home for just three days? Will I have to miss Thanksgiving with my family this year?

Amherst College began their break last week. Yes, we're a public university. Yes, they're a private college ... But something needs to be done.

These are questions many students have to deal with, and each scenario is chaotic and undesirable, and sometimes just ridiculous. Having to stay at classes until Wednesday, then driving home that night, if you can make it, to get home for Thanksgiving the following day, is a lot to ask for by itself.

Then consider the fact that many families still have traveling of their own to do on Thanksgiving Day, so the trip is just beginning when you have to pack your things and get back home with barely enough time to unpack your things before you have to do it all over again. Do you feel like skipping classes all week so you can get home for more than a quick hello? Sure, that's possible, but while many professors do cancel their classes on Wednesday, some even on Tuesday, it's not always the case, and you're marked absent and missing out on class material that's always important come finals time, now that we've entered that period where professors are pushing to cram in as much lecture material as possible to make up for lost time during the semester.

As for students who live across the country and need a flight home? That's possible if a $250 ticket is easy to come by and you can deal with jet lag and waiting hours at the airport over a five-day period. If you can't, well, you may have to anyways if you don't live in a nine-month dorm on campus or you don't have a place nearby to stay.

The Thanksgiving holiday that UMass gives its students and faculty is far too short. Two days off and then the weekend makes it difficult for some students to even be able to get home and see their families and friends, and it gives hardly any time to spend with them to those who are lucky to get home. After a day of eating, and most likely traveling on Thursday and Friday, you have one more day before you have to worry about getting back to school. Amherst College began their break last week. Yes, we're a public university. Yes, they're a private college, and things are run differently there.

I'm aware. But something needs to be done. Give us an extra day. Give us Wednesday off. Or give us the Monday following Thanksgiving off. Students should be able to enjoy their Thanksgiving break, and not have to mull over ideas like "I've got to head back to school the day after tomorrow, and I just got home." I mean, I can't even digest my turkey that fast.

Evan Powers is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at epowers@student.umass.edu.

This weekend, you will be faced with many options: time with family, time with turkey, time with college football, and time spent filling out an application for a position as an Ed/Op cartoonist at the Daily Collegian.

Choose wisely.

Land of the free, home of the woefully dumb

Ben Duffy

Winston Churchill has been quoted as saying: "Democracy is the worst form of government except all those other forms that have been tried from time to time." Churchill's droll remark may have stemmed for the irony of having lost the election of July 1945, just three months after Nazi Germany capitulated. You might think that the British people would have re-elected the great leader ad-infinitum, if only because of his foresight and wartime leadership; but you would be wrong.

I'm frequently reminded of Churchill's quote when I watch our own government in action. Though we are not intended to be a democracy in its purest form, we are supposed to be a democratic constitutional republic. We don't always live up to that ideal, as we witnessed this June when our state legislature refused to allow the citizens of Massachusetts to vote on same-sex "marriage." Nonetheless, that should always be the goal.

I get a little worried when I meet Americans who don't understand the difference between the Declaration of Independence and the U.S. Constitution, or can't distinguish Teddy Roosevelt from Franklin Roosevelt. How did these people pass the eighth grade? I don't want to sound elitist, but should these people be voting?

On the one hand, voting is a cornerstone of our nation and universal suffrage is something that we struggled to obtain. On the other hand, if someone is too apathetic to pay attention to what's going on, then I hope that person is also apathetic enough not to vote. I won't deny anyone suffrage, but if some people choose not to exercise that right, that's fine with me.

Jay Leno's "Jaywalking" segments are great entertainment if you enjoy laughing at ignoramuses. In one such "Jaywalking" segment, Leno visited Washington, D.C., and posed some pretty basic questions to real citizens. He interviewed Bethany, a University of Nebraska student. "Bethany, how many senators for the state of Nebraska?" asked Leno. "One," she replied. Leno cringed at this answer. "Two?" she said. "Two. Can you name your two senators?" asked Leno. "No, I cannot."

So Bethany thinks her state has one senator, and James thinks his state has 30. Astounding.

James, a schoolteacher from Atlanta, was asked how many senators Georgia has. He answered that Georgia has 30 senators. So Bethany thinks her state has one senator, and James thinks his state has 30. Astounding.

When liberals talk about "informed democracy," it's usually a ruse to browbeat the already liberal media into moving further to the left. They claim that the press is doing a poor job of informing the citizenry which it is – but then complain that the press isn't doing a good enough job of disseminating the liberal talking points.

I have another idea as to how we can have an informed democracy. Let's require every voter to pass a basic test of civics and American history.

Am I making this proposal in all seriousness? No. It seems vaguely un-American and I'm sure that the Democrats and perhaps also the Republicans would oppose it. Politicians are generally satisfied to keep the electorate dumb. Someone would certainly also argue that such a test would be too similar to the literacy tests that were outlawed by the Voting Rights Act of 1965. So this is never going to happen.

But let's be hypothetical for a moment. Imagine having to pass a test in order to vote. Nothing too difficult, of course, only the things we should have learned in our primary education, but probably didn't learn because our teachers were too busy presenting "Heather has Two Mommies" and various other liberal pet causes. I wouldn't expect anyone to write an essay explaining the Roosevelt Corollary to the Monroe Doctrine, or to identify who wrote the majority opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut. Basic questions might include: "Who represents you in Congress?" (For me, that would be John Olver, John Kerry and Ted Kennedy.) "Who is the Chief Justice of the United States?" (John Roberts.) "Which amendment contains the words 'separation of church and state'?" (Trick question, none of them do.)

Actually, some Americans did have to pass a test in order to vote. They're called naturalized citizens. I'm sometimes embarrassed that naturalized citizens seem to know more about this country than the native-born. My boss, for example, is a Greek-born American citizen. One day last semester, he started to quiz the people in the kitchen about the Constitution. Many people were appallingly uneducated. "What are the five freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment?" he asked. There was a lot of head-shaking and mumbling. "Th.. freedom of...uh." But my boss knew. That's because he was once a young man just off the boat from Greece who wanted to become an American so badly that he learned enough civics and American history to earn citizenship.

Having an "informed democracy" is easier said than done. If we really want an informed democracy, it might be necessary to tell some people that they can't vote. No one's really prepared to do that, but it might be an interesting experiment. How many people would be able to vote if testing were required? How many Americans would fail miserably? It's a little scary to ponder.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at benjaminduffy@hotmail.com

'BOY, I CAN'T WAIT TO TAKE A BREAK FROM DOING NOTHING!'

POINT:
GOBBLE.

COUNTERPOINT:
GOBBLE!

editorial@
dailycollegian.com

In DC, nine robes still don't make a right

Dan Nicastro

At the beginning of the month, the Supreme Court placed a moratorium on executions until it could review a recent challenge that claims lethal injections violate the Eighth Amendment's guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment. The outcome of this case (which is scheduled to be argued in January) is not certain, which is somewhat remarkable for a Court widely considered to be the most conservative in years.

While debates continually rage about the effectiveness and morality of the death penalty as a form of punishment, this is probably the most serious conversation America has had about this form of penalty since the early 1970s. We've had 35 years to think about what to say and its time we spoke. The death penalty should not hold any place in American society.

As is the case with wars, citizens are willing to throw their support behind state-sponsored executions because they are deaths by proxy. Those who have retired from the military often say that we would be involved in fewer wars if more people understood the physical costs and effects of war. The same seems to be true with the death penalty, as those involved are the ones beginning to rail against it.

A recent Newsweek article shows that while popular support for the death penalty has remained consistently over 50 percent, those who are actually involved in administering death sentences (including lawyers, judges, juries and the doctors who act as executioners) are becoming much more hesitant to administer the death penalty in both the legal and literal sense of the word. Shouldn't we learn a lesson from this? Those who are charged with the task of carrying out death sentences are beginning to step back and reevaluate the efficacy and morality of state-sponsored execution.

This is not to suggest that many of these prisoners are innocent bystanders. On the contrary, most of the criminals on death row are guilty of the horrific crimes for which they were convicted. It is also true that the crimes for which the death penalty is imposed are absolutely, devastatingly evil. I have never been (and hopefully never will be) put in the awful position many victims' families are forced into by those who end up on death row and I can't imagine the anger and pain they must feel. However, while it may be hard to remember when we hear about these terrible deeds, justice is not synonymous with revenge and the American justice system is not based on retribution.

Condoning execution is tantamount to crowning the state a supreme moral authority.

America is in love with the concept of retribution and "cowboy justice." It's strikingly evident in the world that we as a society which finds it necessary to abandon our modern definition of justice when it makes us feel comforted in the short term.

The common quote used by death penalty opponents is Gandhi's: "An eye for an eye makes the whole world blind." My favorite however actually comes from the television show "Law & Order." At the end of an episode examining the characters reactions to an execution, I exclaim Van Buren ends a letter she is writing by commenting that the death penalty "is way too much, and not enough." Let's hope the Supreme Court heeds her advice.

Dan Nicastro is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dnicastro@student.umass.edu

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Re: Yale professor lectures on existence of God

I attended Greg Gamsle's talk on the existence of God and was severely disappointed with the lack of real substance that he presented in support of his view that God exists. He spoke of a God that is ironically the same "God" that I believe in, despite the fact that most people would feel the need to classify me an "atheist." I reject all biblical Gods, religious doctrines, ,and I despise dogma. What I don't reject is the immensity, beauty, and intricacies of our massive universe. I marvel at the very existence or "miracle" of a universe and even more when thinking about the concept of space-time and the presence and possibilities that come with what we know as consciousness.

Gamsle proclaimed himself a Christian but I couldn't help wondering what part of the God he mentioned led him to believe and follow the doctrine of Christianity. Why is he not Hindu? What is it that stops him from seeing truth in the claims and beliefs of Muslims, Jews, Jains, or Buddhists? I think that religious moderates and even scholars like Dr. Gamsle make a profound mistake in claiming truth to their religion. While I am well aware of the benefits of religious worship, as I have experienced it myself growing up, I feel that organized religions and their respective doctrines ultimately bring more suffering to this world than they seek to alleviate. Religion continues to act as quite possibly the most divisive and intolerant ideology that has ever surfaced on this planet. Our current generation has witnessed the brutal impact of religious dogma perhaps more clearly than ever. As Sam Harris says in his best-selling book "The End of Faith", "We all remember September 11th, the day 19 pious men showed our pious nation just how useful religious certainty can be." It is easy for the average religious moderate here in the United States to see atrocities like Sept. 11 not as a product of religion, but a lack of education, economics, or cultural humiliation. The fact is that moderates find it extremely hard to believe that people actually believe what they say they believe.

If this example doesn't strike close enough to home I could point to how unsubstantiated, and frankly illogical, religious opinions are hindering the progression of science's (and possibly humanity's) greatest medical hope: stem cell research. There is also that whole idea of the church dictating what kinds of people are entitled to represent their love under the law. While it is easy to point out the steep dividends society must pay out to religion, I think it is also important to note that leaving dogma behind does not in the least mean leaving a moral or spiritual place behind. I realize that my brief synopsis of Gamsle's talk leaves a lot left unsaid. There are surely many areas that are up to discussion and debate but I felt a need to initiate some thought and hopefully some civilized conversation on the idea of "God." I desperately look forward to the day when we all come to see each other not as Christians, Muslims, and Jews but merely human beings with a capacity and will to love others as we would like to be loved.

Mark O'Brien, UMass student

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Modern sound and love highlight new album

Angels and Airwaves release much-hyped sophomore CD

Tom DeLonge (bottom) formally of the pop/punk group Blink 182 now fronts the group Angels and Airwaves (top). Their sophomore release, "I-Empire," is not as strong as their first album "We don't need to whisper," but it delivers something that Blink fans will enjoy.

By Michelle Abbasciano
Collegian Staff

Shortly after the release of their Greatest Hits album in February of 2005, legendary pop/punk band Blink 182 broke up, or as the band put it, "went on an indefinite hiatus." By November of 2005, Tom DeLonge (former guitarist and vocalist) revealed his new masterpiece project: Angels and Airwaves.

"I-Empire," released Nov. 1, is Angels and Airwaves' second release in two years. Although not as popular as their first album, "We Don't Need To Whisper" it still made a fairly big splash in the music industry, debuting on the Billboard charts at No. 9, with sales reaching 66,000 its first week.

"It is the second half of our first album. It reflects an idea that the world is yours for the taking, and all that exists, exists inside you. It can be something as trivial as a personal struggle, or as grand as the inescapable idea of world peace," said DeLonge.

The majority of the songs on "I-Empire" consist of swirling guitars and melodic choruses. Some may describe the sound as a mixture of Blink 182 and U2, with a hint of techno intertwined throughout the tracks. No matter what band you compare them to, there is no doubt their music is electronic-sounding at its core.

Their music is also very modern-sounding. The album is not quite up to par with their first CD, which was received enthusiastically and positively by old Blink 182 fans and new, interested listeners alike.

However, it is epic, just as DeLonge had promised; epic in the sense that it is original and highly unique, but not necessarily "revolutionary."

Although the track lengths are a bit spastic, ranging from a mere 44 seconds to nearly seven minutes, most of the tracks hover around four minutes.

The opening track, "Call to Arms," although a bit slow at first, is a good introduction song, with a catchy beat and an overall uplifting feeling. The vocals are strange and sound somewhat spacey, yet still appealing in their own way.

"Everything's Magic" is much faster and buoyant from the start, with clapping and synthesizers taking over the backdrop, while the vocals and pop-beat make the song sound like a commercial jingle of some sort.

The band's intent was to have an upbeat, positive message, not necessary about one's own life, but about living in general, and being happy to be alive with the whole world in front of them. This attitude and message really shines through on nearly all the tracks.

"Breathe" is another slower song, with "I love you, you make me feel alive, I love you," the basis of the song, repeated over and over. The song slowly picks up, with catchy drum beats in the background, but continues to repeat the aforementioned chorus until its conclusion.

Tom DeLonge has obviously matured a great deal since Blink 182. This is not only evident in the lyrical aspect of Angels and Airwaves, but musically as well. The record is definitely more advanced and its content includes heavier material.

"Rite of Spring" is the most honest track on the album and shows DeLonge spilling his story to anyone who will listen, while wearing his heart on his sleeve the whole time, yet still maintaining the positive vibes.

One of the best tracks is "Secret Crowds." It begins with strong guitar riffs and then goes on to carry a catchy tune, with the lyrics exclaiming, "If I had my own world, I'd build you an empire." This song is definitely the stand-out track, and probably one of the most appealing.

"Lifeline" is a much slower and low-key track with synthesized sounds in the background, as DeLonge's vocals build up to a high-pitched squeal by the song's peak. One can't help but respect his efforts to churn out music that sounds unlike anything on the market, although it does seem at times that he may be trying too hard.

DeLonge's vocals are distinctive to say the least, and can be somewhat awkward and almost squeaky or too high for his own limitations at times. The vocals are stronger on their first album, although it could be argued that the vocals on "I-Empire," just aimed for a different sound.

The opening build-ups of some tracks turn out disappointing because they don't exactly lead up to anything impressive. The bodies of the songs themselves, however, seem to make up for the drawn-out, deceiving intros.

It takes "True Love" nearly two full minutes to build up and cue in the vocals, which, for some, might get boring. "Heaven" also takes a while to build up, rather unimpressively, but again, the body of the song makes up for that with a chilling, yet catchy, chorus.

Most of the lyrics and song content of "I-Empire" has to do with love. For some, this might be very overdone and cliché, but DeLonge's words are honest and the songs include real-life situations, so that pattern can easily be looked over. Although the lyrics are repetitive and many of the lines repeat themselves in the songs, the music is still refreshing, and its overall unique sound keeps it interesting.

The chemistry between the members of Angels and Airwaves is undeniable, and very evident in their music. They all have a common goal and interest and their hearts are all in the same place.

All in all, the musical progression of the whole band is really quite astounding. The band plans on releasing a documentary of their music tentatively entitled "Start the Machine" as well as a feature film titled "I-Empire."

Michelle Abbasciano can be reached at mabbasci@student.umass.edu

'Hitman' fails to strike target

By Roger Moore
The Orlando Sentinel

"Hitman," the thriller based on the mass-murdering assassin video game, is a "Bourne" knock-off, and not a very good one at that. It has the killer without an identity, lots of other killers out to kill him, all set to a score that "Bourne" composer John Powell should consider suing for violating his movie music copyright.

Timothy Olyphant is the bald Bourne, a skinhead in a "Men in Black" suit with a bar-code tattooed in plain sight on the back of his skull. Somehow, all of Interpol can't find this killer despite the fact that he stands out in any crowd.

He was, the opening credits show us, raised by monks to murder, a literal man without a name. He is called, we learn, "47."

Our killer does in some nasty Nigerians in the opening moments. But it's when he takes a shot at the ruthless Russian president that Interpol, in the person of an agent played by Dougray Scott, closes in. The Russians, shockingly, want jurisdiction over this guy who just tried to assassinate their leader. Much bickering in Russian-accented English ensues.

There's an under-explained, under-developed conspiracy by something called "The Organization" that wants to keep our chatty killer quiet. And 47's own "Agency" sends dudes armed with pistols and samurai swords to get him as well.

Skip Woods, who wrote the script to "Swordfish," earns a writing credit here. It's one he might be a little reluctant to take, what with cliché'd public-restroom shootouts and lines such as "You have no idea who you're dealing with" coming from Mr. Interpol, cut-and-pasted from 134 other movies and slapped into this.

Olyphant, sort of a younger Bill Paxton, made a lousy villain in last summer's "Live Free or Die Hard." Even with his head shaved and his silver guns with silver silencers always at the ready, he seems miscast as an amoral automaton of a killer. It's a character better left in the soulless void of video-gaming, where we don't have to fret over the psyche of somebody raised since childhood to murder, and how they might fit in with civilized society. Olyphant seems to want to emote something more into this guy. He can't.

Thank heavens for the nudity. Not his, but model-actress Olga Kurylenko's. She's the "witness" 47 decides to protect, and hang onto. He courts her and rebuffs her sexual advances and sort of forgets she wasn't a witness to anything and that her purpose in the picture is nothing more than eye candy. Well, she does get this one chewy line, aimed at the killer who is about to knock off his umpteenth foe. "Please . . . stop."

Sure, director Xavier Gens did this just for the paycheck. But if you're going to rip off "The Bourne Identity," you at least want the frequent-flyer miles.

Timothy Olphant and Olga Kurylenko star in the film adaptation of the popular video game series "Hitman." The film follows the journey an assasin named 47 (Olphant) as he runs from Interpol, the Russians and The Agency.

Creem filled nostalgia

Rock 'n' roll magazine puts out greatest hits compilation

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

Whereas a corporate institution like Rolling Stone would do well to stop celebrating itself so much via book spinoffs, the legendary Detroit publication Creem has been long overdue a proper tribute.

"Creem: America's Only Rock 'n' Roll Magazine," expertly compiled and designed by editors Robert Matheu and Brian J. Bow. ($29.95, from HarperCollins), more than gets the job done with an eye-popping, nostalgia-inducing, nearly-300-page sampling of this fantastically erratic but never boring bastion of truly free-wheelin' rock journalism longtime home to Lester Bangs, for starters.

The writing of Nick Tosches, Dave Marsh, Dave DiMartino, Ben Edmonds, Chuck Eddy and the young Cameron Crowe are featured (though curiously Robert Christgau and Greil Marcus are absent), and there's much insight to be gleaned from their unrestrained essaying about subjects both seminal (Pink Floyd, Sex Pistols, the Clash, New York Dolls) and cultish (Marc Bolan, Screamin' Jay Hawkins).

Yet, in summarizing the history of such a deliberately over-the-top mag that ran from March 1969, when the Stooges and the MC5 mattered most to Creemers, until November 1988, when Guns N' Roses and Beastie Boys had become mainstays Matheu and Bowe have wisely sought to re-create on an epic scale the endless hours of adamantly irreverent fun Creem always delivered, from its recurring Boy Howdy! profiles and Creem Dreem pinups both female (Bebe Buell) and male (Adam Ant) to an array of Stars Cars spotlights (dig the Ramones and their beat-up Pinto) and a load of beautifully reprinted covers.

Naturally, the mag's justifiably unwavering hometown emphasis also surfaces throughout, allotting Alice Cooper and Bob Seger, among others, their due space ... and leaving me wondering how Creem might have fared if it had lasted long enough to see the likes of Eminem, Kid Rock and the White Stripes.

It was unlike any other magazine at the time, and it remains so.

"In the Midwest (in the '70s and early '80s), rock music press and info was very hard to find," recalls Cheap Trick drummer Bun E. Carlos in Bowe's introduction. "Rolling Stone was pompous and long-winded. Circus magazine seemed to religiously print the record company propaganda. Rock Scene magazine had mostly New York City gossip but at least it had photos. Amateur photos at best. But Creem was like us. Creem was the wise-ass middle child who wanted the details, all the scoop. They had good pictures and good articles, great reviews and the right amount of know-it-all humor and irony. It was perfect for the post-Watergate universe we were living in."

And so much of it holds up, still such a vivid joy to take in on big glossy pages, I highly recommend it.

Now-defunct Creem Magazine has compiled a collection of articles that were published between 1969 and 1988. Entries include stories about Cheap Trick, Alice Cooper and Bob Seger.

Tips for surviving the Black Friday shopping madness

By Jonathan Takiff
Philadelphia Daily News

Black Friday bargains. They don't call them "door busters" for nothing!

A 42-inch Panasonic plasma TV for $899 at Best Buy. A JVC MiniDV camcorder for $179.99 and Onkyo 7.1 channel home theater system for $399.99 at Circuit City. A Sony Vaio notebook computer with 15.4-inch display, 1GB Ram and 160 GB HD for $649.99 at Office Depot.

A Samsung laser printer for $49.99 and a Navigon 2100T mobile GPS system slashed to $99.99, one-third of the original price with a lifetime subscription to real-time traffic updates tossed in for free at Staples. Oh, and while you're at that last store, don't forget to ask for a universal A/V remote control absolutely free, while supplies last.

These are just the sort of comeons that will have people up and running at 4 a.m. this Friday and standing in line outside their favorite store by dawn. All so they can be first to bust through the doors to score a Black Friday super-special deal on a high-tech product or three.

Bargain-hunting on the biggest shopping day of the year can really pay off. Many retailers and product makers will literally be giving their stuff away at cost, or even losing money on every sale (but making it up in volume at least that's the way the joke goes).

You know those Toshiba HD-DVD players Wal-Mart had a couple of weeks ago at a "pre-Black Friday" special price of $99? One industry analyst estimated that it cost the electronics company as much as $500 to build just one of those babies. This Friday, Sears will have a variant priced at $169.99, still a deal.

How about that Mitsubishi 65-inch, DLP rear-projection set that Best Buy will offer this Friday at $1,499? I can't believe anybody's making a dime at that price.

In these cases, the retailer and the product maker see an opportunity to create brand loyalty and build market share in a retail environment filled with strong competition.

The merchants also hope you'll buy other and more profitable items and services (like extended warranties) while you're there (that's called "attachment rate"). And their manufacturing partners, often arm-twisted by the major chains to eliminate minimum advertised price restrictions for Black Friday, hope to benefit from good store placement of their products in the future and higher prominence in buyers' minds next time they make a purchase.

Jumping into the Black Friday fray? It pays to do some "due diligence" reconnaissance in advance.

1. Do your research. Pick up the paper Thursday or Friday and study the Black Friday circulars. Or do an online search linking a store or product with the phrase "Black Friday." I've found leaked circular info at www.black-friday.net, a site some chains seem to welcome but others find appalling.

Sears was among the first major operations this year to have its very serious list of post-Turkey Day tech specials leaked, and all that info is still available at the site. But party pooper Wal-Mart threatened legal action if the chain's proprietary pricing information wasn't removed. (Can't find it on the site now.)

2. Read professional and user reviews of the advertised products. Find them at sites like CNET.com and Amazon.com. From the posting date, you'll be able to figure out approximately how long the product's been available, if it's the latest model or last spring's big thing.

Your gift recipient might frown at getting an "old," 6-megapixel digital camera when the latest models boast seven or even 10 megapixels. Unless the user's going to crop and blow up pictures to poster-sized prints, a 5-or 6-megapixel camera is fine and the memory card won't fill up nearly as quickly.

On the other hand, that AV surround sound receiver bargain at $99 will be lacking some truly worthy new features like high-definition HDMI digital picture sound switching.

3. You must get there early to get the deals. Otherwise, the early birds will steal your worm. Case study. In nab one of those Toshiba HD-DVD players at Wal-Mart, I showed up five minutes after the department opened. All 22 pieces allotted to the store had already sold out. More savvy buyers had figured out they could line up an hour before the sale commenced.

For Black Friday, some stores are opening as early as 5 a.m. with special pricing available till only 10 a.m. Rain checks are a rarity on hot Black Friday items. And in some instances a store might have just four or five pieces of a loss leader.

Other stores try harder not to disappoint. Staples "plans to have what we think will be enough product, to satisfy all the customers who show up during the special sales hours," said executive vice president of merchandising Peter Scala. But for safety's sake, be counseled, hit the "essential" store on your list first.

4. Look into online specials. Some sites, such has Hhgregg.com, may offer the same deals available in stores. I've also heard of instances when the Internet price gets activated a day early, on Thanksgiving. And many online merchants have created a response to Black Friday super-specials offered on the next Back-to-Work day, a.k.a. Cyber Monday.

5. Get a grip. Not all cheap deals are worth it. Yes, a mainstream-brand gizmo slashed to 50 percent of list price is a steal literally below the dealer's cost. Where things get iffy is with unfamiliar and house (private label) branded goods.

You'll pay even less, but the quality will likely be at least a little off. And good luck trying to find somebody to fix a no-name piece of merchandise when the item is out of 90-day or one-year warranty.

HDGuru site master Gary Merson recently studied the warranties and repair policies of second and third "tier" flat-panel TV set makers. He found there was literally no service network at all for Polaroid branded products (no relation to the camera company), leading him to characterize the merchandise as "disposable TVs."

And while he found that Vizio was willing to service its product out of warranty, the cumulative cost to buy and ship a 42-inch set back to company headquarters in California, plus the flat-fee repair work and return shipping, added up to about $1,100 just shy of what a new set costs.

You could buy an extended warranty from the retailer as an insurance policy, but it makes more sense to invest that "difference" in a better quality set with higher performance and a better track record on repairs," said Richard Gilley, executive director of Home Theater Specialists of America.

The day after Thanksgiving, commonly referred to as Black Friday, is a shopper's dream and a horrible nightmare rolled into one. Monumental sales mixed with human craziness lead to scenes like these in retail outlets around the country.

Arts is currently looking to hire a new assistant arts and living editor for next semester. Anyone interested should stop in the newsroom to get an application.

Email: arts@dailycollegian.com

NCAA COLLEGE BASKETBALL
TWO GREAT TEAMS ONE GREAT TICKET
UMASS MINUTEMEN
VS.
MARIST
Saturday, December 8th
Tickets on sale now
Mohegan Sun Arena
ticketmaster 860.894.0070 (CT) | 212.307.7171 (NY) | 413.733.2500 (MA)
TICKETMASTER.COM | MOHEGANSUN.COM

16 players grab CAA honors

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts football team hosts Fordham Saturday in the first round of the NCAA Division I Football Championship Tournament, one angle the team can not use for motivation is a lack of respect.

After repeating as conference champions and claiming a share of the first-ever Colonial Athletic Association title, the Minutemen were awarded with 17 all-conference selections, which led the conference. UMass set a record with 20 last season.

The Maroon and White earned seven first-team, four second-team and five third-team selections.

Offensive lineman Matt Austin, defensive end Davis Burris, linebackers Jason Hatchell and Charles Walker, wide receiver J.J. Moore and cornerbacks Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson earned first-team honors. Robinson was also selected for the third team as a kick returner.

Offensive lineman Sean Calicchio, quarterback Liam Coen, running back Matt Lawerence and wide receiver Rasheed Rancher made the second team, while defensive tackle Brandon Collier, offensive lineman Nick Diana, kicker Chris Koepplin, safety Jeromy Miles and Robinson as a kick returner made the third team.

One noticeable omission from the UMass roster is defensive end Michael Hanson. The sophomore was a force on defense throughout the season, especially as a pass rusher. Hanson tied for fifth in the CAA with seven sacks this season and second with 15 tackles for a loss. He was also fifth on the team with 56 tackles.

UMass coach Don Brown was dismissive of the fact that Hanson wasn't selected, essentially saying you can't get everyone on the all-conference list.

"I last year we got 20 guys on the team, this year we've got 17. I do the best I can do," he said. "I think I give all my guys a fair shake. You're not allowed to vote, you're only allowed to comment."

Thanksgiving Day off

With Thanksgiving tomorrow, preparation for Saturday's game against Fordham can get complicated, as players try to get home to their families on Thursday. Brown is giving his players about a 24-hour leave, from Thursday morning to Friday afternoon.

"We're going to practice Thursday morning. We'll finish at 10:15, and I'm giving them a window until 1 o'clock on Friday, we have lunch, then meetings, then practice," Brown said.

After last year's national championship run, Brown and most of his players have some experience handling the unorthodox schedule.

"Thanksgiving week is the most difficult of the four playoff weeks," Brown said. "We know how to go about it logistically, coupling family with the football business at hand. Being there before certainly gives you an opportunity to at least understand what you're getting yourself into."

For a lot of players that live too far away to get home and back in a day, Brown is also holding a team dinner on Thursday.

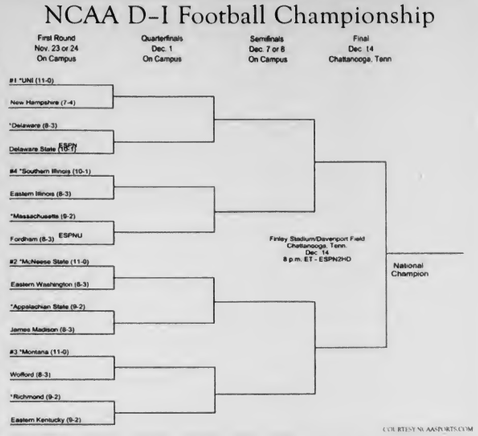
"There's a group of about 25 that I'm taking to dinner," Brown said. "The whole goal is if players want to be with their families locally, or if they want to take a player, that's fine, but we don't want to leave anybody alone on Thanksgiving."

UMass and Fordham will kick off at noon Saturday at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

Minutemen host Rams

FOOTBALL from page 8



ning back Matt Lawrence (1,306 rushing yards, 13 touchdowns) and receiver J.J. Moore (891 receiving yards and five touchdowns). UMass averages 29.7 points per game.

Defensively, UMass ranks first in the CAA in scoring defense, allowing 16.4 points per game — easily besting the second-best defense in the conference (James Madison, 21.5). Defensive ends David Burris and Michael Hanson were the leading sack tandem in the conference, with 16.

Fordham has been equally impressive on offense, averaging 28.5 points per game. Quarterback John Skelton has thrown for 19 touchdowns (10 interceptions) and has proven to be a dual threat — rushing for 440 yards and four touchdowns.

The Rams use the spread offense, and Skelton utilizes a number of different receivers in the passing game. Six different players have caught multiple touchdown passes, with Richard Rayborn (483 yards) and Asa Lucas (573) emerging as Skelton's main targets.

On the ground, Fordham likes to hand the ball off to both senior Jonte Coven and freshman Xavier Martin. Coven has 926 rushing yards and five touchdowns, while Martin has 612 yards and eight touchdowns. The first-year tailback was named Patriot League Rookie of the Week three times. The offensive line for the Rams has been strong, and is anchored by senior captains Mike Breznicky and Michael Nardone.

COURTESY OF NCAASPORTS.COM

Fordham's defense (22.6 points allowed per game) hasn't been as strong as UMass's, but is a talented group. Five different players have recorded at least two interceptions.

"They do some different things [on defense]," Coen said. "They try to mix up who the fourth rusher is, and try to mix up who the linebackers are and defensive ends are. They try to mess with the protections. I think their plan is going to bring pressure."

The Rams do a terrific job in playing the field position game, leading all of Division I in net punting at 40.87 yards. Punter Benjamin Dato has averaged 45 yards per punt.

Eli Rosensweike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen travel to N.C.

Focus on defense as Maroon and White play two down south

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

After three non-conference games in the Northeast, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will travel to Greenville, N.C., to participate in the East Carolina Lady Pirate Invitational.

UMass (2-1) plays Jacksonville Friday. If the Minutewomen win, they will play either East Carolina or Winthrop Saturday.

The loss to Northeastern was disappointing, and the team looks to improve upon its defense and rebounding, as it let up 86 points in the game.

"They came in yesterday as a captains' practice, unbeknownst to me, and had a practice and a workout, so they weren't happy with the result of the Northeastern game, and neither was the coaching staff," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "If they played with that intensity, the way they played the guys [practice squad] today, it wouldn't even have been a ballgame with Northeastern."

Dacko doesn't want opponents to get more than one shot, and Jacksonville (3-1) has been outrebounded by about 4 per game. Similarly to Northeastern, the Dolphins put up a lot of points, and the Minutewoman defense will have to come prepared to stop some of the high-scoring guards. Jacksonville was the preseason favorite to win the Atlantic Sun Conference.

Virginia Gregoire, who, along with forward Ashley Williams, became the first pair to win first team all-conference last season, started where she left off. The junior is averaging 18.5 points through four games, and also rebounds well from the guard position at 5.3 boards per game.

Senior Pam Rosanio is second on the team in scoring, averaging 15 points a game.

The other starting guard, Regina Omoite, averages 12.5 points and leads the team with 9 three-pointers made. Williams is averaging 15.3 points and a team-leading 6.3 rebounds per game.

Before losing their most recent game to Central Florida, Jacksonville won its first three games, including a 72-64 victory over Atlantic Coast Conference opponent Miami. The Minutewomen also recorded a victory over an ACC opponent this year when they beat Boston College 69-66 on Nov. 14.

UMass has moved the ball well this year. The Minutewomen are leading the Atlantic-10 in assists per game, with 22.

"Well, we've always been unselfish and I think that our goal is to not necessarily have one or two go-to people, but whoever has the hot hand, find that hot hand."

Rosanio is averaging 16 points per game, including a career-day against BC in which she was one rebound and three assists away from notching a triple-double. Gerardot has provided the Minutewomen the necessary spark off the bench, and is averaging 12.3 points per game. Although she doesn't start the game, she's often on the court near the end of the game.

The hot hand this year has often been Katie Mills. Pam Rosanio and Stephanie Gerardot. Mills was named this week's A-10 Co-Player of the Week after filling up the stats sheet in the BC and Northeastern games. She averaged 22 points, five rebounds, 3.5 assists and three blocks over these two games.

Starting point guard Sakera Young has handed out 11 assists while turning the ball over just once. Her 11-to-one assist-to-turnover ratio tops the A-10.

While Dacko just wants to focus on the Jacksonville game, the Minutewomen will also play Saturday. Depending on the outcome of its game and the other tournament matchup, UMass will play East Carolina or Winthrop.

The Lady Pirates are 1-3 on the season, but their two recent losses have come on opponents' free throws at the end of the game.

With a 65-64 lead over Long Island, Connie James was sent to the free-throw line with 3.2 seconds remaining. She hit both shots and dropped the Lady Pirates' record to 1-2.

Three days later, East Carolina had another similar incident to close the game. Up a point with just one-tenth of a second remaining, High Point's Jurica Hargraves was fouled shooting a 3-pointer, and hit all three free throws to secure the 72-70 victory.

East Carolina is led by three double-digit scorers, including guard Jasmine Young who leads the team with 13.8 points and 7.5 assists per game.

If UMass is to draw Winthrop, they will be facing a 3-2 team that holds opponents to low field goal shooting. The Eagles have held opponents to 30 percent shooting, and they will try and shut down a Minutewoman team that is shooting 45.1 percent.

Junior Ashley Lunn is second on the team in points with 10.4 and at eight boards per game is the Eagles' leading rebounder.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

BU visits UMass in NCAA first round

M. SOCCER from page 8

The goal was the second of the season for Amick, who ended the season with three. He and Arikian put together remarkable freshman seasons and earned spots on the A-10 All-Rookie Team. Arikian scored two goals on the season as UMass's primary kick taker on short-range free kicks.

He fit perfectly into the UMass alignment, next to defensive stalwart Mike DeSantis. The Minutemen succeeded in their hope of creating more offense this season and Arikian's ability to quickly funnel balls to the UMass forwards aided them in this goal.

Earlier in the season, BU forward Petur Sigurdsson led the Terriers with three goals, but suffered a leg injury and played sporadically for the rest of the year.

Freshman Aaron O'Neal ended the season as the team's leading scorer, with six goals and four assists. He split time between the midfield and forward spot, but featured primarily on the front line following Sigurdsson injury.

The match will also feature a matchup of some of the region's finest collegiate goaltenders. UMass's Zach Simmons enters the tournament with a 0.74 goals-against average. Two goalkeepers saw time for BU throughout the season. Joe Cullaro earned three victories and Davidsson won six games for the Terriers. Davidsson started most of the games down the stretch for BU and will most likely get the nod against UMass.

Koch didn't expect to host a match, but considering UMass's record on Rudd Field this season, he's more than pleased to get one more match at home. The Minutemen are 6-1 on their home turf, with their only home loss coming to Rhode Island.

Friday marks UMass's second appearance in the national tournament under Koch, who took over the program in 1991. This is the 10th time the Terriers have reached the NCAA Tournament. Although they lost in the first round of the America East Tournament to New Hampshire, wins at No. 4 Brown and Rhode Island and one-goal losses to No. 1 Boston College and No. 15 Harvard bolstered their resume.

The only other A-10 team in the tournament is Saint Louis. The Billikens won the A-10 Regular Season Championship, but fell to Charlotte in penalty kicks in the semifinals of the conference tournament.

Joe Melomi can be reached at jmelom@student.umass.edu

UM missing major matchup

KING from page 8

game in Amherst this year. However, most students weren't alive during the heyday of Cougar basketball (you'll probably have to ask your Dad about Phi Slama Jama). I'm sure most fans don't know much about Houston or any of its Conference USA counterparts. And there's a reason for that: the conference isn't that good.

Sure, the Maroon and White play Syracuse, BC and Vanderbilt this season, but all those games are on the road. Playing Kentucky would have been another excellent chance for UMass coach Travis Ford to test his young team.

Instead, the UK administration's excuse was pure economics. The school reasoned that it could send UMass a check for $50,000, schedule a replacement home game against some patsy and create a significant financial windfall in the process. If the Wildcats can attract over 20,000 fans for its season-opening event (Big Blue Madness, anyone?), then it almost certainly can sell out a game against a lower-conference team like Gardner-Webb.

Speaking of the Runnin' Bulldogs, they served up the first shocker of the college basketball season with an 84-68 victory on Nov. 7.

You guessed it. They beat Kentucky, at Rupp Arena.

The most captivating thing about the loss is that the Wildcats have not played since that date. Kentucky has been sitting on this loss for two full weeks and Gillespie undoubtedly hopes to right the ship tonight against Liberty.

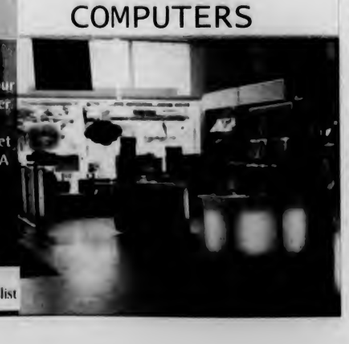
In case you haven't guessed, that game is also at home. The Wildcats don't even leave Lexington until December and play only two non-conference games away from the Blue Grass State.

Wow.

That's a great way to prepare for a Southeastern Conference schedule that features some pretty talented teams. Last time I checked, Florida is still the two-time defending National Champion no matter whom they throw on the court this year.

Anyway, the blame here has to fall on Gillespie. It's almost a certainty that Kentucky would have honored the contract if Tubby Smith was still around; after all, he agreed to the game last year.

You can't put the blame on UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon for not insisting on a higher buyout clause either. It's impressive in itself that he negotiated a return game from the Wildcats, though I'm sure Ford's UK connection didn't hurt.



The Kentucky administration can talk all it wants about money, but the fact of the matter is that Gillespie thought his team had a good chance to lose this game. The cupboard's not exactly stocked in Lexington. After all, Tubby flew the coop to Minnesota for a reason. I'm guessing he would have stuck it out for one more year if he had "championship" talent around him.

Judging by the team's loss to Gardner-Webb, Gillespie was probably right in thinking his team might struggle in a packed Garden. But what kind of a message is he sending to his players with this decision? I don't think we're good enough to beat a pretty good Atlantic 10 team on the road?

I don't care if Kentucky is the most demanding place to coach in America. I'm willing to bet that the Wildcat faithful would be more willing to forgive a loss to UMass in Boston than one to Gardner-Webb at Rupp Arena.

Michael King is a Collegian assistant sports editor. He can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

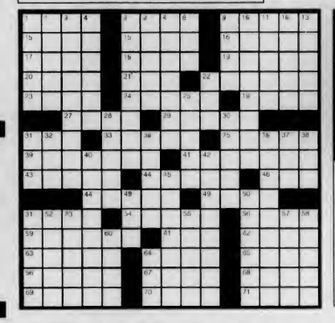
•service/ support
-Macs
-PCs
•apple hardware
-ipods
-iMacs
-Macbooks and more
come see us for our low cost computer repairs.
38 Pleasant Street
Northampton MA
01060
413.585.0007
YES
COMPUTERS
Apple Specialist

Seven O's
Every Wednesday
Karaoke
* * * * * *
Live Band
Saturday, 11/24/07
Mark Snow Band
Looking for exposure?
Student bands welcome to play at Seven O's
Looking for a place to have a private event/party?
Call 413-530-6996
Route 116 330 Amherst Rd
Sunderland, MA 01375
(413) 665-6788
3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Sat&Sun
Next to Cuttside Apts.

Give thanks for pointless number puzzles.

		6	1		5		2
5			7			4
					3			5
3		8			4
	7	9				2	4
			3			9		6
2			5
		4			7			2
	8		4		2	3

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!



ACROSS
1 Shapely fruit
5 Reverberate
9 French clerics
14 Biblical preposition
15 Decelerate
16 Just washed
17 Pound pup
18 Ashen
19 More than one grail
20 Vicinity
21 Make free
22 Lurched
23 On the way
24 Writer Zola
26 Without clothes
27 Bobbed fillers
29 American of Japanese heritage
31 Kimono sash
33 Custom
36 Actor Jeremy
39 President Wilson
41 More euphoric
43 Freeway components
44 Coeur d' ID
46 Mauna volcano
47 Car buyer's option
49 College sleep club
51 Needle case
54 The ones here
56 Legendary tale
59 Of an insect stage
61 Combat
62 Stuffed shirt
63 More chilled
64 African nation
65 Gumbo veggie
66 Jeweled crown
67 Approximately
68 Remainder
69 ___ chloride (refrigerant)
70 Hebrew month
71 Copier element

DOWN
1 Mountain lions
2 Accustom
3 Heed
4 Son
5 Very strong java
6 Allegation
7 Pilot's pattern?
8 Be obliged to
9 Summit
10 Member of the thrush family
11 Feminist Abzug
12 Consumer
13 Catty
22 Notes of scales
25 Feudal lord
28 Hospital staff member
30 Soft down
31 Nocturnal raptor
32 Consinctor shake
34 Covered by wolves
36 Fuel transporter
37 Classic lead-in
38 Mexican Mrs.
40 Transference
42 Of poorer quality
45 ___ Islands of the Lesser Antilles
48 NATO word
50 Categorize
51 Upper crust
52 Unspoken
53 Charles Dickens' Heep
55 Chip dip
57 Moor shrub
58 Grow less
60 Shrinking inland sea
64 Extinct ostrichlike bird

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

MR. TURKEY, YOUR EYES ARE HUGE, BUT WE MUST EAT YOU. THANKS!

Submit your comics!
comicsar.daily.collegian.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

Quote of the Day

"I love Thanksgiving turkey. It's the only time in Los Angeles that you see natural breasts."
-Arnold Schwarzenegger

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

The Quigmans By Buddy Hickerson

"I think the fact that I'm a garden gnome at your garden party entitles me to a free drink!"

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You will have nightmares of Tofurkey and a shortage of mashed potatoes.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't sweat the petty things, and don't pet the sweaty things.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You're stuck in class reading this while everyone else is on their way home. Sorry.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
There is absolutely no reason why Odwalla should cost $3.25 a bottle. NONE!

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Be thankful for multi-vitamins; you never buy food and they're keeping you alive.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You will flirt with a devilishly good-looking man while stuck in traffic later tonight.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are the top of the muffin.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Using the word plethora is a dead giveaway that you are just trying to sound smart.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Have fun spending 6 hours explaining why UMass was on strike to your family.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
At the first Thanksgiving, pilgrims ate dogs; bring that tradition back. Watch out, Sparky!

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Only in America: A national holiday for eating and watching football (Nov 22).

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Only in Russia: A national holiday for having sex to boost births (June 12).

Have a wonderful Thanksgiving; don't choke on any bones.

comics@dailycollegian.com

p.s. If you ever need a friend (which you definitely do) send a message to the new e-mail adress of your old pal Comics.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birthcontrol, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins wecome. www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

*#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Submit classifieds online at www.DailyCollegian.com or visit our offices in the UMass Campus Center basement during our business hours.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Round 1: Rams in Amherst

UMass, Fordham meet for first time in NCAA tourney

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown will try to avoid history Saturday when the Minutemen host Fordham in the opening round of the NCAA Division I Football Championship at McGuirk Stadium.

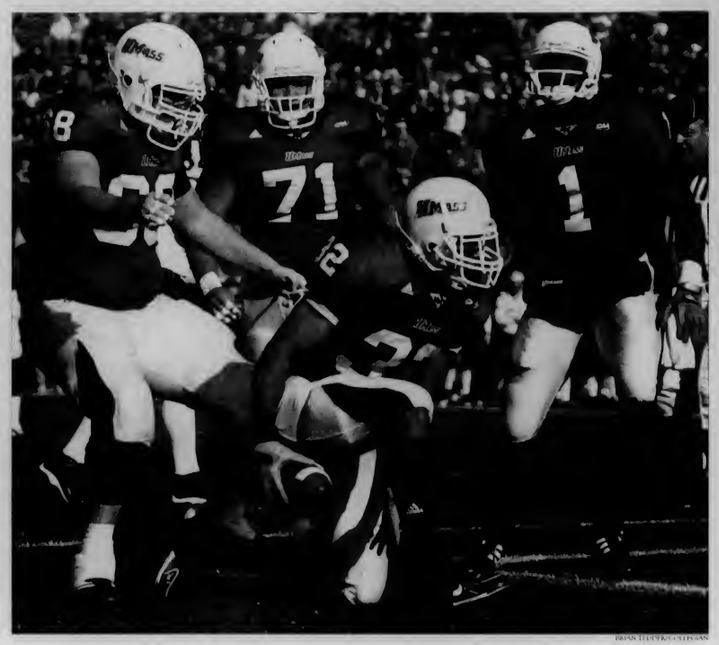
Although these teams have never met on the gridiron, Fordham bested Brown in the first round of the 2002 tournament when he was the coach at Northeastern. The ties don't end there, as Rams coach Tom Masella served as the UMass defensive coordinator from 2002-2003 when Mark Whipple was the head coach.

The game airs Saturday at noon on ESPNU. The winner will play No. 4 Southern Illinois or No. 18 Eastern Illinois on Dec. 1. If the Salukis win, either UMass or Fordham will have to travel to Carbondale, Ill., for the second-round matchup. If the Minutemen win and the Panthers pull off the upset, UMass gets another home game.

The No.7 Minutemen have reached the tournament for the second consecutive season on the strength of winning the inaugural Colonial Athletic Association Championship. UMass (9-2, 7-1 CAA) tied Richmond atop the conference standings, but the Minutemen were awarded the conference automatic tournament bid via a coin flip after they were deadlocked in all three tie-breakers. The league's athletic directors (minus the ADs from UMass and Richmond) had a conference call to determine the champion, but concluded the two teams were "indistinguishable" and decided it with the coin flip.

Masella took over the No. 25 Rams (8-3, 5-1 Patriot League) last season and endured a difficult 3-8 season. Fordham was picked to finish in sixth place out of seven teams this season, but surprised its critics with their first playoff appearance since the 2002 win over the Huskies.

Last season the Minutemen captured the Atlantic 10 title, and made it to the NCAA Championship game against Appalachian State. UMass entered the fourth quarter tied with the Mountaineers, but lost 28-17 in front of 22,808 fans in Chattanooga, Tenn.



Fordham is 5-0 on the road this season, including wins over the then-three-time defending Patriot League Champion Lafayette and against Rhode Island – a team UMass lost to for its only conference defeat.

"Coach Masella does a good job of keeping them focused," Brown said. "They're very solid in structure on both sides, and I just think that being around a veteran presence like Tom they're very focused in what they're trying to do. That's really the key to winning on the road is maintaining your focus in a strange environment."

Something has to give this weekend, as the Minutemen are 5-0 at home in 2007. UMass has outscored its opponents 159-81 at McGuirk Stadium.

On offense the Minutemen are led by quarterback Liam Coen (23 touchdowns, 11 interceptions), run-

See FOOTBALL on page 6

BRIAN TEVYAW/COLLEGIAN

Running back Matt Lawrence (center) and (left to right) Matt Austin, Chris Hopkins and J.J. Moore celebrate a touchdown against New Hampshire. The Minutemen expect plenty of celebration Saturday when they host Fordham in the first round of the NCAA playoffs.

Minutemen, Terriers meet at Rudd Field

Rematch with BU set for opening round of NCAAs

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch spoke with Boston University coach Neil Roberts. The pair agreed to exchange scouting reports should both receive bids to the NCAA Tournament.

The Minutemen earned an automatic bid as Atlantic 10 Champions and the Terriers were a very strong candidate for an at-large bid to the 32-team field. Around 5:30 p.m. Monday, both teams got the bids they were hoping for, but the scouting plans of the long-time friends suddenly seemed like a bad idea.

The selection committee pitted the teams against each other and the Terriers will travel to Amherst for a match Friday at noon.

The teams met earlier this season, with the Minutemen earning a 1-0 win. The victory was the second game in what turned into a six-game winning streak for UMass, including an Oct.12 win at No. 12 Saint Louis.

Freshman Stuart Amick scored the lone UMass goal in the win over the Terriers. Senior back Kenny Cook deflected a ball whipped into the penalty area off a corner kick by freshman Ben Arikian. The ball sailed to Amick, who volleyed it into through the crowd in front of the net and past BU goalkeeper Hrafn Davidsson.

See M. SOCCER on page 6

Gibbs signs NLI, joins Ford's squad for 2008-09 season

As expected, UMass men's basketball coach Travis Ford signed David Gibbs to a National Letter of Intent. The 6-foot-4 guard gave Ford a verbal commitment last year and will join the Minutemen as a part of the 2008-09 recruiting class.

The East Hartford, Conn., native is expected to fit into UMass's up-tempo style with his 3-point shooting ability, athleticism and quickness. Gibbs has the ability to play multiple guard positions and may be the team's successor at point guard several seasons down the road.

Gibbs is considered to be a top New England high school senior by multiple recruiting services. He was named to ESPN's 150 – Class of 2008, as the 112th best incoming recruit in the nation.

Next season, Ford will have no shortage of guard options. The Minutemen will return Lowe, current freshmen Gary Correia, Max Groebe, Matt Glass and Sedale Jones, as well as sophomore Ricky Harris for the 2008-09 season.

In addition to Gibbs, the Minutemen will welcome transfer Anthony Gurley to the squad. The sophomore guard is sitting out this year after transferring from Wake Forest.

At forward, the Minutemen will welcome freshman Tyrell Lynch next season. The 6-foot-9 forward is expected to join the team as a walk-on in 2008-09, as he is on campus this season looking to improve his academic status.

The Gibbs signing also does not mean that Ford is necessarily done with the recruiting process. Last year Ford signed six in the fall and added Trey Lang and Gary Correia in the spring.

Though a National Letter of Intent connects a player to a program, it doesn't mean that the player will join the team. Last year, the Minutemen signed high schoolers Travon Wilcher and Marcus Matthews, but neither has officially joined the program.

Wilcher is on campus this year, while Matthews enrolled in prep school.

—Michael King

Mass Attack falls short in Vt.

Ortiz, Quirk score in second, but Catamounts pull away late

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The No. 10 Massachusetts hockey team dropped a 4-2 decision to Vermont last night in Burlington, Vt.

Senior forward Dean Strong beat UMass freshman goaltender Paul Dainton with 25 seconds remaining to give Vermont the 3-2 lead. Corey Carlson added an empty-netter with three seconds left on the clock.

Vermont	4
UMass	2

Strong assisted on the two early goals by UVM and Carlson's empty net-ter to complete a four-point night.

The Minutemen fought back from two one-goal deficits in the second period, but couldn't even the score in the third with freshman goaltender Paul Dainton pulled in favor of an extra skater.

The Minutemen and the Catamounts have played the Tuesday before Thanksgiving every year since 1996-97. With the win, Vermont is 6-4-1 in these matchups and has won two in a row. Last season, the Catamounts defeated the Minutemen, 3-0, in the Mullins Center. The loss ended a four-game unbeaten streak for UMass and given Vermont its first winning streak of the season.

Kevan Miller gave the Catamounts the lead at 6:03 of the second period. Strong and Colin Vock moved the puck well into the UMass zone before finding Miller.

Sophomore winger Will Ortiz tied the game evened the score less than two minutes later. The goal added to his team-high total of six. Freshmen James Marcou and Michael Lecomte assisted on the Ortiz goal.

Dainton's record fell to 4-3-4 with the loss, although he did his part in keeping the Minutemen alive with a solid first period, making 14 saves and keeping the Catamounts off the board as long as he could. This was the fifth consecutive game that the Minutemen allowed the first goal.

Vock put the Catamounts ahead at 13:13 of the second period with help from Strong and Carlson. Strong leads Vermont with eight points after last night's effort on two goals and six assists. His performance was a welcomed sight for a hockey team struggling to score goals this season.

Junior center Cory Quirk evened the score 42 seconds into the third period. Defenders Justin Braun and Mike Kostka assisted on the goal for the Minutemen. Braun put himself second behind Marcou among scoring leaders.

Marcou's assist gave him 11 points on the season and Braun's pushed his total to eight.

Senior P.J. Fenton and Quirk did not play on the same line for the first time all season. Instead, senior Matt Burto skated alongside Quirk and right wing Chris Davis. Fenton played on a line with Ortiz and sophomore Brett Watson. The only other constant in the UMass lineup was the pairing of Marcou and junior Alex Berry as wingers. Prior to last Saturday's win over Boston College, the pair had played together in every game for the Minutemen.

Marcou featured with Lecomte and freshman Chase Langeraap last night while Berry skated with Jordan Virtue and Scott Crowder.

Defender Martin Nolet played in his second consecutive game after missing three and UMass coach Don Cahoon paired him with Kostka as the primary defensive pair; he was minus-1 for the game.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu

BRIAN TEVYAW/COLLEGIAN

Will Ortiz scored his team-leading sixth goal in the second period of a 4-2 loss to Vermont last night in Burlington.

UM, UK should be playing in Garden

BRIAN TEVYAW/COLLEGIAN

Travis Ford's crew was scheduled to play Kentucky this week.

Michael King

It's arguably the most storied program in college basketball. Kentucky trails only UCLA in National Championships with seven and has been to the national tournament an astounding 48 times.

The Wildcats have been coached by several of the greatest college basketball minds of all time, including Adolph Rupp and UMass alumnus Rick Pitino. They've also had some of the best college players, some of whom played for the Celtics, including Tony Delk, Walter McCarty, Ron Mercer, Antoine Walker and Rajon Rondo (but I'll refrain from calling any of them "great").

And the Massachusetts men's basketball team would have had the chance to challenge this distinguished program this season had it not been for the provincial mind of U.K.'s first-year coach Billy Gillespie.

While the Minutemen are in the midst of an 11-day layoff, this is an excellent time to reflect on what could be happening this Thanksgiving weekend and what transpired between the two schools last May.

UMass and Kentucky signed a contract last year to play a home-and-home series over two years. As you may remember, UMass fulfilled its end of the pact last December sending its squad to Lexington for an 82-68 loss to the Wildcats.

The UMass community should have had an opportunity to showcase its basketball team and University to the greater Boston area in a game at the TD Banknorth Garden this Saturday afternoon.

It was going to be more than just a basketball game. In an age where Boston papers won't give UMass significant coverage without a negative angle, the game would have exposed UMass basketball to the average Minuteman-deprived Bostonian.

With the inevitable cyclical prosperity of Boston College athletics and the perennial popularity of the city's professional sports franchises, it's difficult for UMass to compete for Beantown headlines.

Nonetheless, this story was deemed worthy to grace the city's finest broadsheet. The Boston Globe reported on May 22 that the school would have made between $250,000 and $300,000. In fact, UMass had already sold 7,000 tickets of the Garden's nearly 19,000-seat capacity.

In addition, the buyout leaves UMass without a marquee home game. Last year the Minutemen's annual showdown with the Eagles took place at the Mullins Center, with the impressive undercard battle between shot-blocking sensations Stephane Lasme and Sean Williams.

Now the Houston match becomes the top non-conference

See KING on page 6

NOV 21 2007

PLEASE NOTE:

The Paper is Not Published
During School break

NOV
26
2007

UMASS ADVANCES PAST RAMS | PAGE 8

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN
NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

WINTERY MIX : HI: 46 LO: 41 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | MONDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 2007

Noho on top for change

By Holly Seabury
Collegian Staff

When it comes to community commitment to sustainability and smart growth in Massachusetts, Northampton is best in the state.

For the fourth year in a row, the city scored 131 points out of a possible 140 on the Commonwealth Capital Application, which measures commitment to protecting open space, promoting clean energy and expanding housing opportunities, among other things, according to the official application on www.mass.gov.

Northampton's planning director, Wayne M. Feiden, told The Republican last week that the city's high scoring on the application has the "practical benefit of pushing it to the front of the line for state funding."

The city received a $470,000 state grant that was used to buy open space near the Mineral Hills Conservation Area, which according to Feiden, accounted for 40 percent of the score on the application. Points were also awarded for adopting the Community Preservation Act, creating zoning that promotes the conservation of open space and encouraging bicycling and walking by creating bike paths.

Specifically, communities earn points on the application for zoning, planning, housing, environmental, energy, transportation and other measures already in place at the time of applying. Evaluators also favor communities in which action is taken, rather than done in receipt of grants or funding.

Communities also have the potential to receive bonus points if commitments from fiscal year 2006 are implemented.

Seventy-three communities in the state applied. Following Northampton for most points scored on the application was Barnstable with a score of 117. The city with the lowest amount of points was Clarksburg with a score of 36. The town of Amherst scored a 94, 19 points fewer than its score last year.

More about the application and its guidelines can be found in the Commonwealth Capital department on www.mass.gov.

Holly Seabury can be reached at hseabury@student.umass.edu

Lake to speak on Obama, policies

By Kate Olesin
Collegian Staff

Anthony Lake, former national security advisor for President Bill Clinton, will be speaking at the University of Massachusetts campus on Wednesday.

On behalf of the groups "UMass Students for Barack Obama" and "UMass Amherst Civic Initiative," the event, titled a "discussion," hopes to actively involve students and community members.

"Obama is really focused on getting students involved, and it's a really big part of his campaign," said UMass junior and media coordinator for the group Ashley Coulombe. "There are thousands of schools who have chapters."

Lake, currently the chief foreign policy advisor to Sen. Obama, will speak about his support for Sen. Obama's presidential bid and then provide a question and answer period for students and community members.

Lake has taught at Amherst College and Mount Holyoke College and is currently on the Board of Trustees at Mount Holyoke.

"He's so closely connected to the area, and UMass is such a big school it seemed like a good place to have an event for the whole school and community," said Coulombe.

The group hopes to prepare voters for the upcoming primary and deter doubts about Sen. Obama's campaign and stances on foreign policy.

"We hope as far as the Obama campaign on campus that people will have questions about his foreign policy, and he will have a chance to answer," said Coulombe. "And he is a lot better equipped to answer those questions than we [UMass Students for Barack Obama] really are … he's probably one of the few people in our country able to address these issues. We do like to see someone who has an opinion on everything, and why people should trust Obama … it is so close to the primary that we hope this will help."

Vincent Ferraro, an international relations professor at Mount Holyoke College, will also speak at the discussion.

State representative Stephen Kulik (D-Worthington) will be introducing the speakers.

The discussion with Anthony Lake will take place on Wednesday, Nov. 28 at 7 p.m. in room 101 of the Campus Center.

The Amherst chapter of UMass Students for Barack Obama, founded by UMass junior Matt Cadwallader, is part of the national Students for Barack Obama.

This weekend, the group will also be taking a bus sent by Sen. Obama's campaign to New Hampshire, where they will go door to door informing and answering questions posed by voters. On Saturday, the bus will be at the Haigis Mall at 11 a.m. for interested parties.

For more information, visit the UMass Students for Barack Obama Facebook.com group.

Kate Olesin can be reached at kolesin@student.umass.edu

Former national security advisor Anthony Lake will be discussing Barack Obama's foreign policy at a lecture on Wednesday.

The scholarship of a lifetime

VASMA raises $400 in funds

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts Veterans and Service Members Association raised almost $400 for a scholarship honoring a fallen UMass student soldier during the week following Veteran's Day.

Founded in the memory of Marine Lance Corporal Eric Valdepeñas, the scholarship will be awarded annually to one student in the Isenberg School of Management.

"This was a great opportunity for the members of the student military community to mobilize their peers to give back to the UMass campus," said Andrew Masciola, VASMA treasurer.

VASMA presented ISOM with the nearly $400 in funds at the end of the week. The first recipient of the grant will be chosen this year.

"I am happy that I was able to contribute to something positive that promotes awareness on campus as well as honors one of our fallen Marines," said Jaime Zagami, vice president of VASMA.

J. Brian Palmer, a 1995 graduate of the ISOM accounting program, created the scholarship earlier this year with an initial donation of $36,000. Palmer's company, Bermuda-based White Mountains Insurance Group of which Palmer is the chief accounting officer, matched his donation with another $4,000.

"We sincerely hope that the scholarship will aid some of our future business leaders," Palmer said. "More importantly, however, we hope that the scholarship will serve as a reminder to us all of Eric's courage and sacrifice. We should never forget that our freedoms aren't free."

A 21-year-old Seekonk native studying engineering, Valdepeñas was deployed to Iraq after his unit was called up in December of 2005.

He was killed during a patrol in September 2006 while serving with the 1st Battalion of the 25th Marines in the Al Anbar Province.

"By creating this scholarship, we're able to honor Eric and to support UMass at the same time," Palmer said.

Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins@student.umass.edu

(Left to right) Jacob Petrie, Andrew Masciola, Jamie Zagami and Jon Zagami present UM spokesperson Bonnie Zima Dowd with $400.

Alumnus honored for non-profit work

By Sruthi Valluru
Collegian Staff

On Nov. 6, the cover story of Gambit Weekly was the publication's annual "40 Under 40" listing. The article featured 40 individuals under the age of 40 who the magazine honors for their contributions. Of those honored was Nathan Rothstein, an UMass alumnus who graduated in 2006, for his work in New Orleans.

Rothstein co-founded Young Urban Rebuilding Professionals, an organization that provides a network for people who want to become involved in the revitalization of the city.

The accolade is one of many YURP has already garnered attention from major news networks including NPR and Fox News.

A native of Massachusetts, Rothstein graduated from Lexington High School and came to UMass to pursue a degree in history. He graduated with honors and a job offer from the Democratic National Committee. But by Rothstein's own admission, he had never expected to be in New Orleans. In fact, his life seemed to be headed towards politics.

In high school, Rothstein spent several months working as a teacher assistant at the Cambridge Public Schools Summer School Program, helping fourth and fifth graders pass the MCAS exam. In January 2004, Rothstein spent time campaigning for John Kerry. Two years later, he worked as press secretary assistant for the Deval Patrick campaign.

At the end of college, Rothstein was still unsure about his future. "I really did not know what to do after college," he said.

But that wasn't too big a concern. After all, Rothstein said, "Many great leaders and businessmen and women have struggled through their 20s to find their niche."

The lessons that Rothstein learned in college were not entirely limited to the classroom. Now a leader in networking in a struggling city, Rothstein was at first "very shy and not willing to make an effort to make new friends." He attributes a lot of his current success to what he learned in social situations at UMass – how to make connections.

In March 2006, Rothstein worked with the UMass Hillel in Gulfport, Miss., an experience

See ROTHSTEIN on page 2

Minutemen win NCAA tournament match

UMass advances to face BC

By Michael Kyo

Members of the Massachusetts men's soccer team celebrate their 2-1 first-round NCAA tournament victory over Boston University at Rudd Field. The Minutemen advance to play the tournament's No. 1 overall seed, Boston College, in Chestnut Hill Wednesday night.

For a split second, it looked like the game was headed for overtime. As the Massachusetts men's soccer team tried to hang on to a one-goal lead late in the second half, it was the right post that saved the day for the Minutemen again.

UMass stifled Boston University's scoring chances late in the second half to preserve the 2-1 victory in Friday's NCAA tournament first-round match at Rudd Field. But it was not before BU nearly scored its second goal within the final four minutes of the game.

In that sequence, a former mishap resulted in the ball trickling slowly toward the net, hitting the post and teetering inches away from the goal line before the UMass defense cleared the ball from danger.

In fact, it was same side of the net that shunned a Dyson penalty kick last week in the quarterfinals of the Atlantic 10 tournament as a part of the Minutemen's run to the A-10 title.

"I gave the post a little kiss," Simmons quipped after Friday's victory. "Sometimes it's better to be lucky than good."

And the Minutemen didn't rely just on luck. They were the second team to beat BU this season. Overall, its play in the A-10 tournament, UMass six consecutive conference titles, in addition to playing its trademark stout defense.

The Maroon and White advance to face the tournament's No. 1 overall seed Boston College at Chestnut Hill on Wednesday. Friday's victory was the first step in a record-NCAA match in program history.

With a second-round match with the Eagles on the line, the game's intensity was evident among both squads, especially in the second half. Standout central defender Jeff Parke in the first half received two caution tripartite of battle and caution that culminated in words, pushes and shoving as time expired.

"It was important to play with that intensity and that we've had all season," Simmons said. "Kenny [Cooke] and I were working hard to get the team to calm down and play with that intensity, but channel it in the right ways. Couple of times, we lost our cool, but overall we did a good job of matching their intensity in a smart and composed way."

See SOCCER on page 6

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIII
Issue 56
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Nicholas Belanger
Managing Editor Katie Huston
Business Manager Dan Exter
Production Manager Chris Martin
Night Supervisor Meghan Murphy
Advertising Manager Alex Bender
Advertising Production Katherine Shea
Arts & Living Editor Tim McCall
Copy Editor Adam Scaign
Editorial Editor A.P. Sullivan
News Editor Derrick Perkins
Sports Editor Jeremy Rice
Asst. Business Manager Lyn Szamcsak
Assistant Advertising Manager Whoyden
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Asst. Arts & Living Stephanie McPherson
Asst. Arts & Living Ryan McAskill
Asst. Arts & Living Teresa Reilly
Asst. Editorial James Mathews
Asst. Editorial Melissa Garber
Assistant News Kate Olsein
Assistant News Will McGuinness
Assistant News Holly Seaburs
Assistant Sports Michael King
Assistant Sports Joe Meloni
Assistant Sports Eli Rosenswaike
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Evan Trinh
Asst. Photo Editor Michael Phillis
Asst. Photo Editor Brian Tedder

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts fall and spring semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. It became the College News in 1902, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. It has been daily since 1967. The Collegian has been Pulitzer Prize finalist since 1994. For advertising rates and information, call Advertising Director Kim Sayre at 545-3500.

UMass alumnus honored on 40-40

Rothstein from page 1

that piqued his interest in the issue.

"I could not fathom how an American city could be underwater," said Rothstein in an e-mail. "It did not make sense."

After seeing the destruction and interacting with New Orleans residents, Rothstein's plans for his future began to change.

"It was disappointing that our country looked the other way," he said.

So Rothstein decided to help rebuild the city. He calls it his generation's Freedom Summer, referring to the movement during the '60s that propelled thousands of college students to southern states for civil rights issues.

"It is our time to fight for a group of people … who do not have a voice," he said.

He turned down the job offer with the Democratic National Committee and moved to New Orleans. After spending some time gutting and rebuilding neighborhoods, Rothstein began speaking to college students about alternative spring break programs. He began to receive e-mails from students interested in working in New Orleans, which is how NOLA YURP came about.

NOLA YURP is a networking organization. It provides a forum for young professionals in New Orleans to contact one another and offers an easy way to find like-minded people in the area. Currently there are about 1,500 members, which include accountants, lawyers, architects, bankers, financial analysts and graduate students. Most members are from New Orleans, but some, like Rothstein, are from other states.

Rothstein said the organization's true strength lies in its cross-cultural platform. The situation in New Orleans is being defined along racial lines, dividing the city and, in some ways, paralyzing rebuilding efforts.

"There needed to be a group that is working toward racial healing," said Rothstein.

NOLA YURP's board is one of most diverse boards in the city and includes Hispanic, Vietnamese, African-American and white community members.

But the group has also faced a good deal of criticism from jaded New Orleans residents. A Times-Picayune article quoted residents who thought the YURP program was temporary, more of a "do-good" fix – which will last no more than six months – than a permanent solution. Some view the group members as "carpetbaggers" and "dilettantes" who come off sounding sanctimonious.

Hurricane Katrina survivors survey the damage of the storm. UMass alumnus Nathan Rothstein and his group are part of the rebuilding effort.

Rothstein agrees that although he receives criticism, for the most part, the people of New Orleans are receptive.

"There has been a problem post-Katrina of people from outside telling New Orleans how they should rebuild the city in a better way," said Rothstein. "Many of the planners who came down did not listen to the concerns of the people, designed the plans and then left."

For the most part, he is unfazed by criticism because he thinks it just isn't true. "There will always be people who doubt and are skeptical of something new," he said, "but you just have to keep working and continue to build partnerships."

According to Rothstein, the group is still in its infancy. The Web site is the first of many initiatives that the group plans on launching. He listed a series of programs from financial literacy and home ownership courses to networking events that "help people connect to resources they need to stay in New Orleans."

NOLA YURP is also keen on recruiting more members, called YURPs or YURPies, for its programs. So far, Rothstein has spoken at the University of Michigan about opportunities in New Orleans and plans on speaking at Yale in the near future. He said his ultimate goal would be to make New Orleans a popular destination for people in their 20s and 30s – a move that could ultimately revitalize the city.

NOLA YURP attracts dozens of young professionals to New Orleans. Some YURPs from outside states now consider New Orleans their home and have plans to settle down there. Rothstein himself is entertaining the idea of becoming a full time New Orleans resident.

Right now, though, he is busy with a bigger job as Executive Director of NOLA YURP. This December will be his third month with that job, and he is unsure of what the future will hold for him as a leader. Whatever the case, Rothstein said, "New Orleans is my home right now."

Sruthi Valluri can be reached at valluri@student.umass.edu.

64-year-old ex-black militant becomes Eagle Scout

By Katrina A. Goggins
Associated Press

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Years before civil rights activist Cleveland Sellers got caught up in the deadly 1968 protest known as the Orangeburg Massacre, he was on the path to the elite rank of Eagle Scout – until his paperwork was lost.

Next month, the 64-year-old, who called himself a black militant in his autobiography, will formally collect the honor. He said he hopes it will add an important layer to a personal narrative that, to many people, will always be linked to his conviction in the civil rights protest at a historically black college that ended with three students gunned down by state troopers.

"People have tried to create these monsters and make us something that we weren't because it helped them make their case," said Sellers, the director of the African American Studies program at the University of South Carolina. "I think it's important for people to know who I am and maybe through the process that will help lower the barrier and lower the kind of imagery they have of me."

During a recent interview at his college office, he credited Scouting for his appreciation of nature, and a sense of orderliness. He fondly recalls attending the Boy Scouts' National Jamboree in 1960, and thinks he still could cook up a mean coffee-can souffle.

The men who led the troop he once belonged to were father figures – something many youths lack today, Sellers said.

"I look around now and there's no organizations for them other than the gang banging and that kind of stuff," he said. "I just think we need to take another look at the Boy Scouts as an alternative to the idleness and the crime."

Sellers has helped start a troop named after Camp Brownlee, the blacks-only Scout camp he attended as a young man. A formal Eagle ceremony will be held Dec. 3 in his hometown of Denmark – 20 miles from Orangeburg – more than four decades after he earned the rank, given to only about 5 percent of all Boy Scouts. Since 1912, nearly 1.9 million Eagles have been awarded, according to Boy Scout officials.

After his years as a Scout, Sellers earned a doctorate in education and dedicated his life to improving the lives of black South Carolinians.

Cleveland Sellers talks of his experiences with the Orangeburg Massacre and how scouting helped him growing up in rural South Carolina.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Murphy

Copy Editor
Greg McCarthy

Production Supervisor
Chris Martin

Need More Meals?

Several options to choose from!
Now you can purchase additional meals or upgrade your meal plan on line or go to our meal plan office at Franklin DC

Visit our website www.umass.edu/diningservices or call 545-1362

Get experience writing for the largest college daily newspaper in New England.

You don't have to be a UMass student to write for the Daily Collegian.

New chapter in the #revolution Page 6
The Massachusetts
Daily Collegian
Library elevator goes for wild ride
Students differ on observing Jewish holiday. Mixed opinions on

The Collegian is looking for interested writers from all 5 colleges.

Report about what's going on at your school, and start getting published today!

E-Mail us at News@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
Editorial Opinion
Monday, November 26, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
– Sir Salman Rushdie

Editorial@dailycollegian.com

An unexpected holiday

Thomas Sitzer

For my family, Thanksgiving used to be a holiday that brought the entire family together to feast upon massive turkeys and all kinds of fixings. But now that the children are growing older and off to college, and the elders moving off to West Palm Beach for the weather, it's less often that we all convene for massive family gatherings. Now, it isn't that we don't all love each other, but since it is so hard to sit down together at a table with all of the families, it seems better to just relax with the immediate sibs and have a nice, quiet, festive supper. So Thursday was a peaceful little shindig with china settings and a little James Taylor playing in the background for mood.

Had things been normal, my father and I would have woken early Friday morning to head out to the Adirondack Mountains to a little camp about 45 minutes north of Tupper Lake, N.Y. But sadly, my aunt passed away a couple of days before, and we cancelled our hunt.

Then, of course, there was a massive rush from Dallas, Texas and Jupiter, Fla., and all across the country to make it to the Berkshires at a couple of days notice. And voila: a family gathering.

Despite the ironic juxtaposition, it was really great to see all of the family that I have not seen in years. Suddenly there was a rush of chatter and babble, big meals and old memories. Screaming kids ran among the legs of young men having their first drinks with old farts who teased them about it, pre-teen girls took motherly care of exhausted travelers' children, and for a while, it was a holiday.

Then, of course, there was the funeral. It was a quiet affair. I read once that one should always attend a funeral even if you didn't know the person all that well because one day, someone you love will die, and all of the survivors of those passed will come pay their respects to yours, and their condolences to you.

But the local paper inaccurately dated the event to 24 hours later. So it goes.

God certainly hadn't come up during Thanksgiving, for nobody said grace. And we hadn't planned on going to church next morning …

But in the large Congregational church, there was a cold feeling of unity that seemed less merry than the previous day's reunions. It was a weird and unfortunate juxtaposition between this quiet Thanksgiving and the family's grief. I realized we all got together to sit uncomfortably in pews that we hadn't seen in as many years as we'd seen one another. It was uncomfortable to join an entire side of the family while they wept. I thought it was sad that we couldn't get together as a family unless someone died, frankly.

I also thought the reverend made a strange point. He said that there were three reasons we were in attendance; firstly, to grieve the departed, secondly, to comfort the survivors, and thirdly, and most importantly, to praise God. I understood part one. I mean, that's why everybody was there. Part two made sense of course, because there was a bunch of people crying.

Part three seemed to come out of nowhere because I swear, there was this awkward cloud above our heads that was the family remembering. "Oh yeah, kind of forgot about all of that." God certainly hadn't come up during Thanksgiving, for nobody said grace. And we hadn't planned on going to church next morning, for it was Saturday. Reverend continued to drive home the point that God is a uniting force. That seemed unarguable.

To say the least, this all made me feel terrible. Although I have paid little attention to God in the last couple of years, I thought the reverend's point valid and profound, because there was evidence to prove him correct. We all got together the day before and had a wonderful time reminiscing. And then we all had to get together to mourn a loved one.

What I took away from it was how much of a shame it was we don't spend more time together while we can to celebrate life and give thanks to simply having it. The holidays, no matter what your religion or race, are designed obviously to fuel the economy, worship false idols and yada yada – but also to go home and remember what it is like to share a meal with all your loved ones. Therefore, it was sort of an existential slap in the face, really, to be forced to remember family in the context of death rather than the merriness of life.

Thomas Sitzer is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at tomsitzer@gmail.com

A time to give thanks, and to give more

Brad DeFlumeri

As the turkey wore away after Thursday's heavy feasts, we were left with the prospect of getting up early on Friday morning and participating in one of the most over-done displays of commercialization that our culture has produced: "Black (as in profitable) Friday."

I am strongly in favor of capitalism and price competition, as I feel the free market reaps untold benefits for consumers. However, when the notion of a family-oriented, reflective and culturally significant holiday like Thanksgiving becomes immutably married to frenzied searches for sale prices and rushes people from dinner and family to a prime spot in line for a cheap gadget, I think we may have a problem.

Just as this is merely a symptom of the overly materialistic and pleasure-on-demand society that we have become, so too has Thanksgiving itself lost much of its meaning relative to its heritage and cultural value. The holiday on which we should be counting our blessings in the company of family and loved ones has somehow morphed into a precursor to the Christmas shopping extravaganza that previously did not start until December.

No longer are we content to sit, converse and eat with those who make our lives meaningful. Instead, Americans can be faithfully counted on to rush through their Thanksgiving meals and over to the local shopping centers, not on Friday morning as we had previously deemed socially acceptable, but on Thanksgiving Day itself, soon after the high school football games have gone final. The Wrentham Outlets on the South Shore reported that shoppers began lining up outside of the complex (police would not let them in) as early as 10 a.m. on Thursday.

The notion that since the 1960s, American cultural and family values have been on the steady decline is not a groundbreaking revelation. That we have become less family-centered and more reliant on the government as nanny and the television as baby-sitter is unfortunately not revolutionary either.

However, at no point is the regression of our civic, moral and family values more devastatingly evident than on holidays such as Thanksgiving.

Collectively, we should put down our iPods and pick up American flags.

The irony is that at a time when so many Americans have more to be thankful for than ever, more specifically, at a time when we are better-fed, better-educated, more healthy, wealthy and materially fulfilled than we have ever been, not even on the one day our social calendar sets aside for actually giving thanks are we capable of reflecting on how much freedom and opportunity our nation has afforded us. However, I guess it stands to reason that a nation that is unable to consistently be appreciative of its heritage and way of life and those who allow these ideals to prevail and endure will not properly commemorate the things that really matter even on the one day when we are expected to do so.

John McCain, as he has done so many times in the past, spent Thanksgiving overseas with our fighting heroes. He spent the holiday in Baghdad, Iraq with our nation's finest sons and daughters, including the outstanding General David Petraeus. Far too many of us back at home have forgotten about the fact that we still have troops in Iraq fighting to establish a stable and viable country. Liberal Democrats long ago became politically married to defeat in Iraq as it was the cleanest path to election success in 2008.

Now, as the troop surge has become an undeniable success and things appear to be on the right track in Iraq, we hear much too little about the sacrifices of those responsible for the success in this hotbed of inter-ethnic discord – our troops. McCain is a man who appreciates the freedoms provided by our nation simply because for seven years in a North Vietnamese prisoner-of-war camp he was forced to live without them.

In this country, with a liberal and President Bush-hating media leading an all too undiscerning public around by a leash, we hear far too little about a lot of things. Thanksgiving should have been a time to embrace what we have, what we value and what we cherish. It should be a time to thank our troops for keeping us safe and free, a time to volunteer to help those less fortunate and without their own means to celebrate the holiday, a time to reflect on how lucky we are to be Americans living in a nation where the rule of law prevails, chances for prosperity and happiness abound and democracy thrives.

We collectively spend far too much time worrying and complaining about what we don't have or what the government won't give us rather than being thankful for the mere fact that we live in the world's freest and most opportunity-filled nation; a place to where freedom-loving people flock and a diversity of ideas and innovative ingenuity consistently flourish – we are history's most politically advanced and economically vibrant civilization.

What Americans should do is give not only thanks but much more – namely, their time, talents and energy – to helping us win our current struggle against extremism and helping us preserve and extend our magnificent heritage. Collectively, we should put down our iPods and pick up American flags.

As a generation, so little has been asked and so much has been given to us relative to World War II's "Greatest Generation." Now as much as ever, our willingness to advance our cause and preserve our way of life must be inexhaustible. Merely being thankful on Thanksgiving for the preponderance of opportunities, rights and freedoms this country has provided us is a step in this direction.

And if you ever begin to question the value of these ideals and principles, utopian Cuba is just a few short miles to the south. Enjoy the swim.

Brad DeFlumeri is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bdeflume@student.umass.edu

On strike, with perplexing demands

Katy Bruck

Let me preface everything I'm about to say by stating that I am in full support of expanding scholarships and aid to lower income communities in Massachusetts, increasing student accessibility to student space and putting a stop to this seemingly arbitrary escalation of fees with no communication from the administration to students. The bureaucracy of this University hasn't served or even acknowledged the student population appropriately for a long time. And with a newly-elected Democratic governor who has openly made public higher education a priority, there are plenty of tools and plans in the works that the University could take advantage of if it so chose.

I sympathize profoundly with almost all of the issues that close to a thousand students, maybe even more, voiced their concern over last week. But there was one issue that I felt seriously detracted from the seriousness of the other objections articulated by the strike: the police presence in residence halls.

I've been pulled over before; I've been questioned by an officer over stupid things. I've even been treated rudely by UMPD officers. They're not always the most likeable population on campus. But I think it's a little ludicrous to try and assert that there are routinely undercover or plainclothes police officers roaming the halls of every dorm on campus, busting people for smoking a joint in their rooms or covering their smoke detectors. To think that this university actually employs enough people to pull that off is a little unrealistic. And I think the majority of these terrifying rumors stem from a total lack of awareness on the part of UMass students concerning the policies relating to their own security. This is unfortunate, as I think it provides an opening for those who might wish to invalidate our other concerns.

As a resident of this campus for five semesters, I have lived in three different residential areas, and I have never once seen a police officer in a hallway that was not being escorted there by a resident, an RA or some other emergency personnel. The majority of the time when I have met a cop in the hall, he or she has been carrying an orange first aid kit and running to the aid of someone who more than likely would end up aspirating in his or her own vomit if there wasn't a police force on this campus that responds at the rate that they do.

And as for plainclothes officers – yeah, I've seen that too. In fact, sometime in the unspecified past (to protect the presumed innocence of those involved) I witnessed one undercover officer and two uniformed officers arresting two individuals in a dorm at around 8 a.m. one day. I assumed that the undercover knocked, said "Candy-gram," the door was opened, and chaos ensued. I didn't have to assume what those two were being carried off for: after numerous complaints about late-night knocking, funny smells and a suspiciously large flat screen television victoriously loaded into their room about a week beforehand, the conclusion was sufficiently obvious. Unfortunately, members of the UMass community, sometimes young people, do stupid things, make bad decisions and get themselves in trouble.

Much to their chagrin, the RAs actually are the people who have to deal with our crap the majority of the time.

Much to their chagrin, the RAs actually are the people who have to deal with our crap the majority of the time. You'd think that, when it came to the complicated stuff, they'd be happy to pawn off their responsibilities onto someone a little easier to vilify. There's nothing more relieving than being able to shrug and say "God, that sucks, I'm sorry man," as a resident is being written up by the UMPD for punching someone or being belligerent to the security monitor or drinking underage.

On that note, I'd like to say that I think a strike was probably the worst way to protest the police presence on campus. It obviously hasn't done much, since this weekend our grass and gals in grey were out in force. It also doesn't sufficiently address what I think the real issue is: a lack of knowledge as to what you can actually get in trouble for, and under what circumstances. If students actually understood their rights and what's really expected of them, there would be fewer silly, pointless arrests and misunderstandings and everyone's life would be a whole lot easier. So let me end with a few pieces of advice.

We are in the Pioneer Valley, folks, one of the most beautiful places in New England. If you're going to smoke the you-know-what, go hiking or something. Don't do it on campus, where the 5-0 are lurking around every corner. Also, be nice to the security monitors, especially in the Southwest towers – they have radios that communicate directly to the police station, and they don't appreciate rude, drunk people hassling them (especially if you're a freshman, because then it's pretty obvious you're not supposed to rock like Bacardi Razz). And if you're looking to make some quick money, don't hang shoes out in front of your dorm window.

Katy Bruck is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at kbruck@student.umass.edu

HAPPY THANKSGIVING TO YOU, TOO.

DAILY COLLEGIAN READER POLL

The administration met with the SGA and GSS last Tuesday to discuss grievances addressed by the student strike.

Was this a positive result of the strike?

☐ Yes – the student strike made the administration take our concerns seriously.

☐ No – the administration would've met with the SGA and GSS anyway.

☐ No – the administration did not agree to a public meeting.

Cast your vote online at www.dailycollegian.com!

NOV 26 2007

Twin sisters perform

Tegan and Sara bring their unique sound to Northampton

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last Tuesday night proved highly entertaining for anyone lucky enough to be at the packed Calvin Theater for the Tegan and Sara concert. The twin Canadian sisters and their opener, Northern State, rocked for two hours to screaming, dancing fans.

At 8 p.m., Northern State took the stage. The Long Island natives, who call themselves Sprout, Besta Prynn and Spero, literally bounced around on stage to their rap-rock style music, moving in choreographed poses and getting the audience involved. They played songs from both their newest release, "Can I Keep This Pen," and older albums.

Their set looked like it had come from one of the member's garages. The speakers lay on old, cheap-looking Oriental carpet, and the sign bearing the band name and the initial of "Can I Keep This Pen" looked like it was made during arts and crafts. But this amateur-looking set only added to the laid-back, inviting feel of Northern State's performance, and spoke nothing of the band's talents.

Watching their performance and listening to their unique sound, it was easy to see why these girls have been gaining momentum in the music industry, with a recent episode of "Grey's Anatomy" opening to "Better Already," a song from "Can I Keep This Pen."

Their interesting style, both as performers and musicians, sets them apart from most of today's other artists. They rapped to a background of guitar, keyboard, drums and bass, blending rap and rock in an interesting way.

The music was broken up every once in a while with banter between the friends. They asked for dedication suggestions from the audience, and joked about the latest Britney Spears disaster, wondering aloud to laughter just how low she'd fall.

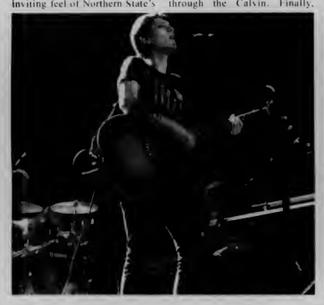
After Northern State left the stage, there was a quick break and the tension and anticipation built. When the lights finally dimmed again, the crowd started to scream so loudly it sounded like a fighter plane had flown through the Calvin. Finally, Tegan and Sara took the stage and started right in with their first song.

After a while, they took a break to talk to the audience. Though they are twins, there are plenty of differences between Tegan and Sara. Sara, wearing a black shirt with white polka dots, jeans and pink converses, was far more outgoing, cracking jokes and telling stories whenever she got the chance. She joked with a man in the first row who, according to Sara, had a strange resemblance to her uncle Jerry, comparing their jaw bones and asking what he did for a living.

Later on, Sara discussed the dangers of Red Bull. "[It] is like legalized crack-cocaine out of a can," she said, before promising she was "sober tonight" and moving into the next song.

At one point during the show, Sara kept talking, continuously interrupting Tegan, who wore a T-shirt, jeans, and red converses, as she tried to get the next song started. Finally Tegan said, "I'm embarrassed for you ... Momma doesn't care do you want to play songs, or do you want to talk?" This prompted Sara to play again.

The roar after each number was deafening, and Tegan kept saying, "Thank you very much." When the duo announced their last song, the audience responded in a chorus of "No," to which Sara explained that they'd actually be back for "four or five more songs" for the encore.



When Tegan, Sara and their back-up band left the stage, the crowd screamed for what seemed like 10 minutes. Finally, when they came back on stage, Sara said they just wanted to make sure the crowd actually wanted an encore. Then they played a great cover of Rihanna's "Umbrella," along with a few more originals. They left the stage to more screams from their devoted fans.

Through the entire show, the audience sang along. People were air-drumming and dancing all throughout the theater. The fans were incredible; everyone knew every word, pause and breath. Tegan and Sara are fun performers to watch, and each song is different and fun to listen to, with musical surprises and interesting melodies and instrumentals.

After seeing one Tegan and Sara show, it's easy to see why they are sold out in almost every upcoming show in the United States and abroad. These sisters are definitely a musical force to be reckoned with.

Stephanie McPherson can be reached at smcpherson@student.umass.edu.

'No Country for Old Men' touches perfection

BY KEVIN KOCZWARA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Wow!" is the perfect word to describe the Coen Brothers' new movie "No Country For Old Men." The movie is as close to perfect filmmaking as you can get. The dialogue is deep, dark, humorous and humane, all at once. The story line, although violent, is easy to follow and the characters depict the definition of good and evil.

Joel and Ethan Coen have had a string of great movies ("Fargo," "Blood Simple," "Barton Fink") and one cult hit that never seems to get old ("The Big Lebowski"). They write, direct, edit and work hard at what they do. They are a perfect pair of brothers who break the mold of Hollywood each time they make a movie and still sell to the public and critics. "No Country For Old Men" is their best. There is no comparison.

What Joel and Ethan Coen do with the Cormac McCarthy novel by the same name is something beautiful and haunting. The director/writer pair takes on a novel with a few storylines and melds them all together into one movie. They play cat and mouse with the viewers and tease the audience throughout with constant suspense.

Some will cringe at the amount of blood shed in the movie. The killings without mercy will hit the gut but the violence moves the plot along and brings the viewer into the world of the characters. The world revolves around a satchel of missing money, $2 million, drugs and a man who is on a mission — and nothing will stop him.

The Coen Brothers push the boundaries of bloodshed. It is graphic but never so much to offend a viewer. Blood is artfully shown flowing from a body to the feet of a character. There are some scenes that are tough on the stomach, but nothing like the "Saw" or "Hostel" movies. The violence is done well and is used to further the plot. It is very real and makes the viewer very conscious of the violence in society.

To help set up the suspense and eeriness of the Texas landscape, where the movie takes place, the Coen Brothers use nothing but natural sounds for the soundtrack. There is no music throughout the movie. There are background noises to the desert that lies in front of its characters. The long stretches of highway echo with sand blasting against car doors. The house windows have a brisk breeze flowing through them, and any one of the motel lobbies has a TV with its rabbit ears, showing a soap opera or any number of poorly made television shows. What results are atmospheres that heighten all the senses.

While the directing and cinematography show stunning beauty and open landscapes, the actors in the movie push the plot and help the audience see the true nature of their characters. Anton Chigurh (Javier Bardem) is more frightening than any villain to come out in many years. He is a killer with no conscious and too much care for the little details of each killing. He is polite and all too calm for a psychopath. He has no mercy for anyone, including innocent bystanders. He is described as a "ghost" many times, leaving no one who has seen him alive.

Llewelyn Moss (Josh Brolin) is the unlucky (or lucky) man who finds the satchel of two million dollars while hunting in the desert plains of Texas. He comes across the murder scene of a drug deal gone wrong. He goes out in search of the living person who had seemed to escape the massacre and left a trail. He finds the man, dead, and takes the satchel of money that was the pay for the drug deal. He shows compassion and care after traveling home with the money and returning later that night to bring water to the only survivor.

That would turn out to be a fatal mistake. Leaving his car behind gets his tires slashed. Llewelyn is chased by drug lords who have come to find their money and drugs. He nearly escapes, leaves behind clues to his presence.

Antoine comes into play when he is hired to find the money that was taken. He takes Moss' car's verification number to identify the owner. The chase begins and the blood that had already been spilled is only the beginning. Moss is in for a dangerous game of cat and mouse with the deadliest of assassins.

Sheriff Ed Tom Bell (Tommy Lee Jones) is trying to track down Chigurh and save Llewelyn Moss and his family. He is old and wise, and has gone soft in his old age. He only has to see the crime scene once to know what has happened and what will happen. He can see into the future and says "If it ain't, it'll do till the mess gets here," after seeing the initial crime scene. The mess shows up many times, and Bell doesn't need to see it to know the dangers that lay ahead for the Moss family.

The cast of actors give some of the best performances of their careers. The Coens' process for gathering a cast is rigorous and it shows. They write a script and follow it to the very last detail. They direct with more care than anyone. They are not there to preach, either. The movie has a message, it is pretty simple, and yet they never put it in the audience's face. They use the book's style and the biblical figures, which McCarthy is known for, to show the message and let the audience determine it for themselves.

Kevin Koczwara can be reached at kkoczwar@student.umass.edu.

NO COUNTRY FOR OLD MEN

DIRECTED BY JOEL AND ETHAN COEN

GRADE: A

"No Country for Old Men" is based off the novel by Cormac McCarthy. The gruesome book has been turned into a violent movie by directors Ethan and Joel Coen.

'Ugly Betty' tweaked

TV series broadcast around the world with adjustments

BY SIBYLLA BRODZINSKY AND GLENN GARVIN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

BOGOTA, Colombia — "Ugly Betty" is returning to her roots, and Colombians aren't sure they like the idea.

ABC's hit satire of "telenovelas" has just begun to air throughout Latin America, but here in the country that gave birth to "Yo soy Betty la fea," the "novela" on which "Ugly Betty" is based, a lot of people see the U.S. show as a pale imitation and an outright counterfeit of the original.

"Watching the gringo version would be like reading '100 Years Of Solitude' in English," says Fabian Sanabria, an anthropologist at the Universidad Nacional who studies television. "It makes no sense."

Executives at Sony Entertainment Television, which operates a Latin American cable channel that reaches 17.7 million viewers, think he's dead wrong.

"Even though everybody in Latin America knows the story from "Betty la fea," I think "Ugly Betty" brings something different," says Carolina Padula, SET's chief programmer, speaking by phone from her office in Caracas. "It's an adaptation and a very successful one."

The repackaging of "Ugly Betty" for Latin Americans represents yet another remarkable chapter in a show that began as a routine "telenovela" and quickly blossomed into an international sensation.

"Betty la fea," an ugly-duckling tale of a smart but unattractive young woman working in the fashion industry who blossoms with the help of true love and a skilled makeover artist, debuted in Colombia in 1999 and soon was the rage of the entire Spanish-speaking world, including the United States, where it aired on Telemundo.

Eventually, the show was dubbed into other languages for release all over the globe, including India, Lithuania, Indonesia, Poland, Bulgaria, Romania, Malaysia, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Italy, Switzerland, Turkey, the Philippines, China and Japan (under the catchier title "Betty, The Secretarial Office of Love and Betrayal").

Its worldwide success prompted keen interest among U.S. television executives in adapting "telenovelas" to the English-speaking market and even the creation of the all-"novela" network MyNetworkTV. But most of the projects flopped before ever reaching the air, and MyNetworkTV abandoned "novelas" after several months of abysmal ratings.

"Ugly Betty" was the exception, perhaps because the show gave "Betty la fea" a makeover as profound as the one its title character underwent. Besides setting the show in the United States (at a fashion magazine rather than a design shop), producers turned it from a soap opera with daily cliffhangers into a weekly comedy with plots that begin and end in each episode.

"Ugly Betty" was an instant hit, drawing more than 14 million viewers a week. Even though the show's audience has declined a bit to 11 million this season, it remains one of ABC's strongest performers and the opener of its powerhouse Thursday-night lineup.

Padula, SET's programmer, is confident that the show, which debuted across Latin America on Nov. 7, will be a hit for her network, too.

"The show has a lot of attitude, a sense of humor and high quality," she says. "It portrays, in a very positive way, Latin American culture. It sets aside stereotypes, in a very positive way.... It has a lot of differences from the original "Betty la fea," but it still keeps faith with the original version."

In fact, "Ugly Betty" already has proven that, like "Betty la fea," it can cross cultural boundaries. The American show has drawn big audiences in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and SET's parent company, Sony Pictures Television International, has purchased its scripts to produce Russian and Indian versions with local casts.

"Sometimes you have to massage the show a little to work in different cultures," one Sony official explains. "In the Hindi-language version, the characters couldn't kiss."

"Ugly Betty" will get a few tweaks for Latin America, too. SET will show it with Spanish subtitles (or Portuguese, in Brazil). "Sometimes that allows us to adapt a joke to make it more understandable to our audience," Padula says.

But that's necessary much less often than you might think. SET shows a lot of subtitled American programs, including "Grey's Anatomy," "Desperate Housewives" and "Medium." The network attracts a young, upscale audience fascinated by U.S. cultural references, no matter how peculiar and idiomatic. SET viewers, for instance, flocked to the eccentric New York neuroses of "Seinfeld."

"Believe it or not, 'Seinfeld' was one of the biggest success stories of all time in television here," Padula says. "It was very hard for us at the beginning to explain the show. But when it had been on the air five or six years, it became very, very popular. ... It's been running 12 years here now, even though they aren't making new episodes anymore, and it's still popular."

Even less explicable are shows that flopped in the United States but developed a big audience in Latin America. American TV viewers who remember "Action," a comedy about a ruthless Hollywood producer and his hooker assistant that aired on Fox for two months in the late 1990s, could probably hold their national convention in a phone booth. But it was a hit on SET.

"In the United States, the shows are given very few opportunities to find an audience because they're canceled so fast," Padula says. "Here, people respond more or less by habit. They watch a lot of episodes, they get used to it, and they get upset when it's canceled."

But that loyalty, some Colombians say, will hurt "Ugly Betty" here. "This series could be a moderate success around the rest of Latin America, or it could even be as successful as "The Sopranos" or "24," says Omar Rincon, the TV critic at Bogota's El Tiempo newspaper. "But in Colombia, no one will watch it."

"Ugly Betty" was based on a telenovela from Columbia entitled "Betty la fea." When American producers recreated the show, they changed the drama to appeal more to primetime audiences.

Master of Engineering in Manufacturing
Creating Global Professionals

Manufacturing is more important than ever, in the U.S. and around the world

Percent of Global Value-Added Manufacturing, 2005
Source: United Nations Statistics Division

New technologies and markets require a new kind of professional. We prepare students with the knowledge and experience they need to become innovators in the field of global manufacturing.

The Master of Engineering in Manufacturing is an intensive one-year program with an integrated, project-oriented curriculum grounded in engineering science. A group project in industry gives students real-world experience.

Fellowships and opportunities for global study are available.

Become a leader in manufacturing and learn the process, product, system, and business aspects of manufacturing.

For more information, including application materials, visit http://web.mit.edu/meng-manufacturing/

Master of Engineering Program
MIT Room 35-231
77 Massachusetts Avenue
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02139
617-258-5622
menginfo@mit.edu

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

'October Road' making its comeback during mid-season

BY SARA RANIWAZI
DAILY BRUIN (UCLA)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES — In a matter of weeks, TV viewers will tune in to prime-time hits such as "Desperate Housewives" and "Scrubs" only to find a dreary rerun. With production halting all around town because of the Writers Guild of America strike, the nation will soon need a new reason to turn on the tube. Enter "October Road."

In preparation of the strike, writers worked tirelessly to finish the scripts for all 13 scheduled episodes.

"These guys love the show so much they weren't going to let some strike hold back what they had to say," said Bryan Greenberg, who plays lead character Nick. "They went into hyperdrive and got all 13 ready, which is pretty amazing."

After filming a six-episode season in Atlanta last year, "October Road" returns with a longer 13-episode run and a new shooting location: Los Angeles. The switch left the show in need of new locales to maintain the East Coast college-town vibe established last year. UCLA was a perfect fit.

"There's a warmth to the architecture at UCLA that we loved," executive producer Josh Appelbaum said. "I hadn't been there in years and we were all like, 'Really? UCLA?' But when we showed up there, it looked fantastic."

Greenberg is no stranger to college campuses: he graduated with a fine arts degree from New York University, but shooting at UCLA was no trip down memory lane.

"I never really had that college experience because NYU is so not a college; it's like being a kid in New York City," he said. "But UCLA has a beautiful campus."

In the face of often-withering reviews from critics, the show still found an average audience of 10 million viewers in its debut season. Although this number looks modest compared to top-ranked shows, which attract upward of 20 million viewers, it was enough to help the makers of "October Road" ignore the critics.

"There was a level of vitriol in those reviews that was flat-out cynical to us," Appelbaum said. "The show is, if nothing else, harmless and entertaining, and they were treating it like we were killing bunny rabbits."

Criticism aside, a loyal fan base soon fell in love with the denizens of Knights Ridge, Mass. — the charming small-town setting of "October Road."

The show follows Nick (Greenberg), a New York City writer who makes it big by penning a best-selling novel based on his old Knights Ridge comrades, characterizing them in an unflattering fashion.

Drama unfolds when he returns to Knights Ridge after a 10-year absence and receives a chilly response from the town he used to call home. His ex-best friend Eddie (Geoff Stults) and ex-girlfriend Hannah ("That '70s Show's" Laura Prepon) are still nursing the wounds inflicted by his sudden departure. The rest of the small town is a motley cast of characters who, in time, come to accept Nick back to the Ridge.

This season finds Nick still adjusting to life in his hometown. He starts the season as a creative writing professor at the local college.

Aside from shooting on college campuses (they also shot at UCLA), "October Road" appeals to the college crowd.

"My friends and I were instantly hooked," Michelle Barton, a second-year biology student, said. "It's such a cute, simple little story. Boy meets girl. Boy falls in love, but something happens to get in the way."

Appelbaum has also noticed the collegiate attraction.

"College kids tell me how they love the show because they feel like it's giving them a glimpse of what it will be like years down the road, getting out of college and the struggles and relationships they'll go through," he said.

In upcoming weeks, "October Road" will have its own share of struggles to overcome, since the life of a midseason show is a tricky one.

Appelbaum sees the late start as a positive thing: "There are so many shows networks dump on the public in September and October," he said. "[Premiering] now allows us to stand out more."

Lynette Rice, a senior television writer at Entertainment Weekly, though, explained how the midseason start could have an adverse effect on the show, especially in this strike-plagued season.

"[Even] people who started this strike favoring the writers, pretty soon they're going to start to get pissed," Rice said. "By the time midseason shows launch, they may have already checked out to, say, pick up a book or watch a DVD or two. They may not want to invest in something new."

Whether or not the strike affects ratings will be seen as the midseason unfolds. Whether or not the show finally wins back the heart of Hannah – you'll just have to watch and see.

And as for those nasty critics, nothing is further from Greenberg's mind.

"I'd rather be involved in something people are going to watch rather than something critically reviewed that nobody watches," he said.

"It's all about connecting with people, and that's what we do."

"October Road" is set in Knight Ridge, Mass., and follows Nick, played by Bryan Greenberg, as he reconnects with old friends.

The Massachusetts
Daily Collegian

is looking for a new
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER

ARE YOU AN EARLY RISER WITH SOME TIME BEFORE CLASS?

ARE YOU ORGANIZED, EFFICIENT, AND PROFESSIONAL?

DO YOU WANT TO BE A PART OF THE LARGEST DAILY COLLEGE NEWSPAPER IN NEW ENGLAND?

APPLY NOW:
113 CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT
DAILY COLLEGIAN OFFICES
(413)545-3500

Offense leads UMass

FOOTBALL from page 8

Quarterback John Skelton engineered a 12-play, 98-yard drive that took up over five minutes of the game clock to tie the game at 35. Skelton had a career-high five touchdowns on the afternoon (three passing, two rushing). This one came on an 11-yard pass to Sylvester Clark a few minutes into the fourth quarter.

After throwing for 306 yards in the first half, Coen and the offense changed philosophies in the second half and continued to hand the ball to Lawrence. It paid off again on the ensuing drive after Fordham tied the game, as Lawrence had several long rushes. A 13-yard run capped the drive and gave UMass the lead for good at 42-35.

"If he wants to throw for 300 yards shoot let him throw, I don't have any problems with it," Lawrence joked. "But if he ever needs me, I'm right there. They said run the ball, so that's what I did. I can't complain, sometimes I wasn't even getting touched; it was a running back's dream."

Fordham's last chance to get back into the game ended on the next drive, when Skelton was intercepted by Charles Walker. Walker returned the ball to the Fordham 22 and Lawrence took care of the rest six plays later for his third touchdown run of the game.

After the game, UMass coach Don Brown talked about his frustration with his punting unit, which had three miscues. With a 21-7 lead in the second quarter, Brett Arnold's punt was blocked by Nicholas Magiera, giving the Rams good field position. Fordham scored a touchdown on the drive with a pass from Skelton to Cody Kritzer to pull within seven points.

But that was all forgotten just a minute later. After a 38-yard kickoff return to the Fordham 41-yard line by Jeremy Horne, Coen and Rancher hooked up once again. On the first play from scrimmage, Coen found his 6-foot-5 target for a 41-yard touchdown. Rancher caught the ball along the right side of the field and cut all the way across to the left sideline for the score.

But it was Rancher's first touchdown catch that everyone wanted to talk about. During UMass's first drive in the second quarter, Coen lofted the ball up in the end zone for Rancher. The ball floated over three Rams defenders, and Rancher dove full extension on the ground and reeled it in for the score and the 21-7 lead.

After a three-and-out for Fordham, Coen completed a long pass to a wide open Rancher on the left side. The completion went for 48 yards, but Rancher fumbled the ball after a Kennith Thompson strip. Thompson recovered the ball and returned it for 27 yards. The Minutemen committed a 15-yard unsportsmanlike conduct penalty on the play, giving the Rams the ball on the UMass 18.

After a few plays and an 18-yard completion to the 1-yard line, Fordham called a timeout with three seconds remaining in the half. Maselta decided to go for it, and Skelton made that decision pay off with his second touchdown run of the game, giving the Rams new life at 28-21 entering halftime.

Fordham tied the game minutes into the third quarter, on a 19-yard touchdown pass to Richard Rayborn. Coen answered on a 33-yard touchdown pass to fullback Chris Zardas on the next drive to regain the 7-point lead. The Rams would eventually tie it on the 98-yard drive following the interception of Lawrence.

The second punting unit mistake came late in the fourth quarter, after the game was already in hand. Arnold muffed the handle of the long snap, and was forced to throw the ball – which was completed for a six-yard loss to linebacker George Byrd.

The UMass punt return team got burned as well, when Fordham executed a fake punt to perfection on fourth-and-2 on its own 26-yard line, trailing 14-0 in the first quarter. The snap went directly to Magiera, who ran the ball 38 yards to the UMass 36. Skelton later scored on a 1-yard run, jumping over the top of the defenders to cut the lead to 14-7.

Michael Bisceglia/Collegian

Redshirt senior wide receiver J.J. Moore was one of six Minutemen to catch a pass against Fordham. The UMass offense torched the Rams for 649 total yards – the second-highest single game total in school history.

Game notes

The Minutemen tied the school record with 651 yards of total offense with just minutes remaining in the game, but two Coen kneel-downs left UMass two yards short of the mark … J.J. Moore also had over 100 yards receiving for UMass, finishing with 115 on eight catches … Zardas had 88 yards from scrimmage on just four touches, including a 33-yard touchdown reception … Coen was virtually untouched all day, completing 24-of-37 passes. He was not sacked once … Jorgensen gave UMass the 7-0 lead on a 7-yard touchdown reception on the game's opening drive.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu.

Check out the audio slideshow from Saturday's first-round playoff game between UMass and Fordham online at www.dailycollegian.com.

UM advances to face Eagles

SOCCER from page 1

UMass started the scoring midway through the first half by dissecting the Terrier defense in a classic offensive progression.

Sophomore midfielder Mark DeSantis brought the ball into the right side of the 18-yard box in the shadow of a pair of BU defenders. He created some space and launched a low cross toward freshman midfielder Stuart Arnick, who was streaking toward the center of the goal. Arnick fielded the pass and tapped the ball into the left side in a running motion.

In soccer, scoring the first goal has a significant impact on the game's momentum. It's especially important for defensive-minded teams like UMass.

"Whenever we score first, we usually are successful," Arnick said. "When we don't those are the games that usually slip by us. It's huge for us being a strong defensive team to get one in and release some pressure. It allows us to do what we do best."

Earlier in the season, the Maroon and White fell into the trap of placing too great an emphasis on defense after getting a lead. Once UMass took the lead in the first half against the Terriers, UMass coach Sam Koch yelled, "It's 0-0," to his players in an effort to remind them not to play like they had a lead.

Meanwhile, the UMass defense held BU shotless in the first half and rarely allowed the Terriers within striking distance of the Minuteman goal.

In the second half, the Terriers began to find their way and started to put pressure on Simmons in net. But the Maroon and White built a 2-0 advantage in the 67th with a set-piece goal.

Redshirt junior Doug Rappaport launched a corner kick from the left side that connected with the forehead of senior Kenny Cook. The ball popped up toward Michael Jopia directly in front, who then headed the ball into the goal. A BU defender unsuccessfully tried to clear the ball before it touched the netting.

With a two-goal deficit, the Terriers increased their offensive pressure and forced Simmons to make several difficult saves with 12 total shots. BU found the back of the net through a rush with less than three minutes to play.

With the Eagles on deck, Koch knows his team is eager to tackle the challenge ahead.

"I'm pleased with the result. Like every game, you've got things to work on," Koch said. "I'm pleased that we're here and very pleased that we're going to practice on Sunday. That was our goal and now we have it."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Brian Thevenin/Collegian

Sophomore midfielder Mark DeSantis assisted on the Minutemen's first goal against BU Friday. DeSantis and the UMass attack succeeded in creating offense in Friday's NCAA tournament game, especially in the first half.

Receiver makes big plays in playoff win

RANCHER from page 8

I got past the defensive back. I stacked him and just dove for it."

Rancher's other touchdown was a demonstration of what happens when a defense forgets that the 6-foot-5 receiver is as fast as he is tall.

Rancher ran a 10-yard comeback pattern on the right side. He found a hole in the zone coverage, and Coen found him for what looked like an easy first down. Rancher then turned and ran east-west along the 35-yard line, following sturdy downfield blocking by J.J. Moore, Michael Omar and Ian Jorgensen.

He outran everyone down the left sideline to put UMass up 28-14 in the first half. Rancher finished the first half with seven receptions for 187 yards and two touchdowns, just 23 yards shy of the UMass single-game record set by Adrian Zullo in 1999 (210 yards against Richmond).

"He got that little 6-yard play across the field, and took it to the house," Coen said. "That's something that he brings to the table."

If it weren't for UMass coach Don Brown committing to the run game to keep the Ram offense off the field in the second half, Rancher likely would have surpassed the single-game mark.

Regardless, he and Coen developed a rhythm in the first half, torching Fordham's defense. Coen himself threw for over 300 yards before halftime.

"He was playing great," Coen said of Rancher. "A couple of times I did just say, 'Hey, 'Sheed, I'm probably going to look for you. He was just playing his butt off."

Rancher's only gaffe in the game came on what could have been his best play. Just before halftime, Rancher caught a bomb from Coen on a first-and-10 from UMass's 10-yard line, but fumbled as he was tackled around midfield. The fumble was returned 26 yards and led to a Fordham touchdown that helped keep the Rams in the game.

Despite the one mistake, Rancher's play helped move UMass to the second round, where it will go on the road against Southern Illinois.

"I'm happy to be into the second round," Coen said, "so as long as we keep throwing and catching the ball well, we'll be all set."

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Meyers triumphant in return

HOCKEY from page 8

career goal, redirecting a shot by Mike Kostka from the point.

Less than a minute later, Chris Davis grabbed his second goal of the season with one Dutchman still in the box. Nolet and Michael Lecomte assisted on the play, giving UMass a 5-2 lead it would carry to the locker rooms.

Nolet said he had not played any forward in three years, but with an injury keeping Will Ortiz out of the lineup, Nolet said Cahoon made the move Friday at practice.

"I had one practice on Friday just to get comfortable," Nolet said. "The first couple shifts I was really running around, but then I talked with coach [Cahoon] in between periods and we just tried to relax. I did the simple things, and I think it went well."

Meyers finished with 25 saves on 27 shots. He's now 2-0 in his two starts this season.

"I thought Danny looked very solid," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I'd say he had no chance on the power play goal [later in the first]. He had no fault on that. The first goal was a tough play, maybe he would have liked to be a little more patient, but he made some real good saves and some testy saves, especially where he's not getting in a rhythm."

The Minutemen visit Cornell Friday. They do not play another Hockey East opponent until Dec. 8 at home against New Hampshire.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Senior defenseman Mike Kostka assisted on two Minuteman goals in the team's 5-2 victory over Union Sunday night at the Mullins Center. Kostka now has two goals and five assists on the season.

Tournament a learning experience for Minutewomen

BASKETBALL from page 8

her team being indecisive was a big contributor.

"There was indecision on all parts. There was indecision on Kate's part, indecision on Pam's part, on [junior guard] Steph Gerardot's part and on [sophomore guard Kim Benton's] part. 'Do I shoot or do I not shoot?' They all have the green light, so there should be no indecision. There should be no indecisive thinking," Dacko said Saturday night. "I'm really not happy with our team's performance."

Benton was the runner-up in the points column with six. Gerardot finished with two.

Junior guard Jasmine Young scored 18 points for ECU, a team high.

"She's a nice player. She's quick, she's gets in the lanes, she creates," Dacko said. "She had 10 assists. I thought [junior guard Sakera Young] did a pretty good job on her but she just broke us down. She's an outstanding player."

Next in line were guards Allison Spivey and LaCoya Terry, who finished with 14 and 12 points, respectively.

Spivey was 4-of-7 from the field, including 2-of-4 from the arc. She also sank all four of her shots from the charity stripe.

Terry shot 5-of-15 and drained both of her free throws.

The team met similar disappointment against the Dolphins (4-2) Friday.

Mills led the way for the Minutewomen in the loss with a team-leading 22 points. She went 9-of-11 from the field, including 2-of-2 from the perimeter. She also nailed a pair of free throws.

Rosanio followed suit and scored 20 points. The 5-foot-10 guard scored on six of her nine shots in addition to going 8-of-8 from the free-throw line.

Despite the two solid efforts, the Minutewomen let the game slip away. With 1:35 left, UMass was up by 65-62 and just trying to hold on when Jacksonville guard DaVina Hamilton shot a 3-pointer over Rosanio to tie the score. On UMass's next possession, Sakera Young got called for charging. Jacksonville then marched down the court and Mills blocked a shot from the 3-point line by Ashley Williams, who finished with a game-high 28 points. Dolphin Regina Omoite gathered the loose ball and sank a 3-pointer.

Everything went downhill for the Minutewomen after that. After a foul by UMass senior Alisha Tatham, Williams nailed both free throws. Williams and Omoite each hit another free throw, off fouls by Young and Rosanio, respectively. A 3-pointer by Mills as time expired proved futile as the Dolphins handed the Minutewomen their first loss of the holiday weekend.

Dacko said one of the main factors in Friday's loss was her team's failure to box out.

"It was the common denominator," she said. "We gave up 23 offensive boards to Jacksonville. They scored probably 25 points off of our turnovers."

She said no one can be that weak grabbing rebounds on offense and expect to be successful.

She did mention, however, that her team's game plan was to get the Dolphins out of their man defense and make them play zone, which it did. The strategy helped the UMass offense, which shot 52.4 percent from the floor.

"It's definitely a disappointment for us," Mills said. "We have to turn it around and use it as a learning tool. We learned a lot about ourselves as a team. We have to work on our rebounding and we have to work on our turnovers, because those killed us in both of the games. I think this tournament kind of exposed those weaknesses, so hopefully we'll be able to work on those."

UMass has just a few more days to prepare for its next game Wednesday against Boston University.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

JAMAICA SPRING BREAK 2008

THE JAMAICA MUSIC FESTIVAL FEATURING ARTISTS SUCH AS: SHAGGY, BEENIE MAN, and much, much more!

Concert Dates: March 3rd, 10th, 17th & 24th

Book Your Trip Today! Contact:

1.800.426.7710 1.800.648.4849

JAMAICA Out of this world

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!

Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP

POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL

• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates

Potter's Collision Repair

at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.potterauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Collision Repair & Glass Replacement

TAKE A PHOTO OF YOURSELF WITH YOUR COMPLETED SUDOKU OR CROSSWORD AND SEE YOURSELF IN THE COMICS PAGE

COMICS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Another day, another useless pattern of numbers.

9						5
	7	8	3	1	2
2						4
	3	6		5	4
4						2
	2	7		9	6
	6					3
		4	5	7	3	1
2						8

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Parks or Convy
5 Numbered musical piece
9 Disenchanted fan
14 Nose alert
15 Time gone by 16 Bald raptor
17 Missile storage
18 Branching diagram
19 Book of maps
20 Medley meals
22 Therapy
24 Ground grain
26 Binge
27 Burn flamelessly
30 Missing persons investigator
34 Lend a hand to 35 Writer Louis
38 Folk tales
39 Caps ending?
40 Writer's blocks
43 Fellow
44 John of the PGA
46 Scurry
47 Hrs. in Seattle
48 Bug
51 Pasta
53 Slack
56 Shredded
57 Wooden siding
61 Pocket breads
64 Solitary one
65 Promote oneself
67 Parking penalty
68 Unit of word
69 Brain subdivision
70 Speech subtlety
71 Consecrate
72 B alt. fails
73 Piece of cake

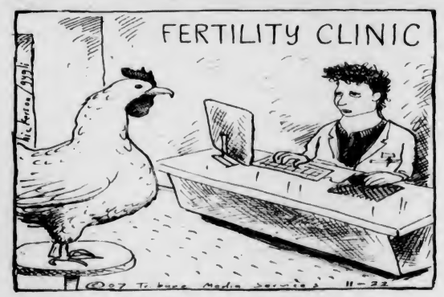
DOWN
1 Top banana
2 Cut and spice
3 People to emulate
4 Garden scoop
5 Select
6 Element
7 Employers
8 Brew as tea
9 Shoot worker
10 Breakfast chorde
11 Eyebat impolitely
12 Zest
13 Remainder
21 Begin's peace partner
23 Carney or Garfunkel
25 Al Capp's hyena
27 Medina resident
28 Italian fashion center
29 Barbecue specialty
31 Finish
32 Answering machine button
33 Landlord's revenues
36 RN's nickname
37 Semi-eternity?
41 Wrestle blast
42 Loiter oneself
45 Sharp bankers
49 Charmer's snakes
50 Also
52 Snow banks
54 Weaselike mammal
55 Actor Flynn
57 Driver or wedge
58 Drops lightly
59 Add to the pot
60 Light touches
62 ___ May Wong
63 Ooze
66 Turn right?

Ten Down: Breakfast Choice

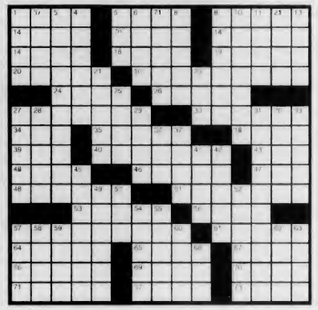
Quote of the Day

"Civilization had too many rules for me, so I did my best to rewrite them."

-Bill Cosby



To Kill a Dragon By Jen Fill



Last Ditch Effort By John Kroes

The Quigmans By Buddy Hickerson

"I realize you wanted your eggs frozen, Ms. Clucky, but … a few of us got hungry, and, well … do you have any more?"

Continuing & Professional Education

Winter Session Classes begin January 2nd

Hibernating this winter?

Get credit without leaving your room!

REGISTER NOW

www.UMassULearn.net

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Start selling homemade candles and quilts to finance your overpriced education.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Cooking fishies can be fun but seafood stinks when it's overdone – or rotting.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Hook up with an old friend, but make sure her dentures are properly secured.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Wash your hands before you eat, especially if you plan on eating your own hand.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
In the world of garnishes, its better to be a sweet baby gherkin than a salty little caper.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
There is no such thing as an illegitimate child, there are only illegitimate parents.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Smoke detectors that don't go off when you're around are broken. You're smokin'.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Offer support to your friends by purchasing a Vicki's brassiere for each of them.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Sing the Jamaican bobsled team song from "Cool Runnings" all day long. Sanka 4 lyfe.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Play the adventurous surfer card by wetting your hair and weaning a wetsuit to class.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Shed not a single tear for hair shed as a result of early-onset male-pattern baldness.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You are a furry little ferret with the capacity for many wonderfully weaselly things.

comics@dailycollegian.com

Do It.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing. 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY 1 Bdrm New Carpet/Paint-mlalli@student.umass.edu for info.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birthcontrol. EC. pregnancy testing. GYN & breast exams. HIV counseling & rapid testing. STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street. Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins wecome www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations 800-648-4849/ www.ststravel.com

NOV 27 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

On their way

Minutemen advance in FCS playoffs, dominate on offense

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKG
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Rasheed Rancher put on a show in the first half, Matt Lawrence did it in the second half and Liam Coen did it in both halves.

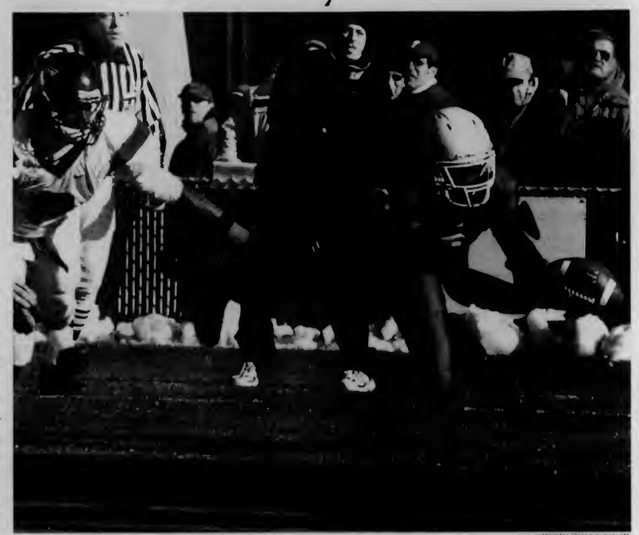
Fordham's defense was essentially a no-show Saturday and no match for the Massachusetts offense, losing to the Minutemen, 49-35, in the first round of the Football Championship Subdivision playoffs Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

No. 7 UMass racked up 649 yards of total offense and advanced to the second round of the playoffs for a match-up next weekend in Carbondale, Ill., against No. 4 Southern Illinois. The Salukis (11-1) defeated Eastern Illinois, 36-11, Saturday.

UMass	49
Fordham	35

"It was kind of a wild football game," UMass coach Don Brown said. "This game certainly took its toll, but it's one we feel good about. We found a way to win, and in the tournament it's all about one thing: surviving and advancing."

"This one hurts, but I'm proud of the way our kids played and the effort they gave," Fordham coach Tom Masella said. "It was a heck of a football game. We seemed to hang in there but just kind of got worn down at the end."



The Minutemen (10-2, 7-1 Colonial Athletic Association) had chances to put the game away, but No. 25 Fordham (8-4) hung around for much of the contest after it capitalized on key UMass mistakes. But Lawrence took over the game in the second half, rushing for 124 of his 167 yards and for two of his three touchdowns. Rancher had 198 yards receiving all but 11 in the first half – and Coen broke the school record with 419 yards passing. He threw four touchdown passes without committing a turnover.

"I didn't get pressured all day," Coen said. "With those guys up front, for us to throw for 300 [yards] in the first half and Matt to blow up in the second half is something we wanted to get accomplished. It all starts up front."

Leading 35-28 late in the third quarter, the Minutemen appeared to be just yards away from the game-breaking score. On third-and-goal at the 4-yard line, Coen handed the ball to Lawrence – who proceeded to throw the ball into the end zone in the direction of tight end Ian Jorgensen. The ball was tipped and landed into the arms of James Crockett for the interception.

Crockett took the ball out of the end zone and returned it to the 2-yard line. Facing a long field, the Rams offense took full advantage of a pass interference penalty on Michael Meggett. On third-and-5 at Fordham's own 7-yard line, Meggett committed a 1-yard spot foul on the interference call, giving Fordham's offense an automatic first down.

See FOOTBALL on page 6

MICHAEL PHILLIPS/COLLEGIAN

As a part of a career afternoon, redshirt senior Rasheed Rancher caught eight passes for 198 yards and scored two touchdowns. His receiving total was the second-highest in school history, as well as a personal best. Meanwhile, quarterback Liam Coen threw for a school-record 419 yards.

MICHAEL PHILLIPS/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt senior running back Matt Lawrence left the Fordham defense in the dust all afternoon, rushing for 167 yards and three touchdowns. UMass defeated the Rams 49-35 at McGuirk Stadium. The Minutemen face Southern Illinois this Saturday in Carbondale, Ill.

Rancher gives Ram secondary fits with career performance

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team won a shootout Saturday in its first meeting with Patriot League champion Fordham. While quarterback Liam Coen will be getting plenty of attention this week for his record-setting performance, it was the man on the other end of most of Coen's passes who was the difference in the win.

Coen was 24-for-37, passing for 419 yards and four touchdowns in the win. Rasheed Rancher caught eight of those passes, gained 198 yards and scored on two of those touchdown passes.

Rancher turned short plays into first downs, failed possessions into scoring drives and incomplete passes into touchdowns.

His best play was his first score of the game. On 2nd-and-11 from the 12-yard line, Coen dropped back and quickly threw the ball to the right corner of the end zone. Rancher had yet to make a move on the defender, but accelerated when he saw the ball in the air. He got behind the cornerback and safety and dove low for the ball, catching it in his hands and pinning it against his shoulder pads as he kept the ball off the ground.

"[The defender] gave me the outside slip, and I just kind of ad-libbed and faked the slant and he went for it," Rancher said. "Liam threw it up and I just ran. Once

See RANCHER on page 6

Mass Attack outshoots Union

With Ortiz out, Nolet makes debut at forward

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A couple of familiar faces returned to the ice last night to help the Massachusetts hockey team defeat Union, 5-2, at the Mullins Center. Sophomore Dan Meyers made his first start since the opening weekend of the season, making 25 saves in the win and defenseman Martin Nolet played his first game at forward for the Minutemen, scoring a goal and adding an assist.

The Mass Attack had its quickest start to a game this season, when Nolet scored 37 seconds into the first period. Nolet took a feed from Brian Keane, who was behind the net. Nolet took a quick shot and beat Union goaltender Corey Milan to jump ahead, 1-0.

UMass	5
Union	2

The Dutchmen responded five minutes into the period with their first goal on the team's first shot on net in the game. Torren Delforte beat Meyers over the left shoulder. It was essentially the only shot in the game Meyers missed.

"I felt good," Meyers said. "Except that first goal I want back. But I settled in and just felt confident from there. It's all about the first shot. You get in there, and the first shot went in. I had to figure out a way to get back in the game, and luckily I did. The team played fantastic and we came out with a win."

On the other side ice, UMass put a season-high 55 shots on net.

Justin Braun gave the Minutemen the lead again with a power play goal at 12:37. Braun crept into the slot and received the puck from Cory Quirk and put it away for the 2-1 lead.

However, the Mass Attack found itself on the wrong side of a 5-on-3 with just over two minutes remaining in the first frame. One minute, 28 seconds after Scott Crowder was whistled for interference, Topher Bevis joined him in the penalty box for hitting from behind, giving Union a two-man advantage.

The Dutchmen capitalized with a goal by Josh Coyle. Mike Schreiber controlled the puck at the point and found Adam Presiznuk in the right corner. Presiznuk sent the puck across the crease, where Coyle had a wide open net. Meyers never had a chance to stop it, diving at the last second to no avail.

Just as they did in the first period, the Minutemen scored early in the second when Cory Quirk scored just his second goal of the season from the top of the right circle, assisted by freshman defenseman Doug Kublin.

UMass dominated the second period, spending the majority of the stanza in the offensive end, but came away with just the single goal and a 3-2 lead after two periods.

The third period was even more UMass and less Union, as the Minutemen put the Dutchmen away for good.

Midway through the third period, UMass drew a 5-on-3 of its own, and scored a goal for each penalty. Freshman Chase Langeraap netted his second-

DAVID DEMOK/COLLEGIAN

Playing his first game at forward, sophomore Martin Nolet scored a goal in the Minutemen's 5-2 victory over Union. UMass coach Don Cahoon moved Nolet from defense to forward for the game with an injury to Will Ortiz.

See HOCKEY on page 6

Down south

UMass drops pair at Lady Pirate Invitational

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team had hardly any time to digest its Thanksgiving turkey before it suffered two defeats over the weekend. The Maroon and White lost a 66-51 contest against East Carolina Saturday after dumping Friday's game against Jacksonville 72-68.

The losses eliminated the Minutewomen (2-3) from the Lady Pirate Invitational in Greenville, N.C.

Seniors Pam Rosamo and Kate Mills each scored a team-high 13 points against the Lady Pirates (2-4) Saturday. Rosamo went 4-of-8 on the day, including 1-of-3 from the 3-point line. She was also 4-of-4 from the free-throw line. Mills was 5-of-14 from the field. She nailed both her free throws and her only 3-point attempt.

UMass	51
ECU	66
UMass	68
Jack.	72

UMass coach Marnie Dacko said Rosamo played with a lot of heart, but she put herself in some bad positions when it came to taking shots. She said Rosanio needs to relax and not make the easy shots seem more difficult.

Kate Mills' performance was sub-par for Kate Mills, according to Dacko. The team's leading rebounder, Mills registered just five boards in 35 minutes of play the same amount she pulled down in her 25 minutes against Jacksonville. Dacko said her 6-foot-1 forward missed a bunch of opportunities to take some charges and failed to make up for it with a significant number of rebounds and points.

But the weekend's losses cannot be put solely on the broad shoulders of Mills. Dacko said the whole UMass squad played short of standard. It's hard to pinpoint one particular aspect that leads to a loss, but she said

See BASKETBALL on page 6

COMMON RELEASES GREATEST HITS | PAGE 4

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY. EST. 1890

PARTLY CLOUDY : HI: 50 LO: 40 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 2007

Cole meets with GSS after protest

BY HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Members of the Graduate Student Senate and University of Massachusetts interim Chancellor Thomas W. Cole, Jr. met following the campus-wide protest that took place two weeks ago.

For two hours last Tuesday, student representatives including president of the GSS Jeff Napolitano, president of the undergraduate Student Government Association Aaron Buford and student trustee Ruth Thompson, met with Cole and agreed to hold a series of weekly discussions between campus administrators and students over the next three months.

The series will focus on specific topics and will result in a summary report by February 22, 2008. The first meeting will take place tomorrow, according to Napolitano. The chancellor will be present as will at least 10 students.

According to University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski who was also present at the meeting, "conversations were respectful on both sides and Chancellor Cole met personally with the students to better understand their concerns and to identify the best way to try to address them."

Also in attendance at the meeting was special assistant to the chancellor John Dubach, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Joyce Hatch, Associate Chancellor Esther Terry and Ombudsperson Catherine Porter. About 40 other students were present in the Whitmore Administration Building at the time of the meeting, though were not allowed in the discussion.

The campus protests that were held on Nov. 15 and 16 demanded lower fees, increased investment for campus diversity, more control of event space in the Campus Center and Student Union and fewer police in residence halls.

Holly Seabury can be reached at hseabury@student.umass.edu.

Chancellor search continues

Committee makes progress on campus

BY WILL MCGUINNESS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Chancellor Search Committee met again last night to discuss the qualities and traits the University of Massachusetts flagship Amherst campus will require in a chancellor who will replace interim Chancellor Thomas W. Cole Jr.

After a period of 14 days in which community input meetings were held, the committee met in the Amherst Room of the Lincoln Campus Center to go over a packet that will eventually be sent to each candidate seeking the office. The packet provides "snapshots" of the University that will describe to candidates the history, present state and challenges the University faces.

Some 21 members of the committee were present and six joined via teleconference to discuss a draft of the packet. Because it is still in the draft stage, committee member Jennifer Braceras mentioned that it will be kept confidential until completed. She also lauded the community and the committee's effort to provide a "united front" when discussing what each body is looking for in a chancellor. She said the committee possessed a "bold ability" to collaborate with members of the community while being mindful of the University's roots as a land grant institution.

Few members had major revisions to the packet other than syntactical revisions, but committee member and Professor and Department Head of Polymer Science and Engineering Shaw Ning expressed concern when considering the packet's discussion of research and its impact on University funding. He said once the packets are sent to candidates throughout the country, the issue of the University's low research funding will become a national question.

He added that a weak research infrastructure, with particular emphasis on an office of grants and contracts, should be featured in the challenges section of the document. He also added that it is important for both the University system and the flagship campus to have a vision in place that will provide leadership and guidance to candidates.

This point was discussed in depth as committee members argued over whether the new chancellor should agree with policies decided upon by University President Jack Wilson and the Board of Trustees or have an independent vision.

Braceras came to the consensus with other members of the committee that the new chancellor cannot formulate opinions on controversial issues the University faces, such as the Massachusetts football team rising to division one status, before he or she discusses them with members of the UMass community.

One major point of the meeting was that the committee was not established to speak on solving the various problems of the University, but instead to attract potential candidates to the University in an honest fashion.

"As Braceras said, "The purpose of the document is to be broad and specific," thus allowing for an educated stance on the issues facing the University while also allowing room for each candidate to review the issues independently.

The board spoke of possible candidates but in private session.

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@student.umass.edu.

Bill Cosby, a UMass alumnus, and co-author Alvin F. Poussaint spoke in the Student Union Ballroom yesterday to promote their new book, "Come On People: On the Path from Victims to Victors."

Cosby, Poussaint speak about book

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts alumnus and entertainer Bill Cosby and Harvard Medical School psychiatrist professor Alvin F. Poussaint spoke on African American social issues yesterday in the Student Union Ballroom.

The speech, part of a nationwide tour to promote their new book, "Come On People: On the Path from Victims to Victors," addressed concerns in the African American community over high rates of young urban homicide victims, high school dropout rates of 50 percent and rising percentages of single-parent homes in urban communities.

"Some people will say we're airing dirty laundry," said Poussaint, who has authored and co-authored various works on African American social concerns such as "Why Blacks Kill Blacks" and "Lay My Burden Down." He addressed the concern among black activists that mainstream media and social critics overemphasize urban crime. Poussaint said, however, that issues such as high murder and high school dropout statistics must be addressed within communities, as well as from without.

Cosby, who donned a white UMass sweatshirt for the engagement, spoke of proliferating violence in mainstream society, citing the success of violent movies, as well as violent and profane music, referring to "the violence of profanity."

"I have called for a clear application of non-violence to be addressed everyday in schools k through 12," he said.

See COSBY on page 2

University hosts public discussion at Mullins for new Life Sciences Bill

BY LISA DIBENEDICTIS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts hosted a public hearing of the Massachusetts Legislature's Joint Committee on Economic Development and Emerging Technology yesterday.

The hearing was the only one that took place in western Massachusetts and was held to discuss Governor Deval Patrick's House Bill 4234, also known as the Life Sciences Bill.

"It allows us to work for two top priorities – fill 21st century jobs and create skills for these jobs," said the Governor's Secretary of Labor, Suzanna Bump. "We are taking a sophisticated inventory of faculty and student needs. We encourage the Commonwealth to develop a plan for public, private and workforce sectors."

One of a series across the state, the hearing was held in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center and conducted by MA Representative Daniel Bosley and MA Senator Jack Hart.

UMass Vice Provost for Research Paul Kostecki summarized the University's Life Sciences programs and proposals. There was also a panel of UMass faculty researchers including Janice Telfer, Lila Gierasch and Dev Gupta, persuading the committee to invest in UMass's Life Sciences program.

The bill promises to create a more comprehensive life science program in Massachusetts, support and generate research and manufacturing, and give the state an overall boost in leadership.

"The opportunity to invest in the campus includes the development of centralized core shared facilities that include modern laboratory space and partnership space for research and workforce training, office space for faculty, students and interns from industry, and state-of-the-art research instrumentation. The result of the investment is a Biotechnology Bioengineering Center for Translation of

See SCIENCE BILL on page 2

A word from Cape Verde

Former President of the Republic of Cape Verde Antonio Manuel Mascarenhas Monteiro spoke at the Campus Center yesterday.

Innov8 game designed for college students

BY EDEN UNVER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A handful of college students around the nation often come back from a hard day of classes and unwind by playing video games, but now a new program may be making video games a part of the classroom curriculum.

According to a University of Massachusetts press release, IBM has introduced a "serious game," a computer or video game that is used for educational purposes and as a training tool.

The game, Innov-8, is a "3-D educational game designed to bridge the gap in understanding between information technology (IT) teams and business leaders in an organization."

UMass's Isenberg School of Management was supposed to be one of 25 colleges and universities worldwide to use the game in the classroom as a learning tool, but due to technical problems this will not be possible.

According to Kaimei Zheng, Director of Information Management at the ISOM, "All my lab computers, and my own computer, are two years old and don't have the advanced video cards necessary to play the game."

ISOM had planned to test out the game for its own classrooms before this technical difficulty was discovered.

"I originally thought I could let my students [Internet Business Design, SOM 597G] play it and learn the basics of Business Process Modeling (BPM)," said Zheng. "If it works effectively, I will introduce it to our Operations Management professors."

This serious game will "have the look and feel of a game but correspond to non-game events or processes such as business operations."

The popularity in the concept of this program stems from the large amount of teenagers and young adults who currently play video games.

According to the IBM Web site, "A new generation of young IT professionals has been raised on games like Halo, [World of] Warcraft and Madden, leaching the new professionals in a traditional classroom manner is like sending them back to Pac-Man."

This serious game is "seen as an effective way of teaching new skills to a generation that has been brought up in the video game era" according to the press release.

Zheng agreed and regrets the ISOM's inability to utilize the product at this time, saying, "It is a great innovative idea to teach business concepts using games appropriate for this generation of students who grow up playing games, but it will take time for SOM hardware to catch up with the technology, unless IMH finds a better solution."

David Rejeski, director of the Serious Games Initiative, spoke to Marketwire.com, saying, "The best kept secret in the world of computer and video games is the rise of a movement – now in the thousands – of gamers, universities and corporations dedicated to applying games to serious challenges such as education, training, medical treatment or better governance."

Currently, over 2,000 universities worldwide can download the game to use in classrooms for free off of the IBM web site.

There is also a demo of the Innov8 program available to watch on YouTube.

Eden Unver can be reached at eunver@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 57

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3499 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Hunton
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Marrin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COPIES EDITOR Adam Stagen
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Bier
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marsea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Scalnars
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenswaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1902, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1904 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED FIRST SPACE JANUARY 1994 FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL MEDIA SERVICES AT 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Will McGuinness

COPY EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

NOV 27 2007

UM speakers discuss social problems

COSBY from page 1

He said that many social problems involving youth, inside and outside of urban communities, stems from an unwillingness of young people to take advice from older role models. Cosby blamed this in part on popular music, namely hip-hop.

"One of the things the hip-hop people did that was clearly to keep their people from knowing good from bad was to say 'don't listen to old people,'" he said.

Cosby's speech focused mainly on the importance of education in uplifting impoverished urban youth and warned of the social stigmatization of "geeks."

"Some of you kids who have studied and understand the importance of education are called 'geeks,'" he said. "There is a lot of age-hating, bourgeois-hating and geek-hating today," said Cosby.

At the conclusion of their speech, Poussaint and Cosby fielded questions about the book and social issues in general from audience members.

Carlos McBride, a UMass School of Education student, told Cosby that as an individual who came from an urban area and works with urban students "it's frustrating to hear the negative things going on in urban communities and not hear about the good."

Cosby responded that "Come On People," a call for the end of violence and increased high school dropout rates in urban communities, was "positive."

Cosby, a renowned stand-up comedian and actor, has authored several best-sellers, including "Time Flies" and "I atherhood." He received his masters and education doctorate from UMass in 1972 and 1977, respectively. Poussaint, who has collaborated with Cosby before "Come On People," is a professor of psychiatry and dean of student affairs at Harvard Medical School. The discussion was held at 2 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom and concluded with a book signing by Cosby and Poussaint.

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsullivan@student.umass.edu.

Science bill plans to spend $500 million

SCIENCE BILL from page 1

Discoveries in Health and Wellness complex," said Kosteski in his testimony.

"On this campus we have a true focus on research excellence in protein misfolding and its relationship to disease. We have attracted top-notch faculty who work in the area, and the resulting synergy has fostered their careers," said UMass Professor Lila Gierasch, who works in both the Department of Biochemistry and Molecular Biology and the Department of Chemistry. "Now we must retain these talented faculty and attract additional talent to ensure that UMass remains a world leader in this important field and to position us to build bridges to the pharmaceutical and biotech industries."

The Life Sciences Bill, if passed, will spend $500 million on capital projects, setting aside approximately $15 million for the Massachusetts Life Sciences Investment Fund, which provides fellowships, research grants, loans and workforce training programs.

It additionally plans to create an investment incentive program for businesses that choose to locate or stay in Massachusetts.

Many UMass students support the bill as well.

"Well, I think that all the life sciences; biology, economy, botany, etc. are by far the basis of things like health care, the cure for AIDS and cancer, and to bring things like that to a state school like UMass is a great move," said UMass biology major Arjun Collins. "Since Boston is the hub of biology in Massachusetts, it would be great to spread that into western Massachusetts and broaden the spectrum of people trying to further their knowledge of the life sciences."

Other students support the bill but are wary of science and research taking precedent over other aspects of learning at UMass.

"I believe that too much focus is taken off teaching, which is what college is for, and too much emphasis is put on research," said freshman Matthew Briggs. "While I recognize the value of research, I believe that the school's first and foremost job is to educate."

Lysa DeBenedictis can be reached at ldebened@student.umass.edu.

Brown University students model nude for extra cash

By Melissa Shube
Brown Daily Herald (Brown U.)

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Some Brown University students, looking to make extra money, have entered the world of nude art modeling.

"It sounded kind of absurd, so I decided to try it," said Matt Novick, who models at Brown. "Basically you're on a pedestal under spotlights surrounded by people, and you're naked, and it sounds like such a ridiculous thing to do that you might as well try it."

"Plus they pay you," he said.

The Department of Visual Art hires student models to pose for art classes and weekly figure-drawing sessions. Hamilton House and local artists also hire students.

Figure drawing is considered an essential learning tool for students who are serious about accurately portraying the human body.

"If you master the real structure of the naked human body then you can draw any person with clothing on and it will look realistic," said Diana Friedman, who is taking VISA 0100: "Studio Foundation" this semester.

For adventurous students, the job may seem attractive. It pays between $15 and $20 an hour, and models can choose their hours. But before shedding their clothing and running to List Art Center, students should know that modeling requires more then showing up in the nude the model must come up with poses emphasizing different angles, lines and muscles and hold these poses without moving.

"It's definitely harder than it looks," said Claudia Schwartz, who models for private drawing groups of local artists.

Novick said a friend, who also models, taught him how to pose.

"I'm an engineer," Novick said. "I have no idea about this stuff. Little things like making sure your arms are away from your body so it's not obscure for people. You might want to have your right shoulder high and your left hip high to try to make interesting angles."

The models start with brief gesture poses and hold them for 30 seconds or one to two minutes. As the artists warm up, the poses must get longer, lasting 15 to 20 minutes or sometimes 40 minutes to an hour. The positions, as a result, have to become less exaggerated and more comfortable so the models can hold them.

"For the longer ones, it's surprisingly like meditation, because you [are] just so focused on every aspect of your body, trying to keep it in the same position," Novick said. "I leave there more tired than from actually working out."

And then there's the awkward factor. The models are, after all, standing naked in front of strangers.

"It was kind of weird – it was definitely no less awkward than I thought it would be, but it's the kind of thing you get used to pretty fast," Schwartz said.

"You don't want to get a boner – that would be upsetting," said Aviad Haimi-Cohen, who goes by the surname "Sunshine." "But that's not a worry once you're actually doing it."

"When it's in an artistic context, it's sort of desexualized. Once it's taken out of the one-on-one sexual situation, seeing naked people is just like seeing another body," he said.

Schwartz models for private drawing groups. "The artists are pretty friendly – they are the aging hippies, they play The Beatles and they drink wine, and they try to get me to smoke joints with them."

She said she would not consider modeling at Brown. "I don't think I would like to run into someone at a party," Schwartz said. "That would be a little too real."

news@dailycollegian.com

TASTE OF TUSCANY

NOVEMBER 27 - 30 ~ 5 - 9 PM
GUEST CHEF BRUNO WEHREN
FROM LAS VEGAS

MENU:

MINESTRONE CON DITALINI (MINESTRONE SOUP WITH DITALINI)

BRODO DI MANZO CON AGNOLOTTI, PISELLI, E CAROTE (BEEF BROTH WITH MEAT DUMPLINGS & PEAS & CARROTS)

POLLO ALLA PARMIGIANA (CHICKEN PARMIGIANO WITH TOMATO SAUCE)

FETTUCINE (FETTUCINE)

CAVOLFIORE E BROCCOLI (CAULIFLOWER & BROCCOLI POLONAISE)

ARROSTO (OR LOMBATA) DI MAIALE "PICCATA" (PORK LOIN PICCATA)

"ORZOTTO" CON FUNGHI (ORZOTTO WITH MUSHROOMS)

SPINACI FRESCHI (FRESH SPINACH)

"PENNE CON SALSICCIA E FUNGHI (PENNE WITH ITALIAN SAUSAGE & MUSHROOMS)

FARFALLE CON ZUCCA, PISELLI IN PANNA (FARFALLE PASTA WITH PUMPKIN & PEAS IN CREAM SAUCE)

TUESDAY, NOV. 27
WORCESTER DC

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 28
FRANKLIN DC

THURSDAY, NOV. 29
BERKSHIRE DC

FRIDAY, NOV. 30:
HAMPSHIRE DC

UMASS DINING
IN PARTNERSHIP WITH BARILLA PASTA

Barilla

Need More Meals?

Several options to choose from!
Now you can purchase additional meals or upgrade your meal plan on-line or go to our meal plan office at Franklin DC

YCMP RESIDENT DINING SERVICES UMass Amherst 2007 Grand Prize Winner Be A Local Hero Buy Locally Sysco

Visit our website www.umass.edu/diningservices or call 545-1362

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
EDITORIAL OPINION
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 2007
"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ballgame. Free speech is life itself."
– Sir Salman Rushdie
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Overzealous censorship

John Gruenenfelder

Truly amazing are the bad habits you can pick up from children's television. Scary habits you're probably not even aware of yet. Fortunately, there are watchdogs and self-censors aplenty. The latest casualty, of sorts, is a "grown-ups" only warning label on a recent DVD release of the earliest episodes of "Sesame Street."

So, why exactly do we need saving from "Sesame Street?" The show first aired 38 years ago this month and, as an article in the New York Times Magazine describes, the original street resembled a lower-middle class New York City neighborhood of 40 years ago. And 40 years ago, New York was a much different and less friendly place.

The surprise, however, is that this is not the source of the warning label. Rather, the problem is Cookie Monster's persona. Alistair Cookie, appearing in Monsterpiece Theater with a pipe. Perhaps I'm showing my age, but I can actually remember watching these types of skits in the early-mid 80s, so that's at least 15 years that children's lives were being destroyed.

Alistair Cookie later goes on to eat his pipe, more because he has an eating disorder than any worries over giving the wrong message to kids. Of course, in today's day and age, anything involving tobacco, even in a parody, is unthinkable.

Times have changed considerably. Monsterpiece Theater is no longer performed and Elmo has arrived, oozing cheeriness. The ways in which children are taught have certainly changed in the past four decades, so the loss of Monsterpiece Theater is not really a concern.

At some point, however, this self-censorship to "protect the children" goes too far. It is a symptom of our society's often too litigious nature and it is not always aimed at children. Sesame Street's warning label stems not from a lawsuit, but to protect themselves against overprotective parents.

Other examples are easy to find. Last year, when the Nintendo Wii was released, only a short time passed before complaints came that the Wii remote strap was faulty.

It could snap if you release the remote while performing, for example, a pitching motion. The sane answer is to simply not let go of the controller. You're not supposed to, and even if you do, the strap isn't meant to guard against you pitching the remote like a fastball.

Common sense did not prevent people from suing over this non-issue and eventually it bloomed into a class action suit. It seems to have faded away in the past year, but Nintendo has still had to change. Every game comes with a safety pamphlet, and the newest first-party game, "Super Mario Galaxy," displays a mandatory 5-10 second safety warning every time you start it.

Or, if music is your preference, you need only look towards Apple's iPod. Apple faced a class action suit over, of all things, the device's volume. Apparently, if you turn the volume on an iPod up all the way you can damage your hearing.

This lawsuit also went nowhere, but Apple did update the software on some models to limit the maximum volume. Europe went even further with an actual law requiring the volume to be limited.

At some point, however, this self-censorship to "protect the children" goes too far.

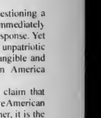
When you begin legislating against stupidity; where do you stop?

Even when lawsuits fizzle or are thrown out by a rational judge, they can still have lasting effects. Self-censorship sees to that.

If you run a large company like Nintendo or Apple the possible cost of a successful lawsuit against your organization is something to avoid. And if that means adding a warning to your product, so be it.

This isn't a good way to operate. The problem is similar to the watchdog groups complaining about television. As an FCC bureaucrat put it on Family Guy, "One call equals one billion people." A small number of people, stupid or otherwise, are influencing the behavior of companies.

When the market and customers determine that a product is bad, faulty or unwanted, companies will change. This is something real and usually speaks the minds of the people.



Change brought about by fear is just as bad for companies as it is for people. The ability to sue is a necessary check on abuses by corporations and damaging products. But self-censorship by frightened executives hurts both the companies and their customers.

Just as people rarely read all the legal boilerplate in a license agreement on a computer or a privacy statement because they often rival small books, people are likely to miss truly important product warnings when they have become buried amongst useless drivel.

And even though common sense seems so often lacking in the legal world, remember that a broken remote does not necessarily mean it was poorly designed if you happened to throw it against a wall.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jgruenen@student.umass.edu.

Patriotism

Greg Collins

During all wars, questioning a person's patriotism immediately elicits a reactionary response. Yet it needs to be said – unpatriotic thinking exists in a tangible and ubiquitous fashion in America today.

The point is not to claim that some people wave more American flags than others. Rather, it is the deeper assumptions behind how our military is perceived, which reveal how certain Americans tarnish and dehumanize our soldiers.

A patriot sees our troops as a group of dignified individuals who selflessly commit noble acts to fulfill the specific mission they were assigned to complete, regardless of who ordered them to do so.

In contrast, unpatriotic thinking and rhetoric reveals two distinct patterns. The first consistently highlights reprehensible actions committed by American forces without first emphasizing their accomplishments properly. The second pattern rests on the assumption that soldiers are powerless people who are unable to overcome whatever hardships and injuries they may suffer in Iraq.

In the first case, unpatriotic thinking would immediately point to the Abu Ghraib atrocity and the number of Iraqi civilian deaths as accurate reflections of an incompetent and immoral American military. Mainstream media and Democratic politicians unceasingly stress these examples, among others, to signal the persistently negative influence American troops have had in Iraq.

But think about it this way. Say you were applying for a job, and your potential employer contacted the people on the reference list to determine whether or not you are the right person for the position. How would you feel if your teachers or fellow students explained to the employer that you did not have strong character and frequently broke rules since you do not hold doors open for the elderly, you skip classes and you get drunk on weekends?

Obviously you would feel betrayed, since these people highlighted isolated instances where you exhibited weak moral character. You would feel angry that your references did not describe the countless other times when you did hold the door open for the elderly, you did attend class and complete homework, and you did study on weekends.

Compare this scenario to how the media and lawmakers portray our military frequently. The Abu Ghraib disgrace was all over the front pages of newspapers, and Democratic politicians assumed that this isolated instance accurately reflected the behavior of other American soldiers.

The point is not to claim that some people wave more American flags than others.

Torturing prisoners and getting drunk are not morally equal. Yet they are similarly deceptive when perceived as mirroring general truths characterizing an entity as a whole, whether it is as a group or an individual.

How would you feel if you were a soldier and read the New York Times describe how American troops tortured Iraqi prisoners? How would you feel if journalists and politicians continually emphasized the number of Iraqis who have been killed in the war by soldiers just like you? Would you think it fair for newspapers to highlight the very worst behavior of your brethren while dismissing examples of the very best?

Of course, these noble instances range from soldiers enabling Iraqis to craft their first legitimate constitution and hold democratic elections, to maintaining security for local business owners in Baghdad, to liberating women previously oppressed under Saddam Hussein.

The second way people convey unpatriotic messages is by portraying American soldiers as a uniform, powerless collection of victims. This thinking assumes that prospective soldiers are not capable of making informed decisions about whether or not to join the military. Additionally, this logic highlights American troops' inadequate military equipment and medical care and how soldiers will be unable to complete their mission and recover from combat duty due to these shortcomings.

What if your friends insisted that you should not work at the job you were applying for because they felt that you were making an uninformed and unenlightened decision? Similarly, what if you did get the job, but encountered hardships learning the skills and acquiring the knowledge necessary to perform your tasks? Would you feel supported if your friends kept saying that you are helpless and are not capable of fulfilling your responsibilities?

Overall, these two patterns are unpatriotic because they directly contradict the unique conception of American patriotism. This type of patriotism honors the dignity of every individual and respects his autonomy to make informed decisions in order to pursue whatever life goal to which he is committed. Furthermore, American patriotism recognizes the heroic acts of our American soldiers without overemphasizing isolated and regrettable instances of immorality for the purpose of pursuing a political agenda.

Identifying a particular way of thinking as unpatriotic is not mere semantics. Being a patriot does not mean that you do not question authority or you refuse to analyze better ways to help our military complete its task. But it does entail stressing that American soldiers are dignified and educated individuals, who are quite capable of fulfilling their noble responsibilities. Such a principle should be embraced by all Americans if we are truly committed to supporting our troops and defeating evil.

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu.

Stairs and elevators

Devon Courtney

Anger has grown deep in my soul ever since the W.E.B. DuBois Library lost one of its most precious commodities back in August. The wonderful multi-floor access device I am referring to caught a severe case of "cable snap" and shot up to the 27th floor, never to come down. Nobody was injured, but students since then haven't learned a darned thing from this terrifying experience.

The middle elevator has broken indefinitely, and there hasn't been enough money in the coffers to fix it. I thought that this unfortunate scenario would deter students from taking gross advantage of the library elevator system, but surprise, surprise – it hasn't.

It's bad enough that you ordinarily have to wait ten to fifteen minutes for an elevator. That said, nothing infuriates me more than getting into a packed elevator car and having to wait even longer as it stops on the second floor every time without fail to let out some lazy traveler.

Despite the fact that there are now fewer elevators and a longer wait time, people still feel compelled to insult those of us who have a greater need to use one. Mathematically, elevator abuse is completely illogical. Taking the stairs to traverse one single floor only requires one tenth of the time that it takes to actually wait for an elevator. On top of this, elevators are primarily an assistive tool for those who are handicapped. The last time I checked, laziness wasn't a valid handicap.

It hurts to see people be that slothful, and I feel that most would agree with me. Whenever I see someone using an elevator to traverse one floor who doesn't have a blatant physical disability, my first thought is to stick out a leg and trip them and then repeatedly close the elevator door on their ankles. At least then they'd have a good enough reason to use one.

Instead of doing that and subsequently having to make an appearance in court, I usually settle for making a snarky comment as the passenger leaves. Most of the other passengers inside the car will verbally concur, with chants of "You tell 'em," and "I know, right?"

So I know at the very least that this problem doesn't bother just me. I would like to offer a vague hypothesis of mine. I firmly believe that the broken elevator malfunctioned because its cables were weakened by too many students at one time wanting to traverse trivial vertical distances. I'm guessing that after they all got off, the cable let go dramatically, sending the counterweight to the bottom of the elevator shaft. After that ensuing mechanical failure, several lethargic students were temporarily stranded on the second floor. But, of course, I'm no engineer.

Mathematically, elevator abuse is completely illogical.

I know how satirical and bitter that sounds, but I can't seem to stop thinking about it. In our privileged, wonderful, active society, one in three Americans is clinically obese, only a small percentage of people regularly exercise, and according to Morgan Spurlock (the creative mastermind behind the documentary "Super Size Me"), "Mobility has become such a chore that we rely on machines to do it for us."

On top of this, I'd like to reiterate a horrifying fact – the elevator cable snapped, hurling the car up to the top floor at supersonic speed! If you were inside that elevator, library janitorial staff today would still be scraping what was left of you from the car's roof with spatulas. Despite this, elevator usage has seemed to increase exponentially. To comically blow it out of proportion, the rate of increase has skyrocketed to a level much higher than the vertical takeoff velocity of the cursed fourth library elevator.

Even though the threat of a messy death is quite clear, people still flock towards these vertical beacons of human laziness. I have to give these people credit though; they really are brave. I wouldn't risk my own life unless I had at least five floors between me and my goal, but these folks really are tempting fate fearlessly. It seems that elevators are being neglected by the burdened and handicapped, and embraced by the brave-yet-ridiculously-lethargic. That's right; I've actually seen people rush to pack themselves into elevators before someone with a crutch or a cart full of books can get there in time.

In light of this, I've decided to take a stand. I'm no longer going to take the elevator in the DuBois Library. Every time I need to change floors while there, I will abstain from using the hellish machine burdened with the throngs of the lazy. The most rewarding part won't be the incredible paintings in between every floor, but rather the fact that I will still be getting to my floor a lot quicker than the other people who chose their precious elevator.

One last thing. In case I haven't convinced you to reconsider your elevator trip, consider this: An elevator's lifespan is between 25 and 30 years. The DuBois Library was built in 1972. If you decide to push that button, you might also be pushing your luck. Are you feeling lucky?

Devon Courtney is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dcourtne@student.umass.edu.

Coming to the right conclusions

Felicia Whately

What is the cure to instability in Iraq? As Americans plead to abort the mission, U.S. companies muddy the waters and embassy delegates complain that being sent to Iraq "is like a death sentence." Iran has the solution.

Blackwater, the private security company hired by the U.S. military, is in deep water. Its dirty laundry has been aired and Iraq revoked amnesty to Americans. I'm we revoke amnesty to Iraqis who squander away our defense money? Iraqis want accountability. Well, we want their weapons of mass destruction. You don't see us pushing that issue much anymore.

Innocent lives have been lost for the cost of freedom. Can we get a reimbursement from Osama Bin Laden? Just send the new defense bill to Al Ubeda. Bin Laden can even pay online the next time he launches his next hate video.

In fact, he can make it a cohesive Muslim extremists' donation fund. They can all come together to help pay off the United States' deficit incurred by fighting terrorism and shoot their guns up in the air in celebratory fire.

Iran's officials proposed a brilliant idea at the Istanbul Conference on Nov. 4 on how to regain stability in Iraq. Spokesmen for the Iranian Foreign Ministry said the plan would include banishing all foreign security companies, including Blackwater.

They suggested sending Iranian, Syrian and other Arab countries' forces to supplement U.S. forces. The Iranians want to issue amnesty for all prisoners, regardless of what crimes they committed. Iran's plan proposes to merge militias to create security forces.

Syrian and Iranian criminal-run militia is Iran's great plan to combat terrorism in Iraq. Are they kidding? This is coming from a government that denies that the Holocaust ever happened and claims that there are no gays in Iran. Their idea of a gay pride parade is a lynching.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates suggested in November that Tehran has given Baghdad "assurances" that it will stop any flow of weapons from Iran into Iraq. "It is my understanding that they have provided such assurances," Gates told a Pentagon news conference. "I don't know whether to believe them. I'll wait and see."

I'd like to see the day an A-bomb is dropped on Ahmadinejad's lap. He'd have all the nuclear testing he'd ever need.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad countered by saying, "Regretfully, two or three monopolistic selfish powers want to force their word on the Iranian people and deny them their rights. Whatever they choose as a nation, everybody should accept and respect. Nobody should interfere in the affairs of the Palestinian nation. Nobody should sow the seeds of discord. Nobody should spend tens of billions of dollars equipping and arming one group there."

That's just what the world needs, Iranians with nuclear weapons controlling Iraq. I'd like to see the day an A-bomb is dropped on Ahmadinejad's lap. He'd have all the nuclear testing he'd ever need. Ahmadinejad is a weapon of mass dysfunction. And he was invited to speak at one of the most prestigious schools in the nation, Columbia University.

If terrorists would stop kidnapping, beheading and detonating vehicle-born explosive devices, blowing up improvised explosive devices and shooting mortars at us, but start playing nice with Coalition Forces and their own Islamic brothers and sisters, we wouldn't have to treat Red Zone Baghdad like a gangland.

CNN likes to do a body count of how many U.S. troops have died in Iraq. Here's a dose of reality. Islamic terrorists have carried out more than 9,924 deadly attacks since 9/11. According to an anti-terrorism Web site, the Jihad attacks for October of 2007 are 242, involved 19 countries, killed 1,252 and injured 2,287, stated Thereligionofpeace.com.

"Iraqis aren't dying from war, they are being murdered by Islamic terrorists," said Iraqbodycount.net, a Web site that teaches what religious hate can do to a country. The Web site Iawatha.edu says that Islamic terrorists murder more people every day than the Ku Klux Klan has in the last 91 years.

Coalition forces and our private contractors may not be perfect, but Iran's idea of taking care of Iraq's problems is irrational. We might as well give Iraq's presidency to Osama bin Laden. Or better yet, let Ahmadinejad get nukes.

Blackwater can get on boats and float to another Third World country, where they can receive amnesty and Osama Bin Laden can hang in the imbalance like Saddam Hussein used to. U.S. delegates whining about serving in Iraq can join Greenpeace and head to AIDS-afflicted African countries instead. At least then they could think they were doing the right thing. And as usual, U.S. Forces can clean up after everyone's mess.

Felicia Whately is a UMass student. She can be reached at fwhately@gmail.com.

Dupri comes back with hits

Producer Jermaine Dupri compiles his success in album

By Steven Stafford
Collegian Staff

If you've ever been to Atlanta, you know that "Welcome to Atlanta" is extremely overplayed there and extremely underplayed anywhere else. You also know that Jermaine Dupri says the word "yo" way too much on that track, and that the parties really do not stop until 8 a.m.

Jermaine Dupri is still only 35-years-old, and it's a little hard to believe how good his resume really is at his young age. That may be because it isn't a particularly well-known fact that in 1991, Dupri discovered Kriss Kross, who went on to become a temporarily popular rap duo, famous for wearing their clothes backwards (they were innovators) and being only 14-years-old. Dupri not only discovered them, but produced their one and only hit, the annoying Jackson 5-sampled "Jump."

It was as a producer, not a rapper, that Dupri first made his name, and it's also how he became one of the richest people in the rap industry. The lesson here, kids, is "if you want to date Janet Jackson, make some hot beats." Jermaine certainly has made his share of hot beats, and recently he has even acted in commercials. This is a big moment for him as an artist – he is now an admired veteran with nothing left to prove. Many young rap artists are motivated by that insecurity, but Dupri is an elder statesman now. After all, he's the youngest member of the Georgia Music Hall of Fame.

It is also hard to imagine that Dupri once was one of the only mainstream representatives of Atlanta. Nowadays, it seems like music is made only in Atlanta with A-town established as the new Motown. But Dupri has established himself for over a decade as his own man and as a hitmaker, and that's exactly what this CD aims to prove.

Anyone remember Dru Hill? His hit "Sleepin' In My Bed" is on this disc. Mariah Carey's monster smash "We Belong Together?" That's on it too. Of course, "Money Ain't a Thang," and Usher's "Confessions Part II" also make appearances. None of these songs require any introduction – they've been tattooed onto the collective American consciousness by rap and rhythm radio since we were in middle school, much like the more recent "Like You" by Bow Wow and Ciara.

This is the age of the rap producer. First they took over rap music, then they took over pop music. They didn't take over rock music because by that point, rock was dead and buried. Jermaine Dupri, however, was instrumental in this ascendancy and conquest, and often doesn't get the credit he deserves for this. Yes, there are better producers out there – Timbaland, Kanye West, and Dr. Dre have far more talent. But Dupri has worked with some incredibly mediocre lyricists and generic voices, and somehow he's always made them work. Dupri is not a great rapper, ever since Kanye West arrived on the scene. Dupri has been the second-best producer-who-raps. But he can make great beats that help you ignore his rhymes.

Monica's "The First Night" is not so well-known as the above songs. It is one of the weaker tracks on the CD, in the played-out R&B trope Conan O'Brien once called "look at how hot I am but don't touch." The song is a half-assed message of "let's have sex on the second date, not the first one" to some generic anonymous suitor. Dupri could have done better. Along with Chingy's "Pullin' Me Back," and MC Lyte's "Keep On, Keepin' On" this makes the end of the CD the only skippable part.

Generally, this CD is a solid document of Dupri's finest production, which itself has quietly worked wonders for Atlanta hip-hop, and for the evolution of hip-hop since 1992. You will not find anything meaningful, deep or socially conscious, but you will find catchy, familiar, party-friendly songs. And that seems to be what people really want anyway.

Steven Stafford can be reached at stevenjstafford@gmail.com

Jermaine Dupri is the youngest member in the Georgia Music Hall of Fame. He is only thirty-five years old.

Jermaine Dupri

"Ya'll Know What This Is... The Hits"

Island Urban Records

3/5

Rap artist releases his earliest works

By Steven Stafford
Collegian Staff

Despite what many young rap fans think from looking at the Billboard charts, Common is a not a new artist. His latest album debuted at number one, undoubtedly the biggest commercial success of his career. Up to this point, however, he has been a champion of the underground, of an alternative movement of sorts in the industry, which places him in a unique position as an artist. But even before Common's recent Kanye West-powered smash hits, the man born Lonnie Lynn, Jr. was a well-respected MC in the rap community.

This collection of his early, lesser-known material seeks to marry his two audiences – one, the eager young fanbase and two, the old faithful fanbase from the early 1990s. However, only the latter will truly appreciate some of the tracks on it, despite the well-intentioned interest of the former group. This CD takes a few listens to truly appreciate, but it repays the effort.

"Take it EZ" feels out of place in 2007, a year dominated by snap music, the Atlanta sound and rap that is increasingly Southern-fried. Common's fast-paced Chicago style is hard to follow for today's fan, and the beat and production sound too old to sell. The song is good but dated, as is "Breaker 1-9," which utilizes a bass line sample from Biggie Smalls' classic "Hypnotize," a song that seems to get played at every UMass party. Not that there's anything wrong with that.

The material is solid but has nothing in common with "Kiss Kiss" or "Crank Dat (Soulja Boy)." But even the most lukewarm of rap fans can appreciate the masterpiece "I Used to Love H.E.R.," which sounded the alarm about the decline of the art form in the mid-90s. The track is widely considered to be one of the greatest rap songs of all time and remains an unparalleled touch of genius in Lynn's career. The song could have been written today for all its laments about the obsession with "realness," and "telling sad stories," and could still teach a few lessons to today's sea of rap artists.

The classic "Resurrection" is his first spiritually-influenced and religiously-conscious effort on this disc and one of his best of the "Resurrection" (1994) period.

The album demonstrates a major leap from the occasionally juvenile and misogynistic "Can I Borrow a Dollar" of 1992. "Resurrection" is a track that 2007 needs – it is anti-materialistic and profoundly meaningful yet still contains the confident swagger that makes hip-hop so alluring. Since this album, Common has remained focused on rap music as art and as expression, filling the role formerly inhabited by poetry. "Resurrection," produced by Chicago native and Kanye West mentor No I.D., is just what the doctor ordered for the drug-fueled, money-fetishizing rap industry.

This collection features the "Resurrection" track "Book of Life," another Quran and Bible-influenced song. "They say become a doctor, but I don't have the patience/Adjacent to that situation/I want an occupation that I'm into/'Cause yet if I begin to/Live to my potential/I went to School for 14 years and my best teacher was experience," Lynn raps.

Lauryn Hill assists on the pro-life anthem "Retrospect for Life," Erykah Badu on the jazzy "All Night Long" and Cee-Lo of Gnarls Barkley fame sings on "G.O.D. (Gaining One's Definition)," but the disc mainly features Common's unique lyrical ability far in the foreground. He raps more slowly now than he did on "Can I Borrow A Dollar," a change that took place on "Resurrection." In this collection, this evolution is clearer than ever. This may, however, be more of a problem for sales than anything.

In a music world where "I'm hot cause I'm fly/You ain't cause you not" is considered a good line, "curiosity killed the catechism understanding the wisdom/Became the rhythm that I played to and became a slave to master self" may not fit in anywhere. No, there is no dance that goes along with each song nor is there new slang. Common does not disrespect women, nor does he glorify violence, nor does he brag about selling drugs, nor does he obsess over money.

Before Common was a Gap Model and an actor, he was a rapper. And before he was a famous rapper, he was an "unsigned hype" in the Source. Common Sense has come a long way; now he has a different name, a different label and a different flow. But behind it all he is still raw talent, something that hasn't changed at all.

Steven Stafford can be reached at stevenjstafford@gmail.com.

Common

"Thisisme Then"

RedInk Records

4/5

Even though Common appears to have just hit the studio, his release of "Thisisme Then" proves that he has years of experience.

Even Vaughn cannot save 'Fred Claus'

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

If you are attempting to find the next great holiday classic to be loved and cherished for Christmases to come, "Fred Claus" is not that movie. On paper, the premise for "Fred Claus" must have sounded like a real winner.

This holiday film is about Santa's disgruntled older brother trying to scam him out of money, but eventually the brother discovers the true meaning of family and Christmas. Throw in an edgy comic actor (Vince Vaughn), and you should have a formula to bring families and teens into the theaters.

On screen, "Fred Claus" falls straight down the chimney from the onset. It's almost painful to watch such great actors like Kevin Spacey ("American Beauty") and Paul Giamatti ("Sideways") try to make the most out of their rehashed, family-approved one-liners. Giamatti, it seems, has finally decided to take a break from continually being turned down by Oscar voters to earn a decent paycheck, as there seems to be no other excuse for his on-screen presence.

In fact, there are a number of highly-recognizable actors in the movie. This wouldn't be surprising, except none of them have major roles in the movie. Kathy Bates, as Fred's estranged mother; Rachael McAdams, as the attractive elf love interest, and Ludacris, as an elf D.J., are all featured in small roles that amount to fewer than ten minutes of screen time. All of these cameo appearances only hinder the film's story development and are far from memorable.

Vince Vaughn does his best with the material and is able to give the main character, Fred, the right sarcastic snap for the role.

Ultimately, the movie proves that he, like a few other of his fratpack pals, can't carry a movie on their own.

However, that might point the finger at Vaughn for problems that were most likely inherent in the film's weak script. The plot meanders along as a fish-out-of-water tale of a disgruntled Fred starting work in the North Pole. Santa (Giamatti) tries hard to get Fred to reconcile with his family while keeping an evil efficiency inspector (Spacey) at bay with varying degrees of success and hilarity.

However, just exactly where he gets the authority to shut down Santa from is never clear. This is never answered and is an example of how the film often starts something that might be interesting to the audience only to leave it for the usually holiday clichés.

Overall, "Fred Claus" laughs are too few and far between and the darker material tends to take over the movie in unexpected ways. For a movie that touts itself as a warm-hearted comedy, it has the tendency to be quite depressing and overly obvious with its messages.

That said, one cannot truly trash "Fred Claus," it's not a wholly unamusing movie. If you're going to spend a few hours doing something, there are a number of things that come to mind that would be more unpleasant to endure. The movie could have worked very well as a dark comedy about Santa's family problems; however, it made the mistake of trying to venture down the already-beaten path of Hollywood holiday movies.

It is safe to say that "Fred Claus" probably won't be joining the itinerary for holiday movie watching except for the most avid Vince Vaughn fans, but the movie does have its moments. With so many other options at the movies at this time of the year, it would be hard to recommend "Fred Claus."

The movie, like grandma's ugly Christmas sweater, will be thrown in the closet, only resurfacing to be talked about for its embarrassing nature and eventually forgotten.

Peter Rizzo can be reached at prizzo@student.umass.edu

Despite the famous cast, "Fred Claus" fails to break away from the traditional holiday movie plot. Cameos in the movie include Kathy Bates, Rachel McAdams and Ludacris.

Fred Claus

Directed By David Dopkin

Grade: C-

Pageant breaks away from the norm

Month-long pageant brings out the 'Mexican Cowboys' for the title of Mr. Gay Vaquero

By Alison Satake
The Oakland Tribune

OAKLAND, Calif. – Backstage in the dressing room, the nervous energy was high as each cowboy primped before a vanity mirror.

For some, like "Antonio Rios," the nerves came from more than a little stage fright.

"Antonio Rios is 24," says the worker from the avocado orchards of Michoacan, Mexico who is actually 21. He assumes this fake identity when he goes to gay clubs. "I don't like using my personal name because my family and straight friends don't know I'm gay. And people might come looking for me at work too."

Despite his coyness, there's one thing Rios is not shy about, his quest for the title of Mr. Gay Vaquero 2007.

The gay vaquero, or "Mexican cowboy" pageant, is a month-long talent and beauty contest, which began Oct. 29 and culminated with the crowning of the winner Nov. 19 at downtown Oakland gay club, the Bench and Bar.

As the only gay-Mexican cowboy pageant in the San Francisco Bay area, the club's owner, Alex Luera, said of the contestants, "[It] helps them be who they want to be."

A Stetson hat, cowboy boots and an elusive, brooding attitude comprise the quintessential vaquero.

"I look good as a cowboy. I like it when people look at me," says Rios coyly with a dimpled smile. "And many people ask me to dance."

Rios refers to "banda," the energetic Mexican country-western two-step dance, which is integral to the vaquero subculture as well as the rodeo.

"I love the rodeo," says pageant founder, Roberto Munoz. "I love the energy, the people dancing and the music."

Munoz frequents the summer rodeos held by the Oakland Coliseum and used to drive every weekend down to West Hollywood's Lempo, the original gay banda club party. He started the Mr. Gay Vaquero pageant in Oakland, Calif., seven years ago.

The pageant aims to continue the rodeo spirit through cultural traditions such as ballet folklorico and cow-roping that originate from the rural Mexican states of Jalisco and Michoacan, says Munoz. It is unique, however, because Mr. Gay Vaquero contestants are free to serenade their boyfriends and have drag queens do back-up as well. On the first Monday, 200 people came to watch the nine contestants strut their stuff in the first round of the competition.

Rios, who is Contestant No. 2 says, "I like cowboys. My family members are cowboys."

Most of the contestants are immigrants like Rios, who came to this country four years ago when he was 17.

"It's like what Washington is for apples," says Rios as he proudly describes his rural hometown, Tancitaro, the region that produces the most "aguacates" or Hass avocados in Mexico. He began working for a farmer when he was 12-years-old who had him sleep in his avocado orchard alone with a 22 rifle to fend off poachers.

At one point, Rios said, he contemplated suicide back in Tancitaro because he knew he was gay, but had no one he could talk to about it. Now, in the States, he has gay friends and although it was strange at first for him to see two men dancing banda together, he has grown accustomed to it.

Munoz admits there is homophobia in the heterosexual vaquero community, but says it reflects the homophobia in the larger hetero-normative society.

He says he believes that in general, heterosexual vaqueros don't mind the gay vaqueros.

"When I go outreach for the pageant at straight cowboy clubs, I've had no problems so far," he said.

For Contestant No. 7, a hair designer from Newark, Calif., the pageant provides a rare opportunity for him to express masculinity as a gay male.

"I think a gay guy can do anything he wants. You can be macho," says Jaime Castro, 29, during a rehearsal break. "For me, being gay doesn't make me less than a man."

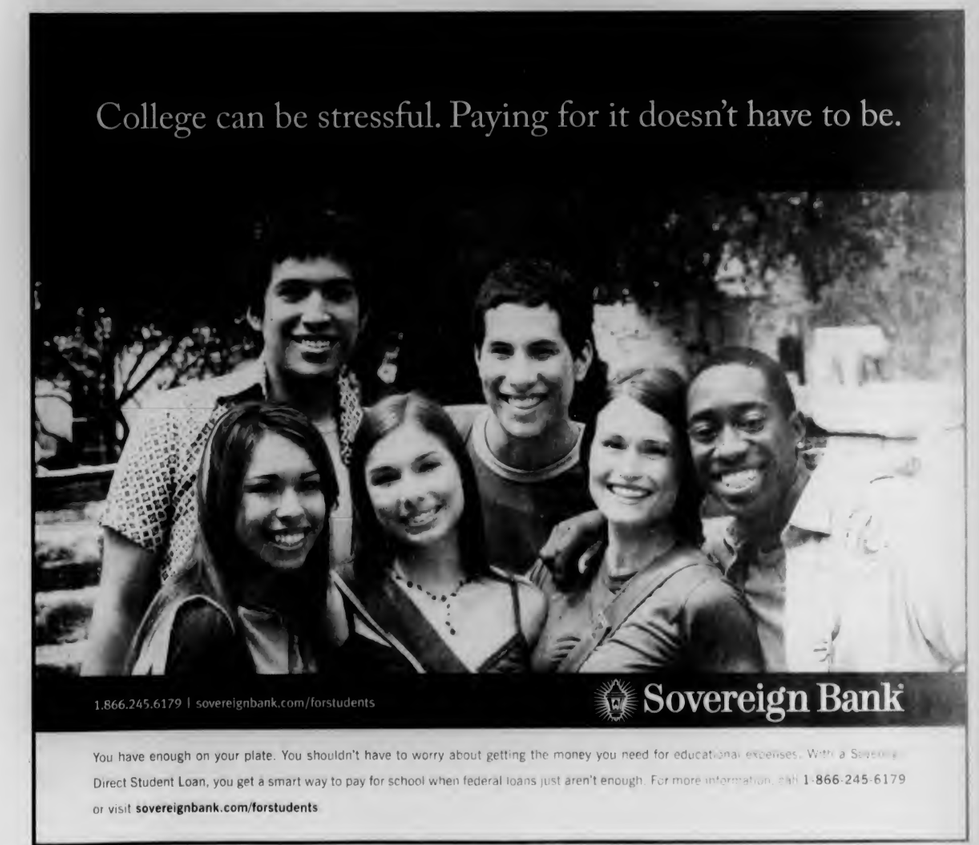
What makes the vaquero, though, is the clothes.

Two days before the preliminary pageant, Rios inspected a pair of cowboy boots at a store selling Latino items such as popular sweet treats (roses and Latin American flags). Boots – cowboy boots, sometimes called "botas" – start at $500 to $600. "Texanas" (cowboy hats, sometimes called "Stetsons") with two pairs of fancy-tipped blue and green cowboy boots for the competition.

The $1,000 cash prize goes to the first place winner, which covers the cost of the contestants' outfit.

Backstage on the afternoon of the contestants' introduction, Rios and the other contestants anxiously fret about on the dance floor of the funky warehouse-like club as a makeup artist grooms a lover for the crowd.

Contestant No. 5, a [illegible] dance teacher from Salinas, Rolando Cabrera, is the [illegible] foot taller and clinched the 25-year-old has been working out in the gym since January to [illegible]



It paid off. Cabrera won the title.

Participants in the Mr. Gay Vaquero pageant spend up to $600 on cowboy boots ("botas") and near $300 for cowboy hats ("Texanas"). The winner receives a prize of $1,000.

"Antonio Rios" is not openly gay with his family and co-workers. He assumed this fake identity when he goes out to gay clubs in order to keep his secret.

Hightower leads UR

CAA from page 8

after using over nine minutes of clock and scoring a touchdown with 7:37 remaining in the game. The Mountaineers responded with a 44-yard field goal with fewer than five minutes to play.

Rather than punting the ball on fourth-and-one from their own 32-yard line, the Dukes attempted to convert the first down, and quarterback Rodney Landers was stuffed for no gain. The Mountaineers scored the eventual game-winning touchdown on an Armanti Edwards five-yard rush with 1:10 left.

Landers then drove JMU down to the ASU 9-yard line before running back Jamal Sullivan fumbled the ball that was recovered by the Mountaineers, who then ran out the clock.

The final miscue by the Dukes nicely summarized their troubles throughout the game. They had a 446-330 edge on offensive yards but lost two fumbles and threw an interception. The other fumble was returned 77 yards to the JMU 3-yard line, and the interception put the Mountaineers at the Dukes' 28-yard line. The Dukes also missed an extra point in the first half.

Appalachian State will host Eastern Washington this weekend. The Eagles upset second-ranked McNeese State 44-15 this past weekend.

Spiders down EKU

Along with Massachusetts and Delaware, Richmond was the third team to advance to the second round of the I-AA playoffs. The Spiders used a solid balance of offense and defense to defeat Eastern Kentucky, 31-14, on Saturday.

"I thought it was probably as most complete a football game we've played in the past month," Richmond coach Dave Clawson said. "Our defensive guys were really flying around and making plays. Offensively, we ran the ball very well and I thought we threw it efficiently and I thought we played really well on special teams."

Clawson was also pleased that his team didn't turn the ball over. Eastern Kentucky (9-3, 8-0 Ohio Valley Conference) came into the game with the country's best turnover margin. The Spiders forced four Colonel turnovers, including two interceptions that resulted in touchdown drives.

Running back Tim Hightower set a Spider postseason record with 180 yards rushing. The senior, who is a Walter Payton Award candidate, also scored the first touchdown of the game that enabled Richmond (10-2, 7-1 CAA) to jump out to a 10-0 lead early in the second quarter.

Hightower wasn't the only Spider player to find success on the ground. Josh Vaughn also rushed for 85 yards, and Richmond dominated EKU 278-54 in the running game.

The Spiders will travel to Spartanburg, S.C., to face off with Wofford. The Terriers pulled off an upset on Saturday when they beat No. 3 Montana 23-22.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

CONTENT EXCHANGE, MEDIA, INC.

Richmond running back Tim Hightower ran for 180 yards in the Spiders' 31-14 win over Eastern Kentucky on Saturday.

Meyers returns in win

HOCKEY from page 8

ular lineup as a defenseman, which has recently made Nolet the odd man out with Mike Kostka, Justin Braun, David Leaderer, Topher Bevis and John Wessbecker filling out the six defenseman slots. Nolet said he has no preference as to where he wants to play just that he wants to get the ice time.

"If coach needs me as a forward, I'll do whatever coach asks me to," Nolet said. "I'm here to help the team, and if he needs me at forward, I'll go forward, and if he needs me as a defenseman, I'll just go play as a defenseman."

Power play back on track

The UMass power play unit struggled early in the season, but it has certainly found its way in late November as the season nears the halfway point.

The Minutemen were 3-for-4 on the power play last night, including two goals in the third period less than a minute apart. Defenseman Justin Braun and forwards Chase Langeraap and Chris Davis were credited with power-play goals against the Dutchmen. Kostka also recorded two assists with the man advantage.

"We worked hard on the power play this week," Nolet said. "That was the thing that was missing in our game last weekend. We made some adjustments. We had Justin Braun playing forward, and he scored a goal today."

"I thought we moved the puck pretty well," Cahoon said. "In the first period, there were some zone entry issues that caused us a little bit of a problem. But once we got beyond the zone entry issue, we started to move the puck effectively and got some good scoring chances off of it."

BRIAN TSUCHIDA/COLLEGIAN

Chris Davis scored a power-play goal for the Minutemen in their 5-2 win over Union on Sunday.

Meyers returns to net

Sophomore goaltender Dan Meyers made his first start for the Minutemen since Oct. 13 at St. Lawrence during the second game of the season. After missing time with a groin injury, freshman Paul Dainton became UMass's full-time goalie, but Meyers finally got back on the ice Sunday night, making 25 saves on 27 shots.

He allowed both goals in the first period, though the second came on a 5-on-3 for the Dutchmen that Meyers had no chance of stopping.

Meyers is now 2-0 in his two starts, giving up three goals. Dainton is a 4-3-4 as a starter with a .920 save percentage and a 2.30 goals-against average ... UMass is now 37-0-1 in its last 38 games when scoring four goals or more ... The Minutemen are undefeated at home this season at 3-0-3 and are on a 12-game unbeaten steak inside the Mullins Center (8-0-4).

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu

UMass punt unit struggles

FOOTBALL from page 8

Lawrence who started to take over. The senior tailback rushed for 124 yards after halftime, including 52 yards and a touchdown on the drive that produced the winning score. Lawrence finished with 167 yards and three touchdowns on 31 carries.

In his first season as a starting running back in college, Lawrence has amassed 1,473 rushing yards and 16 touchdowns in 12 games. He's averaging 5.0 yards per carry on his 294 rushing attempts. Lawrence needs 73 yards to pass and move into fifth on the single-season UMass rushing list.

The Minutemen ended the game with 649 yards of total offense, finishing two yards short of the school record (651) set in 1965 against UNH. UMass had tied the record late in the fourth quarter after a 47-yard run by fullback Chris Zardas, but Coen lost two yards on consecutive kneel-downs to end the game.

Not-so-special teams

Three mishaps on special teams helped the Rams stay close against the Minutemen on Saturday.

Unlike the next two miscues for the Minutemen, the first one came on the punt return unit. On fourth-and-2 on their own 26-yard line, the Rams faked the punt on a direct snap to linebacker Nicholas Magiera. Magiera took the snap and ran 38 yards down the field to the UMass 36-yard line. Quarterback scored on a 1-yard touchdown run to cut the lead to 14-7 in the first quarter.

It was the punting unit for the Minutemen that really struggled. In the second quarter with UMass leading, 21-7, Brett Arnold's punt was blocked by Magiera. The blocked punt gave the Rams great field position and set up a touchdown pass to pull within seven points.

The final mistake that drew UMass coach Don Brown's ire came late in the fourth quarter after the game was already in hand. The long snap was bobbled by Arnold, forcing him to scramble to his left and throw the ball to linebacker George Byrd. The pass was completed for a 6-yard loss.

After the game, Brown was pleased with the victory but was upset with the mistakes he saw on special teams.

"Very concerned, needs to be evaluated, will be evaluated," Brown said after the game regarding his punting unit. "We have options. We have several guys who've been practicing there. I got to take a good hard look over the next 48 [hours], but I'm going to watch the tape and evaluate all pieces of it."

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu

NOV 27 2007

GET TESTED. GET ANSWERS.

Tapestry Health provides confidential, affordable care, including:
HIV Rapid Testing
Birth Control
Pregnancy Testing
Emergency Contraception (EC)
HPV Vaccinations
STD Screening & Treatment
GYN & Breast Exams
WALK-INS WELCOME

In recognition of World AIDS DAY, Tapestry Health will be providing FREE Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c), Nov 30th

Call or stop into one of our 15 Sites Across western Mass

MassHealth and most insurances accepted. If you are not insured, fees are based on a sliding scale.

TAPESTRYhealth CARE WITHIN REACH 413-586-2016 800-696-7752 www.tapestryhealth.org

OPEN HOUSE
THURSDAY, DEC. 6, 4–7 p.m.

Graduate Programs in:
- Occupational Therapy Professional and Post-professional
- Physician Assistant
- Physical Therapy
- Rehabilitation Counseling & Services

(Entry at graduate level or through undergraduate programs)

Allied Health Sciences Center
Call: 413-748-3225

SPRINGFIELD COLLEGE
SCHOOL OF HEALTH SCIENCES & REHABILITATION STUDIES
www.springfieldcollege.edu/hsrs

MOVE AHEAD TO YOUR HEALTH-CARE CAREER

A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Domino's Pizza
AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am -3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 593-9500
2XTUESDAY — FREE
THREE BREADSTICKS — Any 3 Bread Side Items $9.99
PIZZA & BREAD — One 1-Topping Pizza & Choice of Breadsticks MEDIUM $10.99 | LARGE $13.99
WHAT A DEAL 1 — Medium 1-Topping Pizza & Two 20oz Sodas $9.99
YOUR CHOICE — One Large 1-Topping Brooklyn-style Pizza & Medium Philly Cheese Steak Pizza $9.99
WHAT A DEAL 2 — 2 Medium 1-Topping Pizzas $13.99
WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

Auto Express
Fast, Quality Service
Student Discount 20% off oil change
SUNDAY SPECIAL (Every Sunday from 10am-6:30pm) | Full Service Oil Change $19.95
FREE WIRELESS INTERNET
Auto Express is your one stop for MASS STATE INSPECTIONS with extended hours for your convinence!
Monday Wednesday & Friday 8 am to 6pm
Tuesday & Thursday 9am to 7pm
Saturday 8 am to 5 pm
Sunday 10 am to 4pm
Axels • Brakes • Batteries • Mufflers • Tune-Ups • Full Service Oil Changes
118 South East St. Amherst, MA 01002
413-253-0056

TAKE A PHOTO OF YOURSELF WITH YOUR COMPLETED SUDOKU OR CROSSWORD AND SEE YOURSELF ON THE COMICS PAGE
COMICS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Sudoku is your mistress.

		1			8	3		4
4						2
			2		5	8
	5		9		1	6
8								3
		2	5		3		9
	1	7		3
	6							5
9		5	4			2

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

ACROSS
1 In ___ (altogether)
5 Edible mushrooms
11 "My Gal ___"
14 Oklahoma town
15 The Wizard of Menlo Park
16 TV movie channel
17 Office note
18 Impassioned leader's
20 Puncture
22 Engages in diatribe
23 Harris and Wynn
24 Dumbfounds
29 Good cheer
30 Buddhist shrine
31 Gaze wantonly at
35 Runs off
37 Narrow margin
38 Eagle's home
40 Kitchen gadget
41 Look lasciviously
42 In a clumsy manner
47 What ___ can I say?
48 Worn-out words
49 Nuvo network
52 Afternoon shows
54 Human seal
55 Loafs
58 Relaxed
60 Bluebood
65 Kiddie
66 B & B
67 Plenty
68 Desolation
69 Modico
70 Bronco busting events
71 Bohemian

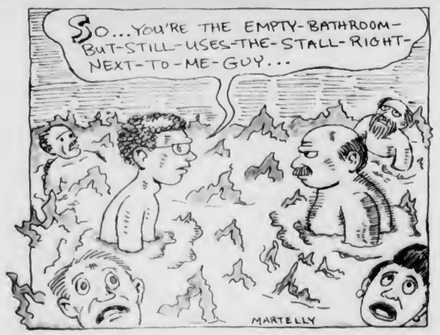
DOWN
1 Moderate
2 Iroquois League tribe
3 Some vacation homes
4 Smell
5 Battlefield rescuers
6 Poetic piece
7 Tire support
8 NASA partner
9 Cabin part
10 Sound asleep?
11 Etcher
12 Help in a heist
13 Defeat
19 Alternative fuel
21 Thicket
25 Self-esteem
26 Actor Silver
27 Annex
28 Existed
32 South African golfer
33 Invent facts
34 Mess up
36 Roman galleys
38 Bottle of brew
39 Cave-dwelling fish
40 Storage box
42 Six months from Apr.
43 Will Smith role
44 $5 bill
45 Treatment for swelling
46 Sword cases
50 Hot-air balloon gondola
51 Quick
53 Daisylike flower
55 Pull down
56 Tuscany river
57 Galvanizing metal
59 Sicilian peak
61 John's Yoko
62 Cape on the Atlantic
63 Road to Reuen
64 In the past

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

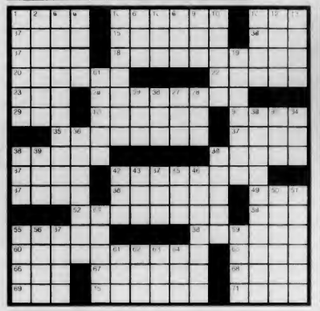
TEN DOWN: SOUND ASLEEP?

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I'm addicted to Altoids. I call them 'acting pills.'"
-Harrison Ford



To Kill a Dragon By Jen Fill



Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

Labrat By Richard Martelly

Submit your comics!
collegianecomics@yahoo.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Bottle up heat in your dorm, and sell it at a cheap price to cold, broke apartment dwellers unwilling to pay for real heat.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
One of your armpits smells worse than the other. You're stinky AND lopsided.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Wear your pajamas to class, and tell everyone that you stole them from your cat.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
The above horoscope refers to Old People Sayings Vol. 1— the cat's pajamas.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Your childhood diet of paint chips explains your intellect and your colorful character.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are completely broke. Head back up the mountain, bring your sheep, bring your buddy; it'll be a gay old time.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Start studying for your finals right now because December 'tis the season for embolisms.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Sniffing Sharpie markers causes health side effects as permanent as the stylus itself.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Commence with winter hibernation mode starting tonight at 5 p.m.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Never take criticism too hard. Most people have no idea what the crap they're talking about.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Hitting on a girl named Chastity is about as close to a lost cause as you can get.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Sweet mother of shrimp cocktail, the Collegian can finally make three line horoscopes. You are very turned on right now.

Feeling grouchy?
Hop in a trash can and read the comics page!

comics@dailycollegian.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing. 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY 1 Bdrm New Carpet/Paint-mlalli@student.umass.edu for info.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext 162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email. phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

HOUSE FOR RENT

Nice, 3 bdr house with 1 car garage. 1 1/2 blks from campus. Available in January. Call 690-1585.

INFORMATION

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

ROOM FOR RENT

Large, quiet, comfortable, furnished, walk to UMass, on 2 bus lines for male graduate student/professor. Reasonable 413-549-1578

SERVICES

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

Please Recycle

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe, Confidential, Affordable. Providing birthcontrol. EC, pregnancy testing. GYN & breast exams HIV counseling & rapid testing. STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 Walk ins wecome. www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Submit classifieds online at www.dailycollegian.com or by visiting our offices during business ours

NOV 28 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass back in hunt for national title

Coen, Lawrence lead the way in victory over Fordham

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After losing to Appalachian State in the NCAA Division I Football National Championship game last year, the No. 7 Massachusetts football team is one step closer to returning to the title game this season.

UMass (10-2, 7-1 Colonial Athletic Association), defeated Fordham, 49-35, on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium in the opening round of the Football Championship Subdivision playoffs. The Minutemen travel to Carbondale, Ill. on Saturday to take on No. 4 Southern Illinois.

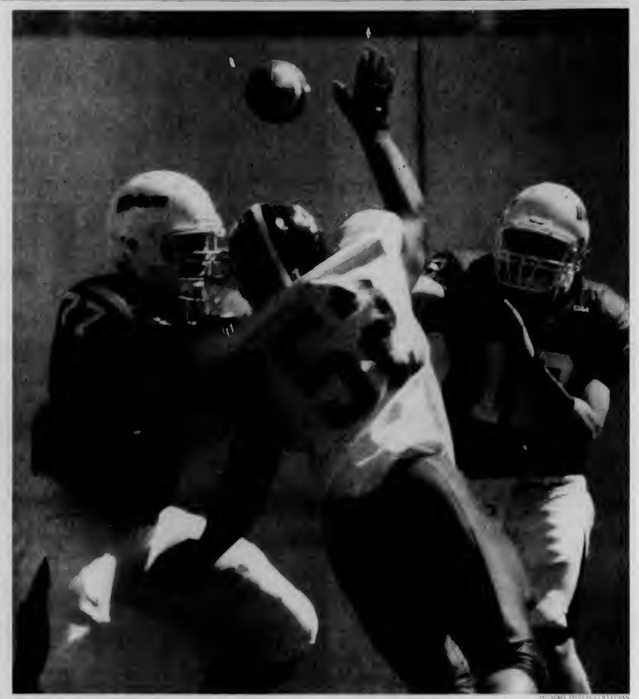
UMass Football

The winner of that second round game will face either No. 1 Northern Iowa or No. 13 Delaware in the semifinals on Dec. 8.

OFFENSIVE FIREPOWER

With the defensive struggles for the Minutemen against the Rams, Liam Coen, Matt Lawrence and Rasheed Rancher had career performances at just the right time.

Coen, the school record holder in virtually every passing category, eclipsed one of the few marks that he didn't already own with his 419 passing yards against Fordham. The previous single-game high for a UMass signal-caller was 403, set by Matt Guice against New Hampshire in 2001.



It took Guice 63 passing attempts that game to crack the 400-yard mark, while Coen did it on 24-of-37 passing. Coen also has the third-highest single-game total with 401 yards against the Wildcats in 2005. The junior quarterback had 306 passing yards in the first half alone on Saturday. He finished the afternoon with four touchdown passes and did not turn the ball over.

Rancher had quite the first half as well, catching seven passes for 187 yards and two touchdowns before heading to the locker room before halftime. The 6-foot-5 wide receiver needed 24 yards in the second half to break the school record for most receiving yards in a game (Adrian Zullo 210, in 1999 against Richmond) but failed – catching one pass for 11 yards. He finished the game with 198 yards receiving on eight catches and also added an 11-yard run on an end-around.

J.J. Moore had a quiet yet effective game, hauling in eight catches for 115 yards. With that effort, Moore topped the 1,000-yard receiving mark on the season. He has 73 receptions with five resulting in a touchdown. He needs two catches to pass Kerry Taylor for third on the single-season receptions list, and his 1,006 yards receiving this year places him third for most in a season.

With the score tied at 35 early in the fourth quarter, it was

See FOOTBALL on page 6

Liam Coen set the UMass single-game record for most passing yards with 419 in Saturday's 49-35 win over Fordham. Coen and the Minutemen take on Southern Illinois this Saturday in the quarterfinals of the NCAA Division I Football Championship.

Sophomore Martin Nolet saw the first action of his career at forward for UMass in its 5-2 win over Union on Sunday. He dressed in place of the injured Will Ortiz and scored a goal.

Nolet provides flexibility for Mass Attack on the blue line

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you were one of the 2,002 fans in attendance on Sunday evening to witness the Massachusetts hockey team handle Union last night, you would have noticed something particularly strange about the lineup on the ice.

UMass Hockey

Of course sophomore Will Ortiz, the team's leading goal-scorer, was absent for the 5-2 win, but wayward sophomore defenseman Martin Nolet was playing forward for the first time in his collegiate career.

The move, which UMass coach Don Cahoon said is neither permanent nor temporary, paid off almost immediately. Nolet put the Mass Attack up early with his first goal of the season just 37 seconds into the game.

"It wasn't just a response to Will being out," Cahoon said. "It was something that I talked about with our coaches for a short while about the dimensions he brings to a game. His physical stature, his speed and his skating ability. I don't think there's a stronger skater in our league."

"That coupled with the development of [defenseman] Doug Kublin and how well he's coming along gave me a sense that we should at least look at that dynamic and look at the team on that basis so that maybe in the future we have more options, more flexibility."

Cahoon is no stranger to mixing and matching his lineups and asking players to make position changes for the benefit of the team.

Mark Matheson, who graduated after his senior season last year, was a primary example of that strategy. Matheson came to UMass as a defenseman but played more at center during the later part of his career, though injuries, particularly to Nolet, forced Cahoon to move Matheson back to defenseman toward the end of last year.

"I'm not shy about trying kids once I get to know their physical makeup," Cahoon said. "Mark Matheson was an interesting experiment that really helped this team for a while. Tommy Pock, the story is well-known, Martin is just another product of that thinking. It doesn't necessarily mean it's right. It doesn't necessarily mean it's long-term, but the thinking is we want to know as much about our team as we possibly can."

Nolet said he felt comfortable, despite practicing at the position just one day before playing in the game.

"It was interesting," he said. "I liked it. Will Ortiz was injured, so coach needed me to play as a forward. I gave it a shot, and I think it went well."

Kublin, a freshman, appears to have entrenched himself in the reg-

See HOCKEY on page 6

Delaware rolls over Hornets

Last-minute drive puts UNI over upstart New Hampshire

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In a much-hyped interstate matchup, Delaware had no problem dismantling Delaware State, 44-7 and became one of eight teams to advance to the next round of the NCAA Football Championship Subdivision playoffs.

CAA Football

The Blue Hens (9-3, 5-3 CAA) jumped out to a 20-0 first quarter lead and never looked back – by halftime the score was 30-0.

"I think when you can get a lead like we did right away, I think it takes a lot of wind out of [the opposition's] sails," Delaware coach K.C. Keeler said in this week's Colonial Athletic Association teleconference. "I don't think the score was indicative of how good of a football team [the Hornets] were."

Delaware State's (10-2, 8-0 Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference) offense couldn't get in a rhythm at any point during the game. They amassed 144 total yards and 11 first downs, and their sole touchdown came at the beginning of the fourth quarter when Blue Hen backup running back Phillip Thaxton fumbled and Reggie McCoy took it into the end zone.

The Hornet defense came into the game allowing 16.1 points per game but had no answer for star running back Omar Cuff. The senior ran for 288 yards on the ground for the Blue Hens – twice as much as Delaware State's total offensive production. Cuff also ran for four touchdowns and now has 37 on the year, which is good for the all-time single-season record for touchdowns in the I-CS.

"When you have 288 [yards] in two and a half quarters and four touchdowns, that's a pretty good day's work," Keeler said.

Cuff now also holds the I-CS record for rushing touchdowns in a single season with 33 and holds the career record for rushing touchdowns in I-CS with 63.

Delaware will next travel to Cedar Falls, Iowa, to take on Northern Iowa.

UNH NEARLY UPSETS NO. 1

New Hampshire went up 35-31 on a Chad Kackert 15-yard touchdown run with 1:16 remaining, and Northern Iowa was in danger of being ousted from the playoffs after a perfect 11-0 regular season.

After a 19-yard kick return, the Panthers started with the ball at their own 29-yard line. Quarterback Eric Sanders completed 5-of-6 passes on the drive, including a 24-yard touchdown pass with seven seconds remaining in the game. Sanders finished the game with 314 yards passing.

Before UNI (12-0, 6-0 Gateway Conference) went on its game-winning drive, Wildcat quarterback Ricky Santos put together an impressive drive of his own. Santos led UNH 75 yards down the field in slightly over two minutes to give the Wildcats the 35-31 lead.

In addition to scoring UNH's final touchdown, Kackert scored on a 94-yard kickoff return to tie the score at 14 in the second quarter.

Santos did himself proud in his last game with the Wildcats (7-5, 4-4 CAA). He threw for 251 yards and two touchdowns, while not turning the ball over. In fact, UNH didn't turn the ball over once, and this allowed the Wildcats to remain in the game.

Corey Williams ran for 220 yards and scored three touchdowns for the Panthers.

JMU FALLS TO CHAMPS

Similar to the UNH game, James Madison held a lead late in the game and had the chance to upset a higher seed on the road.

The Dukes (8-4, 6-2 CAA) took a 27-19 lead over Appalachian State (10-2, 5-2 Southern Conference)

See CAA on page 6

Delaware running back Omar Cuff ran for 288 yards and four touchdowns in the Blue Hens' 44-7 win over Delaware State.

MINUTEMEN TRAVEL TO CARRIER DOME | PAGE 8

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

MOSTLY SUNNY : HI: 42 LO: 28 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 2007

Governor pressures Tocco

Patrick seeks to force out Board of Trustees Chairman

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Gov. Deval Patrick is attempting to oust Stephen Tocco from his position of chairman of the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees.

Patrick wants to replace Tocco – an appointee of former Gov. Mitt Romney – with one of his own people.

The board's current vice chairman, Robert Manning, is the most likely candidate.

While Manning is also a Romney appointee, officials in the Patrick administration told the Boston Globe this week the governor wants someone loyal to him on the board. According to the Globe article, Patrick trusts Manning to stay loyal when it comes to some far-reaching decisions facing the university system in the near future.

Plans for selecting a new chancellor for the UMass-Amherst campus and implementing the new billion-dollar building campaign could be affected by a change in chairman.

While Tocco's term expires in June, Patrick has been adamant about his stepping down as chairman. Patrick tried to forcibly remove Tocco by holding a vote two months ago. The attempt subsequently failed.

Patrick now believes he has enough votes within the 19-member board to oust Tocco at its upcoming meeting Dec. 14.

Tocco has refused to step down, and his allies told the Boston Globe he is confident he has enough votes to allow him to remain chairman. He also plans to stay on the board till the end of his term even if he is ousted as chairman.

"It's a real war now," said one trustee, according to the Globe. "Steve is digging in his heels, and the governor is not budging."

The Governor's office could not be reached for comment before press time.

Tocco has said he would like to work out any differences with the governor while staying on as chairman, but cancelled a meeting with Patrick's chief of staff after news of Patrick's determination to get rid of Tocco were reported by the Globe earlier this week.

Ben Williams can be reached at bwilliam at student umass edu

Despite Governor Patrick's efforts, Stephen Tocco is refusing to step down from his post as chairman of the Board of Trustees.

NSF funds new UM science center

BY LEE WALCOTT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A three-year, $1.5 million grant will allow the University of Massachusetts to establish a research center for the exploration of hydrogen fuel cell science.

The grant, awarded by the National Science Foundation (NSF), will fund the new Fueling the Future Chemical Bonding Center.

"Our objective is to discover the molecule- and materials required to get really efficient proton transfer," said UMass chemist Sarikaran Thayumanavan.

Thayumanavan is in charge of an eight-member team of UMass scientists and one scientist from Yale University.

The team of scientists will study protons and the molecular conditions under which they get transferred from one molecule to another. In the process, a negative electron is stripped from gas such as hydrogen. Then the electrons are attracted to a positive end of a cell, but are forced to travel through an external circuit in the process, powering a motor. The research center is investigating how to best transport hydrogen's positively charged protons across the membrane that divides the cell.

"The aim of these centers is to give scientists opportunities to tackle big challenges in chemistry, in an atmosphere that's flexible and tolerant of risk," said Katharine Covert, director of Chemistry Centers Program at the NSF.

The initial $1.5 million grant is for a three-year period, and if the facility is successful, will be eligible in receiving $15 million over five years and $15 million more after that.

"The technologies likely to emerge from this important work will stimulate economic development and manufacturing opportunities in the state," said Congressman John W. Olver who helped obtain $1.6 million for UMass Amherst's Center for Renewable Energy, Science, and Technolgy (MassCREST).

Fuel cells in the scientist's research will likely be used for powering portable devices, transportation and even buildings.

The center will have a web-based interactive network where educators, students, and the public can receive

See GRANT on page 2

Health care hearing held on campus

State Representative Chris Donelan of Orange (second from right) discussed the challenges of recruiting and retaining health care professionals in rural Massachusetts in yesterday's committee hearing.

Minutemen face No. 1 BC in second round of NCAA

The Minutemen hope to continue the success the team has enjoyed over the past few weeks in tonight's match at Boston College. UMass could advance to the third round with a victory over the No. 1 Eagles.

Study finds colleges using online profiles for admissions

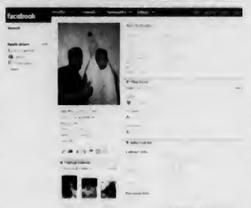
Universities mimic employer practices

BY ASHLEY COULOMBE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Students should be aware that potential employers and college institutions are looking through their photos on Facebook.com, according to a newly released report.

The University of Massachusetts Dartmouth recently completed a study that found that 21 percent of college admissions departments now use the Internet to look at the online profiles of potential students when reviewing applications.

UMass Dartmouth looked at the policies of 452 college admissions departments to determine how many of them included Web sites like Facebook, Myspace, Friendster, and Livejournal as part of the application process. The study also found that 26 percent of these colleges are using Google to research prospective students.



These practices have become widely used by potential employers, but now many colleges and universities are using the technique to learn more about students. SAT scores, GPAs, letters of recommendation, and essays are no longer the only things being considered for acceptance by many schools.

Admission departments in the Five College system, however, do not look at students' online profiles as part of the application process.

"We don't do that," said Kevin Kelly, director of admissions at UMass Amherst. "Each year we receive plus or minus 32,000 applications. The time it would take to check social networking sites is just not possible."

The admissions department at Hampshire College displayed an even stronger stance

See STUDY on page 2

Online profiles, like those on Facebook.com, are more frequently used during the admissions application process.

ACC Champs pose challenge for UMass

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the 2007 NCAA Tournament bracket was announced on Nov. 19, the Massachusetts men's soccer team received some good news and some bad news. Once the Minutemen heard their name called, they were ecstatic that they were hosting the first home NCAA Tournament match in program history. The only drawback was that they would face the tournament's No. 1 overall seed should the team win its first round match.

At the time, the team was not concerned about anything past the first round. And now that the team defeated Boston University at Rudd Field last Friday to advance, the Minutemen (14-7-1) can focus on the nation's No. 1 team – Boston College.

The Eagles (15-4-1) spent the majority of the 2007 season gradually working its way up the NSCAA adidas National Top 25 poll. Once it defeated then-No. 1 Wake Forest in the finals of the Atlantic Coast Conference Tournament, BC grabbed the top spot.

The ACC Tournament Championship culminated a successful regular season for the Eagles that saw four losses by an aggregate four goals. BC also dominated ACC play suffering one loss, while twice defeating the Demon Deacons.

Koch and the Minutemen are well aware of the difficulty of the task that lies ahead.

"We're playing a very good opponent – you don't win the ACC championship if you're not a good team," Koch said. "We have some players we need to step on their and we need to make sure we stay within our roles on our team. We cannot let down and we cannot relax."

One of BC's biggest strengths is height at the forward position. But beyond the Eagles' size advantage, the team has a talented bunch of goal scorers. BC has a pair of 20-plus point scorers with Sherton Matthews (11 goals, six assists) and Alejandro Bedoya (seven

See SOCCER on page 5

Dining Services locally grown program to expand

Area farms sampled at campus dining halls

BY JENNIFER BERGEN AND ASHLEY COULOMBE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Over the past year Dining Services at the University of Massachusetts has purchased 20 percent of its produce from area farms as part of a locally grown program.

Within two years they hope to be purchasing as much as 25 percent from local farms. A farmer's market was opened in the Campus Center this semester as part of the University's effort to expand the locally grown plan.

Supplying all four UMass dining halls takes enough food to feed the 13,000 students that are on a campus meal plan. To put this into perspective, it takes nearly 2,000 pounds of potatoes to make mashed potatoes for just one night.

The food purchased from these farms range from brown eggs and ice cream to apples and various vegetables. When the temperature drops the dining hall menu is adjusted "to serve more seasonable vegetables such as squash, potatoes, and local hot tomatoes," said Director of Dining Services Ken Toong.

Toong also said Dining Services is lucky, because a lot of local produce is kept in cold storage facilities to increase shelf-life.

Stickers reading, "Be a local hero – Buy locally grown," promoting buylocalfood.com can be found at many places around campus and in the community.

Dining Services receives the stickers from the Community Involved in Sustaining Agriculture (CISA). UMass joined the organization in the fall of 2005. Directors of the UMass Dining Services have been working hard to make students aware of the locally grown food available to them every day.

The locally grown program began five years ago. As the program progresses, coordinators set goals to increase the amount and the variety of locally grown foods.

In the future the Dining Services plan to add a local beef program and explore organic farming methods through the possibility of contracting with local farmers, according to Toong.

More information about the locally grown program can be found on the UMass Dining Services Web site, where a blog is also available in an effort to keep students updated. In an entry from October 2006, Toong explained the importance of the locally grown program.

"Supporting the local community and economy is great for UMass and the food can be fresher as well," wrote Toong.

Some of the local farms that have participated in the program are Diemand farm, North Hadley Sugar Shack, Warm Color Apiary, Cook Farm, and Joe Czajkowski's farm.

Jennifer Bergen can be reached jbergen at student umass edu

Ashley Coulombe can be reached at acoulomb at student umass edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 58

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Staigin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
HEAD EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marsea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Beau McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olsein
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenzwaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR CMDPPE
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Katie Huston

COPY EDITOR
Domenic Poli

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

Inventor of Gatorade dies at age 80

University of Florida 'legend' succombs to kidney failure

BY RON WORD
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Dr. J. Robert Cade, who invented the sports drink Gatorade and launched a multibillion-dollar industry that the beverage continues to dominate, died Tuesday of kidney failure. He was 80.

His death was announced by the University of Florida, where he and other researchers created Gatorade in 1965 to help the school's football players replace carbohydrates and electrolytes lost through sweat while playing in swamp-like heat.

"Today with his passing, the University of Florida lost a legend, lost one of its best friends and lost a creative genius," said Dr. Edward Block, chairman of the department of medicine in the College of Medicine. "Losing any one of those is huge. When you lose all three in one person, it's something you cannot recoup."

Now sold in 80 countries in dozens of flavors, Gatorade was born thanks to a question from former Gators Coach Dwayne Douglas, Cade said in a 2005 interview with The Associated Press.

He asked, "Doctor, why don't football players wee-wee after a game?"

"That question changed our lives," Cade said.

Cade's researchers determined a football player could lose as much as 18 pounds – 90 to 95 percent of it water – during the three hours it takes to play a game. Players sweated away sodium and chloride and lost plasma volume and blood volume.

Using their research, and about $43 in supplies, they concocted a brew for players to drink while playing football. The first batch was not exactly a hit.

"It sort of tasted like toilet bowl cleaner," said Dana Shires, one of the researchers.

"I guzzled it and I vomited," Cade said.

The researchers added some sugar and some lemon juice to improve the taste. It was first tested on freshmen because Coach Ray Graves didn't want to hurt the varsity team. Eventually, however, the use of the sports beverage spread to the Gators, who enjoyed a winning record and were known as a "second-half team" for their ability to outlast their opponents.

After the Gators beat Georgia Tech 27-12 in the Orange Bowl in 1967, Tech coach Bobby Dodd told reporters his team lost because, "We didn't have Gatorade ... that made the difference."

Stokely-Van Camp obtained the licensing rights for Gatorade and began marketing it as the "beverage of champions." PepsiCo Inc. now owns the brand, which has brought the university more than $150 million in royalties since 1973.

Cade said Stokely-Van Camp hated the name "Gatorade," believing it was too parochial, but stuck with it after tests showed consumers liked the name.

Gatorade held 81 percent of the $7.5 billion-a-year U.S. sports drink market in 2006, according to John Sicher, editor and publisher of Beverage Digest.

"Gatorade is the clear granddaddy of those drinks," Sicher said.

Cade said he thought the use of Gatorade would be limited to sports teams and never dreamed it would be purchased by regular consumers.

"I never thought about the commercial market," he said. "The financial success of this stuff really surprised us."

Cade, who was the University of Florida's first kidney researcher, also said he was proud that Gatorade was based on research into what the body loses in exercise. "The other sports drinks were created by marketing companies," he said.

Since its introduction, Cade said the formula changed very little. An artificial sweetener has replaced sugar.

Instead of the original four flavors, there are now more than 30 available in the United States and more than 50 flavors available internationally.

Born James Robert Cade in San Antonio on Sept. 26, 1927, Cade, a Navy veteran, graduated from the University of Texas at Austin and the University of Texas Southwestern Medical School in Dallas.

Cade was appointed an assistant professor in internal medicine at UF in 1961. He worked until he was 76, retiring in November 2004 from the university, where he taught medicine, saw patients and conducted research.

COLLEGIAN FILE

Gatorade, the brainchild of Dr. J. Robert Cade, is now sold in 80 countries worldwide after its humble origins as a sports beverage meant to refresh college football players during games.

Center to research renewable energy accurate information on chemical energy topics. The facility will also provide a forum between researchers and facilities involved in chemical energy research.

GRANT from page 1

"This investment by the NSF recognizes UMass Amherst as a hub of leading clean energy research," Congressman Olver said.

"A better understanding of proton transfer will allow us to address one of the greatest challenges to moving away from fossil fuel-based economy," said fellow chemist Interim Chancellor Thomas W. Cole. "I'm thrilled that our outstanding team of researchers has been selected for this task."

Leif Wolcutt can be reached at lwolcutt@student.umass.edu.

Rat infestation chokes birds, plant life on Aleutian island

Alaska to end rat presence

BY MARY PEMBERTON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

More than 200 years ago, rats jumped ship for Rat Island.

The muscular Norway rat climbed ashore on the rugged, uninhabited island in far southwestern Alaska in 1780 after a rodent-thrfested Japanese ship ran aground. It was the first time rats had made it to Alaska.

Since then, Rat Island, as the piece of rock was dubbed by a sea captain in the 1800s, has gone eerily silent. The sounds of birds are missing.

That is because the rats feed on eggs, chicks and adult seabirds, which come to the mostly treeless island to nest on the ground or in crevices in the volcanic rock.

"As far as bird life, it is a dead zone," said Steve Ebbert, a biologist at the Alaska Maritime National Wildlife Refuge, whose 2,500 mostly uninhabited islands include the Aleutian chain, of which Rat Island is a part.

State and federal wildlife biologists are gearing up for an assault on the rats of still-uninhabited Rat Island, hoping to exterminate them with rat poison dropped from helicopters. If they succeed, the birds will sing again on Rat Island. And it will be the third-largest island in the world to be made rat-free.

A visitor to the island 1,700 miles from Anchorage doesn't have to look far to find evidence of vermin. The landscape is riddled with rat burrows, rat trails, rat droppings and chewed vegetation. Certain plants are all but gone.

"You go to Rat Island and there are hardly any chocolate lilies," said Jeff Williams, another refuge biologist.

The same for songbirds and seabirds.

Rats have all but wiped out the seabirds on about a dozen large islands and many smaller islands in the refuge, which is home to an estimated 40 million nesting seabirds. Puffins, auklets and storm petrels are most at risk because they leave their eggs and young for extended periods while foraging.

The rats jumped ship beginning in the late 1700s, a problem that worsened in the 1800s when Russian merchant vessels plied the islands, and grew more serious in the 1940s, when hundreds of military ships visited the Aleutian Islands during World War II.

Now, the islands are vulnerable to "rat spills" from freighters traveling the quickest route from the West Coast to Asia. The Aleutians receive about 400 port calls from vessels each year.

Rats have been the scourge of islands worldwide. According to the California-based group Island Conservation, rats are to blame for between 40 percent and 60 percent of all seabirds and reptile extinctions, with 90 percent of those occurring on islands.

"Rats are one of the worst invasive species around," said Gregg Howald, program manager for Island Conservation, which is working with the U.S. government on a plan for Rat Island.

Norway rats typically have four to six litters a year, each containing six to 12 babies. One pair of rats can produce a population of more than 5,000 rats in an area in one year.

The state is joining forces with federal wildlife biologists in a multi-pronged attack to drive the rats from Alaska.

State regulations went into effect this fall, requiring mariners to check for rats and try to eradicate them if found. Violators face a year in jail and a $10,000 fine. Corporations could be fined up to $200,000.

The state also is mailing out 15,000 'Stop Rats!' brochures to educate mariners on how to control rats aboard boats and keep them from going ashore.

The brochure tells mariners to kill every rat on board, have traps set at all times, keep trash and food in rat-proof containers, use line guards – funnel-shaped devices that go around mooring lines – to keep rats from getting off or coming aboard, and never throw a live rat over the side. Rats are excellent swimmers.

The assault on the rats of the 6,871-acre Rat Island could begin as early as next October. The plan – which involves the use of a blood thinner that will cause the rodents to bleed to death – still must be reviewed and sent out for public comment.

Scientists want to see how the project goes before deciding whether to try to exterminate the rats on other islands.

The world's biggest island rat eradication took place on 27,922-acre Campbell Island off New Zealand. Rats also have been wiped out on Canada's 8,080-acre Langara Island.

Once the rats are gone from Rat Island, wildlife biologists expect the return of birds to be dramatic.

After black rats were wiped out in November and December 2002 on Anacapa Island off the California coast, murrelets were back in force by the following April, and Cassin's auklets were nesting there for the first time.

Five Colleges not among universities checking profiles against looking into student's online profiles.

STUDY from page 1

"It is our policy not to look at online profiles. We look only at the information the student submits to us in their application," said Karen Parker, director of admissions at Hampshire. "The admissions staff discussed the issue and we reached the conclusion that it is not ethical to go looking at Facebook."

Mount Holyoke and Smith maintain similar policies against using Facebook when accepting students.

Smith uses the common application, on which students are asked about any disciplinary action taken against them.

"If they've had disciplinary action taken against them, that's something we follow up on," said Karen Kristof, the senior associate director of admissions at Smith College. Karen Kristof. "That's not the same thing as seeing a picture of somebody who isn't old enough to drink."

Smith does use Google, but not to research students. The search engine is used to look into students the admissions staff believes may have plagiarized their college essay. The college also looks at Facebook, but only to look into potential employees.

Kristof also laid out the ethical repercussions of college admissions departments reviewing online profiles.

"It's hard ethically to take them into account," said Kristof. "You see a picture of a girl drinking who you know to be 17, but how does that affect her admission? Is it fair to?"

Many of the admissions departments mentioned that something specific on students' profiles could hurt admission chances.

"There is a question of what we would learn that would help us to admit or not admit a student," said Kelly.

While many colleges and universities are refraining from looking at online profiles as part of a student's application process, there is no doubt that students should be careful about what kind personal information about them can be found on the Internet.

The National Association of College Admissions Counseling outlines many steps students can take to ensure their online profiles do not adversely affect their future.

The Web site says students should refrain from posting personal information online, such as their address, schedule, and phone number. Students should also make sure their profile is set to private, and try to avoid adding friends they don't know. The site says students should also make an attempt to filter which photos of them are posted online, as they can make a negative impact on them in the future.

Ashley Coulombe can be reached at acoulomb@student.umass.edu.

NOV 28 2007

TASTE OF TUSCANY
NOVEMBER 27 - 30 ~ 5 - 9 PM
GUEST CHEF BRUNO WEHREN
FROM LAS VEGAS

MENU:
MINESTRONE CON DITALINI
(MINESTRONE SOUP WITH DITALINI)
BRODO DI MANZO CON AGNOLOTTI, PISELLI, E CAROTE
(BEEF BROTH WITH MEAT DUMPLINGS, PEAS & CARROTS)
POLLO ALLA PARMIGIANA
(CHICKEN PARMIGIANO WITH TOMATO SAUCE)
FETTUCINE (FETTUCINE)
CAVOLFIORE E BROCCOLI
(CAULIFLOWER & BROCCOLI POLONAISE)
ARROSTO (OR LOMBATA) DI MAIALE "PICCATA"
(PORK LOIN PICCATA)
"ORZOTTO" CON FUNGHI
(ORZOTTO WITH MUSHROOMS)
SPINACI FRESCHI (FRESH SPINACH)
FRUTTA FRESCA E DOLCE
(FRESH FRUIT & DESSERT)

TUESDAY, NOV. 27
WORCESTER DC
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 28
FRANKLIN DC
THURSDAY, NOV. 29
BERKSHIRE DC
FRIDAY, NOV. 30:
HAMPSHIRE DC

UMASS DINING
IN PARTNERSHIP WITH BARILLA PASTA

Barilla

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 28, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
– Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The end of debate

Ben Duffy

Trying to debate with a liberal is probably one of the most maddening things that you will ever attempt to do. Their modus operandi is to cut off the conversation as quickly as possible, usually by declaring your argument "out of bounds," according to their debate rule book.

Arguing with a liberal is kind of like arguing with the umpire in baseball, except for the fact that someone actually gave the umpire his authority, whereas liberals just think that they were born with theirs. As conservative satirist Ann Coulter once brilliantly noted, "It's difficult to have a simple conversation ... when liberals are constantly rushing in with their rule book about what can and cannot be said."

All right, liberals – I'm done arguing by your rule book, because it always stacks the deck in your favor. In any case, who died and made you the umpire?

You cannot argue with liberals about the issue of abortion. Believe me, I've tried. "How dare you?" say the liberals, "you're a man – you don't even have a uterus." Yes, well that's a well-considered argument. True, I don't have a uterus, so I'll just be sitting on my hands over in the corner, not making a peep. You liberals just keep slaughtering your children; I won't say a word.

Actually, women aren't allowed to oppose abortion, either, precisely because they are women. Just ask former University of Massachusetts student Kiera Manikoff. During the spring of 2003, she and the UMass Republicans organized an abortion graveyard to raise awareness about our society's most severe human rights abuse. Miss Manikoff was tending to the white-washed crosses one morning when a female student entered the abortion graveyard and cracked one of the crosses over her knee. Manikoff accosted the woman, reportedly saying, "I excuse me. You may not agree with what I have to say, but you cannot destroy our property. We have a right to do this." The woman reportedly grabbed the hammer from Manikoff's hand, shook it at her, and said, "How dare you, as a woman. You should be ashamed of yourself."

Arguing with a liberal is kind of like arguing with the umpire in baseball, except for the fact that someone actually gave the umpire his authority.

Wait a second – Manikoff cannot oppose mass infanticide because she's a woman? That's interesting. Although I've never met Kiera Manikoff, I'm fairly certain that she has uterus. So now I understand the rule – it's OK to take a pro-life stance on the issue of abortion, so long as you are neither a man nor a woman. Transgendered people might be able to have an opposing opinion on this topic, but I'll have to check the liberal rule book.

Similarly, I am not allowed to oppose same-sex "marriage" because it is a "civil rights issue." This begs the question – it's a civil rights issue, according to whom? Just because one side unilaterally declares that their issue pertains to "civil rights" does not mean that the debate is over.

Personally, I think that affirmative action is a civil rights issue. So is abortion. I know people who believe that having staggered federal tax brackets according to income is a bold-faced violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Mark Henkel, a polygamist rights advocate from Maine, claims "Polygamy rights is the next civil rights battle." Henkel remarks that, "The way to protect marriage is to keep government from defining it."

Just because one group declares that their issue is a "civil rights battle" doesn't amount to a hill of beans. It certainly doesn't mean that the rest of us cannot continue to vote for the opposite position, but that is exactly what happened on June 15, 2007 when our clownish state legislature blocked a ballot question that would have begun the process of amending our constitution to define marriage as between one man and one woman.

I'm also not allowed to oppose affirmative action, because I'm white and "wouldn't understand" how hard it is to be a racial minority. What a convenient argument – as the de facto victim of de jure discrimination, I should never raise my voice in protest, because my skin is white. The assertion that I "wouldn't understand" what it's like to be a racial minority is the choicest of all argumentation. I was born white and will die white, and thus cannot form an opinion on a topical issue that affects me.

I'm not even allowed to support our war effort in Iraq – not unless I "go enlist." I enlisted on my 18th birthday, (hank you very much. I fulfilled my contract with honor, without a black mark on my record. I was a soldier on Sept. 11, 2001. I answered the call and I even served in Iraq during the early days of the war. The Army retained me for four months and two days longer than my original four-year enlistment. The argument that I should "go enlist" before I support the Iraq war isn't an argument at all. It's a quick method of diffusing debate.

I'd say that I'm finished debating with liberals, except for the fact that liberals never wanted to debate in the first place. Never again will I allow liberals to play umpire. I won't debate according to their rules one second longer.

Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy@student.umass.edu.

Draw cartoons for the Daily Collegian!

editorial@dailycollegian.com

Dreaming of Osama bin Laden

Parisa Saranj

Recently, Osama b'n Laden has not only been showing up on radical Muslim Web sites or on uploaded videos of some blogs, but also all over the West and in the most intimate of places – people's bedroom.

Pejk Malinovski has produced a half-hour special for the BBC Radio 3 program "Between the Eras" on Nov. 24, 2007. "Dreaming of Osama" presents a sequence of real people's dreams and their manifestations on issues of security. It examines the effects of the "war on terror" on our collective unconscious mind.

Following a dream about bin Laden shortly after moving to New York City in 2002, Malinovski heard that some people have had actual dreams about Osama bin Laden, too. Therefore, he started to find and record dreams about bin Laden. He writes, "I was curious to find out what kind of portrait would appear if I brought these shards of nightly visions together."

"Osama bin [sic] Laden has a way of lying low, just long enough for you to almost forget about him," adds Malinovski. "And then when you do, he makes an unwanted reappearance."

To his surprise, the appearance of such a horrifying creature in most of the dreamers was a lot less fearful and evil than the governments depict him. Malinovski also claims that many of the dreams were mundane and intimate encounters. According to him, one individual dreamed that he was a sandwich shop owner. Osama bin Laden, one of his dream employees, kept going to work late and never called in sick. The shop owner couldn't maintain his business with such employees. Eventually, he fired him.

At the same time, Malinovski raises the issue of "absolute evil" by examining another dream in which a man is hunting for bin Laden on a safari in Kenya. "Surrounded by bloodthirsty pensioners, he grapples with the fact that he is actually bin Laden's lawyer, and client confidentiality prevents him from revealing his whereabouts," he explains.

Further, Osama bin Laden appears to lead an ordinary life where in he takes the train or shops at Kmart. In this case he even offers to pay for a dreamer who had previously helped him shave, change his look and get dressed.

According to Malinovski, such dreams express a need to re-humanize this "creature." He finds it very difficult and complicating to accept the concept of "absolute evil." He also believes that "war on terror" is a notion created by various linguistic absurdities and rhetorical acrobatics.

For his purpose, he interviewed Dr. Rajenda Persaud, a London-based psychiatrist. According to Dr. Persaud, for thousands of years prior to the 20th century, humans have always believed that enemy is a saber tooth tiger-looking creature that simply cannot be one of them.

Bin Laden is not the monster outside of the village. He is sitting somewhere next to us, around the fire.

"Thinking of this in psycho-analytical terms, Bin Laden is the monster lurking at the edge of the village," said Persaud.

Malinovski might be suggesting that Osama is not as bad as he looks or that the "war on terror" is not as scary as it sounds. However, I believe that once people are tied firmly to black-and-white thinking in which there are only a very bad and very good side, they won't be able to see any other options or sides.

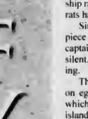
There is no doubt that Osama bin Laden belongs to one of the most dangerous radical and fundamental religious belief systems – which solely represents a small minority of individuals. Yet, I wonder if the notion of the "war on terror" also is part of a bigger picture. Do we need to look at this notion as a black-and-white image or a multi-faceted one?

"As we were huddled together around the campfire in the village, worrying about what lurked outside, the enemy at the gate helped to define us," Dr. Persaud concluded. Yet, the problem is that bin Laden is not the monster outside of the village. He is sitting somewhere next to us, around the fire. Then how does this help us define ourselves? Like the dreams that make him and people like him somewhat human and negotiable, our definitions should be more precise and pliable.

I believe that words and their definitions can easily deceive us. We must be exceptionally cautious of what is being done on behalf of these definitions. For example, thousands of people in the United States and around the world have been detained under the rubric of a "war on terror."

According to Amnesty International, "Many are being held without charge or trial in violation of fundamental due process rights while others are being rendered to countries who engage in torture." I cannot conduct a certain statement based on the somewhat comical idea of "dreaming of Osama bin Laden," yet I can note that even in the midst of a very sensitive and black-and-white subject – which seems to have no other alternative – we can always find questionable assumptions.

Once again, I must declare that raising such questions is not to doubt the state of well-known, perilous and corrupted individuals or organizations such as bin Laden. Rather, such questions help us to expand our understanding of the constant images, characterization and justifications we are fed.



Parisa Saranj is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at psaranj@student.umass.edu.

Has this man been in your dreams? You're not alone.

COURTESY BBC

The 'new' Guiliani: an ugly transformation

Dan Nicastro

For the past year, the presidential candidates have all been lumped together within the same amorphous blob, making it hard for the voters to really differentiate between the presidential hopefuls. Slowly, candidates have started to break off and craft their own personalities and display their own platforms. This provides many candidates a chance to separate themselves from the fray and let the American people really get to know them and their policies before November 2008. This move, however, may backfire for some candidates, as they may be better off being perceived as aloof, single-issue figures. Most notably, this affects former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Up to this point in the campaign, Giuliani has run on the platform of "I was mayor of New York on Sept. 11, 2001." Instead of focusing on his record in pre-9/11 New York City, Giuliani has pointed to his calm composure in the face of the most horrific attack in the history of this country. While his campaign "platform" verged on annoying, its lack of substance was mostly harmless and could be very easily lampooned. Giuliani may have been using one of the most terrible tragedies in our nation's history for personal political gain, but at least he consistently stayed on message.

This lack of substance, however, is changing. As the primaries are fast approaching, Giuliani has slowly revealed to the American public that his platform consists of more than just his physical presence in New York City on 9/11. Unfortunately for Giuliani, and perhaps the American people, these revelations are shocking and deeply disturbing.

As mayor of New York, Giuliani was pro-choice, pro-gun control and pro-gay marriage, stances which have contributed to his image as "too liberal." Apparently, Giuliani believes that the best way to shed this image is to appoint the most conservative advisors he can possibly find.

First, there's Norman Podhoretz, a member of Giuliani's foreign policy team. Podhoretz is considered the "godfather" of neo-conservativism in America and the comments he has made reflect this. Speaking about the war on terror, he commented that the war in Iraq is "only the second front to have opened [in the war on terror] the second scene, so to speak, of the first act of a five-act play." In order to expand the war on terror, Podhoretz advocates the pre-emptive bombing of Iran and has already stated that "none of the alternatives to military action – negotiations, sanctions, provoking an internal insurrection – can possibly work."

Unfortunately for Giuliani, and perhaps the American people, these revelations are shocking and deeply disturbing.

Aside from Podhoretz, Giuliani has also added Daniel Pipes to his foreign policy team. Pipes is infamous for his comments regarding Muslims, including his statement that burqas and niqabs should be banned in all public places because "anyone might lurk under those shrouds... with who knows what evil purposes." The racial profiling does not end there, as Pipes has also commented that Muslim government officials and employees "need to be watched for connections to terrorism." Sounds like a hang-up group of militaristic, racist advisors Rudy has assembled.

In addition to these neoconservative advisors, Giuliani's policy positions on a wide range of issues are just as terrifying. In terms of the war on terror, Giuliani has agreed with Podhoretz in thinking that Iran needs to be preempted. To attaining a nuclear program, even advocating the use of military force. Giuliani has also mirrored the Bush administration's refusal to characterize waterboarding, which simulates drowning, as torture.

We also seem to forget that there was a Rudy Giuliani who existed before Sept. 11, 2001. That Rudy Giuliani was not held in as high esteem for his leadership skills. As former New York Mayor Ed Koch, a two-time Giuliani supporter, remarked, "I honestly believe that on 9/10 he couldn't have been elected dogcatcher." Giuliani did several things during his tenure as mayor which can be characterized as less than stellar. Among other things, Giuliani threatened to pull funding from the Brooklyn Museum of Art because of a controversial piece displayed in the museum's collection, routinely insulted his political opponents and even tried to open homeless shelters in the districts of Council members who voted against him.

By riding the coattails of 9/11, Giuliani has managed to sweep these incidents (and the many, many more like them) under the rug. He has also used this tragedy to fend off any real criticism about both his choice of advisors and his newly found neoconservative slant. This, however, is changing. For voters, it's a good thing that America will soon discover that there is more to Rudy Giuliani than just Sept. 11. I just hope America sees him for what he really is, an absolutely terrifying candidate.

Dan Nicastro is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dnicastro@student.umass.edu.

Lumet returns to top form with latest film

Phillip Seymour Hoffman and Ethan Hawke co-star in "Before the Devil Knows You're Dead." Prior to winning an Oscar for his performance in "Capote," Hoffman was known more for his supporting roles.

Creative sequences make unique plot twists

By Kevin Koczwara
Collegian Staff

Sidney Lumet set a high bar for himself when he was a young, up-and-coming director with his debut "12 Angry Men." He followed up with some more American classics like "Serpico," "Murderer on the Orient Express," "Dog Day Afternoon," "Network," and "The Verdict," but he also put out some bad movies – like "Guilty as Sin," to name one. "Before the Devil Knows You're Dead" would fall under one of his classics.

A few years back, a movie starring Phillip Seymour Hoffman would be rare and may not have sold even though he was a superb leading actor. "Love Liza" was a breakout role for him as a lead actor and it was relatively unknown. But after Hoffman's Oscar winning performance in "Capote", his name has become better known. He has become more than a character actor which he used to be in movies like "Magnolia" and "Boogie Nights." Hoffman shines again on the screen, stealing all the attention.

Hoffman is one of two struggling brothers, the other being the insecure Ethan Hawke. Hoffman is the older and therefore wiser of the two. He is higher up on the economic ladder, but his drug habits and lifestyle weigh heavy on his wallet. He is out of touch with his beautiful, and nearly always naked, wife played by Marissa Tomei.

While Hawke and Tomei have an affair right underneath Hoffman's character's nose routinely on Thursdays, Hawke is struggling with his own demons. He is struggling at work and with his family life. He is recently divorced with a daughter whose child care he cannot afford and who he disappoints at every opportunity. He is the weaker of the two brothers and is easily persuaded by Hoffman when the time arises for a heist of a suburban mom-and-pop jewelry store.

Hoffman's character convinces Hawke to leave the city and rob a small-time jewelry store in a mall. The shop is owned by their very own parents. The plan is perfect. They know the combination to the safe, all of the security devices, and it is far enough away from the city to not bring in any suspicion of their being a part of the heist.

The plan goes all wrong when Hawke invites along an experienced crook to do the actual robbing while he is the getaway driver. The worker on duty gets a hold of a gun and the crook hired by Hawke and as a result the old lady working is killed.

The movie's plot is simple: two brothers need money and will do anything for it. One brother is self-centered and oblivious to the world around him (Hoffman); the other is sensitive and has a string of bad luck (Hawke).

However, the narrative style of the movie is not so simple: a jumbled, cut-and-paste mess of time jumps and insight into each character. The movie has a beginning and an end, and the two of them are at the beginning and the end. The middle part is what's jumbled.

The story revolves mainly around Hoffman and Hawke but also includes segments into Tomei's life as the wife forgotten by one brother and loved by the other.

There is also insight into the two brother's father, played by Albert Finney. Finney's character watches his family implode and tries to stop it. Finney is also the one who closes out the movie with a surprise, dark and depressing ending.

The major flaw with his character is that we don't get to see inside of him and never understand the past history of the family. It's not his fault, but rather one of time restrictions in a movie.

The movie is enjoyable but not one to see unless you are all for a movie that can put a damper one's day. It is beautifully acted and well shot and directed. The time jumps can be overbearing at times with the cutting process and a noise that signals the jump as images flash from one scene to the next when a character's story is being resumed. The script could have been stronger, but its bare bones of it also allows the movie to flow like a movie and not become preachy or too in-depth.

Lumet will be remembered for his early classics and later faults, but "Before the Devil Knows Your Dead" is definitely an achievement in directing for the old-timer.

Kevin Koczwara can be reached at kkoczwar@student.umass.edu

BEFORE THE DEVIL KNOWS YOU'RE DEAD

DIRECTED BY SIDNEY LUMET

STARRING ETHAN HAWKE AND PHILIP SEYMOUR HOFFMAN

A-

Ethan Hawke's character is having an affair with Marissa Tomei, despite the fact that she is married to Phillip Seymour Hoffman's character.

Irwin tells all in book

Widow opens up about life with crocodile hunter husband

By Steve Siegel
The Maneuvering Cat

The late Steve Irwin, Australian wildlife expert and TV personality better known as "The Crocodile Hunter," was one tough mate. He captured crocs by hand, diving into reptile-infested waters, wrapping his body around a thrashing creature and hauling it into his dinghy. He didn't want to eat it, he wanted to help it survive.

He shared his daredevil antics and passion for preservation with the world through his television program "The Crocodile Hunter," co-hosted by his American-born wife, Terri.

He died in September 2006 at age 44 from a stingray barb that pierced his chest during the filming of an episode for the Discovery Channel's "Ocean's Most Deadliest."

Now, a year later, Terri carries on his message, with the couple's 9-year-old daughter Bindi (named after a large female croc at the Irwin's Australia Zoo) and 4-year-old son Robert. Bindi has a show and Terri has written a book, "Steve and Me," as a tribute to her husband. It's both a real-life adventure story and a celebration of Steve's life and the family's dedication to education and wildlife protection.

Irwin could not have found a more perfect soul mate than Terri Raines, a wildlife conservationist from Eugene, Ore., who would walk her pet cougar, Malina, on the beach on a 30-foot leash and who had established a cougar rehabilitation center in her backyard. Terri met Steve in Australia in 1991 while on vacation at the Australia Zoo, which Irwin's family owned and where he gave lectures about crocodiles while bravely handling them.

They married eight months after meeting and appropriately opted to go crocodile hunting for their honeymoon, inviting a camera crew along to film the expedition. The film later became the first episode of "The Crocodile Hunter." In 2002 Steve and Terri played themselves in the movie "The Crocodile Hunter: Collision Course," a fictional tale about wildlife conservationists battling crocs and rogue CIA agents to retrieve a fallen satellite.

Terri discussed Steve, her book, and her naturalist work in a telephone interview from New York City, where she was starting the book's East Coast promotional tour.

Question: What prompted you to write the book?

Answer: Soon after losing Steve I did an interview with Barbara Walters, and afterwards people would come up to me and thank me for doing it, that it really helped them. It made me understand that I wasn't the only person grieving. I thought if I could write a book and help other people honor Steve's legacy and get a good conservation message across then perhaps I would have achieved something worthwhile.

Q: What is the reaction to it so far?

A: Well, people didn't expect anything could surprise them after knowing Steve from 14 years of television work, but the personal aspects of our life, how we met, who he was, being a parent is something they hadn't known and really appreciated hearing about.

Q: In spite of his Hollywood smile and great camera presence, would you say he was really more of a loner?

A: Very much so. He treasured his time in the bush and his country. He was very much a family person with just a few close friends. We didn't go to a lot of parties or have weekends out. He was determined that wherever life took him he would stay in Australia. Outback Australia is a lonely, introspective place and I've come to understand why he loved it so much.

Q: You two were really kindred spirits, weren't you?

A: I was amazed by how much we connected. In fact, my family and close friends would probably agree that if I hadn't met Steve, I probably wouldn't have gotten married. We were very blessed to have met, and it's interesting we had such parallel lives at opposite ends of the world. My message to people is, if you see a magical opportunity, take it. Don't be afraid to seize the chance and run with it.

Q: You spent your honeymoon filming a crocodile documentary, but that was not your original plan?

A: Originally we were going to see the U.S. because the wildlife here is so dramatic, especially in places like Montana or near the Canadian border. We were just going to take off and disappear. But Steve's friend John Stainton got word that a big croc had been frequenting areas too close to civilization, and had to be relocated. What we ended up doing was exciting and I'm glad we did it, but it was challenging going on honeymoon with a film crew, trying to find those romantic moments. But we did.

Q: Throughout the book you mention Steve's premonition of an early death.

A: That was so much part of the fabric of who Steve was that it wasn't disconcerting or surprising. It wasn't morbid, just a bit eerie. He was very matter-of-fact about it and very concerned about living his life to the fullest. Although he spoke often about it making me promise I'd take care of the zoo, and things like that it was still a tremendous shock when we lost him. But I feel there is a destiny to our lives, a reason for being here. It's increased my faith and my desire to make my life count.

Q: I understand he had an unusual ability to predict animal behavior, such as telling a camera crew they would see the snakes they were looking for at 7:30 the next morning, and sure enough they did.

A: He was very strange in that way he had a real sixth sense with wildlife. It wasn't that he could approach any animal. What was bizarre was that animals would approach him. He was also an amazing judge of people, very intuitive, and could read people so quickly.

Q: I have read about the controversy regarding an episode where he was holding his infant son in one arm while feeding a crocodile with the other. What do you think started it all?

A: I don't understand that one myself, especially since we were sharing so much of our lives with Bindi in the exact same manner, and there were no repercussions. In fact, people found it endearing that the children grew up in a wildlife atmosphere and that we shared things with them and loved them.

Q: Is Bindi following in her father's footsteps?

A: Since she was a little girl she's said she wanted to be just like her daddy, just like Steve wanted so much to follow in his father's footsteps. My son is much like that as well, but is more hands-on.

Steve Irwin's widow Terri has authored a new book about her relationship with the late crocodile hunter. They were married for 15 years before Steve was killed in an accident in September 2006.

Sophomore forward Bryan Hogan leads the Minutemen into the second-round NCAA playoff game against the Eagles tonight. Hogan paces the team with five goals scored this season.

Maroon and White hoping to extend successful season

MELONI from page 8

Against teams similarly talented to the Eagles, UMass was 2-1 this season and all three of those games were away from Rudd Field. The two victories included a 1-0 win at then-No. 12 Saint Louis on Oct. 28. In that game, the Minutemen got a goal from sophomore Mark DeSantis early in the second half and immediately kicked into bend but don't break mode.

A similar formula may lead the Minutemen to victory tonight. And if it does, the win will inevitably be described as another of the sport's fickle nature. The only certainty about a potential UMass win is that, if it does happen, it will be done as team.

"We have to keep working hard for each other. A game like [tonight's] isn't going to be won on an individual effort. We have to fight for and win every ball because that's all you can do against a team like BC," said sophomore forward Bryan Hogan. "We're not just going to walk out there and get lucky and beat a team like them. It takes a lot more than that."

Beating the Eagles may take a little luck on the side of UMass, but it's certainly not to be relied upon. A team like BC can create offense whenever its needs to, and the Minutemen will have to be prepared to defend as well as they have all season. The Eagles average nearly two goals per game. Remember, this is soccer. Two-goals is almost always enough to earn a victory.

"I know [BC] is good. You don't become the No. 1 team in the country without having a good offense," Simmons said. "They're going to have skilled players and they're going to create chance and they're going to finish well. We need to defend like animals."

His three years of experience in Division I soccer gives Simmons the proper prospective he needs to lead his team into Boston and over the Eagles on Wednesday. Whether or not the Minutemen win tomorrow, 2007 will be remembered as a success. That is, of course, to everyone but the Minutemen.

Joe Meloni is a Collegian editor. He can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu

Looking to continue success on the pitch

SOCCER from page 1

Regardless of what the Eagles might throw at UMass on the offensive end, Koch knows that his team needs to continue what it's been doing well throughout the season and not make any radical strategic changes.

"We're at a point now where you just have to polish a few things," Koch said. "We can't really add anything major because we just don't have enough time to work on them."

By virtue of being an AC member, the Eagles have played a tougher overall schedule than UMass. But with victories at Saint Louis and Dartmouth, the Minutemen showed that they are capable of defeating talented teams.

"We probably can't [defeat top-ranked teams] day in and day out like maybe they've been able to, but we certainly can on a given day," Koch said.

Even though the Minutemen are the decided underdogs in this match, sophomore forward Bryan Hogan admits that the team tends to enjoy more success from this perspective.

"Sometimes I think our team gets overconfident when we're supposed to win games," Hogan said. "I think this role fits our team pretty well – we like coming into games like this."

The Minntemen are coming off their 2-0 win over BU where UMass dominated the first half – in a game where they weren't the underdog. Regardless, the team's offense had success creating offense against the Terriers and held BU shotless in the first half.

"We've been having success going out wide and having balls crossed in," Hogan said. "We've been scoring on [those plays] and I think we can continue to do it. Any chances we get, we just have to take advantage of. It doesn't matter to me how we create [our goals]; when it comes time, hopefully we can put them in."

Even with the success the Minutemen enjoyed against BU, redshirt junior captain Zack Simmons knows there's room for improvement in the second round. "I think we need to handle pressure a little better and not give up so many opportunities," Simmons said. "You never know when you're going to be back here, so you have to take advantage of the opportunity to do it when you're here – that's just what we have to convey to the other guys."

Despite the fact that BC and UMass play a non-conference schedule laden with programs from the Northeast, the teams last met in 1988. In fact, this match is first chance for Koch to face the Eagles since the start of his time in Amherst. Koch was an assistant at BC for three seasons in the 1980s.

If the analysis of common opponents is any indication of a match's outcome, things do not look good for UMass. The same Maine team that defeated the Minutemen 1-0 in overtime in the first game of the season fell to BC 8-0 only a few weeks later.

"Obviously that gives you an idea of where they are," Koch said.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Flynn, Green lead freshmen

FRESHMEN from page 8

At Syracuse, Flynn and Green are expected to be major contributors the moment the season tips off. Meanwhile on the UMass campus, freshman players like Matt Hill, Papu Lo and Trey Lang will be moved along slowly, sitting on the bench and learning from veterans like Gary Forbes and Dante Milligan.

"If they're ready to play, throwing them under the fire is the best way to do it," UMass coach Travis Ford said, regarding how he prefers to handle his freshman players. "But if they're not ready, they can lose some confidence early. It depends on where they're at in their development, physically and mentally."

This season Ford has brought in seven freshmen to the program. Of those seven, only three – backup point guard Gary Correia and reserve guards Matt Glass and Max Groebe – will likely see any substantial minutes.

Through five games, Correia leads the freshman crop with just over 18 minutes per game. Groebe has averaged 12 minutes per night, coming in when the team needs a spark from 3-point range. Glass gets almost seven minutes a game, while the other four – including Sedale Jones – have combined for only 18 minutes of game action this season.

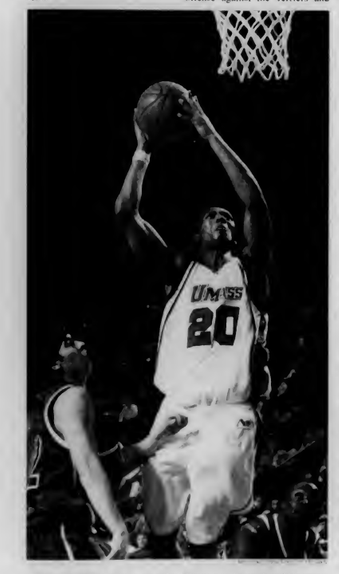
"A lot of kids who are freshman haven't grasped the system yet, so it's very difficult to put them in there for significant-type minutes," Ford said. "But if they understand the system and they're just not physically ready, you can throw them out there and get them ready."

That's precisely what Bocheim did with his duo of Green and Flynn, and with the way they have performed thus far, it appears both are more than ready – physically and mentally – to handle the responsibility.

A 6-foot-9, 225-pound forward, Green has the versatility to dominate the game from anywhere on the floor. He's a solid outside shooter (38.7 percent from 3-point range) and can post up, rebound and block shots. He leads the team in scoring (20.6 per game), rebounding (8.8) and blocked shots (2.6), not bad for a freshman with five games under his belt.

The coaching staff for the Orange must smile every day in practice, because Green may not even be the best freshman on the team. Flynn has thrived, leading the offense at the point guard spot, mixing in a good dose of scoring (11), while also focusing on distributing the ball to his teammates. Not only has he averaged 5.8 assists per game, he's done a good job managing the game and limiting turnovers with an impressive 2.42 assist-to-turnover ratio.

Ford is certainly impressed with what he sees out of them.



"They just have extreme talent, first of all. Wow," he said. "Flynn plays at a really high level as far as how fast he is. He's always seem like he's in overdrive. He's running his team extremely well for a freshman.

"Green, for his size, I love the way he plays," he added. "I love big guys who can shoot it. He's 6-foot-9, he can shoot 3-pointers. And he can take you off the dribble, just a very versatile basketball player."

Coaches of mid-major schools would love to have more players that can contribute right away, but developing players slowly for the future isn't such a bad way to go.

It certainly worked for Chris Lowe and the Minutemen.

Eli Rosenzweig can be reached at erosenzw@student.umass.edu

Dante Milligan is fourth on the Minutemen in scoring this season, averaging 8.6 points per game despite starting only two games.

UMass, 'Cuse renew rivalry

M. BASKETBALL from page 8

The Orange has also had its way with Atlantic 10 teams this season. Syracuse defeated Saint Joseph's, 72-69, and Fordham, 80-63, within the past two weeks. Both games were played at the Carrier Dome as the Orange play only one non-conference game outside the state of New York.

Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim prefers a light non-conference schedule as to not wear down his squad before the Big East schedule begins in early January. The Hall of Fame coach is in his 32nd year at SU.

As with the Minutemen, Syracuse qualified for the 2006 NIT, winning two home games before falling at Clemson to end its season.

Having sat out the Wisconsin-Green Bay game with an injury, Ford expects junior point guard Chris Lowe to be back in the lineup this evening.

"Chris is 75 percent; he's not 100 percent, but he's going to play," Ford said.

Lowe is also one of the several returning players from last year's squad that played several games against top competition in hostile environments. The 2006-07 squad played games at Pittsburgh, Louisville and Kentucky – three programs that average more than 10,000 fans per game.

With a capacity of 33,000 fans, the Carrier Dome can give the Orange a decided advantage. Syracuse went 18-4 at home last season and saw crowds greater than 25,000 on four occasions, including a national-high 32,376 in a Big East match against UConn.

Though Ford acknowledges that the experience was helpful in the development of his older players, he is skeptical of the benefit of those games since the Minutemen have a significant number of new faces on this year's roster.

"A lot of these guys are freshmen or didn't see a lot of minutes [in those games last season]," Ford said. "It's a good game to get under our belts in this kind of environment. No matter how it turns out, I think it's good for us."

Even though the two teams have not played since the 1970s, UMass and the Orange have a rich history. From that decade and the postseason. The teams last played during the 1995 Rainbow Classic in Honolulu, Hawaii. The Maroon and White – then the No. 1 ranked team in the nation – knocked off Syracuse, 65-47.

Before that match, the Minutemen defeated SU in the second round of the 1992 NCAA Tournament to qualify for the Sweet 16.

The last time UMass played at Syracuse was the 1974 season. That match – a 76-60 Orange win – was played at Manley Field House in the time predating the Carrier Dome.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

CHECK OUT
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
MULTIMEDIA ARTICLES
www.dailycollegian.com

YES COMPUTERS | In downtown Northampton!
The Valley's Largest Authorized Apple Sales and Service Center
FREE computer diagnostic - $49 Value!
Why choose our service department?
•Highly trained Apple-certified technicians
•Received Apple's highest possible rating for Service Excellence
•Friendly, knowledgeable staff
Present this advertisement to receive free diagnostic.
Yes Computers | 38 Pleasant St. Northampton | 413-585-0007

SPHHS University of Massachusetts Amherst
School of Public Health and Health Sciences
The Department of Public Health cordially invites you to....
AN OPEN HOUSE FOR PROSPECTIVE GRADUATE STUDENTS INTERESTED IN PUBLIC HEALTH
Please join us from 10am – 12 noon
Friday, December 7th
UMASS Campus Center Reading Room
Come meet public health faculty, staff and students from Biostatistics, Epidemiology, Environmental Health Sciences, Community Health Education, and Health Policy & Management.
Learn about the admissions process, financial aid opportunities, and our curriculum.
Please RSVP with Diane Wolf - email: dwolf@schoolph.umass.edu
Visit our website (www.umass.edu/sphhs) to learn more about our degree programs

NOV 28 2007

Vitale, McNeely lead Huskies' resurgence

BC struggles continue in OT, Vermont moves up standings

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Northeastern is nearly two months ahead of last season's pace in the wins column. The No. 16 Huskies have won six games, a feat they didn't accomplish last season until Jan. 26.

The Huskies (6-4-1, 6-3-1 Hockey East) beat No. 19 Boston College (3-4-5, 2-3-4 Hockey East) in overtime Friday night, padding their conference lead to three points. Senior Jimmy Russo scored his first goal of the season with four seconds remaining in the extra period. It was the second overtime goal of his career.

So far in the season, however, Russo's younger teammates are outplaying him. Standout junior forward Joe Vitale has a team-leading 13 points on the season (five goals, eight assists), all of which came in Hockey East play.

Along with Vitale, freshman forward Tyler McNeely has a share of the team lead with five goals. McNeely is tied with three other Huskies for third on the team in points with seven (five goals, two assists).

The Eagles are 1-2-3 at home and have not won since Oct. 26 against Merrimack (6-6-1, 3-6-1 Hockey East).

The win gives Northeastern its first six-game unbeaten streak (5-0-1) since it had the same record during the stretch of Jan. 6-25 in 2002. The Huskies need either a win or a tie in their next three games to match the team's longest unbeaten streak (8-0-1 in 1985-86) since the conference's inception in 1984.

Friday night's victory was NU's second overtime win of the season. Northeastern is 5-1-5 in its last 11 overtime games. Opposing teams scored first in nine of the Huskies' 11 games this year, although NU is 6-3-0 in that situation.

The Huskies have also been effective on the penalty kill this season. NU is second in the league with an 87.5 penalty-kill percentage.

Stumping statistics

There is an odd trend in the Hockey East stat sheet. The team with the player leading the conference in goals, points or assists is in the lower end of the standings.

Senior forward Bryan Ewing of Boston University (4-4-7-2, 3-3-1 Hockey East) leads the conference in points scored with 16 (six goals, 10 assists). However, BU is eighth in conference standings. BU's inability to break a tie after the second period has been its downfall. The Terriers are 0-3-1 when deadlocked going into the final frame.

Three of the four games went into overtime, except for a loss to No. 6 New Hampshire (7-2-1, 4-2-1 Hockey East) in which the Wildcats blew past the Terriers with three scores in the third period.

Sophomore forward Matt Jones of Merrimack (6-6-1, 3-6-1 Hockey East) is the top scorer in Hockey East with nine goals on the season. Yet the Warriors are ninth in the conference behind the Terriers. This year's Merrimack squad demonstrates no ability to pull out a come-from-behind victory. The Warriors are 0-6-1 when trailing after the second period.

BC's Joe Whitney has a conference-leading 12 assists this season but the Eagles are only sixth in the conference. The only reason BC is so high in the conference is because of four ties. With one more tie, the Eagles would equal their combined in-conference wins and losses total.

Back to basics

In Friday night's loss to the Huskies, BC played in its sixth overtime of the season, half of the number of games its played this season. The Eagles are 0-4-2 this season when games are decided in extra frames. The standings don't show how sound BC is in executing the fundamentals of hockey.

Against Northeastern, two of the Eagle's three goals came on power plays. BC's 25 percent efficiency on the man advantage ranks second in the conference and tied for third in the nation. The Eagles have scored at least one power-play goal in 10 of their 12 games this season.

Four of the team's power-play goals were scored by sophomore forward Ben Smith. Smith is second on the team with 13 points scored, including a team-leading six goals. Smith is tied with Whitney for first in the conference with eight power-play points. Smith and Whitney are two of the four Eagles sitting atop the conference in this category.

BC freshmen are demonstrating equal proficiency in basic principles of the game as well. Whitney recorded his team-leading 12th assist of the season Friday night; Whitney is also tied for first in the nation in assists per game, with 1.00. Whitney's 1.25 points per game ranks him third nationally among all rookies.

Cat scratch fever

Vermont (3-5-2, 3-2-2 Hockey East) boasts a three-game unbeaten streak (2-0-1), in which UVM tallied 14 scores. The last time the Catamounts accomplished this feat during a three-game unbeaten streak was in 2004. Two different lines have totals of 20 points or more for Vermont this season.

Along with sophomore forward Colin Vock, junior frontliners Dean Strong and Corey Carlson have a combined 26 points when the trio are on the same line.

Sophomore forwards Brayden Irwin and Viktor Stalberg, alongside junior forward Peter Lenes, have totaled 23 points as a line.

Together, these two lines account for 72 percent of UVM's point total on the season.

Statistically, no single Catamount ranks higher than 11th in any of the three major scoring categories – points, goals or assists – but UVM manages to stay among the conference's best because of consistent team play. While Lenes leads the team in goals (four) and points (nine), Strong narrowly leads the team in assists, with seven. The Catamounts know how to spread the puck around as well. Five UVM skaters have at least five assists this season.

Odds favor Vermont when the Catamounts are ahead after two periods. UVM is undefeated in that scenario (3-0-1) this season … Providence (3-6-2, 3-3-2 Hockey East) junior forward Pierce Norton is on a five-game point streak (five goals, two assists) … UMass Lowell (4-3-4, 2-3-4 Hockey East) handed Providence its first shutout of the season, beating the Warriors 3-0 … Merrimack has outscored its opponents 13-6 in the third period this season … The BC penalty kill allowed two goals against Northeastern last weekend, the first time this season for the Eagles … Terrier senior forward Pete MacArthur became the 56th player in BU history to net his 50th goal. The milestone came in the form of a game-winner on Saturday against Cornell … Maine (4-6-2, 2-4-2 Hockey East) netted a season-high five goals Sunday against Vermont on Sunday … Riverhawk junior forward Mark Roebothan achieved his first career hat trick in UML's 6-2 win over Merrimack on Saturday.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

HOCKEY EAST STANDINGS

	Hockey East				Overall
Team	W	L	T	Pts.	W	L	T
1 Northeastern	6	3	1	13	6	4	1
2 Massachusetts	3	2	4	10	6	3	4
3 New Hampshire	4	2	1	9	7	2	1
4 Vermont	3	2	2	8	3	5	2
Providence	3	3	2	8	3	6	2
Boston College	2	3	4	8	3	4	5
UMass Lowell	2	3	4	8	4	3	4
8 Boston University	3	3	1	7	4	7	2
Merrimack	3	6	1	7	6	6	1
10 Maine	2	4	2	6	4	6	2

One of the leaders of the 2007 resurgence of Northeastern hockey, junior forward Joe Vitale leads the team with five goals and eight assists.

UMass looking to rebound

W BASKETBALL from page 8

mark. A guard, Raffo's role is to shoot the ball and she needs to be heavily covered, according to Dacko.

She also mentioned that BU's offense is a very generous one.

"They share the basketball. They make the extra pass and they're all excellent shooters," Dacko said. "Everyone shoots over 71 percent from the floor and they're 37 percent from the [3-point line]. They're a very balanced team. They run some of our offenses and we've got to be able to play them hard."

Defensively, the terriers give teams several different looks. They use 3-2, 2-3 defenses, as well as a defense similar to the 2-on-1. Dacko suspects they will put a lot of pressure on junior guard Sakera Young as she brings the ball up the court and double-team seniors Kate Mills and Whitney McDonald in the post.

No matter how thorough a coach's scouting is, however, whether the game becomes a 'W' depends on how a team performs when it's game time.

Despite the weekend's pair of losses, Mills went 14-of-25 (for 35 points) from the field, 10 rebounds and four shots blocked. She led the Minutewomen in points both games. Dacko said the weekend (especially Saturday) was sub-par for Mills and she would like to see improvement today.

"I want her to shoot the ball [more]. I'd like her to get more rebounds, I'd like her to take some charges and I'd like her to really take control defensively, run the team defensively," Dacko said. "Not even make a lot of shots on offense. I want her to take a lot of shots. Many, more than she's been taking."

Mills understands and agrees with her coach.

"We have to use the tournament games as a learning tool," said Mills. "We know we made mistakes and we just have to see how we can respond to it. That's the most important. I think we'll definitely rebound. We have a lot of leadership and that'll just enable us to move on and push us in the right direction."

Guard Pam Rosanio also had solid performances this weekend and Mills' 13 points Saturday. She finished the weekend 10-of-17, for 33 points. In Saturday's game against East Carolina, the senior was struck in the face and has since been practicing with a protective facemask. She said it will not keep her out of today's game, however.

"We know what we have to do [today]," said Rosanio. "We don't even want to remember [last] weekend. It's a brand-new start. We're going on a brand-new roll, so hopefully we can do that with [BU]."

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Freshman guard O.J. Mayo leads USC in scoring with 21.8 points per game. The Trojans have just one loss this season in six games.

Mayo shines, USC tops No. 18 Salukis

TOP 25 from page 8

Early in the game, Yale capitalized on the long ball, tying the game at 17. But UCLA went on a 16-1 run and led at halftime, 33-18.

This was only the second meeting between the two teams, and the first since 1963, a game which the Bruins won by 30 points.

Wolfpack win big

North Carolina State upset 19th-ranked Villanova Sunday in the Old Spice Classic Championship, 69-61.

Senior forward Gavin Grant hit 2-of-3 free throws with 0.4 seconds left, as the Wolfpack improved to 4-1. Grant had eight rebounds and 15 points, along with two steals.

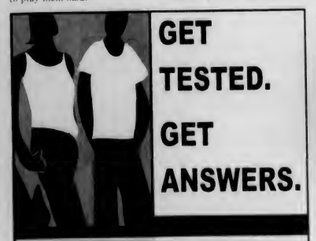
Junior forward Dante Cunningham tipped in a missed lay-up with 2.2 seconds remaining for N.C. State, but fouled Grant, who was coming down the court and threw up a 3-point attempt. Grant missed the first free throw, but made the last two, securing the victory for the Wolfpack.

Junior guard Courtney Fells had 21 points, on 6-of-9 shooting, while freshman J.J. Hickson also had 15 points off the bench.

Villanova kept the game tight with a stellar performance from freshmen Corey Fisher, who had 21 points along with three steals. The Wildcats (4-1) full-court press was successful, resulting in 22 turnovers, 16 of them in the first half. There were six ties along with 18 lead-changes throughout the game.

USC defeats Salukis

Southern California defeated No.18 Southern Illinois, 70-45, Sunday in the championship game of the inaugural Anaheim Classic.



Freshman O.J. Mayo, named the most outstanding player in the event, came off the bench for the Trojans (5-1), along with sophomore forward Taj Gibson. Another freshman, forward Davon Jefferson led USC with 18 points and made 8-of-11 free throws. Mayo had 13 points while Gibson had 10 points and nine rebounds.

Sophomore guard Daniel Hackett had 10 assists, while fellow sophomore guard Dwight Lewis had 14 points. Mayo had double figures for the sixth time this season, the most by a USC freshman since the 1985-86 season.

It was a poor performance for SIU (3-1), who couldn't hit shots and ran in to foul trouble in the second half. Senior forward Randal Falker had 17 points and 12 rebounds.

USC, who doesn't have a senior on its roster, will be challenged in its next three games against Oklahoma, No. 3 Memphis and fourth-ranked Kansas.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

GET TESTED. GET ANSWERS.

Tapestry Health provides confidential, affordable care, including:
HIV Rapid Testing
Birth Control
Pregnancy Testing
Emergency Contraception (EC)
HPV Vaccinations
STD Screening & Treatment
GYN & Breast Exams
WALK-INS WELCOME

In recognition of World AIDS DAY, Tapestry Health will be providing FREE Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c), Nov 30th

Call or stop into one of our 15 Sites Across western Mass

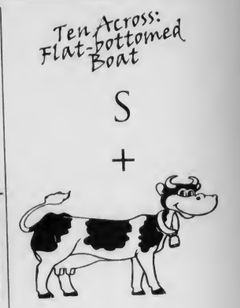
MassHealth and most insurances accepted. If you are not insured, fees are based on a sliding scale

TAPESTRYhealth CARE WITHIN REACH 413-586-2016 800-696-7752 www.tapestryhealth.org

FULFILL YOUR DREAMS!!
WRITE FOR
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
Email: news@dailycollegian

FRUSTRATED? PUZZLED? DO YOU HAVE:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Seven O's
EVERY WEDNESDAY
KARAOKE
LIVE BAND
SATURDAY, 12/01/07
FOUR ON THE FLOOR
LOOKING FOR EXPOSURE? STUDENT BANDS WELCOME TO PLAY AT SEVEN O'S
LOOKING FOR A PLACE TO HAVE A PRIVATE EVENT/PARTY?
CALL 413-530-6996
ROUTE 116, 330 AMHERST RD SUNDERLAND, MA 01375 (413) 665-6798
3 PM TO 1 AM M-F
1 PM TO 1 AM SAT-SUN
NEXT TO CUSTOMS, AP'13.



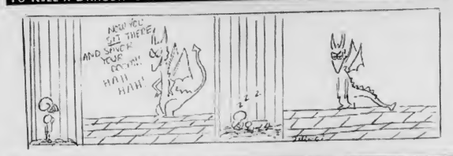
Bon chance.

5		4			6	1	3
			2					9
	9	3		8
6	3		8			5
			3
	9		5			7	3
		1		2	5
4			6
	6	1	5			3		8

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ACROSS
1 Dispatch biblical style
6 Health resorts
10 Flat-bottomed boat
14 Jeweler's weight unit
15 Greek letter
16 Zhivago's love
17 Playing marble
18 Lascivious look
19 Teheran's place
20 Rough up
22 Mesh
24 Son of Seth
25 Unnamed folk
26 Boat to the finish
29 Finances
30 Harden
31 Uses a crowbar
32 Eastern cape
35 Set the pace
36 Throws in the towel
37 Smarting
38 CIA predecessor
39 Sand hills
40 Wild
41 Ticket specifics
42 Control
43 Ones at the plate
46 Olden days
47 Vacation spot
48 Latch
52 Algerian seaport
53 Send out
55 Latin American January
56 Wear down
57 Shoot
58 Odor
59 British pianist Myra
60 Match components
61 To the point

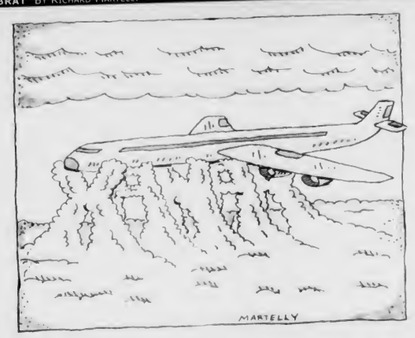
DOWN
1 Sling
2 Creche inventory
3 Romeo and Levin
4 In shreds
5 Forever
6 Moer Marner
7 Pound or Frost
8 Had a bite
9 Tightly packed fish
10 Primitive weapons
11 Christmas song
12 Speux pompously
13 Tapers off
21 Long time
23 Extremes
25 Hearts and diamonds
26 Norway's largest city
27 Shoshones
28 Afternoon affairs
29 Sautes
31 Football kicks
32 Twine
33 Dental exam?
34 Mark for removal
36 Places to live in
37 Time in verse
39 Forest dwellers
40 Race winner
41 Flocks
42 Possesses
43 Clear soup
44 Eagle's nest
45 Former Russian rulers
46 Nuggets
48 Pugilist's weapon
49 Poetic contraction
50 Sea eagles
51 Memory method
54 A Stooge



QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Desperation is a necessary ingredient to learning anything, or creating anything. Period. If you ain't desperate at some point, you ain't interesting."

-Jim Carrey



To Kill a Dragon By Jen Fill

Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

Labrat By Richard Martelly

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes begin January 2nd
Hibernating this winter?
Get credit without leaving your room!
REGISTER NOW
www.UMassULearn.net

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Like an infectious weed, possibly a dandelion, you can grow and thrive in almost any environment.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
The classroom is a war zone filled with intellectual crossfire. Don't be afraid to get caught up in it. CROSSFIRE!

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Grab a fire extinguisher off the wall in your dorm and spray the next person who walks by, then run away screaming "Fire!"

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
The magic number is 27. That's privileged information; use it as you will.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Hand out pastel-colored money and deliver get out of jail free cards to the UMPD while dressed as the Monopoly guy.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Miss Piggy should just give it up. She could never actually fornicate with Kermit the Frog.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You need to get more sleep – you are starting to look like a hagfish.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Your kindness can be a hindrance to your success. Play nice, but don't be afraid to unleash the beast within.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Doctor Octopus was not actually an evil super-villain – he just wanted to be able to multitask more effectively.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Write a strongly-worded letter asking Dashboard Confessional to stop whining.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Spend at least two hours today trying to determine the gender and sexual orientation of Winnie the Pooh characters.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
At some point everyone will feel like damaged goods. All that matters is that you find a lover with a lenient return policy.

KISS ME, I'M COMICS.

comics@dailycollegian.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing. 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY 1 Bdrm New Carpet/Paint-mlalli@student.umass.edu for info.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101

SERVICES

Get The Care You Need TAPESTRY HEALTH Safe. Confidential. Affordable. Providing birthcontrol, EC, pregnancy testing, GYN & breast exams, HIV counseling & rapid testing, STI screening & treatment. Located at 27 Pray Street, Amherst. Call 413-548-9992. Walk-ins welcome. www.taperstryhealth.org

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations. 800-648-4849/ www.ststravel.com.

NOV 28 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSWEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 2007 | SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

NOV 29 2007

Carrier Dome collision

UMass faces Syracuse at fabled N.Y. venue

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

It's certainly not the first time the two teams have crossed paths. But for the Massachusetts men's basketball team, tonight's game against Syracuse will be the first opportunity for the Minutemen to play in the Carrier Dome.

UMass (4-1) is coming off an 11-day layoff, having played its last game on Nov. 17 against Wisconsin-Green Bay after starting the season with a five-game in nine-days stretch.

While allowing his team to recuperate after its demanding start to the season, UMass coach Travis Ford used the unusually long layoff to his players' advantage.

"We've tried to work on our mentality as a basketball team as far as how we want," Ford said. "Even though we're averaging almost 90 points per game, we're still not playing with the aggressiveness for 40 minutes to match our philosophy."

Ford also focused on implementing additional offense plays and defenses as his players have become comfortable with his up-tempo style.

"We really didn't put in as many offenses and defenses as I wanted to because we were still focusing on some system type things," Ford said. "We're still trying to define guys' roles and things like that."

Meanwhile the Orange (4-1) played several high-profile games within the last week. The team fell to defending national finalist Ohio State in the semifinals of the NIT Season Tip-Off at Madison Square Garden one week ago, and battled back to win the third-place game against Washington last Friday, 91-85.

With the loss to Ohio State, Syracuse fell out of both national Top 25 polls.

See M. BASKETBALL on page 5

MICHAEL FISCHER/COLLEGIAN

Senior forward Gary Forbes and the Minutemen will play at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y., for the first time in school history tonight. Both teams enter the game with a 4-1 record.

Different roles for freshmen at programs

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Incoming freshman basketball stars used to have time. They had time to learn from the upperclassmen, mature and improve the physical and mental aspects of their game.

But "The Times They Are a-Changin." With million-dollar contracts awaiting at the next level and agents and scouts filling their heads with grandeur, players are ditching campus life for more a lucrative one as an NBA player. You just don't see star players staying in school all four years anymore.

It's particularly uncommon at big-time basketball programs like Duke, North Carolina and Syracuse, the latter of which will host the Massachusetts men's basketball team tonight at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y.

As usual, SU coach Jim Boeheim features some of the top young talent in the country on his roster. In 2002-03 it was Gerry McNamara and Carmelo Anthony and now it's Jonny Flynn and Donte Green.

This shift in the college basketball landscape dictates that a program is likely to lose those players' services after one season – two at the most.

Although that is the norm among the elite basketball programs in the country, the mid-major schools, such as UMass, operate differently.

At schools like UMass, players will typically stay in school until they graduate or lose eligibility. You won't see many players jump ship early to the NBA, because the majority of the high-profile prospects aren't at these programs.

Because of this, programs like UMass tend to consist mostly of veteran players and transfers – at least the ones who get the majority of the minutes.

See FRESHMEN on page 5

Minutewomen take on BU

Dacko prepares team to deal with versatile Terrier defense

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

After two heartbreaking losses at the East Carolina Lady Pirate Invitational in Greenville, N.C., this weekend, the Massachusetts women's basketball team left for the state capital yesterday to face Boston University at 7 p.m.

According to UMass coach Marnie Dacko, poor boxing out and indecision were the cause of Friday and Saturday's defeats for the Minutewomen (2-3). She's had just a few days to help her team work out these kinks for its game against BU (4-2).

The Terriers have proven to be an offensive menace this season. Four players average 10 or more points a game and in their six matchups so far, they have had five different leading scorers.

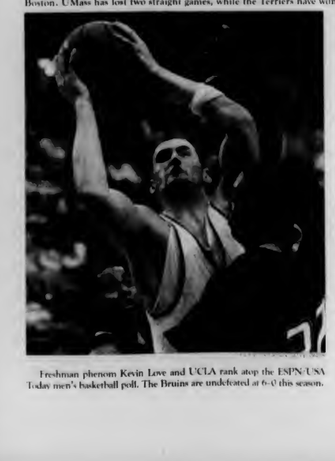
Senior Kasey Devine is the team's leading scorer, averaging 13.7 points per game. The forward is also second on the team in assists and rebounds.

Junior Jessyka Burks-Wiley is the team's second-leading scorer, with an average of 13.3 per game.

"I think she's their most athletic player," Dacko said. "She's the leading rebounder on the team. She's shooting 45 percent from the [3-point line]. She's scores around the basket. We can't let her catch and shoot. We need to box her out. She's very active."

Devine and Burks-Wiley have each been the leading scorers twice this season. Devine scored a team-high 14 points in a loss to North Carolina A&T Saturday and Burks-Wiley got 19 in a win against North Carolina, Greensboro Friday. Both players registered 18 points in a victorious season-opener against at Siena Nov. 11.

Aly Hilton, a sophomore, is averaging 10.8 points a game. She was the leading scorer (35) in a win over Northeastern Nov. 19. Her 6-foot-1 frame makes her one of the most powerful players on the court. Despite her girth, however, the forward is very agile. Dacko says Hilton, who has a .957 free-throw percentage, is a great post player that can hit the outside shot.



Cheri Raffo averages 10.5 points per game. The senior seldom drives the ball to the hoop (5-of-7 in free throws), usually just letting it rip from the 3-point line. Almost half her shots are from the perimeter, having drained 10-of-31 shots from that

DOMENIC POLI/COLLEGIAN

Alisha Tatham and the Minutewomen face Boston University on the road tonight at the Case Gym in Boston. UMass has lost two straight games, while the Terriers have won two of their last three.

See W. BASKETBALL on page 6

Freshman phenom Kevin Love and UCLA rank atop the ESPN/USA Today men's basketball poll. The Bruins are undefeated at 6-0 this season.

Love leads UCLA to head of Top 25

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

UCLA edged North Carolina for the No. 1 spot in this week's ESPN/USA Today men's basketball poll, despite some injury scares to two key players and sloppy play in the first halves of last week's games against Maryland and No. 11 Michigan State.

First-year players also made huge impacts for their respective teams as the Bruins had to play catch up in their last two matchups. But not this week, as UCLA blewout Yale (1-3), 81-47, Friday night.

Highly-touted freshman Kevin Love sprained his left ankle with seven minutes remaining in the win over the Bulldogs but returned to the bench a few moments later.

Love leads the Bruins, (6-0) in scoring and rebounding, and had 15 points in the game.

Love overpowered Yale underneath the boards, scoring mostly on dunks. He went 4-for-5 from the field and had nine points in the first half. Sophomore point guard Russell Westbrook also had a career-high 15 points and added six assists as UCLA extended its home winning streak to 24 games.

Starting center Alfred Aboya experienced blurred vision in his left eye after catching an elbow in the first half. He was taken to UCLA Medical Center for X-rays. The Bruins were also without junior point guard Darren Collison, who sprained his left knee on Nov. 2, and hasn't played since.

Junior forward Luc Richard Mbah a Moute and senior center Lorenza Mata-Real dominated the glass with 10 rebounds and 12 rebounds respectively. Mbah a Moute also had 14 points, while junior guard Josh Shipp had 12 points.

See TOP 25 on page 5

Minutemen not satisfied just yet

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch wants to practice on Thursday.

There's a fair chance that his Minutemen may not need the session, however. The Minutemen aren't at the mercy of Mother Nature in this instance. A much greater foe stands in the way of Koch's planned workout – the No. 1 team in the nation.

After defeating Boston University, 2-1, in the opening round of the 2007 NCAA Division 1 Men's Soccer Tournament last Friday, the Minutemen take on top-seeded Boston College tonight in Chestnut Hill. And even though, getting this far seemed unlikely when the Minutemen were 2-4 and in the midst of a three-game losing streak on Sept. 16, six days later, the Minutemen easily defeated Northeastern, 2-0, and haven't stumbled since.

UMass won six consecutive games following the loss to Harvard and 12 of its last 17 entering overall entering tonight's matchup with the Eagles. And even though no one outside of Amherst expected them to get this far, Koch isn't satisfied.

Neither are his players.

Pick your cliché. The Minutemen aren't buying it. They don't care about David and forget Cinderella, they don't do fairy tales.

No UMass team has ever gotten past the second round of the NCAA Tournament. So in case the Minutemen needed any more motivation – you know, other than beating the top team in the nation and taking one more step on this improbable run – they have it.

"We have the opportunity to do something that no team has done here. We made it to this round [in 2001] and I felt like once we got past the first round and we played like we already reach our goal. There's no question that I think we can [win tonight,]" Koch said.

Despite a year of eligibility remaining, redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons – who may have well made himself the best goalkeeper in program history this season – doesn't plan on returning after this year. But he's not quite ready for his career to end. Neither is Simmons' co-captain Kenny Cook or fellow redshirt juniors Doug Rappaport and Chris Brown. This core of talented players that make up the UMass backfield doesn't care what the Eagles are ranked or what seed they are in the tournament, rankings don't win championships.

Joe Meloni

But they're not stupid either. They know, you don't win the Atlantic Coast Conference by being a bad team – a sentiment Simmons repeated over and over prior to tonight's match. To win the ACC, Boston College had to go through Wake Forest who ended the season ranked No. 1 in the NSCAA/adidas Top 25 poll. In fact, the Demon Deacons didn't lose until BC upended them, 2-1, in the ACC Championship game on Nov. 18.

See MELONI on page 5

JOAN THEODORA/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons faces a tough task against Boston College today in the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

UMASS UPSETS SYRACUSE 107-101 | PAGE 10

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

RAIN : HI: 47 LO: 27 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2007

Papers stunt UM complex

By Andy Smith
Collegian Staff

Members of Preserve UMass and the Amherst Historical Commission met on Nov. 16 with James Cahill, director of UMass's Facilities and Campus Planning, to see if the three parties could agree on a joint response to the Massachusetts Historical Commission's [MHC] stop-work order for the $50 million Student Recreation Center.

The stop-work order, which was issued by the MHC on Oct. 26, was due to the failure of the University of Massachusetts, the Massachusetts Building Authority and the project designer of the recreation center to comply with state law. Massachusetts state law requires building designers to notify and confer with the MHC when historic buildings are impacted by construction by state agencies. In this case, and in many others, this law was not followed, according to the commission.

In e-mails forwarded to the Daily Collegian dated as far back as Oct. 4, it appears UMass-Amherst had not filed the appropriate paperwork for various con-

See MHC on page 3

Funds to fuel UM research

By Danielle Kahn
Collegian Staff

According to Jack M. Wilson, President of the University of Massachusetts, UMass "fuels the Commonwealth's innovation economy in every region of the state."

Not only are important things being done on the Amherst campus, but at UMass Boston, Lowell, Dartmouth and UMass Medical School in Worcester as well. He said the influence spreads throughout Massachusetts.

On Nov. 20, 2007 the latest available UMass Research and Development expenditures data was reviewed by the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees Committee on Science, Technology and Research. It was found that for the first time ever the expenditures topped $400 million, at $405 million.

This money is distributed between the five campuses and their respective science programs. UMass Amherst received a total of $140,184,000. Some 32 percent of that goes towards life sciences, 21 percent goes towards physical sciences, 20 percent goes to engineering and 12 percent goes to computer science. UMass Amherst also gets the second largest amount of money out of all the UMass campus behind UMass Medical School by $51,475,000.

The University of Massachusetts can also claim to be the third largest academic research institution in Massachusetts and the fourth largest in New England. Between last year and this year research and development expenditures grew by almost $27 million or 7.2 percent. The National Science Foundation's Research and Development expenditures only grew 4.3 percent.

But this is not just a competition to see whose expenditures grow the most. The main focuses of finding the research and development on campus is to attract and keep the best faculty, invest and collaborate to compete for top grants, and enhancing student opportunities in research. UMass has also recently gotten involved in clean energy. New ideas for the use of clean energy are being developed all over the UMass campuses. The ideas are possible because of the Research and Development expenditures.

Danielle Kahn can be reached at dkahn@student.umass.edu

Dying for Darfur:

Silent protest stirs emotion, provokes thought

By Katrina Cossa
Collegian Staff

Students today chose to come out to lay together in a somber show of solidarity designed to raise awareness on campus about the current situation in Darfur.

Rand Nashi, a member of MASSPIRG working on the Save Darfur campaign, explained that her group came up with the idea of staging yesterday's "die-in" collectively during one of their previous meetings.

Nashi, 18, is a freshman at UMass and organized the die-in, which she described as a symbolic gesture.

"We want to meet our goal of representing .01 percent of the 400,000

Members of MASSPIRG's Save Darfur campaign braved muddy turf and chilly weather as they staged a "Die-in" on the library lawn yesterday.

who have been killed so far; we want 400 people to come lay on the lawn today so we can demonstrate what a mere .01 percent looks like," she said.

"The word simply isn't getting out," Nashi explained. She went on to describe the strategy of the rather morbid "silent protest" as being primarily "to catch their [students'] eye, then to educate them, and finally, to fundraise."

Stephanie Ames, 21, is a senior at UMass and is the Massachusetts Outreach Coordinator for the national Student Anti-Genocide Coalition known as STAND. The local MASSPIRG Save Darfur campaign is coordinating their next fundraiser, Darfur JAST, with STAND.

The purpose of the fast event, scheduled for Dec. 5, is to encourage students to give up a small luxury they enjoy for only one day, and to donate the money they would have spent on that luxury to one of the collection centers that will be located on campus that day.

MASSPIRG member Robert Weed, 19, is a sophomore at UMass who participated in yesterday's die-in. He explained that what you give up for the day can be anything, but should be something you truly enjoy. When asked what he plans to give up on December 5th, Weed grimaced.

See DARFUR on page 3

Mountziaris focuses small

By Joshua Wadovich
Collegian Staff

This past summer, the University of Massachusetts President's Office funded a new Institute that will involve faculty from three campuses within the University system: Amherst, Lowell and Worcester. The UMass NanoMedicine Institute will focus on research and technology development at the interface between nanotechnology and medicine. The goal is to develop tiny structures to be used in medical diagnostics and therapeutics.

The grant for this research was $2,000,000 for one year.

Professor and Head of Chemical Engineering at the UMass Amherst campus, T.J. "Lakis" Mountziaris, mentioned, "The funds are a seed or a catalyst to support research that will hopefully lead to additional grants from federal, state and industrial sources."

T.J. Mountziaris

"Research will never end. We hope to accelerate our ideas through close collaboration between scientists of the UMass campuses in the near future. The exploration of the interface between nanotechnology and medicine is a national priority, and we intend to attract significant funding from the NIH, NSF, DARPA, private foundations and the U.S. Department of Homeland Security," stated Lakis Latz, assistant professor for the graduate program at the UMass Medical School in Worcester.

"The faculty and students involved in the NanoMedicine Institute like to dream. We develop imaginative research projects, and we are inspired by their potential impact on our society. Then, we go to the lab and work hard to make these dreams a reality," said Professor Mountziaris.

Mountziaris, along with several other UMass Amherst professors, graduate and post graduate students aim to develop tiny fluorescent nanocrystals that can be used to identify biomolecules.

The application of these nanocrystals will be to tag biomolecules involved in immune system reactions. The goal of producing the nanocrystals is to use them in experiments aiming to understand how the immune system works and to develop therapies for autoimmune diseases.

Another is to develop highly sensitive and multiplexed detection assays for proteins to enable miniaturization of clinical diagnostic instruments.

Completing this goal means biomolecules will be tagged in different colors, helping to differentiate one from another. Also tagging multiple molecules at one time will reduce the amount of sample that needs to be collected and the number of tests that need to be conducted. Accomplishing this goal is comparable to the process of how old large computers from the 1960's went through the transformation into tiny laptops and PDA's that we are accustomed to today.

The ultimate objective is the development of portable "point-of-care" diagnostic devices that is said to revolutionize the delivery of medical care, particularly in developing countries. This will also help decrease the amount of time patients have to wait to receive their test results from a couple days to just minutes.

"The field of clinical diagnostics is destined to undergo a dramatic transformation in the coming years with desktop instruments making their way to the doctor's office, where blood tests and other analytical work will be completed in a few minutes and will require only a small sample of fluids," stated Mountziaris.

Another project aims to develop tiny magnetic particles for blood refining applications. The purpose of these nanoparticles will be to dock preferentially on pathogens, such as viruses. Once the nanoparticles are docked on the pathogens, they will be sor-

See LAKIS on page 3

SGA passes act to laud student strike

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

A resolution supporting the ongoing negotiations with the University of Massachusetts administration passed through the Undergraduate Student Senate with no opposition last night.

"This motion was put forth just as observance and appreciation for the efforts of the student government, graduate student senate and all the different coalitions across campus," said Aaron Buford, president of the Student Government Association (SGA).

Buford told the 27 senators in attendance that the student strike of Nov. 15th and 16th had been an important step in creating change on campus at UMass and that the motion recognized the "general student movement."

Vanessa Snow, chair of the State and Federal Organizing committee, urged senators to support the newly elected members of the team representing the student body in the negotiations. According to Snow, the 10 students on the negotiating team would be dedicating 20 hours per week to meeting with administrators.

"This is actually a big step for student power," Snow said. "No other public university has students in these meetings."

Snow cosponsored the motion along with Buford and Central Area Senator Jason Behrens. The resolution passed without debate.

During his office report at the beginning of the meeting, Buford asked the senators to attend and participate in the scheduled general assembly meetings throughout the remainder of the semester and into the spring semester.

According to Buford, a higher turn-out was necessary in order for the assembly meetings to be representative of the student body as a whole.

"This assembly is integral to this process of trying to solve the issues that we put forth with the administrators that we're collaborating with," Buford said. He invited senators who had stood in opposition to the strike to attend the meetings as well.

"I encourage everyone just to come out and look at these issues," he said. "I would come and just see what sort of way you can participate."

According to Buford, the meetings would culminate with a report issued by the negotiators on Feb. 22 to be approved by a majority vote of both graduate and undergraduate students in attendance.

Senator Behrens called on senators to attending the general assembly and to inform the students they represented about the meetings.

"Get back to your constituents," he said. "Whether or no you agree with the strike, it's your job to let them know what's going on."

Derrick Perkins can be reached at dperkins@student.umass.edu

College identity crisis

Schools request change to U's

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Students at Bridgewater and Salem State colleges may soon be attending universities instead, but their classes, dorms, teachers and classmates will all remain the same.

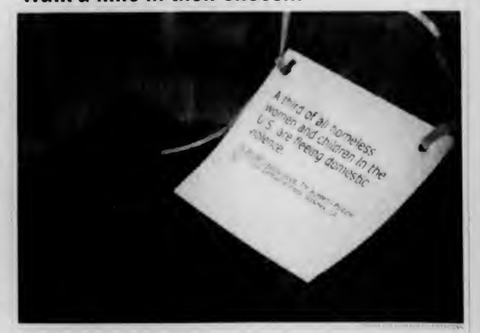
This is because the nine state colleges, in an effort headed by Bridgewater and Salem State, are lobbying the state legislature to change the names of their schools, reports the Boston Globe.

"It's marketing and branding issue...people have this perception that universities are better than colleges, and we want to be on a level playing field," said Robert Antonucci, president of Fitchburg State College.

Administrators at the nine colleges said the change could attract students, resources and prestige.

Patricia Plummer, chancellor of the Board of Higher Education said she is open minded about the change but needs more information about the possible costs before making a recommendation to the legislature.

While approval by the Board of Higher Education isn't necessary for the change, their backing would carry some weight with the legislature.



Part of the reason the colleges want the change is that the state colleges aren't allowed to offer graduate and doctoral programs but would be able to do so as universities. Both Bridgewater and Salem State want to offer doctoral programs immediately, according to the Globe.

Mr. Louis Ricciardi, chairman of the Board of Trustees at Bridgewater State, said, "Our institution has found itself on the university path for more than a decade, and we are properly aligned to take this historic step forward."

The Globe notes that while most colleges would probably decide to become universities, Massachusetts College of Art and Design, Massachusetts College of Liberal Arts and Massachusetts Maritime Academy would likely keep their current names.

Ben Williams can be reached at bwilliams@student.umass.edu

'Walk a mile in their shoes...'

Tom Schiff's Education 292A class "Voices Against Violence" set up a display of shoes symbolizing the number of reported domestic abuse cases. Each set of shoes had a statistic attached.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIII
ISSUE 59
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Nicholas Belanger
Managing Editor Katie Husten
Business Manager Dan Exner
Production Manager Chris Marron
Night Supervisor Meghan Murphy
Advertising Manager Alex Bender
Advertising Production Katherine Shea
Arts & Living Editor Tim McCall
Copy Editor Adam Stagen
Editorial Editor S.P. Sullivan
News Editor Derrick Perkins
Sports Editor Jeremy Rice
Asst. Business Manager Eric Szymczak
Assistant Advertising Manager Whooten
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Asst. Arts & Living Stephanie McPherson
Asst. Arts & Living Brian McAskill
Asst. Arts & Living Teresa Reilly
Asst. Editorial James Mathews
Asst. Editorial Melissa Gerber
Assistant News Kate Olesen
Assistant News Will McGuinness
Assistant News Holly Seaburn
Assistant Sports Michael King
Assistant Sports Joe Meloni
Assistant Sports Eli Rosenwasser
Web Editor James Hale
Photo Editor Joan Tranh
Asst. Photo Editor Michael Phillis
Asst. Photo Editor Brian Tedder

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian (USPS 697-280) is published Monday through Friday during the academic year, except during vacations and exam periods. The Collegian is printed at 1500 Main St., Springfield, MA 01103. Periodicals postage paid at Springfield, MA 01103. The subscription rate is $130 per year.

Production Crew
On staff today

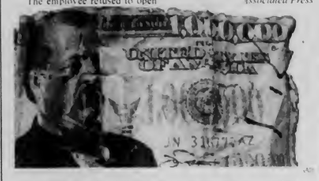
NIGHT EDITOR
Nicholas Belanger

COPY EDITOR
Denise Amaral

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sakes

Around the world, across the U.S.

Man attempts to deposit $1M bill



AIKEN, S.C. — A bank teller in Clearwater had a million reasons not to open an account for an Augusta, Ga., man Monday, authorities said. Alexander D. Smith, 31, was charged with disorderly conduct and two counts of forgery after he walked into the bank and tried to open an account by depositing a fake $1 million bill, said Aiken County Sheriff's spokesman Lt. Michael Frank.

The employee refused to open the account and called police while the man started to curse at bank workers, Frank said.

The second forgery charge came after investigators learned Smith bought several cartons of cigarettes from a nearby grocery store with a stolen check, Frank said.

The federal government has never printed a million-dollar bill, Frank said.

Associated Press

This fake $1 million bill was slated for deposit if it were not for a vigilant bank teller.

Missing girl may be pornstar

By Roxana Hegeman
Associated Press

EL DORADO, Kan. — A missing Kansas college student believed to be the victim of foul play apparently led a double life as an Internet porn star by the name of Zoey Zane.

Nude photos of 18-year-old Emily Sander appeared on a Zoey Zane Web site before she vanished, and investigators are looking into whether her modeling had anything to do with her disappearance last Friday.

"She enjoyed it. She is a young teenage girl and she wanted to be in the movies and enjoyed movies. She needed the extra money," Nikki Watson, a close friend of Sander's at Butler Community College, told The Associated Press on Wednesday. "Nobody in El Dorado knew besides her close friends."

Sander's brother, Jacob Sander, confirmed that the nude woman pictured on the site is his sister.

El Dorado Police Chief Tom Boren said FBI and state experts on Internet crime have been called in.

"Investigators are aware that Miss Sander was apparently involved in a Web site situation," he said. "Allegations that this may factor into her disappearance are being thoroughly investigated."

Sander was last seen leaving a bar in El Dorado, about 30 miles from Wichita, with a man identified as Israel Mireles, 24, authorities said. Sander and Mireles had met that night at the bar, according to Watson.

After Mireles did not show up Saturday at his job at an Italian restaurant, his employer went to the motel room where he was staying.

"His motel room was found to appear in great disarray, and a large quantity of blood was found in the room," Boren said. "Bed clothing was found to be missing. The police were called."

A nationwide manhunt was under way for Mireles and his 18-year-old girlfriend. A rental car he had been driving turned up Tuesday in Texas, where he had family. Those relatives have been interviewed, El Dorado Detective Justin Phillips said, but he declined to say whether they had seen Mireles or knew where he was.

On Tuesday, authorities released a photo of a white bedspread with a floral design and asked for the public's help in locating it. Divers searched a reservoir near El Dorado on Wednesday.

"Our hopes kind of diminish each day we don't hear from her," the police chief said.

Sander recently signed a contract for the pornographic work on the Web site, and told her parents about it on Thanksgiving, Watson said. Her boyfriend broke up with her because he did not approve, Watson said.

"What you are telling me now is things we have never been told or heard," said Sander's grandmother, Shirley Sander. "I don't know what to say. We have never heard anything like this, and truthfully, I don't believe it."

The Web site had some 30,000 subscribers who paid $39.95 a month to visit the site, said David Thomas, the site's designer, who works for a Florida-based videography and photography business. The free teaser pictures of Sander and other women are very tame compared with the videos and pictures that come with subscription to the site, he said.

"She actually was one of the highest-climbing Web sites I had ever seen," Thomas said. "It was amazing; it was incredible."

Deep Throat docs. revealed

By Calvin Woodward
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Deep in Richard Nixon's White House files sit letters from a long-forgotten lobbying campaign to make Mark Felt head of the FBI. Instead, Felt became Deep Throat.

The National Archives released more than 10,000 pages of documents from the Nixon presidency on Wednesday and among them are the urgings of past and present FBI agents and other interested citizens to appoint Felt, then the No. 2 FBI official, as director. Associates described his "outstanding loyalty."

Nixon did not take the advice.

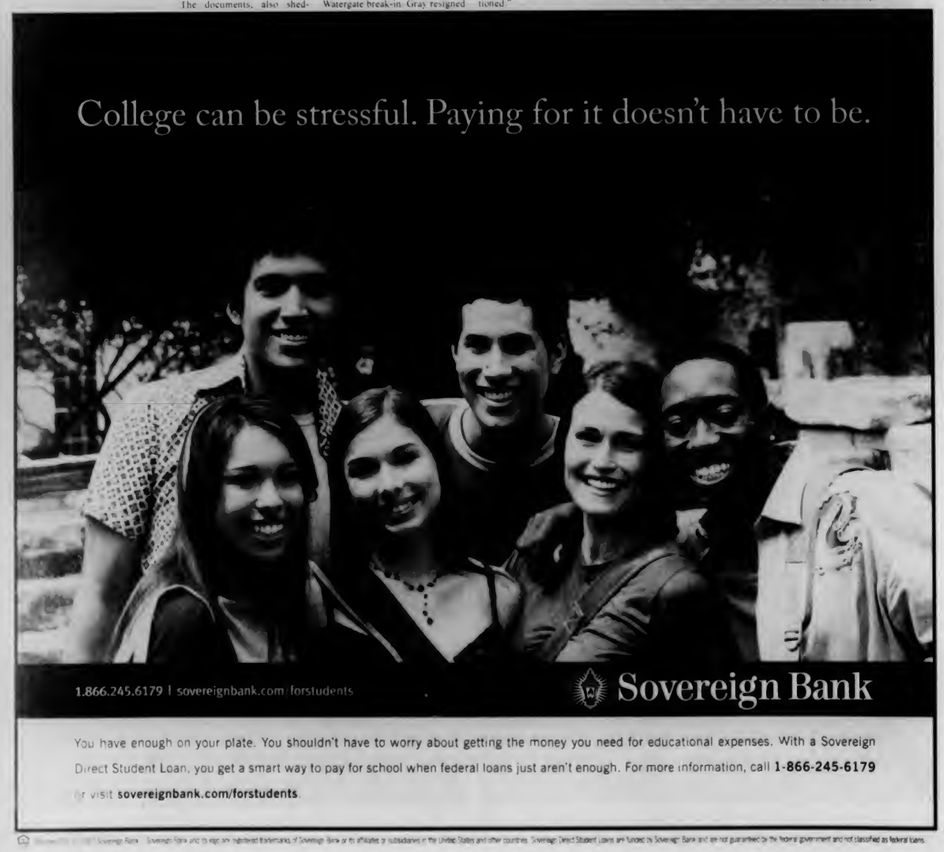
Ultimately, Felt's devastating leaks in The Washington Post's secret Watergate source helped undermine Nixon's presidency.

The documents, also shedding light on foreign and national security policy from the Nixon years, show increasing urgency in U.S. attempts to pacify the Middle East, alarm over Israel's apparent progress in developing nuclear weapons and a wish to "manipulate relations with Saudis" to help broker peace. U.S. officials are also seen weighing whether to support a Kurdish rebellion in Iraq.

To combat the terrorist threat in the Mideast, the U.S. must focus on "political dialogue," said a March 1973 directive now echoed in this week's Mideast summit.

Nixon, soon to be consumed by the Watergate investigation, passed over career agents including Felt when he selected loyalist L. Patrick Gray as FBI chief after the J. Edgar Hoover's death in 1972, just weeks before the Watergate break-in. Gray resigned the next year because of allegations he had destroyed Watergate documents.

Felt's supporters weighed in, with letters, telegrams and cards that have been in Nixon's White House files all these years.



"He has the integrity, the ability, the experience and the image to insure that our FBI will continue to deserve and maintain world esteem," Harold L. Child Jr., legal attache to the embassy in Japan and a 30-year FBI veteran, told Nixon in an April 1973 letter.

Elton A. Mantfield, a former FBI special agent who was then an executive of the electrical contractors' association, asked Nixon in a telegram to turn to the career professional to replace Gray.

"Mr. Felt is a man of outstanding loyalty, character, reputation, habits," he said, are unquestioned."

Felt claims he was "Deep Throat," the long-anonymous source who leaked secrets about President Nixon's Watergate coverup.

Die-in broaches Darfur

DARFUR from page 1

"I can easily give up meals," he explained. "But as a symbol, I'm going to have to give up my one true vice – cigarettes."

Aines said that the first fundraising goal for UMass is $10,000 this year. According to Aines, the money raised will be donated to the Genocide Intervention Network (GIN), a global non-profit organization.

GIN will invest the proceeds in three things: more efficient woodstoves, fostering marketable income-generating activities such as raising livestock and funding firewood patrols, sometimes led by members of UN Peacekeeping Forces, to accompany women when leaving the camps.

Aines explained that all of these things can be provided at a relatively low cost, even for a college student.

"Just think," she said. "For the cost of a Starbucks latte or half a pack of cigarettes, a woman in Darfur can live free from the fear of being raped or murdered for one full year."

The conflict in the Sudan has been a protracted one, having begun in 2003. One of the groups to whom many violent acts against women have been attributed is the Janjaweed, a militia group whose name translates from Arabic to "devil on horseback." The Sudanese government, despite denying so publicly, is suspected by many in the international community to have provided money and assistance to the Janjaweed.

STAND's website claims that the violence in Darfur has been publicly recognized by the United States government as a genocide for over three years, and many present yesterday feel that we are not doing enough to stop the murders from continuing.

Students participating in yesterday's die-in evidently share this opinion. One held a sign she had made that read "400,000 dead, 2.5 million displaced, 10,000 dying every month."

This individual sense of urgency has also taken the form of increased visibility of the cause of helping Darfur among campus RSOs, some of which are beginning to coordinate and work together on events.

UMass sophomore and ASA Vice President Ngozi Mbawuike explained, "This is our first collaboration with MASSPIRG, but we are hoping to build a working relationship, and do bigger things together next semester."

Felix Okonkwo, Senior and President of the ASA elaborated, articulating the group's plans to host a panel discussion and a candlelight vigil next semester.

The Save Darfur campaign is only one initiative of the University's MASSPIRG chapter, which has 134 members. Students interested in working to end the genocide in Darfur are encouraged to attend general MASSPIRG meetings, Tuesdays at 6 p.m. in Machmer W-22, and are also welcome at the Darfur Campaign meetings at 8 p.m., also on Tuesdays, in the Blue Wall.

Katrina Cossa can be reached at kcossa@student.umass.edu

Paperwork stalls plans

Failure to file proper documentation halts work on athletic facility, barn saved for now struction projects.

MHC from page 1

"As a state agency, UMass would be required to submit an Environmental Notification Form to the Massachusetts Environmental Policy Act Office prior to the proposed demolition of any buildings on the Inventory of Historic and Archeological Assets of the Commonwealth. To date, UMass has not done so," wrote Rick Bourre, executive director of the MEPAO, in an e-mail from early October, to Joseph Larson, corresponding secretary of Preserve UMass, a group of nearly 100 active and retired faculty and staff members, alumni and friends of the UMass campus.

"Preserve UMass represents important state-wide constituents of the greater UMass community," said Larson. "And the Amherst Historical Commission is the local governmental authority charged with identifying and inventorying historic structures on state and private property in the town."

In another e-mail from Bourre to Larson, sent one week after the previous e-mail, he wrote, "[Jim Callahan, the project manager at UMass] was told that UMass would have to cease its demolition activities until it complied with both MHC and MEPA review requirements. It is our expectation that UMass will be submitting a Project Notification Form to MHC and an Environmental Notification Form to the MEPA Office."

"It appears that the University has never complied with the state laws and regulations governing historic buildings," said Larson.

The meeting revealed the demolition of several structures on the Brooks Barn Complex, prior to the stop-work order, has been extensive and makes it unlikely that the largest impacted structure, a 1909 stucco cow barn, can be preserved or moved.

Elizabeth Sharpe and Lynda Faye, members of the Amherst Historical Commission present at the meeting, could not speak on behalf of the entire commission, but Larson believes that suggestions for including displays in the new student center illustrating and memorializing the historic importance of the Brooks Bark Complex would be supported.

"However," said Larson, "Preserve UMass takes the position that destruction of a site of potentially national significance, plus the long record of the university's failure to comply with state law, dictates that mitigation should ensure future compliance with the law and preservation of the remaining Brooks Barn Complex structures."

"Preserve UMass will recommend to the Massachusetts Historical Commission that no work proceed until UMass issues a contract for an independent, professional assessment of the historical and architecturally significant buildings on the campus," said Larson.

Andy Smith can be reached at ajsmith@student.umass.edu

AC professor named to head Slavic studies association

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

Amherst College professor William Taubman has been selected to serve as president of the American Association for the Advancement of Slavic Studies (AAASS). The AAASS is a non-profit, non-political scholarly society that deals in issues affecting Slavic society. Taubman is currently the Bertrand Snell Professor of Political Science at Amherst College, and starting next year he will also assume the duties of vice-president president-elect of the AAASS. In 2009 he will become the association's president.

Taubman joined the Amherst faculty in 1967 and has taught a number of classes on Russia's politics, national identity and politicians, in addition to those regarding the Cold War. Last year the Amherst College professor was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship for ongoing research into a forthcoming biography of the USSR's final head of state, Mikhail S. Gorbachev. Taubman also authored the Pulitzer Prize-winning biography "Khrushchev: The Man and His Era" and has written many tracts on the former Soviet Union.

Originally receiving degrees from Harvard and Columbia Universities, Taubman later worked as an associate of the Davis Center for Russian and Eurasian Studies at Harvard. He also chaired the Advisory Committee of the Cold War International History Project at the Wilson Center in Washington, D.C., as well as the International Affairs Fellow of the Council on Foreign Relations with the Department of State.

The AAASS is global leader in the private study of the former Soviet Union and Eastern and Central Europe. The association sponsors The Slavic Review, as well as supporting teaching, research and publication relating to the peoples and territories within these regions.

The American Association for the Advancement of Slavic Studies is a part of the American Council of Learned Societies, meaning that its renowned representatives serve on such bodies as the U.S. State Department's Advisory Committee for Studies of Eastern Europe and the Independent States of the former Soviet Union and the International Council for Central and East European Studies.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu

Focus on the tiny motivates research ed-out from the rest of the blood through the usage of magnetic fields. The magnetic field will immobilize the viruses and any remaining nanoparticles on a surface.

LAKIS from page 1

This process of sorting out the pathogens and viruses can be useful in a blood refining process for chronically ill patients, reducing their recovery time from viral diseases. The blood will be drawn out of the patient, cleaned and after purification, will be returned back into the patient.

The grant will also fund research in developing biodegradable nanoparticles that are engineered to release specific fragments of a parasite. The purpose of the biodegradable nanoparticles is to train the immune system to detect the parasites in early stages of infection.

Eventually the goal will be to develop a novel vaccine for the malaria parasite. Malaria kills more than one million people worldwide each year, 90 percent of them in Africa and 70 percent are children under the age of five making it the number one killer for that age range. The malaria parasite is undetected by the immune system until it has multiplied to a level that is in most cases unmanageable. Detecting the malaria virus at an early stage could save thousands of children's lives.

Not only will this research provide new knowledge on the field of nanomedicine, but it will provide an opportunity to have an economic impact locally. Massachusetts is in a uniquely good position to compete globally because of its strong health and medical care, research facilities and its very strong advanced materials industry.

"We also have a unique strength in nanotechnology," stated Mountziaris. Several UMass Amherst faculty involved in the Institute do related work at UMass Amherst's MassNanoTech Institute and the Nanoscale Science and Engineering Center on Hierarchical Manufacturing.

Assistant Professor Latz commented, "UMass Medical School has world-class scientists that work in biomedical sciences and our colleagues at UMass Amherst and Lowell are leaders in the nanotechnology field. It seemed only logical to combine the expertise that exists on the different campuses. The institute fosters collaborative work on new and exiting ways to utilize nanotechnology in biomedical sciences."

There are currently several opportunities for undergraduate students to do independent research for credit along with senior theses under the direction of the faculty involved in the Nanomedince Institute. There are also plans to integrate material from the research projects into the college courses.

Joshua Walovich can be reached at jwalovit@student.umass.edu

www.dailycollegian.com

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Frustrated? Puzzled? Do you have:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
The Ombuds Office can help
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD
Special Student Rate
Local-National Placement
Includes Certification
1-800-357-3210
BostonBartender.com

We got the facts from you.
9 out of 10 UMass students know how to have fun without alcohol.
Are you one of them?
Campus and Community Coalition
www.umass.edu/ccc

TASTE OF TUSCANY
NOVEMBER 27 - 30 ~ 5 - 9 PM
GUEST CHEF BRUNO WEHREN
FROM LAS VEGAS
MENU:
MINESTRONE CON DITALINI (MINESTRONE SOUP WITH DITALINI)
BRODO DI MANZO CON AGNOLOTTI, PISELLI, E CAROTE (BEEF BROTH WITH MEAT DUMPLINGS & PEAS & CARROTS)
POLLO ALLA PARMIGIANA (CHICKEN PARMIGIANO WITH TOMATO SAUCE)
FETTUCINE (FETTUCCINE)
CAVOLFIORE E BROCCOLI (CAULIFLOWER & BROCCOLI POLONAISE)
ARROSTO (OR LOMBATA) DI MAIALE "PICCATA" (PORK LOIN PICCATA)
"ORZOTTO" CON FUNGHI (ORZOTTO WITH MUSHROOMS)
SPINACI FRESCHI (FRESH SPINACH)
PENNE CON SALSICCIA E FUNGHI (PENNE WITH ITALIAN SAUSAGE & MUSHROOMS)
FARFALLE CON ZUCCA, PISELLI IN PANNA (FARFALLE PASTA WITH PUMPKIN & PEAS IN CREAM SAUCE)
TUESDAY, NOV. 27 WORCESTER DC
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 28 FRANKLIN DC
THURSDAY, NOV. 29 BERKSHIRE DC
FRIDAY, NOV. 30: HAMPSHIRE DC
UMASS DINING IN PARTNERSHIP WITH BARILLA PASTA
2007 Grand Prize Winner
Barilla

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Tips for succesfully surviving the office life

Brad Leibowitz

For anyone out there who has ever had an internship or a regular job doing a nine-to-five in an office – or for anyone who is about to undergo that process this upcoming winter, this article is for you.

I worked, wasting time writing what would become this column, sitting in an ever-dull, buzzing office in New York City trying to pass my day. I should've been writing an article about New York City seizing property to build highway lanes, however, that seems like too much work.

As such, I got to thinking about how to properly spend your day if you ever find yourself working the nine-to-five, sit-in-an-office, make-you-want-to-blow-your-brains-out day job.

One: Use the bathroom as much as possible. The simple fact is that when you are in the bathroom, you cannot be reached by anyone. It doesn't matter if you have an impending deadline or work which your boss needed done five minutes ago, when you're in the bathroom, you simply can't be disturbed. It's your time to do what needs to be done, because in the end, your boss doesn't want the office reeking of pee.

Even if you don't need to use the bathroom, use it. Use the time to send a few text messages or play a game of Tetris on your phone. Or, if worse comes to worse, you could carve some inane message into the bathroom stall, such as you see in every high school stall in the world.

Look at the bathroom as a sanctuary from the office. It's quiet, you don't have to say anything or answer anyone's questions, and most of all you don't have to do any work.

Look at the bathroom as a sanctuary from the office. It's quiet, you don't have to say anything or answer anyone's questions, and most of all you don't have to do any work.

Two: Every once and a while, take a walk around the office to collect lunch orders. This will easily knock 30 minutes to an hour off your day. From the collecting of orders, to the phone call placed for the orders, to collecting the money, this is a very easy and effective way to avoid doing anything your boss doesn't want to do him or herself.

Speaking of the boss, never ever ask the boss directly what he or she wants for lunch. Always have someone else, of a lower level in the office do this for you. Direct contact with the head honcho may mean more work to be done or a boring conversation about how he or she shot on the links the day before. Divert this task to the office gopher.

Three: Send as many pointless e-mails as possible to people outside of your office. You know that hottie you met two-weeks ago at a bar, send them an e-mail that reads, "Hey, I'm at work and I am bored out of my mind. Was just thinking about you. What are you doing?" Guaranteed that person will write you back, "At work also, bored out of my mind. Oh? What were you thinking about?" From here, the rabbit hole is endless. As long as you keep your responses short, the pointless e-mails will continue all day long. This will easily provide an hour or two of distraction.

Four: If you work in a city, whenever the boss sends you on an errand, always take the slowest way possible. If it's a few blocks, saunter there. If it is more than a few blocks, always avoid the subway for the slower cab ride. Mid-day city traffic will make a 10-minute cab drive a 35-minute one. When you finally get back to the office and the boss asks you where you've been, simply say "traffic" or "the cabbie got into an accident." Both are failsafe.

Five: If you have lunch out of the office, do it with friends who work other jobs. Meet them at a cafe or bar for a burger and a beer. Loosen your tie and just relax. Don't worry about getting back to work in an hour – if late, again, traffic.

Finally, six: The most important aspect of the office day job. No matter what you do to avoid doing work all day, at some point, you are going to have to do work. As such, the most important aspect of work is getting just enough work done during the day to keep people from double guessing you, while at the same time, keeping up the illusion that you're doing work all day long.

To accomplish this, when you get to the office get some things done. Once you get some things done, keep some of it open on your computer. This is just in case the boss walks by and wants to see what you are doing. To add to the illusion, spread documents all over your desk in a somewhat indiscernible order; this provides the illusion that you are busy at work looking for something.

Lastly, open up a word document on your computer into which you type thoughts about nothing. Use this time to write a novel or an idea to get you a better job. Case in point, this column. Again, I should've penned an article on New York City's seizure of land, however, I wrote this to pass the time which provides the illusion that I am hard at work.

So, if you find yourself in my shoes, take my advice. If options two through six fail, use the bathroom more or get another job.

Brad Leibowitz writes on Thursdays. He can be reached at bleibow@student.umass.edu.

Presidential parrying, pork and the Pats

Nick Milano

As the presidential race picks up momentum, candidates are going to new lengths to separate themselves from the crowd.

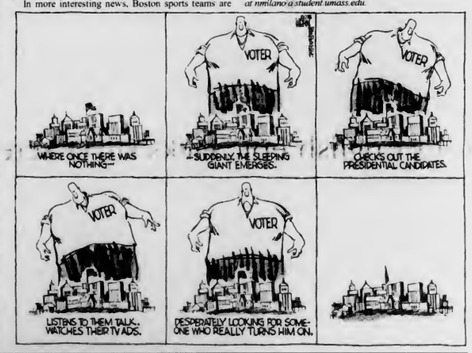
Mitt Romney's latest tirade against Massachusetts included an attack on his own judicial appointee, Kathe Tuttman. Romney jumped to conclusions and demanded her resignation after she released a convict only to have him stand accused of killing a man and wife from Washington.

It turns out the entire system is to blame for the convict's release, not one judge. The former part-time governor distanced himself from the state while still serving as its executive and has continued to do so on the campaign trail. Romney only mentions Massachusetts to take all the credit for universal health care or to slam it for its liberal ways. Apparently, the liberal bastion of Massachusetts was safe in his hands only. One wonders what might happen if he wins the White House.

Romney only mentions Massachusetts to take all the credit for universal health care or to slam it for its liberal ways.

Worried about conservative judges being appointed throughout the federal court system? Worried about crackdown on immigration and overt legislation against illegal immigration? No need. Be more afraid of the possibility of the disownment of Massachusetts. Surely under his administration, Romney will seek to permanently write Massachusetts out of his life by forcing its separation from the union.

Adding to the excitement of Romney's attack on his own recommendation to the court was Rudy Giuliani's subsequent assault on Romney. It was just another example of the current American political system playing itself out. Giuliani's criticisms of Romney are just as unfounded because he is the same man who missed many signs of Bernard Kerik's failings. Giuliani, as one former aide told the New York Times, places more stock in how much he likes a person or how loyal they are to him: "Sometimes qualifications are secondary to loyalty." This sounds eerily similar to the country's chief executive. Harriet Miers, Michael Brown and Alberto Gonzales should warn anyone considering voting for the former mayor of New York.



Finally, it appears that social conservatives are opening their eyes to see that there is another viable candidate in the field: Mike Huckabee. He has consistently been pro-life and helped pass a constitutional amendment declaring that marriage is between a man and a woman. He employs a rather interesting methodology in defense of gun-control. The second Amendment is not about hunting, but self-defense and tyranny. As his website reads, the Founding Fathers "knew that a government facing an armed populace was less likely to take away our rights, while a disarmed population wouldn't have much hope." His major failing may be his moderate stance on the rights of illegal immigrants. But wasn't it Ronald Reagan who granted amnesty to nearly three-million undocumented works with the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986?

On the Democratic side the aisle, there was noticeable reaction from Barack Obama's candid remarks about his past drug use. Unlike President Clinton, he was not afraid to admit actually inhaling the smoke from marijuana. As he put it, "That was the point." In addition to these remarks and Hillary Clinton's dance to explain how many, if not all, of the papers from her time as First Lady have not been released to the public, Barack Obama has placed himself as the one candidate who can be trusted among the other Democratic frontrunners.

In local news, after spending nearly $15 billion on digging big to revamp the Central Artery, Massachusetts is already some million dollars in the hole. According to a Boston Globe report, the special prosecutor hired to investigate the tragic collapse of a Big Dig tunnel is costing the state's taxpayers $30,000 a week. It might make sense if some semblance of progress was being made; instead, the prosecutor, Paul Ware Jr., has charged only one company. Thank the fine will reap cash for state residents who have been forced to pay for cost overrun after cost overrun? Sorry, but no. The prize for a conviction will be a maximum fine of $1,000. It seems even the biggest pork project in the history of the United States has still not taught enough lessons about responsible government.

In more interesting news, Boston sports teams are seen the Red Sox win two World Series, you could have been born in 2004. To have seen the Patriots win three Super Bowls in addition, you could have been born in 2000. Before this turn of good fortune, the only thing taken for granted by generations of Bostonians was losing and Dunkin Donuts. Now with the Pats chasing a historic season, my father and uncles have already etched the Pats' fourth Super Bowl win in stone. If the rest of the country already hates us for our whiny ways, just wait until they meet the new Bostonian: overly confident and exalting in his fortunes.

Nick Milano writes on Thursdays. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

IN SUPPORT OF TOCCO

Dear Editor:

In light of the recent public maneuvering by the Governor to have Stephen Tocco removed as Chairman of the Board of Trustees, we feel compelled to write to express our support for his continued leadership of the Board.

It is our strong belief that Governor Patrick's attempts to turn the BOT into a hangout for the Massachusetts Democratic Party are substantially misguided and inconsistent with the best long-term interests of the system.

Additionally, we, while admittedly biased in favor of certain political causes, acknowledge the ever-greatening need for political diversity in all levels of UMass governance and functioning. That is, all of the campuses – especially this one in Amherst – would certainly benefit from an infusion of conservative-leaning and moderate-minded decision makers simply because the current political climate is so far in the other direction.

To be sure, this month's embarrassing student strike was the latest in a long list of disturbing protests and riots led by leftist students and faculty. It is our view that Deval Patrick's attempt to weed the Republicans out of the BOT, if successful, would unfortunately continue this unnecessary business as usual with respect to the flagship campus. As always, clear-minded and rational administrators and Trustees like Mr. Tocco have a reliable ally in the UMass Republican Club. We hope he remains in the position well into the future.

UMass Republican Club

CLIMATE CHANGE CALL FOR CLARITY

Dear Editor:

Last Friday's release of the fourth Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change affirms what we already know, and should catalyze a call for action. In the last few years we have seen melting of the polar ice caps at a faster and faster rate. Climate change will cause irreversible catastrophic events across the globe, which will determine the very existence of mankind.

The good news is that we are at a pivotal time in our history to change it. Earlier this month 1 rallied with 6,000 passionate youths from across the country, to address the problem of climate change. The movement is gaining momentum and legislation is following behind. Friday, the Global Warming Solutions Act left committee.

The bill outlines a 20 percent reduction in carbon emissions below 1990 levels by 2020 and 80 percent by 2050. This legislation gives Massachusetts the ability to join the ranks of California and New Jersey in passing the necessary legislation and lead this country out of our carbon debt. I encourage Senator Candaras and Senator Rosenberg to continue supporting this important legislation, because too late is just around the corner.

Vanessa Wright
Campaign Coordinator,
MassPIRG
UMass Chapter

GIVE ME A BREAK

Dear Editor:

Re: "And they call this a break?" Evan Powers, Ed/Op, Nov. 21, 2007

Powers' point about the difficulty of travel around holidays as a UMass student really resonated for me. Yes, UMass is a state university, and most of the student body hails from Massachusetts. For those people, getting home is usually a two-to three-hour car ride at most and many of them can easily make the trip home for any given weekend without much trouble.

However, a sizable minority of students are from out of state (and I mean more than just Connecticut or Vermont). I'm from Tennessee, and a trip home is quite an ordeal. If I drive it takes me two days, so instead I fly. But flying comes at considerable cost and planning (and time in the airport). The time off for Thanksgiving is not even worth a trip home, so I instead wait for Christmas.

The winter holiday time, though, is even worse for travel. If we have to fly, we must prepare to deal with the threat of flight delays due not only to traveler volume but also snow storms (Denver's blizzard last year caused me to be stuck overnight on Dec. 23 in North Carolina). This issue is compounded not only by finals week ending on Dec. 22 (Dec. 24 if there's a snow day that week), but also not scheduling any finals until October.

For anyone needing to make long distance travel arrangements, this is a nightmare. We're faced with the option of either early-booking late flights, to avoid missing exams (and hoping there isn't a snow day) but getting cheap tickets, or waiting until mid-October, to (maybe) leave earlier, but also pay a lot more.

Many other schools, both public and private, have a standard finals week schedule set at the beginning of each semester, typically based around when in the school week the course meets (i.e. MWF 9:05; your final is on Tuesday at 10:30.) If UMass did not feel the need to find a room double the size of the regular classroom (we don't move to another room for any of our other tests, so why for finals?) we'd be able to have a more stable finals schedule, something that many of us, students and faculty alike, would appreciate.

Perhaps instead of getting off for both Indigenous Peoples Day (a.k.a. Columbus Day) and Veterans Day we should only take one of those as a holiday and instead get the Wednesday before Thanksgiving off. Couple this with a standard, predictable scheduling of final exams and UMass could go a long way toward better accommodating the travel needs of all its students, both in-state and out-of-state.

Shawn Trivette
UMass grad student
Sociology

THANKS BUT NO THANKS

Dear Editor:

Re: "A time to give thanks, and give more" Brad DeFlumeri, Ed/Op, Nov. 26, 2007

Brad DeFlumeri criticizes the association of Thanksgiving with ever-increasing consumerism and materialism. No, Mr. DeFlumeri would prefer that the holiday be turned into a turkey and mashed potato infused exercise in flag waving and nationalistic chest thumping, an opportunity to reflect on the Bush administration's "struggle with extremism."

But Thanksgiving has as little to do with the War on Abstract Nouns as it does with the iPods flying off store shelves last Friday. It is a holiday dedicated to family, and for many people to their faith – two aspects of our lives that the state and the President have absolutely no right to associate themselves with. Mr. Deflumeri should be ashamed of trying to use a day meant to bring together families and communities as a tool of division and a weapon in the Culture War.

Colin Downes
Class of 2010

DEBATE IS FUTILE

Dear Editor:

Re: "The end of debate." Ben Duffy, Ed/Op, Nov. 28, 2007.

Not only is Mr. Duffy's editorial disturbing in its content but it is also amateur in the way he chooses to make his argument...or lack thereof. One thing his article is successful at achieving is spreading awareness of Mr. Duffy's particular narrow-minded conservative view.

Has Mr. Duffy ever stopped to think that maybe arguing with a liberal is so difficult for him because he can't see any other side of the story?

On another point: No one told him that he should "go enlist" in the Army before supporting the war. Using the fact of your enrollment as leverage to argue in support of the war is stupid and wrong. No wonder no one will debate with him.

Matt Macdonald
UMass student

The Collegian encourages reader responses. letters to the editor should be limited to 500 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Sticks and stones won't break these bones

Shaolin Warriors impress at FAC with Kung Fu and more

By Christina Fong
Collegian Staff

The death-defying, high powered martial arts stars of Hollywood have nothing on the Shaolin Warriors who performed Tuesday night at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. With a team of 22 Shaolin performers and a collection of prop weapons, the Shaolin Warriors gave an awesome display of agility, strength, and stamina.

Bald-headed and clad in bright-orange robes, the Shaolin performers jumped onto the stage to a spellbound audience. They opened with an impressive series of synchronized routines, giving the audience a glimpse of the great skills of the performers' martial artistry. High jumps, mid-air kicks and powerful punches were done with precision while maintaining acrobatic elegance.

Following the prelude were four scenes titled Summer, Spring, Autumn, and Winter, respectively. The scenes represent the philosophical theory of the cycle in Buddhism and each varied in style and tone.

Some scenes were more meditative with slow series of movements involving great mental focus, accompanied with the effects of dry ice and incense. Others had Shaolin Warriors demonstrating hand-to-hand and weapon combat with each other.

Whether they were boxing bare-handed or wielding spears and swords, they quickly proved to be highly proficient in the art of Shaolin Kung Fu. Also, demonstrations of the grace of Tai Chi and the force of Qi Gong offered an interesting variety for the audience.

The costumes, props, and music greatly added to atmosphere. A variety of long and short weapons were used such as the broad sword, tiger hook and spear. There were coordinated combat sequences involving spinning, striking and blocking, as well as solo performances. Routines involving such props as large yellow flags and long golden chains were great visual spectacles with the accompaniment of the performers' flowing orange robes dancing alongside.

Many of the scenes depicted common practices in the daily life of a Shaolin Monk. They are seen meditating, cutting vegetables, and enjoying a meal. All together, they seem to tell a story about the simple life of the Shaolin Monks.

Included in the performance was the well-known style of wushu known as "Drunken Boxing". The performers fought while pretending to drink from large wine jugs and imitated the movements of a drunkard. The technique involves a strong sense of balance and awareness, although the performers deceivingly appeared as having quite the opposite. It is one that has been widely popularized in films throughout the past few years.

Several performers displayed their mental and physical ability to sustain painful positions and contortions. Scenes not meant for the faint of heart included two men laying on three sharpened sword blades and a bed of needles as well as a man being held up by the pointed ends of six spears. Other remarkable demonstrations involved breaking stone bars over to the tops of heads and wooden bars on their arms.

Standing out among the performers were two young boys who despite their size and age had many chances to show off their physical and artistic abilities. The two were able to hold their own while

See WARRIORS on page 6

The Shaolin Warriors who performed at the Fine Arts Center Tuesday night are known for their martial arts mastery. They displayed their incredible stunts and unwavering focus with Kung Fu routines, including board breaking demonstrations and laying on sharpened metal blades.

Old English epic lacks silver screen spark

Lackluster 'Beowulf' drags, stays too true to original poem

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Correspondent

It might not seem like it, but making "Beowulf" into a movie is a daunting task. When taken from its Old English, "Beowulf" takes the literal translation, story that ought not to be adapted for screen. The epic – a cut and dry tale of a monster and the hero who vanquishes him – is pretty bland. It requires a special kind of filmmaker to bring magic to the screen that isn't present in the original source material.

But director Robert Zemeckis feels up to the task, boasting a fresh spin and a big budget that's sure to take in the crowds. The pop director of "Back to the Future" and other family friendly adventures, "Beowulf" has all the makings of a fun little pop adventure itself. Yet despite the effort, the film fails to please.

Anthony Hopkins is Hrothgar, aging king of the Danes who just wants to live a little during his golden years. Freely dispensing of mead and merry to his subjects, Hrothgar encourages his kingdom to party like its 499, and indeed they do, until they wake the neighbors.

Enter Grendel (Crispin Glover), sinewy monster of the abyss with a secret grudge to bear against the kingdom and its inhabitants. Grendel can't abide the ruckus, so he proceeds to rip all but the principal characters to shreds.

Naturally, mass carnage kind of kills the mood. Forced to close up shop and head for cover, the remaining Danes are hopeless until Beowulf (Ray Winstone) hits the scene.

A warrior for hire of moderate infamy, Beowulf doesn't believe in wasting time. Pausing only for a quick drunk and a passing flirtation with Hrothgar's young wife Wealthow (Robin Wright Penn), Beowulf hastens to a showdown with the monster of all monsters.

In modern times, Beowulf might be called a megalomaniac, a danger junkie, or a crazy fool with a death wish. But here, he's just a hero, and exactly what the ailing Danes need if they have any hopes of reopening their glorious mead hall.

Watching the events unfold from afar is Grendel's mother (Angelina Jolie). Demonic but with a soft spot for kings – she serves as a representation of all the dangerous temptations that heroes are privy to. Beowulf soon finds that Grendel is but a symptom of the greater evil, and the greater foe, in turn, comes from within.

The script, penned by Neil Gaiman and Roger Avary, stays true to Beowulf basics. Avary, who once garnered note on the indie circuit with screenwriting credits for "Pulp Fiction," is now stuck playing with water demons. Gaiman and Avary work directly from the poem's chronology, expanding the scope of the script to include all three battles of the epic poem. The result is a film which spans half a century.

The good news is the cast looks great in their tunics and loincloths. The bad news is that everything else reeks of mediocrity. Fresh off the success of Frank Miller's "300," "Beowulf" comes off as a pale imitation created to cash in on the latest fad. The digital motion-capture format is pretty, but pointless, with the exception of Grendel, who just wouldn't look the same if he were forced to wear a human skin. Emotion registers poorly on the faces of human subjects.

Angelina Jolie, who for all intents and purposes is a serious actress, tries her hardest to erase the memory of roles in "Girl, Interrupted" and "A Mighty Heart" with this shallow, sexed up performance. Stark naked and incessantly crooning to the camera, the role does little for her. She keeps this up, and it won't be surprising if she's only remembered as a sex symbol.

Sexploitation of the cast doesn't stop with Jolie, but it would be preferable if it did. Winstone bares it all for an exceptionally long light sequence, complete with the usual

See BEOWULF on page 6

BEOWULF

STARRING: RAY WINSTONE, ANTHONY HOPKINS AND JOHN MALKOVICH

C

Director Robert Zemeckis fails to impress in "Beowulf," based on the Old English epic poem of a hero who saves the Danes from various monsters. The movie tends to take itself too seriously, and it drags by staying too true to the original story line.

Healthy, simple cooking for one

Kelly MacDonald

Mac and Cheese for dinner again? Is this your first year off the meal plan? Are you having problems cooking for yourself? Do you find yourself eating too many fast food meals or making the same boring meals almost every day?

As college students, it can be difficult to find the time to cook anything for yourself, never mind to plan a nutritious meal. Here are a few tips to make mealtime easier, healthier, and even more fun.

Control your portions

One of the most difficult parts of cooking for yourself is preparing the right amount of food. It's hard not to over-eat when all of the food you've made is for you. Many of us are used to eating with our families and it can be difficult to make the switch from making food for a group of people to single-servings. Remember that many prepared foods contain more than one serving per box. Be sure to read the labels.

Also, you might not want as much food as you initially think. When you make a meal, don't put all of the food on your plate. Start by taking a smaller amount, sit down to enjoy the meal, and go back for seconds only if you find that you're actually still hungry. Otherwise, refrigerate or freeze your leftovers for another meal.

Use your freezer

Freezers are great for limiting the amount of food that you waste and for keeping foods fresh. When you make a large meal, eat one portion and freeze the rest in single-size portions. This will make it easy to defrost just one serving when you're ready to eat the next meal. Cooking meals in advance will also [illegible] you can prepare [illegible] cooking session.

I recently left [illegible] leave them in the [illegible] counter for a few days [illegible] them. They [illegible] out of everything, but [illegible] freezer. It's [illegible] long you can [illegible] out anything [illegible]

Buy frozen vegetables

Prices for [illegible] servings of boxed vegetables [illegible] vegetables are [illegible] the fresh ones – [illegible] too. Try to buy [illegible] different colors. [illegible] get more [illegible]

Make one-dish meals

One dish [illegible] meal is often [illegible] make for busy [illegible] includes dishes [illegible] groups (carbs, [illegible] meat because [illegible] beef, broccoli [illegible] try a chicken [illegible] stroke.

Choose convenience wisely

Keep [illegible] canned [illegible] can make a [illegible] in a much [illegible] ing purposes [illegible] often healthier [illegible] solution for [illegible]

Some prepared foods, like Amy's brand found in [illegible] most supermarkets, are healthy and organic choices [illegible]

Warriors wow FAC

WARRIORS from page 5

amongst the many other more experienced Shaolin performers on stage.

The performers were very interactive with the audience. One of their most well-received acts had eager children led onto stage and were then asked to follow an instructor through a short yet somewhat complex routine. The younger children in the bunch offered humorous imitations as they stumbled trying to keep up. Even though the children had trouble on stage, adult members of the audience who were later invited on stage faced troubles of their own, attesting to the difficulty of seemingly simple Shaolin Kung-fu techniques.

Founded by Bodhi-dharma around 525 A.D., the Shaolin monastery is the headquarters of a Buddhist sect that is today known for its mastery in martial arts and spiritual practices. Contrary to popular belief, Shaolin Monks do not follow a code of violence and aggression.

The Shaolin Warriors who appeared at the Fine Arts Center train several hours a day perfecting their skills in combat. Of the 18 weapons that are required to be learned with aptitude, only one must be mastered by each performer.

The practice of Cha'an, which is Chinese for Zen, and strict physical schedules aimed towards attaining a mental state known as Samadhi enable the performers to endure the intense physical and mental demands of training each day. The endurance and high level of skill exhibited by each member of Shaolin Warriors is acquired through such training.

Christina Fong can be reached at cfong@student.umass.edu.

During their show at the Fine Arts Center, the Shaolin Monks called children and adult audience members on-stage to perform a simple routine. The volunteers had nowhere near the skills of the warriors, who train in combat and different weapons for several hours a day.

'Beowulf' film mediocre at best camera gags and prop obstructions. It's silly, but for all the wrong reasons.

BEOWULF from page 5

The mortal wound to "Beowulf" ultimately lies in the technical flaws of its storyline. Loyalty to the epic poem hampers the dramatic pacing of the script – what works for one medium fails in another, and internal tension fails to rise between characters. External action moves the plot, and quickly bores. To supplement this, Gaiman and Avary have tried to add depth by exploring the dark side of heroism, but it's not explored enough to counteract the other bad elements at play.

What the whole story boils down to is a lot of baby-mama drama and grunting. If only it took itself a little less seriously, "Beowulf" could be the stuff great camp is made of.

Shayna Murphy can be reached at skmurphy@student.umass.edu.

"Beowulf" pales in comparison to "300," a recently released film that used the same digital motion-capture format. There is not enough internal struggle to keep an audience interested, despite three battle scenes.

How meals for one can be fun

TIPS from page 5

Choose a meal that has some protein and fiber. It will keep you feeling full longer. Check the label for this information.

USE YOUR LEFTOVERS

If you don't freeze your leftovers, use them in other ways. Make a sandwich with the leftover meat from last night's dinner or put it into a soup or stir-fry. Using leftovers will save you time and money, since you won't have to cook again and you won't be wasting the food you didn't use yesterday.

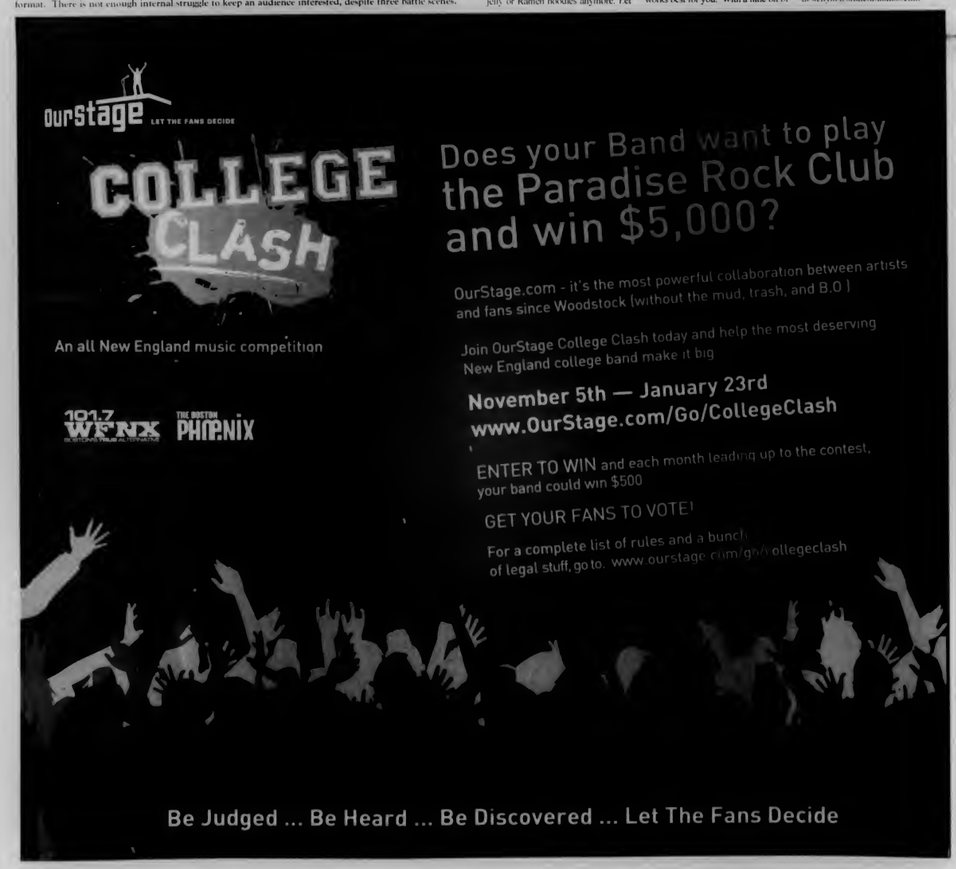
COOK WITH FRIENDS

This can be a fun way to visit and makes dinner preparations easier. If you each make a dish, you'll get a variety of foods without a lot of effort on your part.

INVEST IN A COOKBOOK

A good cookbook can be a helpful tool in the kitchen. A number of them scale down their recipes for one person. Some of them offer more than just recipes, adding in tips for planning a menu, selecting healthy foods, and reading food labels. Try "Healthy Cooking For Two (Or Just You)" by Frances Price, R.D.

There are also many websites that offer free recipes. Check out the Healthy Living section of Allrecipes.com.



Don't settle for peanut butter and jelly or Ramen noodles anymore. Let your creativity shine through in your cooking. Be adventurous. Try new recipes or experiment with your own creations. In time, you'll find what works best for you. With a little bit of planning and a few of these new strategies, you'll be cooking up delicious and nutritious meals in no time!

Kelly MacDonald can be reached at kellym@student.umass.edu.

JANE DOERFER

Books like "Going Solo in the Kitchen" give tips and strategies for how to cook healthy, good sized portions when living alone.

DeSantis hits game-winner

M. SOCCER from page 10

All season, Rappaport one of UMass's primary kick takers, along with Arikian, spoke all season about the importance of converting set pieces into goals. The assists were the fifth of the season for both Arikian and Rappaport, who share the team lead.

The UMass defense corralled the high-powered BC offense, allowing just five shots on goal. Simmons made four saves, including one in the 70th minute off a shot from BC's Chris Carey.

Simmons, Cook and Rappaport are among several UMass players whose careers would have ended if the Minutemen fell in Chestnut Hill. Simmons knew his team was capable of defeating the Eagles and knew the key lied with the forwards. This season UMass hasn't wasted nearly as many scoring chances as it has in the past, and that didn't change last night.

DeSantis' goal came in the 84th minute and was his fifth of the season after scoring none in his first season in Amherst. After he beat Brown, the Minutemen held back, focusing on maintaining possession and keeping the ball out of their defensive third. Against Boston University last Friday, the Minutemen nearly lost a two-goal lead late in the game due shoddy defensive play in the midfield.

Arikian whipped the ball in from the left corner and it sailed right to DeSantis who directed it past Brown. The goal was the third game-winner of the season for DeSantis.

His brother, Mike DeSantis, received a yellow card four minutes before his goal. The caution was one of four doled out in the game by officials. The Eagles held a distinct size advantage over the Minutemen and appeared to dominate the game physically; receiving 20 fouls in the game to UMass's five.

Obviously, BC planned to use their height advantage as a weapon against the Minutemen, but executed poorly. The fouls prevented BC from maintaining any real offensive flow and forced the Eagles to constantly start rushes in their own defensive third.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Mark DeSantis scored UMass's second goal of the game in the 84th minute sealing a historic victory over the top-ranked Eagles.

UMass takes one SIU

FOOTBALL from page 10

almost seems inviting.

"That's kind of where the bar is set to," Coen said. "We know it can't get much harder than Montana. It was tough this year, but only on third downs. Montana was tough the whole drive down the field."

As far as how the Minutemen have managed to lose just one I-AA road game (a 12-6 overtime loss to Rhode Island in a hurricane) in two seasons, Brown and Coen agreed that it comes down to preparation and focus prior to game time.

"I think we are a good prep team," Coen said. "We do all the right things on Fridays in the hotel. I think we're pretty good at that. Our focus has always been really good on road trips."

"If you're a good football team, you're a good road team," Brown said. "I think we travel pretty well. Our guys approach it the right way. We try to do all the same things in terms of our preparation from Friday night to Saturday morning the same. I think the more routine you get, the more guys understand organization, the more confidence they have in it."

The Salukis' running attack is almost the polar opposite of the Minutemen's. Instead of a single featured runner in the backfield, SIU goes to three different backs to carry the load on the ground. And that does not include Hill, who is mobile outside the pocket, picking up 281 yards scrambling.

Running backs John Randle (859 yards), Larry Warner (461) and Deji Karimi (386) make up the Salukis ground game, and although SIU has proven it has a prolific passing attack, their offensive play selection this year is actually fairly even, even considering most of Hill's scrambles were designed passing plays.

For UMass, running back Matt Lawrence continued his trend to closing out games in the second half with clock-killing drives. Lawrence gained most of his 183 yards in the second half, and scored two of his three touchdowns in the fourth quarter.

The redshirt senior has recorded 1,473 yards so far this season, the seventh-best single-season total in UMass history. Lawrence is in range of Jerome Bledsoe's 1,545-yard total set in 1991, currently fifth all-time, and has an outside shot at fourth-place Garry Pearson's 1,631 yards set in 1982.

Wide receiver JJ Moore is also in the midst of a run through the UMass record books. He is now just 10 catches shy of setting the career receptions mark at UMass. His 73 receptions this season give him 178 for his career. Adrian Zullo (1998-2002) currently holds the record with 187 catches.

Kevin Rice can be reached at jeremy@student.umass.edu.

Tight End Ian Jorgensen caught two passes for 16 yards and a touchdown against Fordham in Round 1 of the Division I Championship.

Woodward helps defense prepare for Hill pounds, Hill moves around the pocket extremely well and usually towards his left – something defenses aren't accustomed to seeing.

LEFTY from page 10

UMass defensive end David Burris doesn't foresee any major changes to the schemes along the defensive line, but feels it will be important to attack the right offensive tackle in an effort to hit Hill's blind side. But with the complex defense that the Minutemen run, the switch in the quarterback's throwing arm won't mean too much for the men up front.

"We vary every play depending on what their strengths are and things like that, so I'm back and forth regardless of the situation," Burris said.

But he definitely thinks that his experiences against Woodward these past few years in practices will pay dividends.

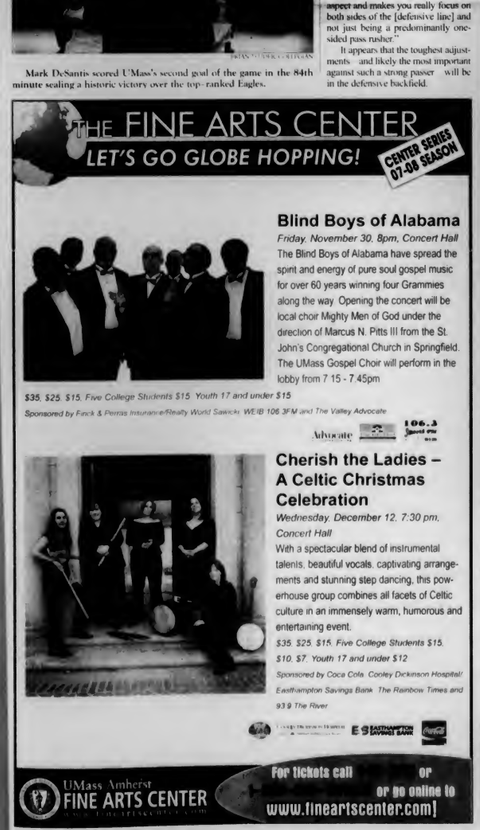
"He doesn't go against us every day [in practice] but it definitely does help," he said. "It just adds a different aspect and makes you really focus on both sides of the [defensive line] and not just being a predominantly one-sided pass rusher."

It appears that the toughest adjustments – and likely the most important against such a strong passer – will be in the defensive backfield.

"It's different. His strengths will be the opposite and some of the tendencies are what you would think a left-handed quarterback's tendencies would be," Brown said.

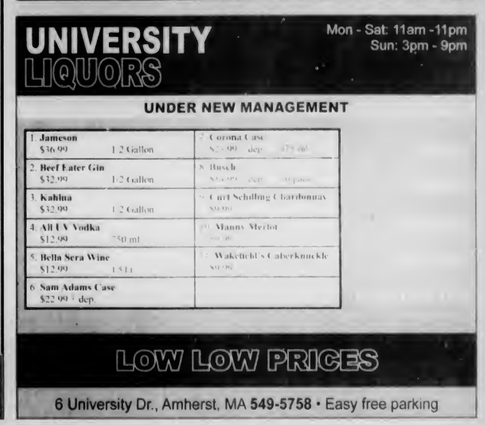
For starting cornerback Courtney Robinson, the only difference in his view is what side of the field Hill will utilize more often.

"It's really not that big of a difference, pretty much it's all the same," he said. "The only difference is depending on what corner you play, you'll probably get more balls, that's pretty much it. We get a good look from Scott going back to the spring."



Under Brown, the Minutemen have a steady, play-making defense that can handle any type of offense. The new-look at quarterback this weekend is something the coaching staff will make the players well-aware of, but in the end, defending Hill comes down to typical execution on defense.

But that won't be up to Coen or Woodward.



Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at erosenwa@student.umass.edu.

Left-handed backup quarterback Scott Woodward will spend some time in practice with the scout team, simulating SIU's Nick Hill.

NOV 29 2007

Fearless UMass wins inside Carrier Dome

POINTS from page 10

this game did make sense.

The Orange (4-2) shot 56.3 percent from the field, outscored UMass (5-1) by 12 in the paint (52 to 40) and grabbed 12 more rebounds than the interior-challenged Minutemen, and still lost.

Flynn had a superlative performance for a Syracuse offense that even the sullen and downtrodden Boeheim praised after the game. The rookie point guard had 20 points on 7-of-10 shooting, and got all of his teammates involved with a game-high 12 assists.

Eric Devendorf had a strong night (23 points) and Green and Arinze Onuaku contributed with 20 points apiece. Onuaku had 10 rebounds for the double-double and Paul Harris had a strong night (13 points, 11 rebounds) that was forgotten as soon as the final buzzer sounded.

But it wasn't enough.

Boeheim had the answers to why this was the case – he just didn't seem to know how to correct the problem.

"We just got to play better on defense. That's it," Boeheim said as he walked off the podium.

"Well, we haven't been able to fix it in six weeks, that's all I can tell you," he said earlier, responding to one of the many questions about his defense.

The Orange couldn't get that quick fix on either Harris or Milligan, who combined to score 31 points on 11-of-17 shooting from the field. They didn't stop Gary Forbes (15 points after halftime, 23 total) and they had no such luck stopping the 3-point shot for UMass. Even with Harris's struggles from the perimeter (3-of-11), Syracuse allowed the Minutemen to shoot 45.2 percent behind the arc (14-of-31).

UMass used clutch jump shots from Gary Forbes, inspired and physical down-low play from Milligan, and Harris deciding to take the ball to the rim to edge Syracuse. They showed poise in a tough environment, and took advantage of what they set out to do.

"They were really the younger team, because we have guys like Gary Forbes – a fifth-year senior, Luke Bonner – a fourth-year junior and they just have two true freshman, a true sophomore and two true juniors. We just used our experience tonight," UMass point guard Chris Lowe said.

After the game, Ford couldn't help but praise the perseverance of his team, but he was particularly pleased with the ferocious performance by Milligan.

"Dante finally gave us that physical presence we've been looking for," he said. All of his points came tonight on physical plays. This team desperately needed that. The whole game they were killing us inside. And finally we got a little bit of that back with him."

"I think my aggression carried over to the team and it drew up positive energy, which allowed all of us to play with an extreme amount of confidence," Milligan said.

Milligan missed just one shot. He was 8-of-9 from the floor, and had seven rebounds, including key offensive rebounds down the stretch. His dominating performance in the low post in the second half didn't surprise him.

But what transpired over the full 40 minutes surprised just about everyone.

Just not the Minutemen.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu.

Minutemen pull off shocker

M. HOOPS from page 10

directly in the front of his defender, shooting guard Eric Devendorf.

"I was surprised Devendorf let me dribble up and get even closer than I already was," Forbes said. "But I knew once I looked at the shot clock that I was going to shoot it, and once I put my hand up I knew it was going in."

Devendorf quickly redeemed himself for his defensive gaffe by converting on two free throw attempts to bolster his team-leading 23 points. Then an Orange defensive rebound resulted in freshman point guard Jonny Flynn capitalizing with a fast-break lay-up, cutting the lead in half.

The two points was as close as Syracuse got to regaining the lead that it had once owned at 12 points near the midpoint of the second half.

Syracuse continued to press, and with a little help from the crowd, forced Gaffney to call timeout while attempting an inbounds pass.

But Gaffney's second attempt was one of the most pivotal decisions of the game. He heaved the ball down the court, sending Harris and Devendorf on a foot race to the ball. In a futile effort to make up for lost ground, the Syracuse guard fouled sophomore shooting guard Ricky Harris as he attempted a fast-break lay-up.

Once the referee signaled an intentional foul, the Orange had no chance to come back with only five seconds on the clock.

UMass coach Travis preached from the beginning of the season that he didn't want his team to try to outscore the opponent at any point during the season. But with the Maroon and White establishing a new record for most points by an opponent in Carrier Dome history, it was a challenge for UMass to avoid that fate at times.

BRIAN TUREK/COLLEGIAN

Point guard Chris Lowe was an assist shy of a double-double last night with 13 points and nine helpers in the Minutemen's victory over Syracuse in their first-ever visit to the Carrier Dome.

The Minutemen lost the battle in the paint, attempted less free throws and was out-rebounded, but managed to hit 3-point shots and force turnovers when they needed to the most.

UMass made 14 shots from beyond the arc, shooting 45 percent. And that ability to spread its offense allowed the team to stay in the game as Syracuse established a physical presence in the second half.

"We wanted to make them shoot 3-pointers," Ford said. "They started isolating [center Arinze Onuaku] inside and were trying to get him the ball every time. They figured out that weakness and really exploited it."

With a 51-48 advantage at half-time, Syracuse quickly built its lead back up to nine. At 14-32 of the period, Syracuse had the largest lead of the game of 12 points.

Several minutes later, Brower committed an intentional foul under the Syracuse basket, prompting Ford to return junior point guard Chris Lowe, Forbes and Harris back into the contest. UMass continued to trade baskets with the majority of its back starters on the floor, gradually trimming the lead and forcing one of the game's seven lead changes near the seven minute mark.

Ford was determined not to let the venue intimidate its players.

"I told them not to worry about anything except playing hard and fast during the first 10 minutes of the game," Ford said.

The Minutemen established a fast start out of the gate, gaining a 12-4 advantage just over two minutes into the game. Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim immediately called a time-out after the Minutemen converted 3-point field goals on its first four possessions. But the Orange scored the next 13 points of the game to establish an eight-point lead.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen fall at Boston University

W. HOOPS from page 10

weren't made.

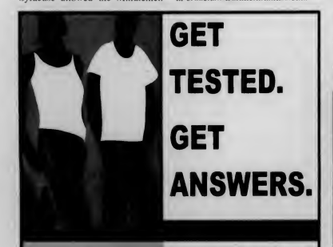
However, Mills was not the only one to struggle on the team the Minutewomen were 10-of-34 from the field in the first half, and hit 1-of-8 three pointers in the second half.

Pam Rosario was held to five shots in the game, and never got into a rhythm due to two early fouls she picked up less than two minutes into the game. After being removed, she came back onto the court with 12:48 remaining in the half, but picked up her third at the 7:38 mark and sat on the bench the rest of the half.

Since the Minutewomen lost to Jacksonville in the first round of the East Carolina Lady Pirate Invitational on Friday, Dacko says her team hasn't been the same. The players' confidence in their shooting abilities isn't as high as it was in the first two games.

"It's now a question of 'how tough are we?' and 'are we ready to go?'" Dacko said. "We can't be afraid because there's nothing to be afraid of."

One positive Dacko took out of the game was rebounding. The Minutewomen out-rebounded the Terriers 44-42, but they still gave up some second shot opportunities, and Dacko would like opponents to be held to one shot.



Stephanie Gerardot provided scoring off the bench, and led the Minutewomen with 13 points on 3-of-8 shooting. Backup point guard Kim Benton hit on just one of her nine shots, including 1-of-4 beyond the arc.

Starting point guard Sakera Young tied a career-high with eight points on 3-of-6 shooting, but six of these points came in the final 3:21 of the second half when the game was already out of reach. These points came in an 11-0 Minutewoman run that ended the game. She also led the team with two steals.

Early in the game, UMass used a 7-0 run to cut a 15-7 BU lead to one, but couldn't keep the momentum going. The Terriers weren't breaking any shooting records themselves in the first half, but their 34.4 field goal percentage was good enough to send them into the locker room with a 35-27 lead.

Starting center Whitney McDonald was limited to no points and one rebound in 14 minutes of action. ... The Terriers hit 8-of-20 three pointers, while UMass was 4-of-16 from outside. ... Burks Wiley's double-double was the first of the season for BU. ... Umez-Eronini won America East Player of the Game. ... BU scored 17 points off of turnovers, while UMass had nine. ... The UMass bench scored 27 points to the Terriers' 11, but the BU starters outscored the Minutewomen starters 61-33.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu

GET TESTED. GET ANSWERS.

Tapestry Health provides confidential, affordable care, including:
HIV Rapid Testing
Birth Control
Pregnancy Testing
Emergency Contraception (EC)
HPV Vaccinations
STD Screening & Treatment
GYN & Breast Exams
WALK-INS WELCOME

In recognition of World AIDS DAY, Tapestry Health will be providing FREE Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c), Nov 30th

Call or stop into one of our 15 Sites Across western Mass

MassHealth and most insurances accepted. If you are not insured, fees are based on a sliding scale.

TAPESTRY*health* PART WITHIN REACH 413-586-2016 800-696-7752 www.tapestryhealth.org

JAMAICA SPRING BREAK 2008

THE JAMAICA MUSIC FESTIVAL FEATURING ARTISTS SUCH AS: SHAGGY, BEENIE MAN, and much, much more!

Concert Dates: March 3rd, 10th, 17th & 24th

Book Your Trip Today! Contact:

1.800.426.7710 www.ststravel.com 1.800.648.4849

JAMAICA

Auto Express — Fast, Quality Service — Student Discount 20% off oil change

SUNDAY SPECIAL (Every Sunday 8am-12pm) : Full Service Oil Change $19.95

FREE WIRELESS INTERNET

Auto Express is your one stop for MASS STATE INSPECTIONS with extended hours for your convinence!

Monday, Wednesday & Friday 8 am to 6pm
Tuesday & Thursday 8am to 7pm
Saturday 8 am to 5 pm
Sunday 10 am to 4pm

Axels • Brakes • Bottenes • Mufflers • Tune-Ups • Full Service Oil Changes

118 South East St. Amherst, MA 01002
413-253-0056

Domino's Pizza

AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am-3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 593-9500

MY WINGS OR CHICKEN KICKERS
10 Buffalo Wings Plus Cheesy Bread $9.99
THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items $9.99
PIZZA & CHICKEN
MEDIUM $12.99 LARGE $15.99
555/777 DEAL
Three 1-Topping Pizzas MEDIUM $5.55 EACH LARGE $7.77 EACH
SALAD & BREAD
Any Large Salad Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water $7.99
FAMILY MEAL DEAL
1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Bread & an Order of Buffalo Wings $18.99

WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About eatingwell.org

comedy connection
HUKELAU
413-593-5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
www.hukelau.com

THIS SATURDAY!
From HBO's "Real Time with Bill Maher" and host of BET's "S.O.B."
D.L. HUGHLEY

STAR OF THE HBO SPECIAL "UNAPOLOGETIC"

DECEMBER 29TH
The 'carjack victim' on the final episode of "Seinfeld" and from the movie "The Punisher"
JOHN PINETTE

Campus to Career
Options? You've Got Options!
Wednesday, December 5
5:30 p.m., Memorial Hall
FEATURED ALUMNI GUEST SPEAKERS:
Genevieve Conlin '93, Jackie Govoni '05, Jamie Kane '00, Anthony Manhart '95
Alumni guest speakers will share a few personal experiences as well as their current career paths and the decisions they made to get where they are today. Come listen to a variety of options available to you upon graduation. Meet and mingle with these alumni as you explore their—and your possible future—career path!
FREE ADMISSION • FREE PIZZA • FREE REFRESHMENTS
To register visit the Alumni Association web site at UMassAlumni.com/students.
KAPLAN ALUMNI STUDENT ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Sponsored by the Alumni Association and the Student Alumni Association in partnership with Kaplan Test Prep & Admissions
Attend this event for a chance to win a FREE Kaplan course valued up to $1849!

STEPHEN KELLOGG & THE SIXERS
plus The Alternate Routes
SAT. DEC 1 • 7 & 10 PM DOORS 5:30 & 9:30 PM

ELVIS PERKINS IN DEARLAND
MON. DEC 3 • 7:00 PM DOORS 5:30 PM
20 CENTER ST. NORTHAMPTON, MA

theNEWDEAL plus NBFB
THU. NOV. 29 • 8:30 PM DOORS 7:30 PM/BALLROOM
Presented by IHEG in Association With Bluetortoise Productions

THE SWORD
PLUS VALIENT THORR, BLACK COBRA
SUN. DEC. 9 • 7:00 PM DOORS 6:00 PM/CLUBROOM

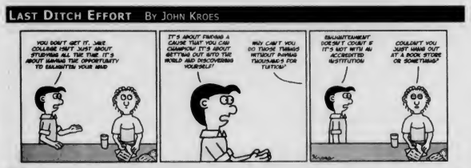
Pearl Street Nightclub 10 PEARL ST. NORTHAMPTON, MA

TO PURCHASE TICKETS OR FOR MORE INFO VISIT OUR WEBSITE OR CALL:
WWW.IHEG.COM
413-586-8686

Sudoku: a clear route to going nowhere fast.

	5	3			6
1		9	3		7			6
2	6			9
			5			3
		2				4
	9				1
				8			4	5
4			9		5	8		1
			4			9	7

QUOTE OF THE DAY



"Rivers, ponds, lakes and streams - they all have different names, but they all contain water. Just as religions do - they all contain truths."

-Muhammad Ali

THAT'S EDUCATION By Derrick Perkins

LAST DITCH EFFORT By John Kroes

LABRAT By Richard Martelly

ACROSS
1 Have a bite
4 Powerful ruler abbr.
7 Postal delivery
14 Magnon
15 Reed or Rawls
16 Some woodwind musicians
17 Critic Reed
18 §
19 Sawbuck
20 Canada's neighbor
23 Abrades to smoothness
24 Knack
25 "Nova" network
28 TV intermission
33 Candidate Landon
36 Lion's name
37 Threat ender
38 Short jackets
41 Forced inductee
42 Ashe Stadium event
43 Big's tab
44 Mach topper
45 Big Bird's whereabouts
49 Hosp. sections
50 Pool tool?
51 Typical patterns
55 Nutritional regimen
59 Adversary
62 The way in China
63 Mr. Zegfeld
64 Pekoe piece
65 Miss a step
66 Bog
67 Clan patterns
68 Forensic sampling
69 Understand

DOWN
1 Beige shades
2 Action title
3 Poisonous compound
4 Most senior
5 State of mind
6 Throbs
7 Couch denizen
8 Shelter a fugitive
9 Ice cream holder
10 "Beth" group
11 Small snake
12 Classic Pontiac
13 Superlative suffix
21 6-pointers
22 Singing group
25 Bombards
26 Military posts
27 Shooting at clay targets
29 In isolation
30 Ancient Scandinavian
31 Lingerie buy
32 Limp's relative
33 Assail with insults
34 Defeated rival
35 Dental care product
39 Clean as grog
40 Sleep letters
41 Took charge of 43 Daze
46 Fatty voraciously
47 "Bewitched" grandmother
48 Director Browning
52 Musical improvisations
53 Brawl
54 Boulder
55 Take off
56 Going by yacht
57 Slender
58 Work for
59 Ex Giant Mel
60 Shooter pellet
61 Golf score

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Sadly, this delightful little morsel was eaten by a 77 year old woman named Mable only minutes after this picture was taken. Needless to say, Happy Taco was not so happy anymore.

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You have eaten way to much sodium this week, eat some potassium rich bananas to neutralize the threat.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Somewhere between being a tadpole and a full grown froggy, baby frogs are known only as froglets.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Whether or not you actually have pink eye is irrelevant, what matters is that you look like you've got a diesel case of Conjuncto.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Don't bank on institutions of financial storage and savings actually caring about your personal financial situation.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Your roommates call you a fascist dictator behind your back. Quit being so bossy, Stalin.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
One adjective that perfectly describes you: floppy.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You are like a ginsu knife, no matter where you go or what you do, you're never dull.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Exercise caution when befriending small invasive rodents in your home as they are subject to random acts of dying.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
The French copy no one and nobody copies the French. This is probably because they call perfume "water of toilet."

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
If it itches, don't scratch it; it will only become inflamed and possibly infected. Seek out scented lotion and apply liberally.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Sunflower seeds are a glamorous delicacy but they can wreak havoc on the fragile fabric of your gums.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
There is never enough time in a day to achieve all that you want to do, that is why you must look forward to tomorrow.

Fill Me!

comics@dailycollegian.com

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price. Best Hotels.781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net.

APT. 4 RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

APT. FOR RENT

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY 1 Bdrm New Carpet/Paint-mlalli@student.umass.edu for info.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext.162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

ROOM 4 RENT

Large, quiet, comfortable, furnished, walk to Umass, on 2 Bus Lines for male graduate student/professor reasonable available Jan. 413-549-1578

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

SERVICES

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St. Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

TRAVEL

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices, guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

TRAVEL

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free! Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations. 800-648-4849. www.ststravel.com

WANTED

EGG DONORS WANTED Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Must be a non-smoking female between the ages of 21 and 32. For more info please visit our website at www.robertnicholsesq.com or contact Julie at 781-551-0600

NOV 30 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Bound for Carbondale

Safety Michael Meggett and the UMass defense face one of their biggest challenges Saturday when they face Southern Illinois' Nick Hill. The quarterback has an astounding 74.4 completion percentage this season.

No. 4 SIU plays host for quarterfinal match

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This year's road to the NCAA Division I Football Championship may prove even tougher than last season's journey to Chattanooga, if only for one reason.

Instead of a second-round home game against a familiar conference opponent, the Massachusetts football team will be making the trip to Carbondale, Ill., for this year's NCAA Quarterfinal against No. 4 Southern Illinois for a 3:15 p.m.

UMass knocked off Fordham, 49-35 last weekend to advance to the second round. Quarterback Liam Coen set the UMass single-game record with 419 passing yards while throwing for four touchdowns.

Coen may need to break his own record just to keep up with the Saluki's signal-caller, Matt Hill. The senior has thrown for 2,853 yards and 25 touchdowns with just four interceptions this season.

UMass coach Don Brown regard him as one of the most accurate passers in the Football Championship Subdivision, and his 74.4 completion percentage shows just how precise a passer Hill can be.

"He's very accurate and he knows where he wants to go [with the ball]," Brown said of the SIU hurler. "And if he doesn't have [an open receiver] he isn't hucking it. He's either going to eat it, or he's going to scramble, but he's not going to do anything stupid. That's why he was on the Walter Payton list. He's a really good player."

The Minutemen are not expecting anything different from this road trip, as they have been consistently successful on the road over the past two seasons, going 9-1 on the road against FCS teams over that span – they lost to Bowl Subdivision's Navy and Boston College on the road as well.

After heading into Missoula, Mont., in frigid temperatures and leaving with a 19-17 victory, Carbondale

See FOOTBALL on page 7

Left-hander Hill presents new challenge for defense

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts quarterbacks Liam Coen and Scott Woodward will each play key roles against Southern Illinois.

Coen's job hasn't changed: lead the Minuteman offense on Saturday, this time against the No. 4 Salukis in a second-round playoff matchup. Woodward, the backup to Coen and holder on kicks, will actually help out his team on the defensive side of the ball.

No, he won't line up at defensive back to defend against SIU quarterback Nick Hill. But he will mimic the star signal-caller during practice, in a way only he can. And this will provide a big benefit to the UMass defense.

Woodward is a rare breed of quarterback: a left-hander. Hill is also of the lefty persuasion, which is something that the UMass defense hasn't seen much of in game action. The last time the Minutemen faced a left-handed starting quarterback, their title hopes ended against Armanti Edwards and Appalachian State in the national championship game last season.

"It's just going to be the opposite of most right-handed quarterbacks," Woodward said. "Maybe they'll roll out more to their left than to the right, and just get the defenses doing stuff that they're not used to doing."

Woodward doesn't run the scout team offense for the Minutemen – a spot occupied by freshman Octavious Hawkins – but UMass coach Don Brown still plans on utilizing his southpaw quarterback to help his defense this weekend.

"We're going to use him a little bit, but we can't use him a whole lot. I can't take away from his preparation [with the offense]," he said.

Woodward can help the defense prepare for the different intricacies that a left-handed quarterback like Hill possesses. At 6-foot-3, 210-

See LEFTY on page 7

Stunner in Syracuse

UMass upsets Orange, prevails in shootout

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SYRACUSE, N.Y. – In a game with an intensity similar to the Massachusetts men's basketball team win over Syracuse in the second-round of the 1992 NCAA Tournament, the Minutemen knocked off the Orange, 107-100, last night at the Carrier Dome.

Though there was no last-second, game-winning shot, UMass outlasted Syracuse in an affair that saw substantial leads swing between teams as the game developed.

UMass	107
Syracuse	100

Senior forward Gary Forbes – a fifth-year senior who's no stranger to pressure situations – took over the game for the Minutemen in the second half.

"He made great plays and he was really on top of his game tonight," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "It was the best game he's ever played at UMass."

The combination of a cavernous arena and the 20,644 passionate Orange fans in attendance challenged the Minutemen to avoid venturing from its style of basketball.

"This was a big game for us – just like last year, we're road warriors," Forbes said. "Most teams would collapse during games like this at the Carrier Dome. We were able to come back and fight through adversity."

No shot was more important for the Minutemen last night than Forbes' 3-pointer with 1:11 remaining in the contest. The shot gave the Minutemen a six-point lead and was a devastating blow at that stage of the game.

With six seconds left on the shot clock, Forbes squared to the hoop and made a 3-point shot while

See M. HOOPS on page 8

Dante Milligan scored 17 points in 19 minutes coming off the bench in UMass' 107-100 win over Syracuse last night.

Syracuse came out on top in every category but final score

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SYRACUSE, N.Y. – Syracuse shot better from the field in both halves. They outscored Massachusetts in the paint, at the free-throw line, on second-chances and on the fast break.

The Orange out-rebounded the Minutemen, had four players score 20-plus points (UMass had two) and all three players who had double-doubles last night played for SU coach Jim Boeheim.

But none of them left the Carrier Dome with a victory.

That privileged stroll to the locker room and post-game press conference belonged to UMass coach Travis Ford and his group of seemingly "no-name players" – a group that set the record for most points scored by an opposing team at the Carrier Dome in its history. And all that in their first-ever trip to the fabled gymnasium.

"Every timeout they were really positive with each other. We were down 10 [points] in the second half and the timeout came, they weren't even phased," Ford said. "I'm just pretty proud of their mentality in a very tough environment."

Those watching on ESPN Classic and at the Dome were expecting to see the Donte Green and Jonny Flynn expose, not the Dante Milligan – "I'm never going to miss a shot" – and Ricky Harris. "I'm going to drop 20-points in the second half after shooting 2-of-9 before halftime,' clinic.

With the way this game turned out – a 107-100 UMass victory – it only made sense that not much in

See POINTS on page 8

UM upends No. 1 Eagles

DeSantis scores game-winner to beat top-seeded BC, 2-1

BY JOE MELOSI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The first half of the Massachusetts men's soccer team's NCAA Tournament game against No. 1 Boston College ended poorly for the Minutemen.

Despite a respectable shot total and six corner kicks, UMass failed to beat BC goalkeeper Chris Brown. The Eagles, however, took advantage of their opportunities, beating UMass goalkeeper Zack Simmons in the 18th minute to take a one-goal lead.

But UMass coach Sam Koch wasn't worried. He knows what to expect from his team. The Minutemen dominated the second half and rode the performance to a 2-1 victory over the Eagles.

The win qualifies the Minutemen for the Round of 16 and they will host Central Connecticut State this weekend. The Blue Devils defeated No. 9 Tulsa last night. The Minutemen most likely will host the matchup since they come from a stronger conference and have a RPI of 55 compared to 131 of CCSU.

UMass	2
BC	1

A pair of sophomores scored for the Minutemen. Bryan Hogan headed a Kenny Cook deflection off a Ben Arikian corner kick to even the score, and Mark DeSantis beat Brown with a header off a corner kick from Rappaport.

See M. SOCCER on page 7

The Minutemen completed one of the biggest upsets in UMass soccer history last night with Mark DeSantis' late game-winner.

Terriers too much for Minutewomen

BY MIKE CONNORS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball will be happy to return home to the Mullins Center against Hartford on Saturday. The team dropped its fourth road game of the year against Boston University, 72-60, last night.

"I'm extremely disappointed with our team's performance," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I just thought we were ready, we were practicing with a great deal of intensity, and I thought we did a pretty good job on the boards. We out-rebounded BU, and we just couldn't buy a basket."

UMass	60
BU	72

A 17-4 Terrier run in the first eight minutes of the second half pushed their lead to 21 points and made a road comeback nearly impossible.

When three players combine for 54 points in a college basketball game, it's difficult to win. Jesyka Burks-Wiley led BU, 15-21 with 20 points and added 10 rebounds, while Amarachi Uniezkomni and Cheri Raffo scored 18 and 16 points, respectively.

Freshman Teya Wright brought positive contributions to the Minutewomen 12-41 off the bench. She tied Kate Mills for the team-lead with 10 rebounds, and also scored five points on 2-of-4 shooting from the floor. The Patterson, N.J., native is now averaging 6 rebounds per game.

Mills, who leads the team in shooting percentage, converted on 5-of-18 shots and was held to 10 points, which was still second highest on the team. She didn't get to the foul line once, but Dacko thought Mills was being fouled in some cases where calls

See W. HOOPS on page 8

Alisha Tatham scored nine points on 4-of-7 shooting and recorded three rebounds in the loss the Boston University.

COLLEGIAN
WEEKEND EDITION

FRI ○ H:39 | SAT ⛅ H:28 | SUN 🌧 H:33 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2007

Race for White House hits UMass

BY JENNIFER BERGEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sen. Barack Obama's Chief Foreign Policy Advisor, Anthony Lake led a discussion with over 150 guests in the Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts on Wednesday.

The goals of the discussion were to further inform those already supporting Obama, convince those who may be undecided, educate students on foreign policy, and urge further support, all while holding an open forum for discussion as well as questions.

State Rep. Steven Kulik (D-Worthington), Mt. Holyoke International Relations professor Vincent Ferraro, and National Youth Vote director, Hans Riemer, were also among those who spoke at the event. The University organization, UMass for Barack Obama (UMFBO) sponsored the event.

The discussion opened with the President of UMass Democrats, Matt Giancola, and UMFBO chapter coordinator, Matt

See LAKE on page 3

NOV 30 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 60

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COPIES EDITOR Adam Szajgin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Mateya Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenwaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS' FALL/SPRING SEMESTERS. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. ESTABLISHED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1902, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN INDEPENDENT SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nicholas Belanger

COPY EDITOR
Amber Vaillancourt

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

Robotic UMan lends a hand

By Hannah Nelson
Collegian Staff

Artificial intelligence is alive and well at the University of Massachuetts in the form of UMan, or UMass Mobile Manipulator, a robotic arm, that is out-of-reach of the competition.

Children learn how to play with building blocks and stuffed animals, but UMan learns with garden shears and wooden joints.

The four-fingered robotic arm explores the movements of hinged toys in the lab that were created in order for UMan to gain insight into its surroundings.

UMan uses a camera, laser scanners, and sensors to 'see' and observe its surroundings before exploring without any direction by a controller.

"To perform interesting tasks in unstructured, unknown and dynamic environments, a completely different set of skills is required," said professor Oliver Brock, head of the UMan research, in an interview for Wired Magazine.

It would have been easy to just give UMan a scripted program and to work by manual operation. But with the method that the team has developed in creating a robot that can 'learn,' the potential for future uses is increased.

The fact that the UMan doesn't have a scripted code of actions that it can and can't perform puts a whole new meaning in the old maxim "if at first you don't succeed, try, and try again'.

In order for UMan to be able to deal with changes in its environment, it has to know and learn how to deal with various obstacles or surprises that cannot simply be programmed – it has to gain the experience.

"[UMan] can associate actions with perceptions…the information can be stored in memory as an experience," said graduate student Dubi Katz.

Katz has been involved with the UMan project for almost three years. Previously there have been about seven students involved in various stages of the development and there are currently about four graduate students involved.

Around three years ago, when the project started, and Katz joined the team, the groups was still in the process of acquiring the necessary hardware.

According to Katz, there are three phases to the project development: hardware, coding, and research. The team is currently conducting research into UMan.

"It's still a work in progress," Katz said.

The members of the team designed an algorithm as part of the coding process unique to robotics. UMan does not even require a human to imitate. Instead it starts with observations and 'playing' with a specific object in its environment, such as a doorknob. Once UMan recognizes and gains understanding of how the doorknob operates, it can keep that memory for future encounters.

The UMan "learns," functioning without previously programmed actions.

The goal of UMan is to eventually have robots that can perform the simplest everyday tasks of opening and closing drawers and to understand how to maneuver around an obstacle in its path. It needs to be able to react to the unpredictable events in everyday life.

"The very big picture is having robots in everyday life," Katz said in reference to the future applications of the technology. "[UMan] could eventually interact with real environments, a real house, real kitchen."

For now the work is concentrated on continuing the current research phase of UMan.

UMan's descendents could one day make the iconic image of a robotic maid a possibility. The range of outcomes is large, from mail room sorting and carrying groceries to providing home care services for the elderly.

Hannah Nelson can be reached at hnelson@student.umass.edu.

Networking club at SOM

By Josh Walovitch
Collegian Staff

Jewish Leaders in Business (JLB) is a newly developed networking club founded at the University of Massachusetts comprised of students, young professionals and mentors.

JLB has been quietly growing during its two years in existence and hopes that its upcoming events will get their name out there.

JLB is primarily a networking club meant to help students interested in business realize their career aspirations, goals and potential. The club hosts trips, events and workshops that help students develop their business skills and at-the-same-time learn to maintain their Jewish identity. Although the club focuses on Jewish culture, it is open to all.

The club prides itself on mentoring students and offering help with field visits and shadowing with internships and jobs.

For mentoring, students are able to meet with business professionals either on campus, on conference calls or via e-mail. Students are encouraged to visit these business professionals at work and spend the day with them. This gives the students hands on exposure in their field, giving the students career experience, knowledge, networking skills and connections.

The mentors who have worked with JLB often attend events and general meetings. The guest speakers are veteran Jewish business professionals who provide the club with presentations and discussions about their particular area of interest.

The club also assists students in locating internships during the school year, summer vacations and after graduation.

JLB is run in cooperation with the Isenberg School of Management, Hillel and Chabad. The club has a steering committee which consists of five students, each specializing in a certain field of business including, but not limited to: finance, operations management, accounting, management, marketing and small-business/entrepreneurship.

In addition to the steering committee, JLB's general membership consists of a group of 20 self-driven and highly motivated students. Students are selected through an application process which requires your field of study, career goals and academic credentials.

JLB has sponsored three events this semester thus.

These events included a program called "How to Start a Business" where businessman Lee Frankel spoke, another event had a panel of veteran professionals speak about what it means to be Jewish in business. UMass alumna Stu Rubenstein from Constellation Commodities discussed his experiences.

Next week, JLB will be hosting a fashion show followed by a guest speaker; Betsy Hilfiger, director of community affairs and the major fashion designer, Tommy Hilfiger's, sister. The event is titled "Dressed for Success," and Hilfiger will inform students on what attire is prudent in order to make the right impression in the business world.

Josh Walovitch can be reached at jwalovitch@gmail.com.

Investment club recieves $25,000

Cara Grannemann
Collegian Staff

Recently, the University of Massachusetts Investment Club attained $25,000 from the University of Massachusetts Foundation for the first student-managed investment fund.

For the past two and a half years, Investment Club co-presidents, Mike Schiraga and Drew Schwarz have been working toward getting an endowment from the UMass Foundation in order to start the nicknamed "Minuteman Equity Fund," according to an article by club member Andrew Dunham. The allocation from the UMass Foundation on Oct. 29 brings UMass up to the rank of other universities with investment funds, including Boston College, University of Connecticut, Bentley College and Virginia Tech.

According to Dunham's article, each of the four UMass campuses, those including Amherst, Boston, Dartmouth and Lowell, will each receive a $25,000 endowment, and will compete for the largest investment return.

Save for the competition, the funds given to the Minuteman Equity Fund will give club members the opportunity to use investment praxis on real money, or as Dunham's article states, "combining classroom education with the practical experience."

According to Schiraga, students will benefit from real investment experience and association with distinguished alumni. He also noted that the School of Management will get more exposure to alumni and will be able to appeal to a higher quality of student.

The club is made up of 25 students ranging from freshmen to seniors. Within the club there is a management board consisting of eight juniors and seniors. According to senior member Drew Schwarz, the management board is responsible for deciding how much to invest and what to invest in.

See INVESTMENT on page 4

Obama gets support at UM

LAKE from page 1

Cadwallader, who introduced the lineup for the night.

Kulik began by explaining how he knew Dr. Lake and had a great relationship with him.

A highlight of the evening was when Kulik announced his endorsement for Obama and strongly encouraged students to help make a difference by participating in going to New Hampshire with the campaign to show their support.

Lake later commented on how much the state representative educated him on the politics of Mass. Professor Ferraro was next to speak at the podium and expressed his belief and support for the Obama campaign.

"What we have to look for is a person with imagination and vision," said Ferraro.

Finally, Lake approached the stand to speak of his contribution and devotion to Obama.

Lake has over 40 years of experience in international relations. He began his career in the Justice Department and eventually became assistant to Henry Kissinger in the Nixon Administration. He decided to quit the administration when they had made the decision to extend the Vietnam War to Cambodia. Lake also worked on former President Clinton's campaign in 1992.

Dr. Lake spent nearly an hour professing his firm belief in the fact that Barack Obama is the leader that our world is in dire need of.

"Leadership is telling people what they believe, asking them to join him, and getting things done," said Lake.

He spoke of the many ways in which he is impressed with what Sen. Obama represents including, that he is an icon of change, maintains good judgment, and that he is real.

"He is real because he says what he thinks," explained Lake.

He continued to encourage the audience to get involved and show support by taking a trip to New Hampshire and canvassing with UMFBO.

Hans Riemer ended the discussion by reiterating the fact that the youth plays an important role in the campaign.

"We need to blanket the state, we are definitely counting on students in Massachusetts and everywhere to help us out," Riemer said.

The discussion was concluded with an open forum, where a few audience members were able to pose questions.

Cadwallader and junior Ashley Coulombe, UMFBO media coordinator, planned the discussion for UMass students and the community to experience an evening of intelligent discussion based on one of today's increasingly important issues, foreign policy.

"Matt Cadwallader started UMFBO last semester with high hopes and a plan to show UMass students who Barack Obama is," said Coulombe. "Over the past semester he has poured his heart into this organization and last night his hard work paid off. This event took a lot of time on the part of Matt and I, and other volunteers here at UMass, and a great number of people who believe that Senator Obama can and will be the next President."

UMFBO strongly urged students to join them this Saturday, where a bus will be leaving at 11 a.m. from Hagis Mall for the "Road Trip for Change." The organization will be gathering anyone willing to come and help canvass around Keene, New Hampshire. The bus will arrive back on campus at 6 p.m.

"I'd also like to thank the help of the UMass Democrats and the UMass Civic Initiative for giving us guidance and helping to make this event the great success that it was," added Coulombe. "The biggest credit goes to Tony Lake, Vinnie Ferraro, Steven Kulik, and Hans Riemer who took time out of their busy schedules to let people know why they believe that Obama represents the hope and change that this country needs."

Jennifer Bergen can be reached at jbergen@student.umass.edu

Anthony Lake, Sen. Obama's chief foreign policy advisor, led a discussion Wednesday to address Sen. Obama's campaign.

The Daily Collegian
WANTS YOU

WE JUST LAUNCHED A NEW CLASSIFIED WEB SITE (UMASSLIST.COM) AND WE ARE LOOKING FOR ONE STUDENT TO SERVE AS THE SALES/MARKETING DIRECTOR TO DRIVE REVENUE AND TRAFFIC TO THE WEB SITE.

WHO ARE WE LOOKING FOR?
YOU. THE COLLEGE STUDENT LOOKING FOR THE BEST SALES AND MARKETING EXPERIENCE AROUND.

WHAT'S IT IN FOR ME?
FOR EVERY PAID LISTING THAT IS PLACED YOU WILL EARN A COMMISSION FROM THE WEB SITE DEVELOPMENT COMPANY, CAMPUS AVE. THE COMPANY WILL PAY YOU 20 PERCENT OF THE COMMISSION YOU EARN FROM THE DAILY COLLEGIAN ON EACH PAID LISTING.

DURATION.
INITIALLY FOR 2 MONTHS AND THEN THE DAILY COLLEGIAN AND CAMPUS AVE. WILL DETERMINE IF THEY WOULD LIKE TO EXTEND THE CONTRACT.

PLEASE CONTACT GREG EDSON AT
greg@campusave.com
INCLUDE NAME, TELEPHONE, MAJOR AND YEAR AND A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF YOUR QUALIFICATIONS.

Practice.
It's a show stopper. And a career starter.

At Temple, we provide students with hands-on opportunities to learn.

215.204.1101 www.temple.edu/collegeboyer

November 15 | December 10 | January 27

Temple University
Boyer College of Music and Dance

NOV 30 2007

Club gets real investment exp.

INVESTMENT from page 2

There are non-student members involved in the management of the equity fund.

"Above the student portion of the fund, we have two faculty advisors, as well as an advisory board of extremely influential alumni in the Finance industry, including a former strategist at Goldman Sachs and vice presidents at Putnam Investments and Credit Suisse," said Schiraga.

As for the club's plan for the money, they are using a strategy called "sector shift."

According to Schiraga, this strategy consists of "finding sectors of the economy we believe will outperform other sectors and then finding individual companies in those winning sectors that will outperform the sector average."

According to a 2006 article from the Wall Street Journal, many of student-managed investment funds outperform their expected benchmarks.

With the money to be earned from the club's investment, the investment profits will go towards future investment as well as student scholarships.

"The plan with the money is to reinvest any funds we have until we hit $200,000, through both internal investment growth and external fundraising from alumni," said Schwarz. "Once we hit the $200,000 point, we are planning on offering student scholarships to UMass-Amherst students, though we haven't settled on any specific criteria to be used to select those scholars."

To prepare club members for a future on the management board, Schiraga says they will go through basic investment training.

"Another very cool thing that we are working on in networking a trip to Boston," he said. "This will happen when the new management board is introduced and will serve as a 'boot camp' to teach the next management board some real world investment techniques."

According to the club members, the $25,000 allocation is the result of many years of dedication to the idea of a student-managed investment fund.

"The Fund has been developing for the past year, and has been the result of support from administration, alumni, and faculty," Schwarz said. "This has been something offered at many other campuses and we're very excited to see it starting at UMass.

Cara Grannemann can be reached at cgrannem@student.umass.edu.

Tocco resigns

Stephen Tocco has stepped down as Chairman of the University of Massachusetts board of trustees today following increasing pressure from Gov. Deval Patrick.

The Boston Globe reported Tocco sent a letter to the trustees saying his stepping down was in the best interest of the University.

Vice chairman Robert Manning will continue as chairman until March, when an election for the new chair will be held.

Gov. Patrick has been trying to oust Tocco. Patrick unsuceessfully tried to vote him out of the position two months ago, and reportedly believed he had enough support for another vote in the upcoming December meeting.

Tocco plans to serve out the remaining three years of his five year term as a board member.

-Ben Williams

Negotiations underway

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

The recent student strikes resulted in University of Massachusetts administrators agreeing to preliminary negotiations between interim Chancellor Thomas Cole and a select group of 10 students from now until February.

The talks each week will focus on the four main points of contention for the student strikers: lower spiraling student fees, get police out of residence halls, giving student groups more control over student spaces and a stronger focus on diversity at the University.

On Tuesday night the Student Government Association selected the 10 negotiators who attended the meeting with Chancellor Cole and other administrators late Wednesday afternoon. The SGA sought to have the student representatives be reflective of the student body as a whole, including a balanced assortment of undergraduates, graduates and ALANA members.

The 10 students included Aaron Buford, president of the Student Government Association, Jeff Napolitano, president of the GSS, and Carla Dominguez, speaker of the SGA. Student Government Association and ALANA members Joong Kim, Rachel Daniel and Gregory Saint-Dick all were selected to attend the negotiations. Also included were Constantinos Savaros, a student senator from Orchard Hill, and Lisha Daniels, a representative from the GSS, along with Vanessa Snow, the chair of the State and Federal Organizing committee.

Chancellor Cole had been in Boston earlier in the day, and was reportedly rushing to be back to the UMass campus to attend the meeting, scheduled for 4 p.m. in his office in Whitmore.

Much of the first meeting was devoted to laying a procedural groundwork for how the negotiations would go forward, according to students in attendance. UMass administrators preliminarily proposed that all future meetings take place on Thursdays at 8:30 a.m., which the students agreed to.

Student negotiator and Student Trustee Ruth Thompson described the initial meeting as "productive," and both sides appeared to be feeling positive to go into the next round of negotiations next Thursday morning.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu.

College Students
Get 15% OFF full-price items.
Must show valid college ID. Restrictions apply, visit store for details.

Hadley
Mountain Farms Mall
351 East Russell St.

eastern mountain sports
EASTERN MOUNTAIN SPORTS

EDITORIAL OPINION

Friday, November 30, 2007

"The large print giveth and the small print taketh away."
- Tom Waits

www.dailycollegian.com

Meth madness

Joe Hughes

The worst drug in the United States has been used by everyone from Midwestern schoolteachers to Adolph Hitler, and it can be made using the stuff beneath your kitchen sink.

Meth's beginnings were about as pleasant as its long term effects. It was Hitler's drug of choice, used to combat his depression and speculated Parkinson's Disease. The drug was distributed amongst all ranks and divisions of the Nazis during World War II, but today it has become the product of thousands of labs dispersed throughout the United States.

According to the Drug Enforcement Agency, meth has become the No. 1 drug in rural America. Although comparatively minor in the northeastern region of the United States, meth has become the drug of choice on the West coast and particularly in the Midwest.

What makes the drug particularly harmful to those who use it is its low cost, highly addictive properties and its common cause of death. It can be smoked, taken orally, snorted or injected, which further endangers its user with potential exposure to hepatitis and AIDS. It's simple to make and can be created out of a number of easily accessible products – including cold medicine, household cleaners and battery acid.

In a recent survey taken among 500 separate counties across the nation, law officials in the upper Midwest revealed that up to 75 to 100 percent of those imprisoned in jail were there for methamphetamine-related offenses. People from all walks of life take part in this epidemic; there is no common age range in which the drug is most commonly associated.

We are a nation addicted to energy, whether in the form of coffee, energy drinks or Adderall.

At one school in Iowa, the town's epidemic was such a problem that grade schoolers were not even allowed to bring baked goods to class as many parents were making meth with the very same utensils.

The severity of the problem is demonstrated by the act passed by the U.S. Department of Justice on November 7, 2006, which declared that November 30, 2006 be Methamphetamine Awareness Day. Furthermore, meth is considered to be a weapon of mass destruction in North Carolina, resulting in a meth conviction of 12 years to life for each count.

Currently, one of the major reasons meth is in such high demand is due to its record high of 70 percent purity. Along with this purity, the user immediately feels a high that lasts between six to eight hours, whereas the same amount of cocaine would last a mere 1/4 minutes.

According to the Associated Press, an individual's initial IV intake of meth is equitable to ten consecutive orgasms lasting from a half hour to a full hour, with a remaining arousal continuing for an additional day and a half. Meth is therefore dangerously addictive with users requiring increasing amounts of it in order to reach a desirable high. The dangerous level of addiction, which perhaps surpasses crack, perpetuates all of the harmful effects of its intake.

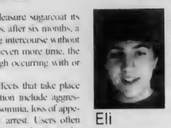
Its immediate effects of pleasure sugarcoat its long-term effects. This includes, after six months, a complete loss of arousal during intercourse without the aid of the drug, and, after even more time, the same sexual deficiency although occurring with or without meth.

Additionally, immediate effects that take place besides the pleasurable sensation include aggression, paranoia, convulsions, insomnia, loss of appetite, strokes and even cardiac arrest. Users often sacrifice both sleep and food in order to intake increased amounts.

This leads to compulsivity of actions, paranoia, and hallucinations of parasites crawling underneath their skin, resulting in the user scratching aggressively until they form deep wounds and scars on their body and face.

For me, what is most intriguing about meth is the fact that although it is the No. 1 drug in America, it is also the most easily manipulated by the government. Because cocaine and heroin are distilled from plants in other continents, they are less easy to regulate than methamphetamine, which is created from chemicals intended for the manufacturing of cold remedies. Additionally, there are nine factories dispersed across the world which create these chemicals, one in Germany, one in the Czech Republic, two in China, and five in India.

Although the American government has persistently enforced a number of regulations intended to restrict access to such chemicals, each has been flawed and subject to loopholes. However, although these restrictions haven't completely eliminated the problem, they've managed to lower the overall abuse of meth in the country. It is clear that if the right system is employed, the war with meth can in fact end.



Possibly the reason for the phenomenon of meth is the increase in competition and in work in America. We are a nation addicted to energy, whether in the form of coffee, energy drinks or Adderall.

The sad fact is practically everyone is addicted to it in one form or another. The illegal intake of Adderall has skyrocketed to the point where it has become a part of college culture. This corresponds with the ever-increasing workloads and diminishing amounts of free time. In this highly-competitive economy, everyone from grade schoolers and high schoolers to college students, parents and senior citizens, have resorted to caffeine and speed as a means to contend with their environment.

There is only one direction this phenomenon will lead in, but, as unhealthy and unnatural as this phenomenon is, it will remain. My belief, however, is that Meth is an eye-opener, a warning of what could be to come. Perhaps it's time to evaluate our society and consider that Methamphetamine could possibly be only the beginning.

Joe Hughes is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jmhughes@student.umass.edu.

The 'peace' play by play

Eli Gottlieb

Those watching the news Tuesday had the opportunity to witness yet another utterly nonhistoric event: the opening of the Middle Eastern peace conference in Annapolis, Maryland. Yes, once again the Israeli and Palestinian Authority governments have gotten together in the United States to eat expensive food (that still doesn't taste as good as their Middle Eastern cuisines) and pretend to try their very hardest to make peace.

Saudi Arabia and Syria have come on behalf of the Arab League – a group of the remaining nominally secular Arab states – to support this initiative.

While every leader at the conference may present a facade of strength, in reality they all have little and dwindling support in their home states.

Any student of history has seen this dance before. The Israelis will make an excellent peace offer of 90-percent of the pre-1967 "Palestinian" land, and the Palestinians will refuse it because it conveniently fails to include the one exact thing they like to claim they can't live without, like Jewish holy sites, including East Jerusalem.

Mahmoud Abbas, the modern replacement for the Egyptian-born terrorist Yasser Arafat, will give long speeches on how the honorable talks broke down honorably because the evil Jews would not make sacrifices for peace. Palestinians will continue sending bombs and rockets into Israel from their cities, towns and refugee camps while making their best collective effort to look like victims.

Malicious Israeli-Arab political parties will once again tell their cousins of Palestinian citizenship they have complete justification in not recognizing Israel as a Jewish state. In short, the Palestinian Arabs will continue trying to pretend that they can make Israel go away.

Then Israel will go straight back to demolishing innocent Arabs' houses to make way for new settlement blocks that ultra-Orthodox, ultra-nationalist Jews arriving from ethnic ghettoes in America absolutely require for the security of the Jewish state. They will continue to impose martial law on one people while allowing the settlers to live under Israeli civil law. They will continue to build roads only usable by Israeli citizens on land that Israel claims not to govern. In short, they will continue to occupy Palestine.

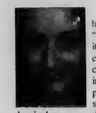
Still, we might have a bit more hope than that picture can give. After all, for the first time everyone jumping into this conference really has their future riding on it. Ehud Olmert's government can barely survive after the 2006 Israel-Hizballah War without the Israeli Parliament calling elections by claiming that they will make peace with Palestine.

Mahmoud Abbas's government in the Palestinian Authority has already faced a coup in the Gaza Strip and will face one in the West Bank as well if they fail to bring tangible improvements in the Palestinian standard of living through these negotiations. The secular Arab states – including Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Egypt – face rising Islamic movements demanding honest government and good lives for the people, and the United States has shown itself quite willing to give monetary and military aid to any Middle Eastern state that makes real peace with Israel.

Oh, and of course our current President of the United States desperately wants to try and redeem his abysmal failure of a foreign policy by showing that he can interact with the Middle East without killing anyone. I really doubt he has any idea what he's doing, but actually getting all these leaders together without riots or bombings still counts for something.

So while every leader at the conference may present a facade of strength, in reality they all have little and dwindling support in their home states. So while they will sing their usual songs of not giving a single inch of whatever it is they think they have, they really have to make some kind of progress towards a lasting, just peace (remember that killing everyone in the entirety of the traditional Land of Israel, encompassing Israel's current borders and those of aspiring Palestine, would bring "peace") if they want to keep their jobs.

At the same time, none of their peoples really trust them and none of their peoples would feel surprised if nothing happened. So the leaders of the modern Middle East could just take the free food and run, even if it wouldn't be their best move in the long run.



Who knows what lies in the future yet unknown? In the words of the Israeli national anthem, "Our hope is not yet lost." Maybe by the end of this the two parties can at least agree on the matter of each other's basic existence – Israel as a Jewish state and Palestine as an Arab one. That would be a start.

Eli Gottlieb is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at egottlie@student.umass.edu.

NOV 30 2007

This game is rated 'P' for propaganda

Leigh Greaney

If you've never heard of the game "Counter-Strike," it may be time to emerge out of the cave you're living in. It's the most popular first person shooter game in the world. You're placed in a combat zone stacked with your favorite weapons. Whether your cup of tea is a bowie knife to slit a few throats, a shotgun to blow off your enemies' heads or maybe a machine gun for maximum capacity kills, you can still guarantee massive amounts of blood.

Like most first-person shooter games, you can even watch your enemy die. They might cry out in pain as blood sprays from their head. They might grab their throats while violently convulsing on their way to the ground. If you're lucky, you might even kill enough people at once to pile them up in a giant heap of freshly pierced flesh. Then, you can take their weapons and be on your merry way.

This sounds a lot like something the U.S. Army would love to get their hands on. A killing game targeted at the youth's culture? Perfect.

On the first Fourth of July after 9/11, the Army launched it's version of "Counter-Strike" into the online world. "America's Army" was finally ready after two years of development to be played by anyone with a computer. The game was also a first-person shooter game much like its forbear "Counter-Strike," yet much different in the scheme of things.

What better way to lure adolescents into signing their life away than a video game?

First and foremost, instead of being $50 retail, it was free. Also, you cannot choose which side to be on, you must be an American soldier.

But it's more than just a free game. It's an effective Army recruitment tool. What better way to lure adolescents into signing their life away than a video game? They play for hours a day anyways, why not put them through the motions of combat while they are at it?

It's almost ingenious how effective the game is. Not only is it successful propaganda, but it is able to weed out the cream of the crop. It requires everything an Army recruiter could ever dream of, a young person with computer skills who finds entertainment in killing. This "militainment" approach is able to rope in its prey for hours a day with a compiled total of 112,122 hours of play a day.

Before you are even allowed to set your digital foot onto the battlefield, you must go through a weapons training course and send your firing range stats to Big Brother himself. If the Army declares you as a not-so-sharp shooter, you're not allowed to play. In other words, you can be all that you can be as long as you're an effective murderer.

Players are divided into two teams, one being the "Assault" group and the other being the "Defense" group. The Assault team loses a round if the time runs out. The two teams fight simultaneously armed with the equipment of their soldier class. The round usually ends with one team victoriously massacring the other team. Unless, of course, there is a tie due to both teams being eliminated or time running out for the Assault team.

To make use of operant conditioning, gamers must obey the "rules of engagement" with an honor system. Rewards are given out in the form of "experience points" and punishments are given by taking those points away.

You are rewarded for killing enemies, healing injured teammates, and for specific mission objectives. Activities that are frowned upon by the Army, such as friendly fire and eliminating objectives assigned for protection, result in a lower amount of points.

All of this honor can be achieved while desensitizing it's user to violence. By rewarding killing to highly impressionable youth, it only makes the propaganda more gratifying. It paints a picture that the Army is a one-sided, self-glorifying mechanism. Disguised by the facade of its realism, it's able to create an idea that this game is the exact experience you would receive if the combat was real.

The Web site says it all. It is complete with a link to goarmy.com, which is said to be the Army's most effective recruitment tool. Words clutter the homepage such as "the only game based on the experiences of real U.S. Army soldiers" and "Created by soldiers, developed by gamers, tested by heroes."

With a featured hero based on a real soldier, you can learn how to be a "real hero" while a scroll tells its viewer the seven core Army values. Loyalty, duty, selfless service, integrity, respect, honor, and personal courage are virtues packed into a M-16 holding digital character.

This is more than just a misuse of tax dollars. This is the degradation of a nation's morals and a political invasion into the youth's culture. It is blurring the line between entertainment and the brutality of war. This is a false reality / propaganda in its ugliest form.

Leigh Greaney is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at lgreaney@student.umass.edu.

Placing the blame where it's due

Matt Hoffman

We all want to save the world. And we all know that in addition to joys, the world is full of problems. It's often said that the first step to solving an issue is recognizing it. Therefore, it is important for journalists and those that set the tone in civil discourse to accurately portray the goings-on of our precious Earth.

I have heard many friends say, "The Middle East is a mess." I tell those friends to familiarize themselves with the key players there. For example, I point out that the charter of Hamas, the group which currently controls Gaza, states "Islam will obliterate [Israel], just as it obliterated others before it."

Is that the first time you've heard that a large portion of Palestinians support a group that refuses the Israelis' right to exist as a people? Not surprising.

Maybe you also didn't know that the official television station of The Palestinian Authority has proclaimed: "The Muslims will kill the Jews, praying man declares: "Turn [the American] wives into widows! Turn their children into orphans!"

I know that the Middle East is full of wondrous people and that there is bountiful potential for that region. Granted, I have not seen the entire Middle East first-hand. I am exempted by Lebanese, Sudanese, Saudi Arabian, and Iranian laws from visiting those countries since I am a Jew and/or I have visited Israel.

As a human being, I deserve equal rights in these Muslim countries. In addition, so too do gay Muslims, feminist Muslims, and secular Muslims.

The more time that opinionated people dilly-dally with inconsequential aspects of Middle East policy, the longer it will take for Jewish people and many Muslim people to be free to do as they choose in these Muslim countries. This situation is not acceptable. I am saddened when I don't see criticism unleashed at these nations for discriminating against me simply because of the religion I was born into or discriminating against a Muslim simply because he was born gay.

Is there any doubt that some Muslim leaders are inciting their peoples to murder others? Is there any doubt that some Muslim leaders advocate murdering gay people and cutting off women's clitorises? Does anyone think that these are acceptable goals?

And yet, Muslim leaders around the world repeat this hatred. Last week, after three bomb blasts murdered 13 lawyers and injured 60 people in India, "One wounded man was shown riding away from one of the explosions on a motorbike, bleeding profusely from the neck."

Now that the irreversible damage to this man's life has been done, this man deserves to know that authorities will work to ensure that the murderers who caused this harm will not terrorize others.

However, in the International Herald Tribune piece about the murders, it is not until the second-to-last paragraph that readers learn who was responsible for the bombing: a group of Muslims called Indian Mujahadeen.

How can enthusiastic students be expected to help this man if they do not know who committed these crimes or why? If the information about what is occurring around the world is not accurately represented in a timely manner to the American public, then how can anyone understand these Muslim leaders' intentions?

Understandably, it is hard to believe that anyone would want to murder so wantonly. It is easier to rationalize the killings. Much the way that battered women react when they are beaten by their husbands. The Battered Women's Syndrome often leads abused women to ask: "What did I do to make my husband do this to me?"

The woman asks this because she wants to feel in control of her situation. She can change herself, but not her husband. In the same vain, it is easier to believe that somehow non-Muslims are at fault for this phenomena of Islamist killings. But believing that non-Muslims are no more responsible for this Islamist abhorrence is no truer than non-Germans believing they were responsible for the Nazi party's murder of six million Jews.

With accurate reporting, one can see that Islamist governments evoke hatred of non-Muslims and some fellow Muslims in order to distract from their failings as leaders. It's about time that media outlets stop insinuating that Islamists who commit these attacks are blameless.

Positing other reasons for this problem takes away from solving the actual issue. If the plights of Jewish Israelis, Christian Americans, feminist Muslims, and Hindu Indians were reported correctly, maybe there would be a chance of helping them.

Maybe there would have been a movement this week to support the Hindus in the "Muslim-dominated government" of Malaysia who protested against its second-class treatment that non-Muslims are afforded in that country. Of course, the peaceful protestors were met with water cannons and tear gas.

As many activists choose the easy way out by claiming that we must be responsible for these injustices, the victims keep on piling up. It's time we tell the perpetrators: enough is enough.

Matt Hoffman is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mjhoffma@student.umass.edu.

It's about time that media outlets stop insinuating that Islamists who commit these attacks are blameless.

rejoice [in it]…The Muslims will kill the Jews, and he will hide…There are none who love the Jews on the face of the Earth, not man, not rock, not tree. Everything hates them…these pigs on the face of the Earth."

The television station that aired this vile hatred is operated by the Fatah party. The leaders of Fatah were in Washington D.C. this week because many people think that they are willing to make peace with Israel.

Yet, only a month ago, on October 9, 2007, the official Palestinian newspaper Al-Hayat Al-Jadida (also run by Fatah) printed a cartoon depicting a Muslim praying for the destruction of America. The

DAILY COLLEGIAN READER POLL RESULTS

The administration met with the SGA and GSS last Tuesday to discuss grievances addressed by the student strike. Was this a positive result of the strike?

- No - the administration would've met with the SGA and GSS anyway.
- Yes - the student strike made the administration take our concerns seriously.
- No - the administration did not agree to a public meeting.

"Results are not scientific; they not reflect opinions of the campus as a whole

A foot in the past, a foot in the present

FAC hosts Blind Boys of Alabama

By Nicholas Brown
Collegian Staff

The word gospel is derived from the old English, god-spell, or "good tidings" as we might say in today's vernacular. The gospels of the biblical sort are meant to be the teachings of Jesus as rendered through his disciples and various associates. Spread the good word and ye shall be saved…or something like that.

Gospel is also a musical tradition dating back to the earlier parts of the 20th century. Usually vocally driven, gospel music recalls the teachings of Jesus and Co. In combining high energy rhythms with complex harmonies and rich musical textures, gospel is a uniquely American tradition of making Sunday services rock.

The Blind Boys of Alabama are an ever changing gospel group that has been combining their own love of music and faith for almost 70 years, reaching out to audiences across the country. Tonight they will perform at the Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m.

Although the "Blind" moniker might sound like some unfortunate indie bands attempt at backwoods legitimacy, these Blind Boys of Alabama were actually united at the Alabama Institute for the Negro Blind in 1939.

Today there remain two of the founding members, Clarence Fountain and Jimmy Carter, who are actually blind. They have been joined in recent years by Bishop Billy Bowers (vocals), Ben Moore (vocals), Eric "Ricky" McKinnie (Drums), Caleb Butler (Rhythm Guitar), Joey Williams (Lead Guitar), and Tracy Pierce (Bass). Throughout the years they have released 60 albums and won four Grammys and still tour to this day.

Over the years they have moved fluidly with the times. With their first Christmas album "Go Tell it on the Mountain" (2003), a collection of traditional songs and hymns with recently popular artists like Ben Harper (who was featured on the Blind Boys album "There Will be a Light"), Mavis Staples, Tom Waits, Michael Franti, and Robert Randolph to name a few, the Blind Boys take on new approaches to traditional tunes. They've even been known to cover Funkadelic, Curtis Mayfield, Aretha Franklin, and Stevie Wonder.

Although Christmas has its most obvious roots in Christianity, it is also a time when we give of ourselves to those we love. Founder Clarence Fountain recalls his earliest memories of the holidays, "Christmas was the one day that us kids all got some candy and some apples and oranges. Didn't have anything else - we were too poor to buy anything else. But I knew it was Christmas, because that was the only time I got those things all at the same time - the candy and the apples and the oranges."

Imagine waking up on December 25, you're four years old and you walk down the stairs to see that Santa has brought you some oranges and candy. It's not hard to imagine that most children this day in age would balk at the thought of only several pieces of fruit for Christmas. They want a Wii or an Ipod. Clarence Fountain got oranges, apples, and candy. For most of today's youth it's hard to imagine that kind of Christmas.

It's also hard for most youth to imagine a time when the word "Negro" was still in use, but it was a central element to the world in which Clarence Fountain grew up. These were hard times for many people, especially blacks, and through the church there was hope. But church can be quiet, dreary, and quite frankly, dull.

By injecting the soul of vocal harmonies, community and feet-shufflin' rhythms, Church became not only a place of worship, but a place of hope in fellow man and the community that fosters us. Christmas is not a time of Ipods but rather a time of apples and oranges, a time where we share the fruits of our labors.

If you've never witnessed the power of gospel, you would do well to spend an evening with the Blind Boys of Alabama, for there can be no more legitimate gospel experience. The Blind Boys of Alabama were rockin' the pews in 1945 when Nazi Germany fell. They were praising the lord while J. Edgar Hoover was squeezing into a size 12 blouse. They were marching to the beat of the lord when Martin Luther King Jr. was marching to Washington. They were moving people to the rhythm of faith while Clinton was shopping for the perfect cigar.

These guys are the real deal, for they have been there and done that. They continue to groove even now, bringing their infectious and homegrown mix of soul, blues, and gospel to the University of Massachusetts.

Tonight the Blind Boys of Alabama will be performing songs from "Go Tell it on the Mountain" at the Fine Arts Center. The local choir Mighty Men of God under the direction of Marcus N. Pitts III from the St. John's Congregational Church in Springfield will start the evening. The I Mass Gospel Choir will perform in the lobby from 7:15-7:45 p.m.

Nicholas Brown can be reached at nebrown@student.umass.edu.

NOV 30 2007

Campus fashion from the streets

Emma Lifvergren
Collegian Correspondent

Winter has definitely set in around campus, but along with the wind and snow comes practical clothing. Not that there's anything wrong with that, but personally, it puts me to sleep unless there's something special about it. Keeping warm and dry doesn't mean a sweatshirt and huge boots have to be the standard winter uniform.

Courtesy Emma Lifvergren

Sara Afzal has a love of antique jewelry and this DKNY coat.

As difficult as it was, I managed to find some stylish people around campus among all the Uggs, leggings and baseball hats that have become so ubiquitous. I really applaud anyone who manages to brave the elements without looking like they're going to climb Mount Everest.

Name: Sara AfZal
Age: 19
Year: sophomore
Major: Journalism

How would you describe your personal style?

Well, I'd have to say that my main thing is looking sophisticated, definitely. I like to wear classy things, you know, styles that stay always. I like wearing a lot of black and pencil skirts. But if I had to describe my style as one thing, I really don't know the phrase, probably urban chic or something.

What do you think when you get dressed?

Well…sometimes I like dressing up, but not all the time. I really like, when I do dress up, to be comfortable, so I do like comfort. I also like to be original, I don't like wearing things that a lot of people have, but I do definitely love wearing good clothes, a lot of people at UMass don't.

Is there anything you own that you could never part with?

That's a good question. I love this coat, it's DKNY, it's one of my favorite things. It's just really practical, it has a hood for whenever it's cold, I just put the hood up and it looks so cool. As far as accessories, I love jewelry. I have a couple gold necklaces that I would never let anyone borrow. I have a ring from when I was little that still fits, I have small fingers. But yeah, jewelry that's stayed in the family and that my grandma's given me. I really like antique jewelry.

Where did you get what you're wearing now?

Well let's start from the bottom up. These boots, they're suede slouchy boots, I got them in New York, I don't think they're real. I don't know the brand but I think I got that at a store called Strawberry's. The tights are J. Crew, they're pinstriped, sheer grey tights. The dress is from Bloomingdale's, my mom gave it to me. The shirt I'm wearing underneath, three-quarter length sleeves is from Michael Stars. The necklace my grandma gave me, it's gold. The coat is from DKNY, I got it at TJ Maxx.

Any style advice?

I really just think you need to wear what's flattering to you. You have to know what shape you have. Whatever's the most flattering, wear that…and the most comfortable. I don't like it when girls wear things when they don't know their shape. You really have to know what works well with your body individually.

Name: Lhakyi Lokyitsang
Age: 20
Year: Junior
Major: Social Theory and Political Economics

How would you describe your personal style?

My personal style is really versatile, really diverse. I just like different things. I sometimes go for preppy, I just mix it up. I don't have a specific style, whatever's cute I'm there, I'm wearing it.

What's on your mind when you get dressed in the morning?

I don't think about it, I just get in there, look at things in the closet, see what looks cute. It all depends on my mood. If it's really rainy I'll want to be cheery, I'll want to wear really bright clothes. But I don't really have a plan, it just ends up coming together.

Do you own anything that has special value to you?

I'm not very materialistic, I can part with anything, basically. And I can rock out anything, so it doesn't matter to me.

What's your style philosophy, any fashion advice?

Just don't try and do something just because other people are doing it. Don't go with the mainstream, do whatever feels right and looks right to you. If it looks good to you, trust me, it'll look good to other people.

What are you wearing now?

Well this jacket I got from Burlington Coat Factory, I'm a bargain hunter. I got my shirt at Arden B. for like $8. I got the jeans from somewhere in New York, and the shoes at H&M.

Emma Lifvergren can be reached at elifverg@student.umass.edu.

Courtesy Emma Lifvergren

Lhakyi Lokyitsang focuses on diversity and versatility in her style.

comedy connection
HUKELAU
413-593-5222
705 Memorial Drive in Chicopee
www.hukelau.com

THIS SATURDAY!
From HBO's "Real Time with Bill Maher" and host of BET's "S.O.B."
D.L. HUGHLEY

STAR OF THE HBO SPECIAL "UNAPOLOGETIC"

DECEMBER 29TH
The 'carjack victim' on the final episode of "Seinfeld" and from the movie "The Punisher"
JOHN PINETTE

The Source

(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of Western Mass.

Friday, November 30

MUSIC

Mount Holyoke College's A cappella group, Diversions, will play their annual fall show in the Great Room of the Blanchard Campus Center at Mount Holyoke College. They will be joined by Colby-8, an A cappella group from Colby College. The concert will take place from 8 to 10 p.m. and is open and free to the public.

•

Iron Horse Music Hall's stage will feature the Mobius Band, Tigercity and Middle Distance Runner. The show will take place at 10 p.m. and tickets are $10.

FILM

At Amherst College, French filmmaker Christian Delage will screen his film, "Nuremberg: The Nazis Facing Their Crimes," at 4 p.m. in Pruyne Lecture Hall, Amherst College. The event is free and open to the public. An answer session will follow the film presentation.

•

Mount Holyoke College's Film and Video Collective will screen "Wet Hot American Summer," David Wain and Michael Showalter's film documenting a last day of summer camp set in 1981. The screening is free and will take place at 10:10 p.m. in Dwight Hall 101, Mount Holyoke College.

UMass' Friday Night Movie series continues with a free screening of "The Invasion," a sci-fi thriller staring Nicole Kidman who is trying to stop an alien epidemic, at 8 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union. In case you miss the Friday screening, a encore will take place at the same time and place on Sunday.

Saturday, December 1

CRAFT FAIR

Amherst College will host their third annual holiday craft fair in the Charles Pratt Performance Room from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. The event is free and open to the public.

MUSIC

Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers will be performing at the Iron Horse Music Hall. There will be a 7 p.m. show and a 10 p.m. show. Tickets are $16 in advance and $19 at the door. The Alternative Route will be open both shows.

COMEDY

Mission: IMPROVable, UMass's improvisational comedy group will put on a free show at 8 p.m. in Herter 231.

Compiled by Allie Roth, Collegian Staff

The Beer Dudes

Tradition and the secret of cask beer

By Tim McCall and Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Let's start off the debut edition of this column with a simple truism: college and beer have always been in bed together. The first president of Harvard University, Nathaniel Eaton, managed to turn the student body against him after only three years, in large part because he had failed to adequately provide the beer ration. His wife — in charge of providing the beer ration — admitted in the end that beer was "wanting … a week or half a week together." Prestigious Harvard dismissed Eaton soon after in 1639.

Fast-forward about 368 years; students continue to flock to bars and breweries to get their alcohol fix.

Amherst's own Amherst Brewing Company may just be 10 years old, but the company goes deep with its knowledge for the history of beer.

One style in particular that makes the ABC stand out is the cask beer. Serving beer from a cask goes back to the traditional English style of pouring a draught beer. While most bars in this country have modernized and adopted the process of pumping beer from the artificially carbonated keg into your glass, the ABC has kept to the English tradition.

Unlike beer drawn from a keg, a bartender must literally pump the ale up from the cask, inside of which the fermentation process has continued on naturally. For the beer patron with more patience, cask beer is the way to go. The average glass takes three or four minutes to pour and five or six pulls on the pint to clear the glass of extra head. According to Mike Yates, the process of pumping beer out of the keg knocks the carbon dioxide out of the solution and creates a foaming effect.

Yates — the ABC brewmaster of six years and a University of Massachusetts Alumni (he majored in microbiology) — explained that the process of brewing cask beer differed only slightly from that of regular keg beer. Freshly brewed cask beer is stored in a 10-gallon cylinder, called a firkin. Yates adds a touch of extra sugar beforehand to induce a little extra natural carbon dioxide, in the same manner that champagne or bottled craft beers. There it carbonates for only a short time before the breweries' patrons can indulge.

"I enjoy the cask beer," Yates said. "It's guaranteed fresh beer."

The ABC only serves porters, stouts and traditional ales from the cask. Pilsners and Lagers undergo a bottom-style fermentation with a particular yeast that requires colder temperatures to work than the cask can provide. Still, any ale from the cask is smoother and less gassy than a lager off the tap.

Typically Yates brews ales like the brown or pale for the cask. On cask, the brown was served at slightly warmer then room temperature. Not bitter, but smooth, the cask-style ale had less flavor than it's more bitter keg equivalent.

Likewise, the ABC North Pleasant Pale Ale possessed a thin body, not thick or overpowering in taste. Served with yeast still settling at the bottom of the glass and cloudier than its keg counterpart, the North Pleasant had a flatter, blunter taste.

Courtesy Emma Lifvergren

Amherst Brewing Company offers a variety on beer served from a cask. The traditional English style of pouring draught beer offers a unique flavor for adventurous bar patrons.

According to Yates, cask beer is fairly popular and comprises between five and ten percent of the ABC's beer sales. In the area, the ABC is one of the only bars or taverns that serve cask-style beer. Yates changes the style of ale in the cask on a weekly basis and about 80 percent of the ABC's beers end up on cask at one point or another.

ABC is not all about cask beer; the brewery offers a wide selection of homemade brews on premises. On any given night, ABC offers seven different local brews on tap alongside a wide selection of mixed drinks and sparkling cider. Still, by serving cask-style ales, Yates and ABC have successfully carved a niche out of a huge market in a college-town like Amherst.

Beer and college have gone hand in hand for as long as higher education has existed in this country. While the days when university students received a daily beer ration have long since disappeared, the brew still remains an active part of college life. In that spirit, head downtown and have a taste of history and tradition: cask-style ale.

The Beer Dudes can be reached at arts@dailycollegian.com.

School for Health Studies

Is your occupational calling in the health profession?
Would you like to earn a graduate degree in nutrition or physical therapy?

Consider Simmons College in Boston.

- Offering programs recognized by the American Dietetic Association to prepare individuals to become Registered Dietitians.
- Providing evidence based practice in physical therapy.

Doctorate in Physical Therapy (D.P.T.)
January 1, 2008 for June 2008 entry

Nutrition (Master's and Certificates)
March 1, 2008 for May 2008 entry

All programs are nationally accredited and academically excellent campus housing available. Located just blocks away from the Harvard University hospitals where Simmons students complete their clinical rotations and internships.

School for Health Studies · 300 The Fenway · Boston, MA 02115
www.simmons.edu · shs@simmons.edu · 617.521.2605

SIMMONS
A WOMEN'S COLLEGE OF DISTINCTION

NOV 30 2007

Minutemen host CCSU next

BRIAN TUCCIO/COLLEGIAN

Bryan Hogan scored one of UMass's two goals against top-ranked BC Wednesday.

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

To truly understand the heights the Massachusetts men's soccer team has reached in its NCAA Tournament run, it only requires a look at the frequency it's played two of its three opponents.

The Minutemen defeated the tournament's top seed, Boston College, 2-1, Wednesday in Chestnut Hill. The win marked the first over the Eagles since 1987. And their next opponent, Central Connecticut State, hasn't been to Amherst since 1986. UMass won that matchup, the only one between the two schools.

Against BC, the Minutemen welcomed the underdog role because it guaranteed they wouldn't think about anything beyond that match. But the Blue Devils put together an improbable run of their own in the first two rounds of the tournament – defeating Harvard and ninth-seeded Tulsa, 3-2, on the road.

"We've got an opponent that I saw play against Harvard, [CCSU] is scary. They've got some players," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "I think we'll match up pretty well. [The Blue Devils] played two teams that didn't respect them. But that won't happen with us."

Junior Yan Klukowski poses a dangerous threat from the CCSU midfield. In wins over HU and TU, he totaled five points with a pair of goals and three assists. He factored in all three goals against the Golden Hurricanes in completely different fashions.

His goal came off an unstoppable shot from just inside the penalty area. But his passing ability is where he can hurt any team in the country. A perfectly lofted lob led to the second CCSU goal, and his vision led to the third, as he found a teammate open in front of the net and hit him for the score.

UMass junior midfielder Mike DeSantis, who scored the game-winner against BC, must stay with Klukowski. DeSantis is unquestionably the best defensive midfielder on the UMass roster and can't allow Klukowski too much space to roam, especially in the UMass defensive third.

But he's not the only CCSU player who can hurt the Minutemen. For the second straight game, center back Chris Brown will have another player sharing his name to worry about. Blue Devil freshman forward Christopher Brown matches the UMass defender in size and should provide for some interesting battles in the air in front of the UMass goal.

Koch feels that against BC, the Minutemen played reserved in awe of the Eagles seeding and the specter of moving onto the round of 16. The Minutemen eventually relaxed and took the game over. He only hopes that, against CCSU, the opposite doesn't become true.

"I couldn't be prouder of this group. They didn't just go out there and upset [BC]. They beat them. Even the BC players talked about how we just took it to them in the second half," Koch said.

"Sometimes you play against a team with a name on a shirt that you respect too much. But you've got too really understand what's inside the shirt first. But now we know we can play with anyone. When we beat Saint Louis at Saint Louis, we showed everybody that we were capable of incredible things. But, could we do it day in and day out? That's always the question. Right we are because we finally molded as a group at the right time."

The Minutemen scored both of their goals off set pieces in the win over BC, and one of the two against BU was a product of another well executed penalty kick.

Redshirt junior Doug Rappaport and freshman Ben Arikian share the duties for the Minutemen. Rappaport serves the balls from the right corner and Arikian does so from the left.

Sophomore Bryan Hogan and defender Kenny Cook are typically the main targets for the Minutemen on these pays. Although Cook, 6-foot-5, is four inches taller than Hogan, he doesn't have the same ability to leap and reach balls at their peak.

Aside from the standard ball played in directly to a teammate's head. The Minutemen also employ a play that allows DeSantis to streak in from his position in the midfield to the far post and deflect balls on goal. The game-winner over BC came on this play as did a score early in the season against Dayton.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am -3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 593-9500

Domino's Pizza

MY WINGS OR CHICKEN KICKERS
10 Buffalo Wings Plus Cheesy Bread
$9.99
Limited Time Offer

THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items
$9.99
Limited Time Offer

PIZZA & CHICKEN
MEDIUM $12.99 | LARGE $15.99
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer

555/777 DEAL
Three 1-Topping Pizzas
MEDIUM $5.55 | LARGE $7.77
Must Have 3 Per Delivery
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer

SALAD & BREAD
Any Large Salad, Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water
$7.99
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer

FAMILY MEAL DEAL
1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Bread & an Order of Buffalo Wings
$18.99
Deep Dish Extra • Limited Time Offer

WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

FACTORY DIRECT
DISCOUNT MATTRESS WAREHOUSE INC.
LOWEST PRICES IN THE VALLEY MATTRESSES
FROM $11
FUTON MATTRESSES
FROM $11
FUTON FRAMES
FROM $118
PLATFORM BEDS
100% HARDWOOD
FROM $241

To the 'Jungle'

Following SU upset, UMass travels to IUPUI for first time

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

In the final minutes of Wednesday's historic upset victory over Syracuse at the Carrier Dome, the Massachusetts men's basketball team exhibited impressive resolve and focus to edge the Orange in front of 20,644 screaming faithful.

The UMass coaching staff and players celebrated the 107-100 victory quickly and quietly, choosing to set aside the win and focus more on the future rather than the present.

The future is a first-ever meeting with Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis tomorrow night in Indianapolis, Ind., in an environment vastly different to what the Minutemen (5-1) experienced against Syracuse. The IUPUI Gymnasium, otherwise known as "The Jungle," seats just 1,215 to create more of a high school game atmosphere. The Carrier Dome seats 33,000.

"We can only cherish this one for one night, and then tomorrow we got to work on IUPUI," point guard Chris Lowe said Wednesday night after the game. "They are a great team and we just got to keep on. We just can't have one great night."

The Jaguars (4-2) have won three straight games and are 2-0 at home. Coach Ron Hunter and IUPUI defeated Alaska, Chicago State and South Carolina Upstate before having a week off to prepare for the Minutemen.

The Jaguars fell to the only well-known program they've played this season, losing at Marquette, 76-68, in their season-opener on Nov. 10.

BRIAN TUCCIO/COLLEGIAN

Chris Lowe recorded 13 points and nine boards in Wednesday's win over Syracuse.

Both teams have four players averaging double-digits in scoring, and shoot extremely well from 3-point range. IUPUI has connected on 40 percent of their attempts (42-for-105) and the Minutemen are right there at 39.9 percent (65-for-163). UMass hits over 10 shots per game on average from the perimeter, including 14 against the Orange Wednesday.

A trio of veteran guards leads the Jaguars offensively. Junior George Hill is the team-leader in points (20.8 per game), rebounds (6 per game) and assists (3.6). Senior Austin Montgomery averaged 13.3 points per night and senior Jon Avery is second on the team with his 15.2 scoring average.

Gary Forbes and Ricky Harris continue to lead the Minutemen. Forbes matched his season average with 23 points against SU and Harris had a game-high 25 points. Dante Milligan had an identical 8-for-9 shooting and 17-point performance against Syracuse that he had versus Yale on Nov. 14. Etienne Brower has provided a spark from the outside with his 62.7 percent shooting from deep – a figure that ranks second in the country.

The Jaguars have an edge against UMass on the glass as they hold a plus-8.8 rebounding margin over their opponents. The Minutemen have struggled in the rebounding department, having been out-rebounded by over six per game.

Game notes

IUPUI finished 15-15 last season, including a 7-7 mark in the Summit League … The Jaguars have attempted 40 more free-throws than their opponents, and have hit 78.2 percent from the line … The 107 point scored by the Minutemen against SU was their highest-scoring output in the regular season since a 110-97 victory over Duquesne on Jan.6, 1977 … The Minutemen traveled straight to Indianapolis after defeating Syracuse.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosenswa@student.umass.edu.

BRIAN TUCCIO/COLLEGIAN

Gary Forbes is averaging a team-high 23 points per game this season.

UM working on 'D'

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

According to UMass coach Travis Ford, defense is still a work in progress for the Massachusetts men's basketball team. Yet it was good enough Wednesday night to allow the team to escape the Carrier Dome with a 107-100 victory over Syracuse.

The Minutemen played aggressive defense against the Orange, executing a variety of zone and man-to-man sets. The team also employed a full-court press during most of the contest, which allowed UMass to create multiple turnovers.

UMass Basketball

"We pressed every single possession of the game," Ford said. "We used one of our six presses on every possession."

But Ford knows his team still has work to do since it allowed the Orange to reach the century mark in points.

"Our defense is nothing to write home about and we have to get better at it," Ford said.

Meanwhile, the Orange employed a zone defense. A man-to-man set would have been more effective against UMass's pass-heavy offense. But the Orange would have struggled to execute it correctly if it was having trouble with zone, which is typically an easier defense to run.

Lasme to NBDL

Just under two weeks after being waived by the Golden State Warriors, Stephane Lasme signed with the Los Angeles Lakers' affiliate of the NBDL yesterday, the LA D-Fenders. The NBDL is the minor league of the NBA and serves as an opportunity for teams to develop NBA-caliber talent.

Bench Pressing

Even with many new players, the Minutemen have not struggled with depth issues yet this season. Against the Orange, UMass saw 24 points from its bench. Ford used a 10-man rotation – the typical number of players he likes to use per game – though, freshmen guards Matt Glass and Max Groebe saw very limited time in the game.

Syracuse relieved heavily on its starters, even as the Minutemen tried to wear them down by pushing the ball up the court. Coach Jim Boeheim played all of his starters for at least 34 minutes.

Flying Low

After Wednesday's win, Ford did not want the upset to make his team overconfident. Though he loves to defeat high-profile opponents and earn exposure for the program, he still wishes that his team could maintain a low-profile at times.

"We just need to be happy we won and stay under the radar," Ford said after the victory. "We want to be humble and move on."

Team Effort

Ford is big believer in the system mentality of bringing players in to fit a role on a team. In the team's win over Syracuse, the Minutemen received contributions from a wide variety of sources.

"Everybody on our team made a big play at some point," Ford said after his team's victory.

Senior forward Gary Forbes stood out among the Minutemen Wednesday night. Ford said he thought the performance was his best joining the Minutemen. Though, sophomore shooting guard Ricky Harris led all scorers with 25, registering 20 in the second half.

Other players contributed beyond simple scoring points. Junior forward Tony Gaffney had five rebounds and was on the court for many of the Maroon and White's crucial possessions down the stretch in the second half.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM

- Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
- More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
- Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
- Post unlimited online listings
- Little to no spam
- By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

NOV 30 2007

Mass Attack back in N.Y. against Big Red

UM visits Cornell tonight at 7 p.m.

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

The No. 11 Massachusetts men's hockey team travels to Ithaca, N.Y., tonight for a non-conference matchup with Cornell.

UMass is coming off a victory in its last action against another team from up-state New York, Union. The Minutemen (6-3-4, 3-2-4 Hockey East) rolled over the Dutchmen, 5-2, five days ago and are in the midst of a 4-1-2 stretch, including wins on both ends of Commonwealth Avenue, against Boston College and Boston University. But UMass coach Don Cahoon wasn't pleased with the seven-game stretch after a loss to Vermont on Nov. 20.

"Our guys knew coming off the game in Vermont that it wasn't a good enough effort. There wasn't enough focus and the results weren't there," he said. "We have to be prepared no matter who we play or where we play. And that's something we really focused on."

The Big Red have lost two of their last three games after winning three straight. After reaching the Midwest Regional Final of the 2006 NCAA Division 1 Men's Ice Hockey Tournament, CU (4-4-0, 4-2-0 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Hockey League) has fallen into a state of mediocrity. Last season, it finished one game over .500 and has struggled with consistency again in the early stages of 2007-08.

Historically, the Big Red are among the elite programs in college hockey and despite their current state, Cahoon expects a fight from his opponent.

The win over Union produced a season-high shot total of 55 for the Minutemen. After some struggles to produce scoring chances early in the season, Cahoon demanded that his team get more pucks to the net. Defensemen have become regular scoring threats for the Minutemen. Senior captain Mike Kostka and sophomore Justin Braun are among UMass's leading scorers.

Against Union, sophomore Will Ortiz did not play. Cahoon said that keeping Ortiz off the ice was more of a precaution than anything. He is questionable for the matchup with Cornell.

Ortiz' absence opened a spot on the wing for the Minutemen. Sophomore Martin Nolet, normally a defender, filled in for Ortiz and scored a goal. Despite the success, the move is not a permanent one. Nolet was a healthy scratch for the Minutemen in the three games prior to the Union win. It does, however, give more depth to a UMass team that struggled with injury at times this season. Sophomore center Brett Watson also missed time earlier this season with a broken finger.

Sophomore goaltender Dan Meyers saw his first action since the second game of the season in the win over Union. Freshman Paul Dainton played well with Meyers out of the lineup. It is unclear at the moment whether Dainton will resume his role as starting goaltender or Cahoon will return to his original plan to rotate the pair. In 11 games played, Dainton posted a 4-3-4 record with a 2.30 goals-against average.

The Minutemen also have an exhibition game this weekend against the United States Under-18 National Team.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Brian Tenerelli/Collegian

Sophomore Justin Braun leads UMass defenseman in scoring with nine points on three goals and six assists, good enough for second overall on the team.

Minutewomen look to snap 4-game slide

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will try to snap a four-game losing streak when they host Hartford tomorrow at the Mullins Center.

If they are to do so, the Minutewomen (2-4) will have to beat a Hartford team that has won six games in a row since dropping its season opener to Kansas on Nov. 11.

The Hawks (6-1) are led by senior Danielle Hood. The 6-foot-1 inch forward/center is averaging just under 20 points-per-game, and was named to the America East All-Conference first team her previous two seasons. It hasn't taken her long to start picking up awards this year either. Hood is currently two-time defending America East Player of the Week.

Joining Hood in the frontcourt is Diana Delva. The sophomore is averaging nearly 12 points-per-game and leads the team with 6.4 rebounds per-game.

The Minutewomen will counter with Kate Mills as their main offensive threat in the frontcourt. She is averaging 16.8 points on the season, but is coming off her poorest game of the year. Against Boston University she was 5-of-18 from the floor, but did grab 10 rebounds.

Mills' 10 rebounds led the team along with Teya Wright. Wright is a talented freshman who can provide the Minutewomen with defensive energy off of the bench, and she has been seeing more time recently, especially with starting center Whitney McDonald averaging 2.2 points and 1.8 rebounds per-game.

UMass has had good success in their two home games this season. They had early victories over Vermont and Boston College to propel them to a 2-0 start, but then failed to win a game on the road.

Going on the road will be nothing new to Hartford. It has played four of six games on the road, and has scored wins over Providence, Brigham Young and Hawaii away from home.

One important player the Minutewomen will need to get better play from is sophomore guard Kim Benton. Along with Stephanie Gerardot, Benton is the Minutewomen's best pure shooter, but has converted of 5-of-19 attempts from beyond the arc during the team's four-game losing streak.

Foul trouble has also been an issue for UMass recently. Starting point guard Sakera Young got into first half foul trouble against Northeastern, and the same problem plagued Pam Rosanio against BU.

Young is an important member of the team because of her ability to drive to the hoop and find her teammates. She is also one of the better defenders on the team. Rosanio is considered the team's emotional leader, and is one of the top-two scoring options.

Rebounding could play a major factor in this game. The Minutewomen have been getting outworked on the glass by nearly six rebounds a game this season, but coach Marnie Dacko was pleased with their performance on the glass against BU.

Hartford doesn't have anyone who dominates on the boards, but it has outrebounded opponents by four rebounds-per-game. Dacko wants opponents limited to one shot, so offensive rebounds will be a category to watch for.

UMass had three players that play at least 30 minutes per-game. Rosanio and Alicia Tatham average right around 30 minutes, while Mills leads the team with 34 minutes per game.

The Hawks use their bench more and no one averages more than 27 minutes per-game. Hartford will need defenders to guard Mills, who can score from inside and outside, and they may need to continue to use their depth.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Senior Pam Rosanio is averaging 14.5 points per game, second only to Kate Mills.

Swimmers, divers take talents on road this weekend

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming and diving teams will each have their own agendas this weekend. The men's team will participate in an intrasquad pentathlon, which will be treated like a dual-meet. The women's team will face the Northeastern Huskies in a dual-meet, and the divers will be in New Brunswick, N.J., for the Galbraith Diving Invitational.

The divers take the momentum from the Invitational in which both junior Karen Upperco and senior captain R.J. Rappe placed second in the one- and three-meter dives into the Galbraith Diving Invitational at Rutgers University.

This is the biggest meet of the season to date for the divers. Diving coach Mandy Hixon chose three men and three women to take to this event. Rappe and freshmen Adam Duffield and Zach Lichter will represent the men. Upperco, freshman Anne Fogerty and junior Sarah Horstmann will represent the women.

"This is the meet where I really see if they can compete [at the collegiate level]," Hixon said.

A diver typically works on a specific set of dives for each individual meet. The difference between the one-meter and three-meter dives is the amount of time one has to perform a particular dive. Naturally, more technical dives will be done at the three-meter level, but Rappe hopes to bring a three-meter dive into his set for the one-meter this weekend.

"When you bring a new dive into a meet, you want to have it be good enough to score well on," Rappe said. "A couple of new dives for me would be a front [flip with] two and a half [rotations] with a full twist on one meter, and a front three and a half tuck."

The Minutewomen take a strong fourth-place finish at the Boston University Terrier Invitational into this weekend's meet against the Huskies. Last season, NU got the best of UMass, overtaking the women's team, 160.5-139.5. Also, the Huskies won the Terrier Invitational, so women's coach Bob Newcomb is particularly familiar with the Minutewomen's competition this weekend.

"[Northeastern is] just a very talented group and very well coached," Newcomb said. "We're trying to upend them and do better than what we did last year."

The Minutewomen come off of a rest after the Thanksgiving break and they have not raced competitively since the Invitational. Rest will be a key factor for the team, as the swimmers are getting back into the swing of things and are beginning to pick up the pace in practice.

Naturally, constant practice takes a toll on one's body. Yet the team isn't suffering from any severe injuries at this point in time.

The depth of the Northeastern team is apparent in the Huskie's 13 freestyle swimmers. The UMass squad counters with depth of their own in the freestyle races, boasting 19 of these swimmers.

Look for an exciting matchup in the individual medley races. The Huskies have six swimmers who specialize in this event, while the Minutewomen have eight. One of these swimmers, senior captain Samantha Demty, believes that the team will use the emotion from the Terrier Invite to fuel them this weekend.

"Coming off of that meet, we were very positive," Demty said. "This week there's been a great atmosphere in practice."

The Minutemen will face a team this weekend that they know very well, themselves.

In order to keep his team fresh, men's coach Russ Yarworth had to schedule an intrasquad pentathlon, due to the lack of collegiate men's swimming programs in the area. Yarworth had the opportunity to participate in an invitational meet this weekend, but he felt that his swimmers have already traveled enough in the past few weeks.

The Minutemen are split up into two teams, the Maroon team and the White team. Yarworth left the lineup entirely up to the swimmers. The entire team had fun with this idea and even had a draft to decide the lineups. Yarworth, however, instructed his swimmers to take this meet seriously.

"The point of this is for [the team] to get up on the blocks, race and swim fast," Yarworth said. "They're going to have fun."

Senior captain John Weaver believes that his team, the White team, will dominate the freestyle and butterfly events.

"We have Nate Bromage who's going to be a strong sprinter for us and hopefully anchor our relays," Weaver said. "All around, I think that our team is real deep."

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT

REGISTRATION FOR SPRING 2007

The WRITING PROGRAM PLACEMENT TEST will be offered on:

Monday, December 3rd
7:00 pm
Herter 217

The test is the pre-requisite for enrollment in EnglWrit 112, (College Writing).

This test may only be taken once.
Students do not need to register for the test.

GET TESTED. GET ANSWERS.

Tapestry Health provides confidential, affordable care, including:
HIV Rapid Testing
Birth Control
Pregnancy Testing
Emergency Contraception (EC)
HPV Vaccinations
STD Screening & Treatment
GYN & Breast Exams

WALK-INS WELCOME

In recognition of World AIDS DAY, Tapestry Health will be providing FREE Rapid HIV Testing
at the UMASS Campus Center (168c), Nov 30th

Call or stop into one of our 15 Sites Across western Mass

MassHealth and most insurances accepted. If you are not insured, fees are based on a sliding scale.

TAPESTRYhealth
CARE WITHIN REACH
413-586-2016
800-696-7752
www.tapestryhealth.org

NOV 30 2007

DISTRACTIONS

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price, Best Hotels. 781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlali@student.umass.edu for information

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing. 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo. 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY 1 Bdrm New Carpet/Paint- mlali@student.umass.edufor info

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 Ext 162

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments. $10/hr English must be your first language. Email phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab. phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

ROOM 4 RENT

Large, quiet, comfortable, furnished, walk to Umass, on 2 Bus Lines for male graduate student/professor. masner9@yahoo.com available Jan. 413-549-1578

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906.1-800-550-4900 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

SERVICES

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St., Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

TRAVEL

#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Keep on Recycling

ACROSS
1 Solid paraffin
4 Skewered meat dish
9 No-see-ums
14 Wall climber
15 In seclusion
16 Boom box
17 Tonne or Gibson
18 Subdivided
19 Last one
20 Deep
22 Fanatic
23 Move laboriously
24 Smile sheepishly
26 Printer's spaces
27 Walkie's island
29 Get steamed
31 John's Yoko
32 Computer of 2001
34 Gardener's tools
38 Wistfully thoughtful
40 Fired clay
41 Perspired
42 Coffee container
43 Long scarf
44 Language
46 Huff and puff
47 Pop-ups, e.g.
50 Dine with regrets
51 Fly high
53 Transform into
55 Nonsense
59 Cover story?
60 Dishes
61 Get along in years
62 Chases off
63 Trail follower
64 Abel to Adam
65 Earl "Fatha"
66 Lifeless
67 NCO rank

DOWN
1 Timid type
2 Profess
3 Manitoba cousin
4 Toy musical instrument
5 For all to hear
6 Birthplace of Beethoven
7 Keyed up
8 Bunk
9 Tenderfoot
10 Dog in "Peter Pan"
11 Befuddle
12 Affix
13 Classifies
21 Winter bug
22 Stringed instrument
25 Save
27 How clumsy of me!
28 From scratch
29 Snow vehicle
30 __ Marie Saint
32 Haphazard
33 Means of access
35 Discomfort
36 Detroit football player
37 Go away!
39 Poised
45 Needy youngster
46 Butter serving
47 Disconcert
48 City on the Jumna River
49 Heir
51 More rational
52 Dizzying designs
54 Slender woodwind
56 Enjoy
57 Highly excited
58 Closely confined
60 Greek X

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

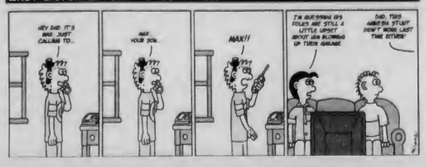
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Welcome to the newly introduced, magazine–style Weekend Edition of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

It's pretty, just like you.

Continuing & Professional Education

Winter Session
Classes begin January 2nd



Hibernating this winter?

Get credit without leaving your room!

REGISTER NOW

www.UMassULearn.net

LAST DITCH EFFORT By John Kroes

TO KILL A DRAGON By Jen Fell

amherst cinema
FRI 11/30-THU 12/6

NO COUNTRY FOR OLD MEN 1:45 4:15 7:00 9:45

You are what you eat!
DAILY 2:00 6:30 KING CORN

INTO THE WILD 3:00 6:00 9:00

LARS AND THE REAL GIRL 4:00 8:30 (NO 4:00 SHOW MON 12/3)

L'ICEBERG Mon 12/3 4:00 PM ONE SHOW ONLY!

SAT DEC. 1: ONE DAY SALE! @ Box Office Only! $5 MOVIE PASSES IN PACKS OF 20

28 AMITY ST. DOWNTOWN AMHERST
413-253-2547
www.AmherstCinema.org

Free Delivery to UMass
Menu Online @ andiamo.cc

				8
9					4		7	6
	6	2	5			9		3
2	4
		7	1		2	6
							4	7
7		9			5	8	6
3	1		8					5
				7

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are on a the verge of a massive cold, sniff as many scents as you can while you've still got the sense.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You have now been granted diplomatic immunity, this is your chance to commit espionage against Earthfoods.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You are a rock, you are an island.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Apply for a job working at Judie's and hit on all the waitstaff until you get fired. Call it a social experiment.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Whoa, Santa's little helper, take it easy. It's still a smidgy bit early for Christmas tunes and mistletoe molestation.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Improve your street cred by getting an apendectomy and telling people that the scar is from a knife fight outside Domino's.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are a purveyor of pleaure for the population at large.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You will take the "walk a mile in another person's shoes" metaphor too far and go on a shoe-jacking spree.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
God save thee, Ancient Manner, from the fiends that plague thee thus. Why lookest thou so? With my crossbow, I shot the Albatross!

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
This weekend is a chance for you to catch up on all the bathing you'd missed for the past month.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Quit being an ass and do something useful. Note: this horoscope does not apply to actual donkeys, burrows, or jack stocks.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You a magnificient piece of slickly sliced salami from a fine deli. And yet, you are truly alone in the absence of spicy mustard.

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
Now Hiring
Counter/Cashiers and Drivers

HOURS
Sun-Wed: 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat: 3pm-3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK-UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing Street
Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, MA 01002

QUOTE OF THE WEEKEND

"Everyone discusses my art and pretends to understand, as if it were necessary to understand, when it is simply necessary to love."

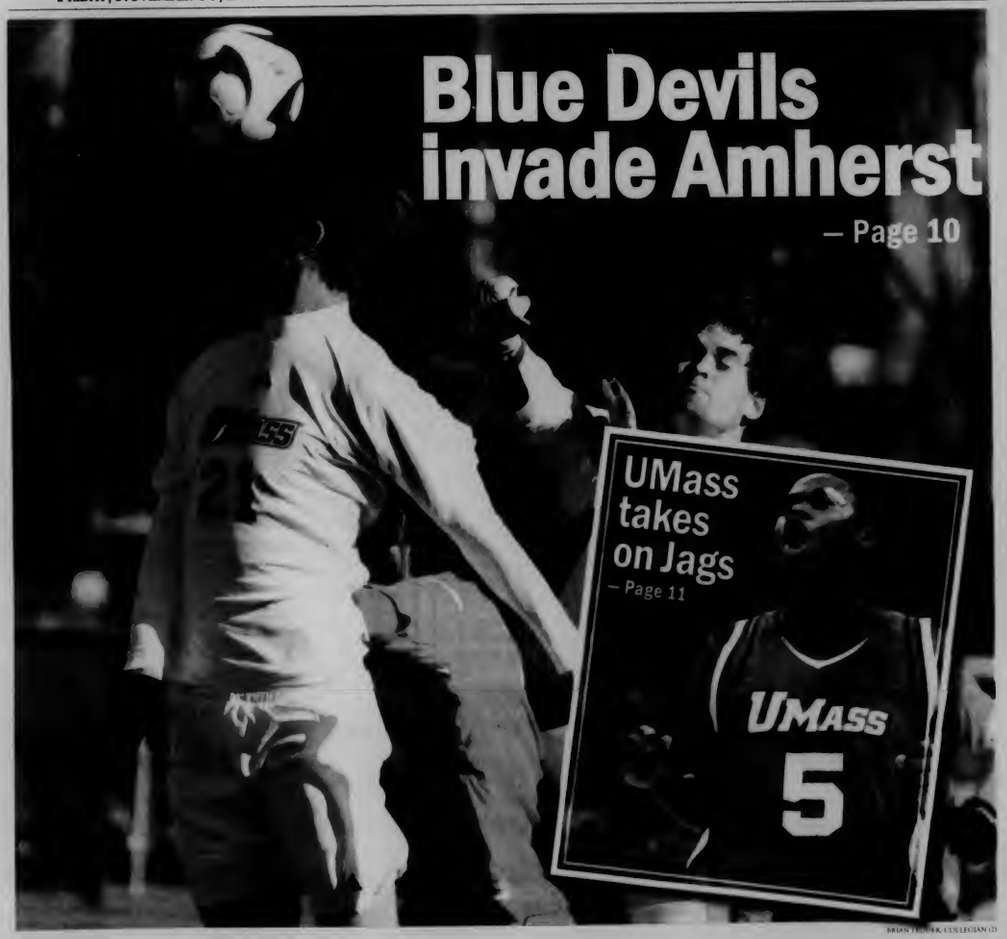
— Claude Monet

RESERVED:

STARTING NEXT WEEK, THE COMICS PAGE WILL BE HOLDING A WEEKLY CAPTION CONTEST. STUDENTS CAN GO ONLINE TO WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM AND CLICK ON THE MENU BUTTON THAT READS "CAPTION CONTEST (DUH). BY MONDAY, THERE WILL BE A PICTURE AND A SPACE TO SUBMIT A FUNNY, CRAFTY, DEROGATORY OR POSSIBLY LEWD CAPTION. THE BEST CAPTION WILL BE PRINTED WITH THE PICTURE IN THE FRIDAY EDITION OF THE COLLEGIAN ALONG WITH A CREDIT RECOGNIZING THE ALMIGHTY YOU.

PLUS, YOU'LL BE A CELEBRITY AND GET MAD PROPS (PROPERTY OF YOUR PICTURE IN IF YOU WANT.

THE QUIGMANS By Buddy Hickerson



"I'm sorry, dear. You love snacks and you needed a purse, so I naturally assumed you'd love the Hot Pocket-book."

NOV 30 2007

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 2007 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Blue Devils invade Amherst

– Page 10

UMass takes on Jags

– Page 11

DECEMBER

DEC 3 2007

'I'M NOT THERE' EXCITES DYLAN DEBATE | PAGE 4

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN
NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

WINTRY MIX : HI: 35 LO: 27 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2007

Library evacuates due to fire alarm

Amherst firefighters arrived at the W.E.B. DuBois Library yesterday after a fire alarm sounded, causing an evacuation. The alarm was not a scheduled drill.

Students forced to leave work and valuables for 45 minutes

BY KATIE HUSTON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

W.E.B. DuBois Library was evacuated for 45 minutes on Sunday afternoon when a fire alarm went off, leaving students out in the cold as it began to snow.

Hundreds of people flowed out of the library's two side doors onto the deck, zipping jackets and pulling out cell phones, when the alarm sounded at about 2:45 p.m. Though many left, over 100 students waited to retrieve laptops, books and coats they had left behind.

The fire department and the Environmental Health and Safety department arrived on the scene within about 10 minutes and were conducting an investigation, according to Jay Schafer, director of libraries at the University of Massachusetts. At the time of press library officials were unable to comment on the cause of the alarm.

Soon after, library officials told students that the alarm was not a drill, and asked students to evacuate the deck for safety reasons. Bystanders flooded the Student Union and nearby academic buildings until they were allowed back in at 3:30 p.m.

Several students expressed frustration at being interrupted during the end-of-semester crunch.

"It's very inconvenient. I was in the middle of writing a 10-page paper. I have no time the rest of the week to do it," said Mark Kohls, an electrical engineering student. He had saved his story on one of the library computers. "It's in there and not on my laptop in my room, or I'd leave."

Students like freshman Pranav Patel didn't think most people were worried.

"We have to pretty much see the fire to worry about the fire," he said.

Brett Willie, who was waiting for his cell phone, felt the same way.

"I'm kind of curious what it is, but I'm not really worried about anything," he said.

R.J. Boutelle, a junior English major, had arrived to work at the Writing Center.

"If it turns out there's something actually wrong, I'm glad they were actually effective in evacuating the library," he said. "In the event that it's just a prank, it's a little annoying, given the weather conditions."

The library periodically holds drills, according to a library official who asked to remain unnamed, but yesterday's evacuation was not scheduled.

Katie Huston can be reached at managingeditor@dailycollegian.com

College authorities earning more money

BY CAITLIN QUINN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Chronicle of Higher Education recently released a study that shows college executives' compensation is on the rise at both public and private universities.

The study cites increased competition for executives as a reason for the increase in salaries. Colleges are offering increased salaries to keep, as well as attract, new executives. Former Chancellor John V. Lombardi, who left the University of Massachusetts' Amherst campus last year, will be making a base salary of $550,000 at his new position at Louisiana State University. His base pay at UMass was $347,500.

Robert Connelly, spokesman for UMass president Jack Wilson, said, "I don't think that compensation was a key factor in

See SALARIES on page 2

UMass may expand campuses

Springfield plans school of pharmacy

BY JENNIFER HESHION
COLLEGIAN STAFF

State legislators continue to seek the expansion of the University of Massachusetts despite possible opposition from western New England.

Representative Sean F. Curran of Springfield has filed legislation to explore the opportunities of establishing a new branch of UMass in Springfield, with a school of pharmacy and health sciences. Curran's legislation seeks to create a 10-member state commission to look into the possibility of starting the new school.

"If you're looking for a University of Massachusetts presence in Springfield, pharmacy and health sciences would be a good fit," said Curran.

According to Curran, the ideal location for the new school would be the federal building and U.S. District Court on Main Street in Springfield, which is soon to be vacant. A new federal courthouse is being completed on State Street for an estimated $67 million.

Curran is urging UMass to consider the expansion due to the national shortage of pharmacists. According to him, a new school of pharmacy would create a good market for pharmacists. The school might also advance prospects for attracting biotechnology companies to the city.

Representative Benjamin Swan of Springfield has cosponsored the bill. "I think it's a good idea to have a school of pharmacy in the city of Springfield," said Swan. "Pharmacy is a big industry today."

Before the school has even come to fruition, Curran's legislation has already been met with skepticism.

According to Barbara A. Campanella,

See PHARMACY on page 2

Food safety specialist focuses on Listeria monocytogenes

BY KATHERINE NEUBERT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A bacterium known as Listeria monocytogenes is known to surface commonly purchased foods and may be very harmful to a consumer's health.

According to David Nyachuba, a food safety specialist at the University of Massachusetts, Listeria is bacteria found in everything and everywhere: the soil, the ground, all surfaces, animals and food.

The way the bacteria can get into these ready-to-eat foods is from most of the surfaces they are placed on. If any surface is not properly tested prior to food being processed on it, Listeria can easily contaminate any food that has been placed on that surface.

"Foods with Listeria don't look or taste bad, but still could be contaminated," said Nyachuba, adding that most ready-to-eat foods that have potential to be contaminated vary from salads to deli meats, smoked salmon and pasteurized or raw milk and cheeses.

Eating foods with Listeria in them isn't a problem as long as the consumer is healthy. People who may have HIV, problems with constipation, a low immune system, are pregnant or are elderly, among many other conditions, have a greater risk

See LISTERIA on page 2

Business students weigh in on first employer consideration

BY JESSICA WALOVITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Thousands of business students from colleges across the country, including the University of Massachusetts, were surveyed to find out what business students look for when choosing their first employer.

The survey reported that college business students want career opportunities, not salaries and benefits.

Fifty-seven percent of the 2,400 students surveyed said career opportunities would be their primary consideration when choosing an employer, followed by 22 percent who said work life balance, while only 12 percent felt that the salary and benefits package would be their primary consideration.

"I would choose a job that has the most career potential because I want to work for a company where there is room for growth," said UMass aspiring business student Stephen Lang. "Choosing a job with an initial high salary might sound good at first, but in most cases those jobs lack opportunities of growth in the company."

A majority (53 percent) of respondents only expect to stay at their first job for three to five years. The survey found that students largely have a "wait and see" attitude. An overwhelming number (74 percent) responded 'maybe' when asked if changing jobs is necessary for career opportunities.

"The problem with taking high salary jobs initially is that you might be setting your standards to high, and later on in your career when you plan on moving to a different company you might have to accept a lower salary which could be upsetting," said Lang.

"I think that times have changed and people are not interested solely in money anymore," said Larry Wales, a partner at KPMG, LLP, an audit, tax and advisory firm who conducted the survey. "They want a life balance and career opportunities. By the time people are in their late 30s, it is expected that they will have had 12 different jobs. People attain more self-gratification doing what they enjoy."

Other survey statistics gathered included that 48 percent of college students said they would like to retire between ages 51 to 60, with 27 percent indicating between ages 61 to 70.

However, some UMass students desire other categories in their first employer mentioned on the survey.

"When choosing my employer after college I am going to lean towards the job that will provide me with the highest salary and benefits," said UMass business student Anna Decelveo. "I want to be able to financially support myself and live life without the financial help of my parents."

"I have learned the importance of life/school and life/work balance when I was younger, and I think it's an important concept that I want to adhere to for the rest of my life," said sports management major Dan Gollinger.

Forty-four percent of students said they expect to work on average 50 hour work weeks, while 22 percent said 45 hours a week. Sixty-six percent are concerned about the social networking opportunities at their full time employer. Sixty-five percent of respondents believe they will be more financially successful than their parents.

Jessica Walovitch can be reached at jwalovitch@umassd.edu

Hogan plays hero for UMass in win

Members of the Massachusetts men's soccer team mob teammate Bryan Hogan after he gave them a 1-0 lead in the second of half of yesterday's 3-1 win over Central Connecticut State in the third round of the NCAA Division I Men's Soccer Tournament. See page 8 for more coverage.

Activist to speak on anti-communism

BY KATHERINE NEUBERT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Dec. 6, former dissident Barbara Jakubowska will give a lecture at 4 p.m. in 601 Herter Hall about her experiences as a participant in Poland's democratic, anti-communist opposition in the 1980s.

"Solidarity was organized as an independent trade union and opposition movement after a wave of strikes in 1980, leading to often-violent government repres-

See JAKUBOWSKA on page 2

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 61

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Stajgis
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Rebecca Wooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenwaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Tom Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALOE, LIKE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Murphy

COPY EDITOR
Greg McCarthy

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

DEC 3 2007

AT&T 3G network launched

UM, Amherst receive service

BY TIM SABIN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

AT&T Inc. recently announced the launching of its new third-generation (3G) wireless network in the Worcester and Springfield areas. On Nov. 21, the University of Massachusetts, as well as the town of Amherst, received the upgrade.

By introducing the 3G networks, those with compatible AT&T devices will now encounter faster Internet speeds, quicker e-mail and other entertainment services benefits. The 3G services will eventually expand more among the students on the UMass campus, and possibly solve the emergency e-mail update dilemma.

With already existing 3G networks in the greater Boston area, AT&T felt that this expansion would open up many opportunities.

"Offering 3G services in western Massachusetts allows us to open up a whole new world of capabilities for more of our customers," said Stephen Krom, vice president and general manager for AT&T's wireless operations in New England. "With our championship sports teams, ever-changing weather and busy rush hours, there's never been more of a desire for quick access to important information when you're on the go."

This new service brings many benefits to the student body at UMass. With the network now set up throughout campus, students will be able to do research a lot more quickly than on the previous network. Students with AT&T compatible phones will be able to retrieve e-mail on the run, which could be a solution to the ongoing debates with the emergency e-mail updates.

Students can now receive e-mails through their phones at an extremely fast pace. This could be helpful if there is an emergency on campus, like the bomb scare that took place at Herter Hall several weeks ago. On top of fast Internet speeds and quicker mobile e-mail, students will have the benefit of downloading music and videos onto their phones and participating in face-to-face conversations with people across the world via streaming video feed.

The community of Amherst will also gain from the arrival of 3G networks. On top of getting all the same benefits as UMass, the citizens of Amherst will be able to hold conference calls from their 3G compatible devices while they download a presentation or access the Internet. People traveling will be able to take their devices and utilize the 3G advantages while away. For those worried that there may not be a large enough number of 3G compatible devices available, AT&T has taken care of that problem.

"We continue to unveil new and exciting 3G devices at an amazing rate, which gives New Englanders a lot of choices to satisfy their need to be accessible wherever they go," said Krom. "This 3G launch is just another example of AT&T's commitment to ensuring that more New England customers have access to next-generation technology and services."

As the month progresses, the 3G networks should continue to expand; new devices are being released every week. The new networks are designed to make things easier for people, and within the next year or so, 3G users will populate the UMass campus and the surrounding town of Amherst.

Tim Sabin can be reached at tsabin@student.umass.edu.

Solidarity lecturer to speak Tuesday

JAKUBOWSKA from page 1

sions," said Robert Rothstein, a professor of Polish language, literature and culture who helped convince Jakubowska to come to UMass and also to donate her collection.

During this period of solidarity operating underground, Jakubowska was also involved in the lesser-known Committee for the Defense of Workers (KOR). KOR was started in 1976 primarily to protest the firing and imprisonment of striking workers and to help their families. It was an important expression of solidarity between writers and intellectuals on the one hand and workers on the other.

More importantly, Jakubowska secretly collected newspapers, leaflets, and books published illegally, without the permission of the censorship office, which she has recently chosen to contribute to the UMass Libraries this spring, among other Polish books.

Professor Rothstein invited Jakubowska to speak because he believes that her account of life during this solidarity period would be of much interest to many in the UMass community and beyond.

"I wasn't planning on attending this lecture because I don't know much about solidarity in general, so this didn't catch my attention," said junior Jen Fitzgerald.

Jakubowska was born in Warsaw, Poland, and studied American literature, philosophy, anthropology of culture and Middle Eastern languages at Warsaw University.

Katherine Neubert can be reached at kneubert@student.umass.edu.

Bacteria found in food may be harmful of becoming ill.

LISTERIA from page 1

The only way for any person to avoid eating foods with Listeria in them is to start from the root of the operation: detecting it in foods before they hit the market. This starts where the food is processed.

"Food processing treatments like heating, freezing, exposure to sanitizing compounds, acidification [and] addition of additives like sodium nitrite can result in sub-lethal 'injury' of this pathogen," said Nyachuba.

One way of controlling and preventing Listeria from contaminating food is to do mandatory environmental testing on surfaces that will come into contact with food all the time. Nyachuba and his colleagues have modified existing techniques for helping detect Listeria and developed a more selective method, which he hopes the United States Department of Agriculture and Food and Drug Administration will pick up.

"The current USDA and FDA methods for detecting and recovering use highly selective enrichment media," said Nyachuba. "Thus, these methods may fail to detect 'injured' Listeria that could essentially recover and start growing again, in places like your refrigerator over prolonged storage, growing easily at 41 degrees Celsius."

Instead of having just one enrichment method, Nyachuba has demonstrated that the recovery of Listeria from food could be significantly improved through use of repair-enrichment protocols with dual primary enrichment, which facilitates Listeria detection and recovery.

"Instead of using one enrichment medium, the modified method uses two," he said. "We also have developed a primary enrichment medium, which is one of the two that the modified method uses. This new dual-enrichment method helps better detect 'injured' Listeria in food and environmental samples than when just one primary enrichment medium is used."

Nyachuba also feels the need to expand sanitizers on environmental surfaces, paying close attention to the floor, the walls, stainless steel surfaces, brick and more. Listeria can be brought in from the outside on anything, even after a surface has been tested. Being able to detect and eliminate harborage sites of Listeria is key to controlling this organism. To do that, methods that are capable of detecting injured as well as uninjured Listeria are critical.

Sub-lethal injuries can grow on any surfaces, so it is important for any environment with food processing to consistently be free of Listeria.

Nyachuba is the newest assistant professor in the department of nutrition at UMass, as well as Extension's Food Safety Education Program director. He has been studying the effects of Listeria monocytogenes among other bacteria in foods for a number of years, starting in his final undergraduate year at the University of Nairobi, Kenya. He is determined to get his new methods for testing and finding these "injured" microbes in ready-to-eat foods out in the open.

Still working with an advisor from the University of Vermont, he is trying to set up a lab and get funding to do some of his research at UMass. On top of that, he does extension work teaching food safety for family daycare providers, in an effort to reduce food illnesses, as children fit into the category of people who are very susceptible to illness from bad food pathogens.

Katherine Neubert can be reached at kneubert@student.umass.edu.

Western Massachuetts opposes expansion of UM to Springfield

PHARMACY from page 1

vice president at Western New England College, a public pharmacy school in Springfield would be redundant. Western New England, a private college in Springfield, plans to open a pharmacy school in the city.

"It would be somewhat wasteful of tax dollars to invest in something that is a duplication of effort," said Campanella.

According to Campanella, there are other projects that UMass could initiate in Springfield that would be of better use. Campanella believes that Springfield couldn't support two pharmacy schools, as shown in extensive marketing studies.

Trustees of Western New England College voted last June to proceed with the school of pharmacy, which would include the construction of an academic building and at least one new residence hall.

Curran plans to meet with Western New England College officials to discuss his proposal.

Curran's bill has come at a time when the University is looking to expand its presence in Springfield.

"We would want to look at the legislation, study it, review it and see what legislators have to say on the subject," said Robert P. Connolly, vice president of communications for UMass.

According to Connolly, UMass president Jack M. Wilson has taken steps to analyze the University's connections in Springfield. Connolly said that Wilson has asked Thomas W. Cole Jr., interim chancellor on the Amherst campus, to review UMass involvement in Springfield and look into ways to further relations with the city.

UMass associations in Springfield have proven successful in the past with the Pioneer Valley Life Science Institute, located in downtown Springfield. The PVLSI is a collaboration between UMass and the Baystate Medical Center. The PVLSI has successfully combined the academic and scientific resources of UMass with the clinical expertise of the Baystate Medical Center to improve human health and economic development, thereby strengthening the community.

Curran said he might attempt to attach his bill to Governor Patrick's $1 billion bond for stem cell research. He believes that if biotechnology is to advance in the city, it needs a university presence in Springfield. A university can provide more laboratory space, along with more workers with science and medical backgrounds.

Jennifer Heshion can be reached at jheshion@student.umass.edu.

College leaders' pay increases

SALARIES from page 1

Jack Wilson's decision to come to the University. Jack came to UMass to be the founding CEO of UMassOnline, and it was the challenge of creating an online education program that attracted him."

Similarly, UMass interim chancellor Thomas W. Cole, Jr. said, "In my case, salary was not a major factor. I came out of retirement to accept this appointment."

According to the Chronicle of Higher Education's study, President Wilson receives a $360,500 base salary, $43,260 annuity and $40,000 housing allowance, coming to a total of $478,134. His current contract that holds this salary is a five-year contract with two years remaining.

"As a matter of policy, salaries for UMass System officials are established in relation to the salaries paid at peer institutions, with the overall goal of UMass salaries being about 75 percent of the peer average," said Connelly.

The study surveyed 183 public institutions and showed a median total compensation for the 2006-2007 year of $397,349. 56 of those 183 were paid at least $450,000. Of the 670 private colleges surveyed, research universities had the highest median compensation, at $532,059, which is a 37 percent increase from five years ago. Liberal arts colleges followed with a median of $276,141. Eighty-one presidents of private institutions made more than $500,000 for 2006-2007.

The Chronicle's study also attributes the rising salaries to more and more college executives coming from corporations, with corporate chief executives earning far more than those in the education world.

In 1993, President Wilson founded the software company LearnLinc Corp that merged to form Mentergy Corporation, a public company on the NASDAQ exchange. He later served as a professor, dean and interim provost at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute and a professor at the University of Maryland before joining the UMass system.

Chancellor Cole was formerly president and CEO of the non-profit organization Great Schools Atlanta until 2006. Before that, he was president of Clark Atlanta University, Clark College, West Virginia State College, vice president of Academic Affairs at Atlanta University and a professor at Atlanta University.

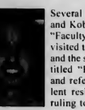
The highest-paid college executives in the state of Massachusetts for the 2005-2006 year were Northeastern University's former president, Richard M. Freeland, who received $2.9 million and Simmons College's former president, Daniel S. Cheever, Jr., who received $2.8 million.

The average salary of full-time faculty members in Massachusetts for the 2005-2006 year was $83,657 for public universities and $102,208 for private universities.

Caitlin Quinn can be reached at cquinn@student.umass.edu.

JAMAICA SPRING BREAK 2008

THE JAMAICA MUSIC FESTIVAL FEATURING ARTISTS SUCH AS: SHAGGY, BEENIE MAN, and much, much more!
Concert Dates: March 3rd, 10th, 17th & 24th
Book Your Trip Today! Contact:
1.800.426.7710 1.800.648.4849
JAMAICA



Today is your last chance to apply for Collegian Web editor
Please visit us during office hours if you're interested.

School for Health Studies
Is your occupational calling in the health profession?
Would you like to earn a graduate degree in nutrition or physical therapy?
Consider Simmons College in Boston
• Offering programs recognized by the American Dietetic Association to prepare individuals to become Registered Dietitians.
• Providing evidence based practice in physical therapy.
Application Deadlines:
Doctorate in Physical Therapy (D.P.T.)
January 1, 2008 for June 2008 entry
Nutrition (Master's and Certificates)
March 1, 2008 for May 2008 entry
All programs are nationally accredited and coeducational. Graduate campus housing available. Located one block away from the Harvard University hospitals where Simmons students complete their clinical rotations and internships.
School for Health Studies • 300 The Fenway • Boston, MA 02115
www.simmons.edu • ehs@simmons.edu • 617 521 2605
SIMMONS
Learning with Purpose.

Campus to Career
Options: You've Got Options!
Wednesday, December 5
5:30 p.m., Memorial Hall
FEATURED ALUMNI GUEST SPEAKERS:
Genevieve Conlin '93, Jackie Govoni '05, Jamie Kane '00, Anthony Manhart '95
Alumni guest speakers will share a few personal experiences as well as their current career paths and the decisions they made to get where they are today. Come listen to a variety of options available to you upon graduation. Meet and mingle with these alumni as you explore their—and your possible future—career path!
FREE ADMISSION • FREE PIZZA • FREE REFRESHMENTS
To register visit the Alumni Association web site at UMassAlumni.com/students
KAPLAN ALUMNI ASSOCIATION STUDENT ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Sponsored by the Alumni Association and the Student Alumni Association in partnership with Kaplan Test Prep & Admissions
Attend this event for a chance to win a FREE Kaplan course valued up to $1849!

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
EDITORIAL OPINION
MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2007
"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself"
- Sir Salman Rushdie
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

All in all, it's another wall

Bruce Lerner

Several weeks ago, Rateb Abu Rahma and Kobi Snitz, members of the group "Faculty for Israeli-Palestinian Peace," visited the University of Massachusetts and the surrounding area. Their talk was titled "Bil'in, Village of Resistance," and referred to a town where non-violent resistance led to an Israeli court ruling to redirect a portion of the wall that goes through the area. The event was poorly attended at UMass but nevertheless proved to be very informative and was greatly appreciated. It was a privilege to have people who have experienced Israeli crimes firsthand come speak for the sake of spreading knowledge and nurturing concern for innocent people on both sides of the conflict. The speakers' message was clear: the separation that Israel has built along the West Bank is a hindrance to people's lives in the region and must be torn down if peace is desired.

First of all, one thing must be noted. The wall (and it is a wall, not a security fence) is completely unlawful. The International Court of Justice ruled in 2004 that building the wall is "contrary to international law." Any discussion of the separation wall must have as its central tenet this crucial fact of the wall's inherent illegality. Even before one turns to the physical and moral implications of the hideous concrete barrier, the fact that it stands contrary to the somewhat basic legal obligations of countries in the international community has to be taken into consideration. However, considering that the discussion of international law is egregiously absent from mainstream U.S. publications, there are many other reasons to knock the wall down.

First, to make a moral argument, the wall is completely harmful to the Palestinian people. It snakes through Palestinian land, fencing off valuable land and water resources and effectively starving people to death. These resources belong to the Palestinians, and the Israeli elites have no right to them. It has been noted that the average Israeli has as much drinking water as a Palestinian farmer has to grow his crops. This drastic inequality is unjustifiable and the wall serves to further the discrepancy and to steal the very livelihoods of the people who live in the West Bank. One must remember that many of the affected people are innocent children who have committed no crime except that of having dark skin in the Middle East.

The average Israeli has as much drinking water as a Palestinian farmer has to grow his crops.

The racism that politicians and concerned American elites spout is quite apparent. One thing that Snitz said during his talk was very interesting. He said we should replace the word "Palestinian" with the word "Jew" when we talk about the reasons for building the wall. Imagine someone, especially in the United States, talking about building a security fence for protection from Jewish terrorists and radical Judaism. It sounds absurd, just as it is when the word Palestinian is substituted. The Palestinians are not terrorists to be corralled off – they are victims who have basic human rights that are not being respected by the governments of the United States and Israel. Both of these points were made on the UMass campus recently.

Another reasonable point to make about the construction of the wall is that it is impeding progress to peace, the very thing that people like Bush and Sharon say they want in the region. Ignoring the obvious hypocrisy and lies in the words of the above-mentioned world leaders, peace cannot be accomplished while people are subjected to cruel and inhumane treatment. Simply put, vicious practices breed hate and especially retaliatory violence, some justifiable and some not, the unjustifiable being known as terrorism. Any actual attempt at peace would take into account the other side and its wishes. Anything less than this should be considered a cruel joke, just like the Annapolis peace conference.

The Faculty for Israeli–Palestinian Peace stressed that students can and should get involved in the process for justice and peace in Israel/Palestine. The organization offers opportunities for students to travel to the occupied West Bank and Israel to see with their own eyes what people go through and to help the situation. The speakers stressed the importance of international outcry in ending the occupation and urged people to become active. Their message was powerful and offered a taste of the type of success people can strive toward.

Bruce Lerner is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at blerner@student.umass.edu.

Watch your words: the power of language

Sada Farah

I was listening to "Hot Thing" by Talib Kweli the other day, and I realized why I love that song. Not only is Kweli a great lyricist, someone who people would group into the "conscious rapper" category, but it seems that even when he isn't attempting to be serious, and makes a fun song, something always hits home.

"I love the way your crib smell like Votivo candle incense, the white voice you use on the phone when you handle business." That part of the song always makes me smile, probably because it rings true to me. I can't count how many times I've been told that I speak "white," simply because I don't speak in Ebonics. Usually I get away with it because I grew up in Canada, having learned English after my native language (Somali) and French. But that's just a technicality, considering I was fluent in all three by age eight.

In the United States, you're expected to speak a certain way simply because of the color of your skin, and everyone has internalized this myth. If you are a person of color and you have good grammar, speak proper English, etc. it's expected that you're either from another country or that you've had the resources to go to good schools and you're considered an exception to the rule. Similarly, your own racial group considers you for the most part to be a "sell-out," or trying to conform to the norm and assimilate to whiteness. It seems, though, that vernacular is more a product of class than it is race.

This is shown through the fact that, even in countries without a colonial past, there are differences in vernacular between the classes, and your "identity" or class is easily identifiable through your speech. In England, the most common form of English used by the British ruling class is that originating from south-east England (the area around the capital, London, and the ancient English university towns of Oxford and Cambridge). This form of the language is known as the "Received Standard," and its accent is called Received Pronunciation, which is improperly regarded by many people outside the UK as "the British accent." Earlier, it was considered better than other accents and referred to as the King's (or Queen's) English, or even "HBC English."

Even Jay-Z knows that you can only get so far without putting on a suit, educating yourself and adjusting your speech in corporate situations.

Now, don't get it twisted – there are many variations of "English" in Britain, there are regional dialect differences as well as the slang that youths use. The point is that even when you exclude race, or immigrants in the case of Britain, there are easily identifiable differences between people's speech and those differences are given value, based on a pre-existing vernacular hierarchy.

Then there's the hip hop culture phenomenon, which went from originating in urban areas inside the U.S., to being simulated by whites in this country, to being exported to the rest of the world via globalization. Now, all of a sudden it's cool to speak in Ebonics, wear baggy clothes and rap about money, clothes, women, drugs and violence (lower classes and racial minorities have always had a 'sub-culture' in every country, one that historically has been looked down upon by the status quo, but now this culture is being re-enforced by the media. But even Jay-Z knows that you can only get so far without putting on a suit, educating yourself and adjusting your speech in corporate situations. Does that mean you have to give up your identity in order to achieve success in the United States? Not necessarily. The common misconception is that you have to become white and be a sell-out in order to get far. The reality is that people have to be able to become chameleons in a sense. We all wear different hats, and even Shakespeare knew that being able to transform oneself in concordance with the situation is a virtue.

No one expects to get a corporate job walking into an interview wearing baggy jeans and a white T-shirt, and the same goes for speech. I'm not trying to say that one way of speaking is superior to another, but it seems to me that encouraging an already disadvantaged group to not become multi-faceted, and encouraging the importance of Ebonics (or similarly, "trailer trash talk," etc.) for the purpose of vernacular diversity is simply a way to make sure these classes don't have social mobility.

Acts such as the Ebonics Resolution, passed by the Oakland School Board, are ridiculous and backwards. The plan is to introduce Ebonics into the classroom; the objective being to improve the academic performance of black students by keeping them interested in their studies.

Many argue that Ebonics is based on West African languages, and that teaching it in schools would reinforce black identity. I highly doubt Ebonics has anything to do with any actual African language, and assuming that it does is discriminatory and ignorant.

According to Project 21, a non-profit organization, "Teaching Ebonics will not provide a means for an individual to acquire a job, or maintain a living. It will not provide an individual with the skills necessary to compete in an academic setting, let alone a professional setting. It does absolutely nothing positive for those to whom it is taught ... Some people would prefer schools to take the easy way out and send black children into the world without basic English skills, but it is a disservice to the black community ... This is a prime example of what people call 'the soft bigotry of low expectations.'"

I never thought I would agree with conservatives, but this just proves that anything is possible.

Sada Farah is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at sfarah@student.umass.edu

NEEDED:

WEB EDITOR
for the Daily Collegian's
ED/OP SECTION.

Inquire soon at:

editorial@
dailycollegian.com

The dorm, the officer, the slippery slope

Ted Rogers

Now that the student strike is over and done with, I figure I can put in my two bits. First of all, I'd like to say that I really supported the idea that the student body actually takes enough interest in its affairs to strike. Secondly, I'd like to know if anything actually resulted from it. Seriously, if anything really changed, I'd like to know.

The part of the protest I took the most interest in was the issue of police officers in the dorms. Most of the people I talked to are divided into two opposite camps. Half of them completely oppose the idea, mostly on the principle that they don't like the thought of getting arrested for something they don't see as a big deal. The people who tend to be more straight-laced are fine with the idea of police officers in our dorms, even the plainclothes cops I get to hear, "If you aren't doing anything illegal, why should you worry?" an awful lot.

That in itself worries me. I should make myself clear; I don't oppose uniformed police in the dorms. If a dangerous situation of any type should arrive, I'd feel better knowing that an officer could be able to respond to it. But plainclothes police officers hanging around dorm halls make me nervous.

The issue I take with them has nothing to do the usual concerns of most students (i.e. getting arrested for doing something dumb in the dorms). For me, it's an issue of legality.

I forget that plainclothes police don't even have the legal right to patrol dorm hallways without being invited. What I'm worried about is the precedent it sets. The idea of having an officer patrolling a private residence seems like it comes from some dystopian thriller. No one really wants to make a big deal of it because it's only dorms being patrolled, but what if it were also private residences, like houses? The idea is scary, and I don't think it's that far of a stretch.

Putting plainclothes police officers in dorm halls erodes the given right of privacy. Yes, when that right starts going down the tubes, no one really knows when it will end.

Another reason I don't like the idea of plainclothes policemen in dorms is because of the ever-changing political landscape. Sure, right now the cops are mainly searching for underage drinking and drug use in the dorms. What about in the future? Would people like cops in the dorms if they were checking on other laws? What if policemen also went around to make sure you were praying to a very specific god? How about a random room search to make sure you aren't hiding any materials that could be used to make WMDs?

This may seem a little far-fetched to you, but it shouldn't. The sort of stuff I mentioned happens in countries like Saudi Arabia on a regular basis. It is here, you can get thrown in jail for possessing a plant that causes "5,766 less deaths than alcohol per year, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (for own founding fathers were paranoid enough about issues like this to make an amendment requiring warrants to search private areas. But with the presence of undercover cops in our dorms, the 4th amendment starts to get a little shaky.

The idea of having an officer patrolling a private residence seems like it comes from some dystopian thriller.

Besides all the troubling legal precedents that undercover cops in dorms bring up, there's another reason why I dislike the presence. Simply, it doesn't feel right. For years, wealthy 4 year the dorms are my home. I try to live in the dorm as comfortably as circumstances allow, and maybe make a couple friends in the building while I'm at it. But you know what? Having people walk into around in normal clothes but also carrying guns and checking to see if I'm doing anything wrong doesn't really allow me to get much of that. Undercover cops may be here to protect us from whatever unspecified threat, but they also do a fine job of creating distrust among people in the dorms. I wouldn't want a guy with a gun walking around my halls at home, and I don't want one here.

A quote often attributed to Ben Franklin states, "Any society that would give up a little liberty to gain a little security will deserve neither and lose both." I think it would be wise to keep this in mind when the debate on undercover police officers comes up. We need the safety the police afford us, yes, but we need the safety of our rights just as greatly.

Ted Rogers is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at tsrogers@student.umass.edu

DAILY COLLEGIAN READER POLL

Last Friday, the Collegian published its inaugural Weekend Edition. What did you think?

☐ I thought it was great!
☐ I liked the old paper just fine.
☐ There's a paper on Friday?

Cast your vote online at www.dailycollegian.com!

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2007 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Tangled up in Bob Dylan

New film satisfies eccentric fans of legendary folk singer

Hollow acting, complex plot causes biopic to fall short

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BY SHAYNA MURPHY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The biopic gets a face lift in Todd Haynes' latest work, "I'm Not There," a semi-fictional biography of Bob Dylan. But narrative falters in the pursuit of a greater vision, and any viewer with less than a master's degree in Dylanology will be lost in the dust.

The film's conceit is central to its scrambling. Dylan, enigmatic, [illegible] works. She plays Dylan at his most iconic; mid-60s, right in the middle of his electric guitar years. Snarky and irreverent, she provides the film's spark.

The unfolding of Dylan's life during this period is equally arresting, faltering only occasionally. The idea of having electric-guitar Dylan machine gun the audience at the Newport Folk Festival is trite, but Haynes redeems himself in this segment with a comic spin on Dylan's introduction to the Beatles.

Cate Blanchett, it's Bob Dylan [illegible] all the way. His self-[illegible] map of Dylan's [illegible] patterns and manner-[illegible] like bad karaoke. As [illegible] troubadour of folk [illegible] later, as the born-[illegible]ristian, he flunks out. [illegible] to Batman.

[illegible]termed "The [illegible] close to the [illegible]gets, but seems [illegible] in the context [illegible]. Perhaps that's [illegible]s only supposed [illegible] Dylan in the con-[illegible]nalebrity. Here, [illegible] a French lass [illegible]bourg) and has [illegible] a bit of fore-[illegible]Ledger's Dylan [illegible] motorcycle. [illegible]Jones" is more [illegible]biopic, and doesn't [illegible]t's a film. In the [illegible]s of others, the film [illegible]to legend./ But the [illegible] there's nothing to [illegible]ept an idea poorly [illegible]

[illegible]s to no chronol-[illegible]dy give way [illegible]mbarking [illegible]n back [illegible]ttle of [illegible]

[illegible]ade, it is [illegible] of Pasteboard [illegible] Among the [illegible] is Cate [illegible] notes [illegible] [illegible] because of her [illegible] previous [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Season ends for swimmers

Coaches happy with progress, success of respective teams

By Sam Ehrlich
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams concluded their respective seasons this weekend in separate events. The women's team lost to Northeastern, 156-144, and the men's team competed in an intra-squad practice meet.

The meet was a close one for the women, who lost by just 12 points despite only taking two events.

"I think we had a lot of great swims," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "They relaxed, they had a good warm up, and I really liked where we were today. Northeastern is a very talented team, and we raced them very well and that is what I wanted to see."

Northeastern has not lost a meet this season in six dual meets. It also took first place in the Boston University-hosted Terrier Invitational last month. The Minutewomen took fourth in that event.

The Huskies beat the Minutewomen largely in the free-style, with sophomore Kathrine Fugge and freshman Emily Sutliff combining to take every freestyle event. Sutliff's time of 10:51.44 in the 1000-yard freestyle was a full 10 seconds faster than the second-place finisher, UMass's Taryn Prout.

However, UMass took second and third place in most of the events, keeping the score close throughout the meet.

"They were winning, but we were right there with them," Newcomb said. "Their top kids swam a little better than ours, and we were tired, but I think we raced very well."

The Minutewomen were also helped by their diving team, which took every event, despite being at an invitational at Rutgers this weekend. Since both teams' divers were in New Jersey for the diving-only event, they took the results from the Terrier Invitational to help tabulate the scores.

Despite Northeastern's dominance on the women's side, the Huskies do not have a varsity men's swim team, so the UMass men stayed in shape by facing each other in a "Maroon vs. White" intra-squad matchup.

The match was full of laughs and levity, but according to men's coach Russ Yarworth, it accomplished a lot more than team spirit.

"At this point in the year, I think it was a nice break of the intensity of competition, but they brought the intensity in another manner, so it was a learning experience," he said. "You get a little tight and tense like I felt they were against BU and Army, and then you don't swim as well. You have to remember, we're doing this for fun. You can be intense and have fun at the same time."

Yarworth also saw a lot of good swims from the men, who seemed to refuse to hold back while facing their teammates.

"I think the kids had fun, they competed hard, and they swam some pretty fast races and times," he said with a laugh. "The score was 130-127, so it was some good competition to the end."

UMass now has a long layoff until its next competition, the Rhode Island Invitational in mid-January. The plan is to take a short break for finals and then get right back into it with individual workouts at home and a training trip to Puerto Rico.

"The next couple weeks we have a lot of training," Newcomb said. "As we start heading in towards exams, I know we're going to start having the papers and the work, and people are going to miss a couple more workouts, but I think what we need to do is continue the training and get back into it."

"The key period for me right now from Dec. 1 to Jan. 1 is to maintain and improve power, strength and conditioning," Yarworth said. "This four-week cycle is the time where they can make or break the season. If they perform like they did this week and today, then we're going to be fine."

Sam Ehrlich can be reached at sehrlich@student.umass.edu.

R·I·T
A Category-of-One University
Graduate Study At RIT
Career-focused. Specialized. Technologically based.
- Talented and diverse faculty with industry connections
- Scholarships and assistance available
- 3,000 corporate and government partnerships
- 75 graduate degrees, including MS/MBA/MFA/Ph.D. programs
- One-year master's degrees and online programs
- 50 research centers supporting applied research, consulting and innovation
- 100,000 alumni worldwide

Contact us at: www.rit.edu/gradstudy/4, 1-866-260-3950
Attend Our Grad Study Open House January 7th, 2008.

UM shocks Hartford in win

Previously undefeated Hawks upset by Mills, Minutewomen

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

After three straight losses, the Massachusetts women's basketball team got back on the winning track Saturday with a 72-60 win over Hartford.

Three Minutewomen scored in double figures to lead UMass (3-4) over the Hawks (6-1). The win kept UMass perfect at home, with a record of 3-0 at the Mullins Center.

Senior Pam Rosanio scored a team-high 22 points and added six rebounds and five assists. Kate Mills had a strong effort in the low post, with 18 points and a career-high 14 boards. Junior Stephanie Gerardot put up 11 points.

The three are UMass's leading scorers this year, averaging 17, 15.6 and 9.1 points per game, respectively.

The Minutewomen struggled in the first half, fighting neck and neck with Hartford and turning the ball over 14 times before halftime. They picked it up after the break, however, giving the ball up just five times.

UMass	72
Hartford	60

"We cut down on the turnovers. We made effective use of our shots and held it," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "I thought we handled ourselves pretty good. I'm happy with [our performance]."

Due to the early turnovers, Mills (with 10 points) was the only UMass player to reach double digits in scoring before halftime. But after a pep talk by Dacko, the Minutewomen gave the ball better protection and didn't allow Hartford many more easy opportunities to score.

"We knew what we had to do in the second half. We knew we were really sloppy in the second half," Rosanio said. "We didn't take care of the ball that well. By watching the game you could tell the difference between the first half and the second and I think we just came out and did what we wanted to do."

Rosanio was one of two UMass players to get injured during the game. Already wearing a facemask to protect her nose after she was struck in the face against East Carolina last week, she went down with a leg cramp under the basket. Freshman Teya Wright, also wearing a facemask to protect a broken nose, was injured again Saturday. She was popped in the nose and went down near the baseline.

Both players made it back into the game.

Sophomore Kim Benton started at point guard instead of junior Sakera Young and Gerardot at forward instead of senior Whitney McDonald. Dacko said after the game that it was just to mix things up. She said she chose to "juggle the dice" and that both players accepted the change well.

Benton was 2-of-4 from the field, hitting 1-of-2 shots from behind the arc in 24 minutes of play. She was also 3-of-3 from the free-throw line, finishing with eight points.

Both Young and McDonald did see some time, although McDonald didn't register any stats. Young scored seven points. Captain Alisha Tatham scored six points in her 31 minutes. UMass shot 45.5 percent (5-of-11) from the 3-point line and 50 percent (25-of-50) from the field.

Dacko added that she was also happy with her team's effort under the glass. UMass had a plus-14 rebounding margin over Hartford, a team averaging 39.5 boards a game.

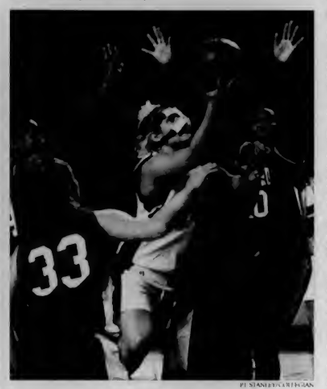
As for the defense, Dacko said her players started off slow but got their act together as the game progressed.

"I think we played really good defense. A couple times I don't know if we were having defensive breakdowns but we were letting people go in all the way to the bucket," Dacko said. "But, for the most part, I think our defense was good and we were able to close in on their shooters. [Hartford guard MaryLynne] Schaefer didn't hurt us as much as she did a year ago and I think that's an important thing."

Mills was among the Minutewomen that had a good defensive day – of her 14 boards, 12 were on defense. UMass totaled 33 defensive rebounds. Mills also blocked six shots.

The forward said she was happy with her performance and with the way her team handled Hartford. The Hawks were undefeated coming to UMass and all the Minutewomen knew they were a well-groomed team that has been to the NCAA Tournament three times in the last five years.

"They're an experienced team," Mills said. "We knew they were going to be a veteran squad who could play under pressure. With four minutes to go (with UMass winning 68-53) we knew they could still come back so we definitely had to take care of the ball and we knew they were going to keep playing until the buzzer sounded so it was a great test for us."



Forward Erica Beverly led the scoring for the Hawks, notching 14. The redshirt sophomore also finished with a team-high 10 boards in 22 minutes of action.

Sophomore Diana Delva, Hartford's second-leading scorer (averaging 11.8 points per game) scored 12 in her 22 minutes. She also contributed five rebounds and four steals.

Senior Danielle Hood was the only other Hawk to get more than 10 points Saturday. With a scoring average of 19.2, Hood is her team's leading scorer and recorded 11 against UMass.

The Minutewomen's next matchup is scheduled for Tuesday when they take on St. John's (5-1) in Queens at 7 p.m.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Senior guard Pam Rosanio injured her nose last week, forcing her to use a protective facemask Saturday in the victory over Hartford.

Dacko concerned with turnover rate

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

When Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko was preparing her team for Saturday's game against Hartford, 14 first-half turnovers couldn't have been in the gameplan.

The Minutewomen shot 54.2 percent from the field in the opening half, but their poor protection of the basketball allowed Hartford to go into halftime with the game tied at 32.

"We need to protect the ball," Dacko said. "I mean, we were just giving it to them. We're a team that notoriously puts the ball over our head and let[s] people knock it from us."

By comparison, Hartford had six fewer turnovers and shot 36.7 percent from the floor. The Minutewomen held two-time America East Player of the Week Danielle Hood to five points in the half but still found themselves in a battle.

Stephanie Gerardot and Alisha Tatham led the team with four turnovers in the first 20 minutes, but would commit one more between them in the second half.

The five turnovers the Minutewomen committed in the second half are approximately what coaches expect in basketball, but it's not easy to win a game with 14 turnovers in a half. Even with the accurate shooting, including 3-of-6 from beyond the arc, UMass still could only salvage a tie going into the locker room.

Hartford still did a better job of protecting the ball than its opponent in the second half, but was thoroughly dominated on the boards. The Hawks committed a pair of turnovers in the second half, but lost the defensive rebounding battle 33-14, and were out-rebounded overall by 14.

UMass entered the game averaging about four fewer rebounds per game than opponents, while Hartford out-rebounded opponents by four rebounds.

In addition to her 18 points, Kate Mills added 14 rebounds en route to her second consecutive double-double. The continued success from the floor and their rebounding and cutting down on turnovers ultimately allowed the Minutewomen to break the game open in the second half.

"I think we just knew what we had to do in the second half," Pam Rosanio said. "I mean, we knew we were really sloppy with the ball in the first half, we didn't take care of the ball that well."

Rosanio committed two turnovers in the first half and also had three fouls, but her second-half play was a microcosm of the team's turnaround. She committed zero fouls and turnovers in the second half, and also scored 16 of her 22 points.

One thing that remained consistent for the Minutewomen throughout the game was their defensive play. The Hawks shot 33 percent for the game and often had a hand in their face.

Mills recorded six blocks, so the Hartford players were often getting rejected when the ball was in the paint. This was significant because their top two scorers, Hood and Diana Delva, play in the frontcourt.

Dacko was pleased with the win over a quality opponent, but the Minutewomen will have to put together more complete performances that mirror the second half of Saturday's game, rather than waiting until the second half to turn it on.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

UMass loses to IUPUI after beating SU

M. Basketball from page 8

halftime en route to a 89-77 victory in Indianapolis, Ind.

The Minuteman defense could not contain Hill in the second half, with the junior guard exploding for 26 points, eight rebounds and four assists in the final 20 minutes. He led all players with 30 points and 10 rebounds and tied Chris Lowe for a game-high eight assists. Jon Avery contributed 25 points off the bench for IUPUI (5-2), with 20 coming after halftime.

The Jaguars came out strong in the second half, using a 16-5 run to tie the game at 48. They took their first lead of the game since it was 2-0 when Hill hit a pair of free-throws to bring the score to 51-50. The game went back and forth and remained close until IUPUI used another scoring run to pull away from the Minutemen.

After UMass forward Gary Forbes converted on a lay-up to cut the IUPUI lead to 70-67 with 5:05 remaining, the Jaguars iced the game with a 15-to-5 run.

UMass struggled from the field after shooting 56.3 percent in the first half (18-for-32), with its second-half shooting percentage tailing off to 43.3 percent. The big difference was from 3-point range, as the Minutemen hit just 4-of-14 in the second half after connecting on 5-of-11 in the opening stanza.

The key in the second half was at the free-throw line. The Jaguars outscored UMass by 12 points in the second half at the charity stripe, with Hill hitting all but one of his 11 attempts. IUPUI was 16-18 in the half, while the Minutemen missed half of their eight shots. The Jaguars also had the advantage in the turnover department, limiting turnovers to nine overall and just four after halftime. UMass had 14 turnovers and was outscored 22-8 in points off turnovers.

The Minutemen had four players score in double-digits, with shooting guard Ricky Harris leading the way with 23 points. He hit four 3-pointers, including three in the second half. No other Minuteman had more than 12 points. Forbes had 12, Luke Bonner tied a career-high with 11 points and Dante Milligan continued his strong play with 10 points.

Point guard Chris Lowe struggled from the field (4-of-12) but handed out eight assists to go along with his nine points. UMass held its own in the low post, losing the rebounding battle by just two.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Free Networking Breakfast for Students, Faculty, Staff, Alumni
Sponsored by the UMass Amherst Alumni Association and Brueggers Bagels of Amherst
(Limited to first 250 people)
Wednesday, December 5
8:30 - 10:30 a.m.
Memorial Hall
BRUEGGER'S BAGEL BAKERY

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK BODY INC.
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement

TAKE A PHOTO OF YOURSELF WITH YOUR COMPLETED SUDOKU OR CROSSWORD AND SEE YOURSELF ON THE COMICS PAGE
COMICS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

#S

		3		4	8	2
			3			1	6
	6			1
9	8				2		3
			4	6
2		7				6	5
			8			3
6	5			7
	7	4	6		5

ACROSS
1 Marmara and Galilee
5 Flock juniors
10 Chatter indiscreetly
14 Need
15 Double curves
16 Quetua
17 Comic Johnson
18 Begin's peace partner
19 Makes up one's mind
20 Rearview gap
22 Mischiefs
23 Stage signal
24 "___ Street"
26 Mesh fabric
30 Electronic musical effects
33 Fine work
34 Genesis twin
36 Big name in ice cream
37 ___ of Orleans
39 Squealer
41 Grain tower
42 Take part (in)
45 Bend out of shape
48 Raven's call
49 Richard or Gene
51 Have
53 Geronimo's tribe
55 Def. mil. grp.
56 Chip makers
58 Cuts off
63 Choice cut
64 Workers' group
65 Droop lazily
66 Kick back
67 Bogged down
68 Stance
69 Small storage building
70 Linguine or ziti
71 Cabbage salad

DOWN
1 Q-tip
2 British title
3 Opposed to
4 Foul odor
5 Apartment crowd
6 Urgent letters
7 Precursor to Windows
8 One who pounds
9 Concorde, e.g.
10 Loose, women's trousers
11 Faked support
12 Put money in the kitty
13 Armstrong or Myerson
21 Sand hill
22 Volcanic output
25 Min. fraction
26 Regulations
27 Shiraz resident
28 Brand as disgraceful
29 Vicious liquid
31 Lugosi and Bartos
32 Delays
35 Big letters in Detroit
38 Attempted to soundproof
40 Barrooom sprigs
43 Point of soccer
44 SASE, for example
46 Domed room
47 Exam for /rs
50 Singer Twain
52 Head covers?
54 Arab leaders
56 Armenia
57 Ark man
59 Pound or Frost
60 Aw! Oh! Now
61 Lohengrin's love
62 Large amount
64 Diamond decider

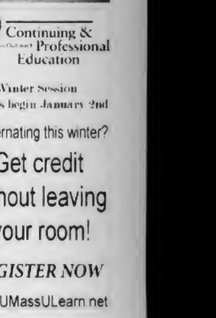
Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

YO G-DIGGITY MUFFINBUTT,
PEEP THE CAPTION CONTEST AT:
DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM
NOTE: THERE ISN'T ACTUALLY A PHOTO POSTED YET, BUT I JUST WANT YOU TO BE READY FOR WHEN THERE IS ONE TOMORROW BECAUSE ITS GONNA BE SO INTENSE THAT IF I DIDN'T WARN YOU, YOU'D PROBS HAVE A HEART ATTACK.

Quote of the Day

"The Four Levels of Comedy: make your friends laugh, make strangers laugh, get paid to make strangers laugh, and make people talk like you because it's so much fun."
-Jerry Seinfeld

Pauk By Billy O'Keefe



My Cat Had Fleas By Joe Mirkin

Superman? By Alex Ezorsky-Lie

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes begin January 2nd
Hibernating this winter?
Get credit without leaving your room!
REGISTER NOW
www.UMassULearn.net

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
December is officially upon us, break out the mistletoe and let the excessive and unwanted lip-locking commence.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your college degree serves no other purpose than to illustrate that you can finish what you start, but that speaks volumes.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Wearing a cape and doing creepy things to bunny rabbits does not automatically make you a magician.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Right now you are being followed by a very large, very angry, invisible dragon. I have no way to prove it, but it's quite true.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Remember in Aladdin when he shares his bread with the hungry little boy? You may be a broke college kid, but give something.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
On the bright side, if you fail all your finals and get kicked out of school, you'll get a really long spring break.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
One day your words will be quoted in outstanding college newspapers such as this one.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Buy a Facebook gift for yourself because ain't nobody gonna buy one for you.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Soon you will dance the horizontal tango. Gird your loins with a thorough grooming in honor of this majestic event.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Resist the tempation of the forbidden fruit, reach for a delicious piece of celery or perhaps a turnip instead.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Although you are not forty, based on the way you'd eat, you should probably get a colonoscopy.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Giants use a loufa on a stick for a toothbrush; you apparently use nothing.

Chanukah starts tomorrow, get ready for the 8 freakiest days of the year.

comics@dailycollegian.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price, Best Hotels 781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net.

Apt. 4 Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing. 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

Apt. for Rent

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace dnve under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

Brandywine Apt JAN-MAY 1 Bdrm New Carpet/Paint-millali@student.umass.edu for info.

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

Employment

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab. phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

Information

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza. Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

Room 4 Rent

Large, quiet, comfortable, furnished, walk to Umass. on 2 Bus Lines for male graduate student/professor masner9@yahoo.com available Jan. 413-549-1578

Services

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org

Services

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101.

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St., Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

Travel

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices, guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations 800-648-4849/ www.ststravel.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Not done yet

JOAN TELESCA/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Mark DeSantis (No. 18), senior Greg Cirillo (No. 13) and sophomore Bryan Hogan celebrate Hogan's second-half goal in yesterday's 3-1 win over Central Connecticut State. Hogan scored two goals in the win which put UMass in the national quarterfinals against Illinois-Chicago next weekend, although the date and site of the game has not yet been determined.

Magical postseason run still alive after defeating CCSU

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

When sophomore forward Bryan Hogan slipped on the icy surface of Rudd Field during the first 10 minutes of yesterday's NCAA Tournament third-round match, it looked like it was going to be a challenge for both offenses to score.

But an hour delay and a three-goal outburst resulted in arguably the most important win in Massachusetts men's soccer history. The 3-1 victory over Central Connecticut State University (10-9-3) marks the first trip for the Minutemen (16-7-1) into the quarterfinals of the tournament and establishes a program-record 16 wins.

UMass	3
CCSU	1

"We take it game by game. If you look a few games ahead, it's so hard," senior captain Kenny Cook said, referring to his team's post-season success. "We'll take it one game at a time and see how far we can go."

Yet for a while, it didn't look like the game was going to be played as scheduled. The referee determined that the field was unplayable and waved the players off the field after only 10 minutes. The slippery conditions made the field dangerous for both squads, but a high-ranking NCAA official decided that the game should continue.

CCSU coach Shaun Green favored the postponement, as his players' footwear was ill-designed for the field conditions.

"UMass definitely deserved to win, they were the better side today," Green said. "I don't think the game should have been played today, I thought the

See SOCCER on page 5

Confidence in strategy leads to NCAA victory

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Yesterday's NCAA Division I Men's Soccer Tournament match between the Massachusetts men's soccer team and Central Connecticut State began as expected.

The Blue Devils kicked off just after noon and the first 10 minutes went by in typical soccer fashion. The Minutemen forced a few early chances and the Rudd Field record crowd showed its appreciation. But as the game's 10th minute ticked off the clock, officials – responding to the complaints from CCSU coach Shaun Green – pulled both teams from the icy turf and delayed the game for more than an hour.

The frigid temperatures covered the grass with a slick coating of ice, and the Blue Devils, wearing their standard cleats, were not prepared.

"We had to totally change our style of play. The footing for our players was really different from the footing for [UMass's] players," Green said. "They were prepared to play on the hard surface, and we were not. It was very visible from what we saw out there. But that's not to discredit [UMass's] performance. They deserved it. I thought UMass played exceptionally well, they had a great game."

CCSU features a high-intensity offensive style that calls for balls played directly from its midfielders to its forwards. Without proper grip on the turf, Blue Devil leading scorer Yan Klukowski struggled to move the ball to the front line and had to rely on other means to manufacture chances. But it wasn't until the 63rd minute that CCSU tested redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons with a 35-yard

See CONDITIONS on page 5

Ford and Co. suffer letdown

After upset win over Syracuse, team falls to IUPUI on road

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Saturday's matchup against IUPUI epitomized what to expect from the Massachusetts basketball team this season.

From one game to the next – and even one half to the next – nobody knows which team will show up.

The UMass team that upset previously-ranked Syracuse at the Carrier Dome last week was back at it Saturday against the Jaguars during the first half. The Minutemen (5-2) held a 43-32 edge entering halftime with hot shooting and tough defense, limiting star Jaguars guard George Hill to four points.

UMass	77
IUPUI	89

But a whole new team came out of the locker room after intermission. The defense that UMass coach Travis Ford often worries about became a problem in the second half, as the Jaguars scored 57 points after

See M. BASKETBALL on page 6

JOAN TELESCA/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore guard Ricky Harris led the Minutemen in scoring with 23 points in Saturday's loss to IUPUI. UMass drops to 5-2 this season.

Strong season ends vs. SIU

UMass falls in second round of FCS playoffs to Salukis

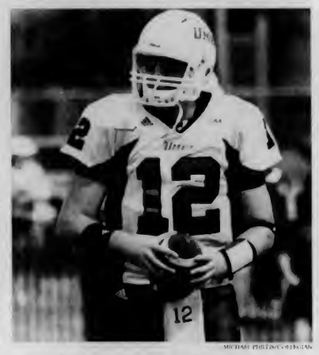
By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team's bid for a second straight appearance in the NCAA Division I Championship fell short Saturday, as the Minutemen lost to Southern Illinois, 34-27, in Carbondale, Ill.

UMass	27
SIU	34

Quarterback Liam Coen set the school single-game passing record for the second consecutive week, throwing for 421 yards, but the Salukis offense proved too much for the UMass defense. SIU jumped out to a 14-point lead at halftime and a 21-point lead in the third quarter that the Minutemen simply could not overcome.

The game did not start well for UMass, as the Salukis grabbed a 7-0 lead on their third play of the game, a 69-yard touchdown pass to backup tight end Byron Gettis. SIU quarterback Nick Hill (13-of-23, 216 yards, three touchdowns) hit Gettis on an out to the sideline. UMass cornerback Courtney Robinson dove to break up the pass but missed and Gettis scored easily.



"We dug ourselves a pretty good hole right out of the gate," UMass coach Don Brown said. "We had no margin for error."

UMass punted on its first possession, using backup quarterback Scott Woodward as the Minutemen's punter for the game in place of Brett Arnold, who struggled in the win over Fordham last week.

SIU responded with another touchdown, a 10-yard run by Richard White, which capped an eight-play, 80-yard drive that appeared to demoralize the UMass defense early. The extra point was missed, leaving the SIU lead at 13-0.

The Minutemen got on the board

See FOOTBALL on page 5

MICHAEL PHILLIPS/COLLEGIAN

Quarterback Liam Coen re-wrote the UMass record books this year, but UMass's season ended Saturday with a loss to SIU in the playoffs.

Mass Attack fights to tie with Cornell

Dainton, Scrivens lead teams to stalemate in Ithaca, N.Y.

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Despite out-shooting Cornell 45-24, the No. 11 Massachusetts hockey team played to a 0-0 tie Friday night in Ithaca, N.Y.

Cornell (4-4-1) net minder Ben Scrivens kicked away all 45 UMass shots, including 32 in the first two periods. But in the overtime session, it was UMass's freshman goaltender Paul Dainton that kept his team in the game.

"I don't think anybody would have believed it would end like that after the start of the game," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It would have been nice if we finished some plays and broke the game open early, but we took advantage of a really good opportunity to play in a great venue."

UMass	0
Cornell	0

The Big Red out-shot UMass, 3-2, in the extra session, but Dainton was up to his opponent's challenge. Cornell began the overtime on the power play, but the Minutemen prevented any shots on Dainton. Sophomore winger Will Ortiz went off for slashing with 32 seconds remaining in regulation to set up the power play in overtime.

This has been common for Dainton this season. Despite his nifty 2.10 goals-against average, he's won four

See HOCKEY on page 5

MINUTEWOMEN TRAVEL TO SAINT JOHN'S | PAGE 10

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

❄ SNOW : HI: 31 LO: 21 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 2007

Bill tries to end spanking

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

Parents living in Massachusetts may start thinking twice before laying a hand on an uncooperative child's bottom, as a new bill introduced to the state legislature seeks to ban the age-old disciplinary practice of spanking.

State representative Jay Kaufman, D-Lexington, introduced the "anti-spanking" bill, formally titled "The Act of Prohibiting Corporal Punishment in Children," to the legislature on Nov. 28. Kaufman proposed the bill at the request of Arlington resident Kathleen Wolf, a registered nurse who wants Massachusetts to lead the nation as the first state to stop the corporal punishment of children.

Corporal punishment is defined by the bill as "the willful infliction of physical pain or injurious or humiliating treatment," but rules out "incidental minor physical contact designed to maintain control."

In an interview with the Attleboro Times, Wolf pointed out that corporal punishment is illegal when directed toward one's spouse but not one's child. Corporal punishment of children by teachers and staff of schools is already illegal in most states.

"Corporal punishment is not an acceptable form of discipline in Massachusetts," she told the Times. She emphasized that she is not primarily concerned with spanking in particular, but that she wants the state to better define when punishment turns into abuse.

University of Massachusetts senior Tom Holubiak said that "spanking may seem petty at first, but negligence in addressing such social issues can escalate into a rather serious problem in the family."

Yet, Holubiak, like other students, point out that government intervention into family issues can also be a problem.

"Isn't that something that's done in the privacy of your home?

See BILL on page 3

Bolton lecture stirs controversy at AC

Demonstrators gather outside

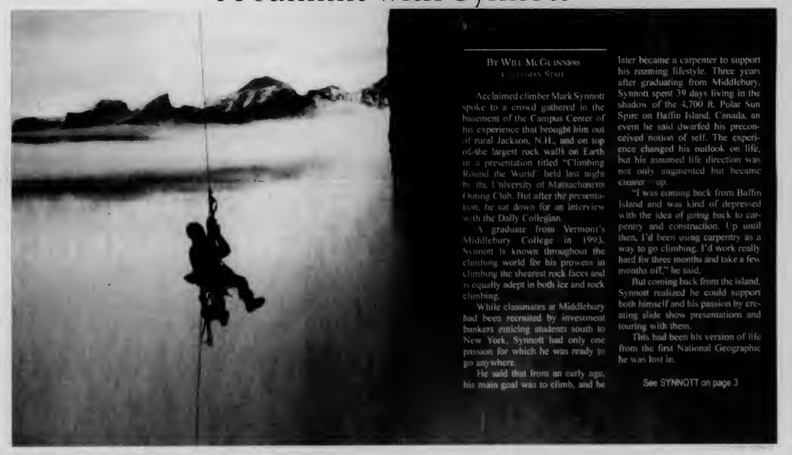
By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Former United Nations Ambassador John R. Bolton's lecture at Amherst College last night was met with mixed reactions from both audience members and demonstrators.

The lecture, entitled "Dealing with Rogue States After Iraq," elaborated on points addressed in Bolton's recent memoir, "Surrender is Not an Option," such as the effectiveness of the U.N. as a legitimate authority, the current situation in Iraq and possible conflicts with North Korea and Iran.

Demonstrators gathered outside Converse Hall prior to the speech, wielding picket signs reading "Just Say No To War Criminals" and handing out anti-war literature.

Mark Watkins, an organizer for the Amherst Peace Vigil, referred to Bolton as "the Ultimate Chicken hawk," and distributed flyers denouncing the college's invitation of the former Bush Administration official.



Hadley Arkes, Edward N. Ney Professor in American Institutions at Amherst College, introduced Bolton, who has served under several administrations, including President

See BOLTON on page 3

Former United Nations Ambassador John R. Bolton delivered his lecture "Dealing with Rogue States After Iraq" in the Cole Assembly Room at Amherst College last night.

A summit with Synnott

By Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Acclaimed climber Mark Synnott spoke to a crowd gathered in the basement of the Campus Center of his experience that brought him out of rural Jackson, N.H., and on top of the largest rock walls on Earth in a presentation titled "Climbing Round the World" held last night by the University of Massachusetts Outing Club. But after the presentation, he sat down for an interview with the Daily Collegian.

A graduate from Vermont's Middlebury College in 1993, Synnott is known throughout the climbing world for his prowess in climbing the sheerest rock faces and is equally adept in both ice and rock climbing.

While classmates at Middlebury had been recruited by investment bankers enticing students south to New York, Synnott had only one passion for which he was ready to go anywhere.

He said that from an early age, his main goal was to climb, and he later became a carpenter to support his roaming lifestyle. Three years after graduating from Middlebury, Synnott spent 39 days living in the shadow of the 4,700 ft. Polar Sun Spire on Baffin Island, Canada, an event he said dwarfed his preconceived notion of self. The experience changed his outlook on life, but his assumed life direction was not only augmented but became clearer – up.

"I was coming back from Baffin Island and was kind of depressed with the idea of going back to carpentry and construction. Up until then, I'd been using carpentry as a way to go climbing. I'd work really hard for three months and take a few months off," he said.

But coming back from the island, Synnott realized he could support both himself and his passion by creating slide show presentations and touring with them.

This had been his version of life from the first National Geographic he was lost in.

See SYNNOTT on page 3

UMass Giving Tree brings joy at Xmas

By Eden Univer
Collegian Staff

An annual project at the University of Massachusetts is bringing holiday cheer for less fortunate children.

University Health Services will be hosting its Giving Tree project for a second year. According to Karen Dunbar Scully of Communications and Marketing at UHS, "The Giving Tree project began in 2006 as part of FISH [First in Student Health] UHS' employee-led initiative to enhance the work environment."

Four employees in particular led the effort to get the project off the ground. Deb Warner, Patience Monty, Donna Williston and Kerry Naumowicz of UHS' sterile supply and central stores departments began the project themselves.

A tree is erected at UHS with handmade ornaments that have the name of a child, the child's age and a gift that they would like to receive. UHS staff members then take an ornament and purchase a gift to donate to Berkshire Children

See GIVING TREE on page 3

The Casa Dominicana dancers performed Saturday night at HASA Casa's 14th annual cultural event held in the Student Union Ballroom.

Cultural event held at UMass

By Gisee Saillant
Collegian Staff

With the effort of both the Haitian American Student Association and Casa Dominicana the 14th annual HASA Casa cultural event helped unite the island of Hispaniola.

The event took place on Saturday at the Student Union Ballroom from 6:30 p.m. to 2 a.m. Attendees arrived early to get a table and get in the line for authentic Dominican and Haitian food that was being served.

"The food, both HASA and Casa, was really good and represented each culture very well," said University of Massachusetts freshmen Carolina Davila.

The program started with the

See HASA on page 3

Fatal infection new threat to nation

By Daniel Kahn

A new threat to college students has emerged known as Methicillin-resistant Staph (pronounced methicillin of MRSA). It has gained attention ever since a student died from it in October.

MRSA is a strain of Staph infection that has so far shown to be resistant to antibiotics and was originally bacteria generally only found in hospitals. But a new strain has developed and is now found in communities known as CA-MRSA.

The Staph bacteria can be found on the skin or in the nose or close to one third of the population. If someone has the bacteria but isn't sick he or she is susceptible to spreading it to others. Symptoms include red bumps that resemble pimples or spider bites but eventually form into painful abscesses that are red, swollen or warm. But one of the deadly aspects of MRSA is that it is capable of entering the blood-stream. This can cause life-threatening infections to bones, joints, blood vessels, heart valves and lungs. Symptoms of these fever, hot painful wounds, headache, tired-

See MRSA on page 3

Toy drive still hopeful

The annual Toys for Tots drive held on campus last weekend managed to collect only a small amount of holiday gifts for needy children, but event sponsors are hoping to make up for it.

The event took place Saturday during the University of Massachusetts women's basketball game against the University of Hartford at the Mullins Center and was co-sponsored by U.S. Marines from Westover Air Base and the UMass Athletics Department.

The Marines were dressed in uniform throughout the arena and collected donations for new and unwrapped toys for children in western Massachusetts. Each year, the U.S. Marine Corps Reserve sponsors the event nationally.

Though few were in attendance Saturday, announced events planned for the future will suffice for Toys for Tots. For now, gifts can be donated at all Toys 'R' Us or Babies 'R' Us stores or at select drop-off locations found on Toysfortots.org.

Holly Scabiry

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 62
113 Campus Center, University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Reimann
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Houston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Eaton
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kris Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COPY EDITOR Kristen Saemann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Sean Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Dermot Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Erin Hornyak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Maureen Mooney
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallace
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Brian McKaig
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mastroeni
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Gartner
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Glenn
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seaburn
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Melore
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenwaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Tom Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Will McGuinness

COPY EDITOR
Kristen Saemann

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkies

5-year-old chimp outsmarts college students

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

Think you're smarter than a fifth-grader? How about a 5-year-old chimp? Japanese researchers pitted young chimps against human adults in tests of short-term memory, and overall the chimps won.

That challenges the belief of many people, including many scientists, that humans are superior to chimpanzees in all cognitive functions," said researcher Tetsuro Matsuzawa of Kyoto University.

"No one can imagine that chimpanzees – young chimpanzees at the age of 5 – have a better performance in a memory task than humans," he said in a statement.

Matsuzawa, a pioneer in studying the mental abilities of chimps, said even he was surprised. He and colleague Sana Inoue report the results in Tuesday's issue of the journal Current Biology.

One memory test included three 5-year-old chimps who'd been taught the order of Arabic numerals 1 through 9, and a dozen human volunteers.

They saw nine numbers displayed on a computer screen. When they touched the first number, the other eight turned into white squares. The test was to touch all these squares in the order of the numbers that used to be there.

Results showed that the chimps, while no more accurate than the people, could do this faster.

One chimp, Ayumu, did the best. Researchers included him and nine college students in a second test.

This time, five numbers flashed on the screen only briefly before they were replaced by white squares. The challenge, again, was to touch these squares in the proper sequence.

When the numbers were displayed for about seven-tenths of a second, Ayumu and the college students were both able to do this correctly about 80 percent of the time.

But when the numbers were displayed for just four-tenths or two-tenths of a second, the chimp was the champ. The briefer of those times is too short to allow a look around the screen, and in those tests Ayumu still scored about 80 percent, while humans plunged to 40 percent.

That indicates Ayumu was better at taking in the whole pattern of numbers at a glance, the researchers wrote.

"It's amazing what [the chimpanzees] is able to do," said Elizabeth Bonsdorf, director of the Lester E. Fisher Center for the Study and Conservation of Apes at the Lincoln Park Zoo in Chicago. The center studies the mental abilities of apes, but Bonsdorf didn't participate in the new study.

She admired Ayumu's performance when the numbers flashed only briefly on the screen.

"I just watched the video of that and I can't tell you right now, there's no way I can do it," she said. "It's unbelievable. I can't even get the first two [squares]."

What's going on here? Even with six months of training, three students failed to catch up to the three young chimps, Matsuzawa said in an e-mail.

He thinks two factors gave his chimps the edge. For one thing, he believes human attention gave up much of this skill over evolutionary time to make room in the brain for gaining language abilities.

The other factor is the youth of Ayumu and his peers. The memory for images that's needed for the tests specializes is said found in children, but which dissipates with age. In fact, the young chimps performed better than older chimps in the new study (Ayumu's mum did even worse than the college students).

So the next logical step, Bonsdorf said, is to fix up Ayumu with some real competition on these tests – little kids.

Ayumu the chimpanzee performs a memory test at a research institute in Kyoto, Japan.

Duke students protest Rove

By Eugene Wang
The Chronicle (Duke)

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.C. — Karl Rove's appearance at Page Auditorium on Monday will be met by a group of students, faculty and Durham residents protesting the George W. Bush administration's policies on torture and human rights, protest organizers said.

The group will be in orange Guantanamo Bay-simulation detention camp jumpsuits at 5 p.m. outside the speech by Rove, the former White House deputy chief of staff. Members will hand out fliers highlighting specific Bush administration policies the group opposes.

"We are concerned about the use of torture and the violation of basic international human rights standards by the Bush administration in the War on Terror," said Orin Starn, a professor of cultural anthropology, wrote in an e-mail.

He added that the protest is not affiliated with any organized group.

"[We] just decided to do this because Rove has so much been the face of an administration that seems to have so little respect for basic human rights," Starn said.

The group opposes the use of water-boarding, sleep deprivation and temperature extremes in interrogations – methods it claims the Bush administration supports. The handbill they will distribute also draws attention to so-called "torture taxis," airplanes that bring detainees to foreign countries for imprisonment.

According to The Eagle, the independent student newspaper at American University in Washington, D.C., Rove delivered a speech to College Republicans in April at AU that was met with student protests.

Students lay in front of Rove's car after the event while others heckled Rove and his bodyguards, it said. Approximately 30 students were involved and six faced arrest warrants following the protests.

Professor of Political Science Peter Feaver, moderator of the event and a former member of the National Security Council staff under Bush and Bill Clinton, said he is not surprised people plan to protest Rove's speech, but does not expect a reaction similar to AU's.

"Rove is a controversial figure and of course there are lively debates about the Bush administration policies that he's been involved in," Feaver said. "I'm not surprised there are people who have strong views about it and want those views heard."

He added, however, that protests can either present an alternative view or deny people a chance to hear the presented view. He said the former is a legally permitted form of free speech, while the latter is not.

"There should be ways for people to register their disagreements with him without breaking the law and without infringing on the rights of others," Feaver said. "I'm confident that Duke administrators have taken steps so that everyone's free speech will be preserved."

Former White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove visited Duke University last night and sparked controversy on campus.

From the guys who brought you
THE 40-YEAR-OLD VIRGIN and KNOCKED UP

Exclusive to Blu-ray Disc!
SUPERBAD "SUPERMETER"
BONUS FEATURE keeps tally of the lewd and crude lingo in the film
UNRATED

Text "getsome" to 94444 to get a FREE Superbad ringtone!
Standard text messaging charges apply. Terms and Conditions apply. May not be available from all service providers or to all handsets. Offer valid until 1/31/08.

ON 2-DISC DVD AND BLU-RAY™ HIGH-DEF DEC. 4TH
Includes More Movie and Over 2 Hours of Outrageous Special Features!
© 2007 Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. All Rights Reserved.
™ and © 2007 Layout and Design Sony Pictures Home Entertainment Inc. All Rights Reserved.

Bolton discusses new memoir

BOLTON from page 1

George H. W. Bush, as an individual who "hit the ground running" when appointed United States Ambassador to the U.N. in the summer of 2005.

The commencement of Bolton's speech was impeded by confrontation with demonstrators who had made their way inside the Cole Assembly Room, which was at standing-room-only capacity for the event.

One demonstrator, his hands painted red, shouted that Bolton had "blood on his hands" for the "murder of innocent Iraqi men, women and children." Other demonstrators questioned his military service. Bolton, receptive of the questions of demonstrators, responded that he had in fact served six years in the Army.

Bolton's lecture first addressed the delicate situation of the U.S. in regards to foreign affairs. "The decisions the next president makes will have an impact on not only his or her four years in office but also on decades to come," he said.

He was also critical of detractors of the Bush Administration's handling of the war in Iraq. Bolton spoke of the "urban legend" that President George W. Bush knowingly misled the American public into the conflict and addressed criticisms of the use of military force.

Bolton described two "camps" of thought in foreign policy: Those "including myself, who believe 99.44 percent of the world's problems can be solved by diplomacy," and those who believe that diplomacy "works 100 percent of the time."

He also questioned the legitimacy of the U. N. with respect to enforcing its authority internationally. "If the [U.N.] Security Council passes resolutions that no one pays attention to," he said, "does that strengthen or weaken the power of the United Nations?"

Bolton went on to defend the actions of the Bush Administration leading up to the war in Iraq, saying that Saddam Hussein showed, "proclivity to expand his authority by military force" and the "intellectual capabilities" by way of nuclear scientists to create nuclear weaponry, as well as "large visible supplies of chemical weapons."

"Do not succumb to the mythology that somehow our concern about those weapons came from false intelligence, or cherry-picked intelligence or outright falsehoods," he said. "They came from Saddam's own declarations"

Bolton went on to warn of possible conflicts with North Korea and Iran, stating that "neither country will be talked out of nuclear weapons voluntarily."

He said that there are only two options in the nuclear disarmament of Iran, the first being "regime change," and the second "one I certainly don't want but that needs to be considered is the use of targeted military force." Bolton reiterated, however, that a regime change was "ultimately the best solution."

Throughout the question and answer session following Bolton's speech, the former ambassador was critical of the U.N. and international courts and defended his own policies as acting in the interest of the U.S.

"Every country in the United Nations is working in their own country's interest; only one of them gets criticized for it," he said.

Bolton's speech concluded without incident other than continued outbursts from demonstrators. Alexandra Ferrara, a Smith student who attended the event, said Bolton's speech was "quite generic" and "addressed nothing new that hasn't been said before" but commended Bolton on his handling of outspoken demonstrators. "I wish the audience wasn't so disrespectful," she said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Committee on the American Founding, described by member Shauneen Garrahan as an organization devoted to the natural-rights principals of the Founders, which seeks to facilitate an open discourse in the left-leaning Amherst community by inviting conservative speakers to the college.

"Ambassador Bolton is a good example of that," said Garrahan.

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsulliv a student.umass.edu

Holiday cause gains student support and families, formerly known as Children's Aid and Family Services.

GIVING TREE from page 1

"The social service agency's staff works with recipients to identify appropriate gifts," said Dunbar Scully. "Those suggestions are passed on to the Giving Tree coordinators, who incorporate them into handmade decorations for a special tree in the staff lounge."

Anyone is allowed to donate to the project, including UMass students.

Caroline Duffy, a UMass sophomore was in favor of the Giving tree project. "Who doesn't want to help out little kids? I volunteer in my hometown," she said.

UMass sophomore Alex Carvajal had similar support for the project. "I think it's a great idea for underprivileged kids who can't always get what they want for the holidays," he said.

This event was very successful in its first year, and carloads of gifts were dropped off at the agency's Northampton headquarters.

Dunbar Scully agreed. "Last year, many UHS staff members went above and beyond the suggested items, donating gift bags overflowing with toys, clothes, gift certificates and more."

UMass sophomore Nick DiJacomo praised the efforts of the project. "I love to see the community giving back to kids in need," he said. "Often times we take for granted what we have in our lives and we have to take a step back and realize that there are other people out there who don't have as much as we do."

According to Dunbar Scully, donations are being accepted at UHS' Central Stores department during regular business hours until this Thursday. Those looking to donate should go to the loading dock at the side of the health center and ring the bell for assistance. After Thursday, donations can be made to Berkshire Children and Families at their office located on 8 Trumbull Road in Northampton.

"The top gift suggestions include clothing for children age two and under, board books, puzzles, tub toys and ride-on toys," said Dunbar Scully. "Gift cards for grocery stores and department stores are also greatly needed."

Eden Unver can be reached at eunver a student.umass.edu.

HASA/Casa night unites Hispaniola

HASA from page 1

theme of "Coming to Hispaniola." Serving as tour guides, HASA/Casa organizers showcased the beauty of the island with traditional dances and vibrant costumes.

In one skit, an African prince, portrayed by Felix Okonkwo, president of the African Student Association at UMass, had a deadline to find a wife in Hispaniola. This skit gave the opportunity for both organizations to introduce cultural differences and misconceptions about each other.

As the performance came to an end, the prince found the best of both worlds, as his wife was both Haitian and Dominican. The party was initiated after both organizations finished a joint dance of Compa and Merengue. The blend of Bachata,Compa, Dancehall and Reggaeton were played throughout the night.

"I think HASA/Casa was a great event. It allowed two cultures to be represented to the fullest," said sophomore Samantha Rey.

"I really enjoyed how two cultures came together to put on an astonishing performance despite all that craziness that goes on in putting on a show like this," added Luis Hernandez, a senior at UMass.

The speaker of the night was Michael Scott, a graduate student from the University of Connecticut. Scott spoke about Dominican and Haitian relations today and the importance of getting educated about both cultures.

"HASA/Casa: Coming to Hispaniola is an event distinguished from all others by its crowd and the ability to bring to light the presence of the many Haitians and Dominicans on this campus," said HASA president Mike Moise. "[We] sold out at around 9:00 p.m. and had the largest amount of [attendees], I events such as HASA/Casa are what allows others to view the talent and learn a little about the cultures of a large amount of students on this campus."

"The event was a great success. It was wonderful seeing that many people in attendance," said Evelyn Martinez, president of Casa Dominicana. "I am looking forward to improving HASA/Casa. If you thought last night was great look out for our 15th annual HASA/Casa in 2008, it will be bigger and better!"

Gisel Saillant can be reached at gsaillan a student .umass .edu

Acclaimed climber speaks of journeys

SYNNOTT from page 1

"I kind of just looked at that photograph and told myself that I was going to climb it," he said. "And I guess that's the difference between a reader and an explorer. They look at it and say, 'wow it must be a great view from up there,' explorers find a way to get up there themselves."

Synnott speaks from experience when speaking of being atop the world. However, spoke too on the qualities necessary to reach those heights, and perhaps more fittingly, on the literal pitfalls that appear and often consume one's attempt to summit anything, never mind a mountain.

During the lecture he spoke of a moment called "the Grip" during which every climber says to himself, "Okay, this is really really bad." He said that climbing slime walls in the Amazon was his experience with it, and it's a feeling that is associated with being stuck on a wall, unable to move up or down, fearful of death.

He sat across the table red-eyed. Maybe it was the slide show or the idea of driving home to New Hampshire after the interview, but then again it could have been the plain white walls of the room we were in, his eyes unable to process the level of starkness compared to the wonder of his most natural habitat.

But he added that in addition to "the Grip" each climber has his moment of triumph, a "primeval scream" that is emitted not only vocally but silently in his conscious as well.

"I've had several. I have them out there when I'm climbing, and I'm looking out over everything below up. But I have them at home too. I have a wife and three kids," Synnott said.

In a profession that has one seeing parts of the world continuously for the first time, Synnott admits that he fears being jaded, a moment where a primeval scream is replaced by an apathetic shrug and a grip that holds nothing.

"I fear it, especially when out guiding. I'll be out 30 days straight, and I might think about it. It's my job, how I support myself and my family. I couldn't do anything else now, but I think that the people who become jaded do it because they allow themselves to."

A suggested $3 donation was well-received by the crowd as it came with a free raffle ticket that could win those in attendance climbing equipment and T-shirts. The Outing Club's membership includes both current and former students as well as faculty. The group organizes trips year round that involve climbing, canoeing, hiking and spelunking skills of all levels.

Will McGuiness can be reached at wmcguinn a gmail com

Mark Synnott scales the face of a rock formation and spoke yesterday to a group gathered in the Campus Center.

Students on both ends of bill debate

BILL from page 1

Shouldn't the government be spending their time worrying about more important things, like health care, than if a little brat child is getting spanked?" asked junior Jon Duteau.

"I don't think anyone over five gets spanked," added Duteau. "And a five-year-old doesn't have the capacity to understand that being spanked is against the law."

Whether against the law or not, University of New Hampshire sociology professor Murray Straus points out that 90 percent of 100 studies of corporal punishment revealed that children can experience harmful side effects after being spanked.

Spanking may cause depression, weaken the bond between parents and the child and increase the likelihood of a child being abusive as adults, according to Straus. He recognizes that although spanking does not always bring about these effects, it does not mean the method is harmless. If a person is not abusive later on in life as a result of spanking, Straus said that "it just means they were part of the lucky 75 percent who were not affected, rather than the 25 percent who were."

Straus suggests that physical discipline does not work any better at correcting misbehavior than other non-physical means, and that the law could help educate parents of these "non-violent" means of effective discipline, as the Swedish law against corporal punishment has done for almost 30 years.

The Swedish research project that helped propel the passage of the 1979 anti-corporal punishment law, discovered that stopping all physical punishment was the "gateway" to preventing most child abuse, according to University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee professor Adrienne Ahlgren Haeuser, a project director for the National Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse. Although the law does not punish parents with jail time or fines, it has proved effective in turning the behavior of many Swedish children and parents around through widespread education of non-violent parenting methods.

Haeuser claims that on a trip to Sweden in 1988, none of her encounters "snickered about the law or opposed it. Both parents and professionals agreed that Swedish parents, aside from those with very serious psychological or social problems, were not using physical punishment of any sort, even in the privacy of their homes."

However, the Swedish government provides parents with many child-rearing services that would seem foreign to most Americans. The government guarantees one parent a paid 15 month leave from their job to care for their newborn and provides local parent-child centers where parents are aided by social workers and early childhood educators, according to Haeuser.

In America, however, even Wolf recognized the Massachusetts bill has little chance of passing. Hohbiak linked the lackluster outlook for the bill's passage with the fact that many people may see it as intrusive.

"I think that being an American, a characteristic is independence and that entails rearing a child however you want."

"I think it would be a good law, but I am hesitant to have any governmental involvement in family matters," said junior Travis O'Deane. "But, as a fundamental rule, you shouldn't hit the people you love."

Stella Cernak can be reached at ccernak a student umass edu

Infection caused by improper practices

MRSA from page 1

ness and others.

One of the major reasons people develop MRSA is because of improper antibiotic use. Now, doctors assign antibiotics to all infections and colds that don't necessarily require antibiotics to cure. Livestock is also filled with antibiotics, which is soon eaten. Misuse of antibiotics given to the animals can also lead to tainted water. Because of all of this, antibiotics have been consumed and allowed the bacteria within to become immune to them.

While immune systems are filled with unnecessary antibiotics, it is easy to pick up MRSA from other people. It is possible to catch the hospital strain by just staying in a hospital. But the community strain can be caught by interacting with friends in the simplest of ways. Two of the major ways are playing a contact sport or sharing towels or athletic equipment.

Any cuts or open wounds that are received while playing a sport are susceptible to passing or receiving MRSA from someone else who doesn't know that MRSA is present. And even though there have not been a large amount of outbreaks recorded in public gyms from sharing the machines, there have been cases reported from sharing razors, towels, or uniforms.

Public health nurse Anne Becker at the University Health Services at the University of Massachusetts believes that students are no more prone to the infection than anyone else.

"We've been seeing cases of MRSA for the last couple of years now and our numbers are on par with the rest of the state's," she said. "The good thing is that all the cases have responded well to treatment. The infection is out there now and we have to deal with it."

Becker also believes that athletes are more susceptible to MRSA because their skin takes a beating, but that is the same everywhere. She also stresses the incredible importance of not sharing personal items to avoid MRSA.

Danielle Kahn can be reached at dkahn@student.umass.edu

Write for news in next Spring!
e-mail
news@dailycollegian.com

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM

- Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
- More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
- Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
- Post unlimited online listings
- Little to no spam
- By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

DEC 4 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Boston schools struggling

Joshua H. Wilder

Being college students here at UMass, academic pressures can be intense, and the economic stakes are even higher. Faced with multiple obligations, limited time and a variety of distractions, it truly requires a lot of discipline and work to stay the course and not drop out.

And while there is no denying that all students here at the University have a lot riding on the time we spend here, younger students across Massachusetts are having trouble making it through a much more important period of education – high school.

According to FairTest, the National Center for Fair and Open Testing, the dropout rate in Boston schools has been on a steady upswing over the past five years with no end in sight.

Nearly half of Boston students fail to graduate from the city's regular public high schools in four years, if at all, according to a recently released Boston Globe story.

The Globe estimates that the city's overall graduation rate stands at a shaky 53 percent, lagging way behind the statewide average.

Based on a ten month study the newspaper found that eighth grade students, who had spotty attendance, failed one or more classes or were more than two years older than their classmates, were more likely to drop out of high school. These findings aren't particularly surprising, but the sheer number of students dropping out as early as eighth grade is a sobering statistic.

From 2005 to 2006, more than 1,900 students, or 9.1 percent of the students in the city high school population, dropped out. That brings the dropout rate in the city up 25 percent from the year before. The report said that 27 percent graduated in their fifth or sixth year; most students in the remaining percentage dropped out.

Most seniors here at UMass will tell you that they are facing some serious anxieties about job hunting after graduation day comes and goes. These concerns are legitimate. There is an increasingly more competitive market out there, and even with degrees from a prestigious university such as UMass, there is no guarantee that each alumni from the class of 2008 will end up with a successful professional life.

What actual job opportunities are available to someone with no degree of work experience?

But imagine how the job hunt would turn out for someone who never completed middle school and has no formal education to fall back on. What actual job opportunities are available to someone with no degree of work experience?

School officials told the Globe that the city's school system has no major method to identify students who may be at risk of dropping out but were optimistic that the study will shine some light on ways to do so.

While officials are optimistic, this humble columnist is not. Perhaps it is easy to be optimistic when the dropouts have no direct impact on your own life; however, what can you say to make a 16-year-old kid with no education who is hopeful about his future? The only real jobs available to someone with such credentials include pumping gas, scrubbing floors and ending each sentence with, "do you want fries with that?"

Not to imply that these are bad jobs, but living off of minimum wage is no easy feat when practically every other commodity is becoming more expensive these days.

When high school dropout rates in states like Arkansas and Georgia make headlines, it is unfortunate. But when it happens here in Massachusetts, it is truly a rarity. For a state that arguably holds education on a higher pedestal than any other state in the nation, seeing its capital, Boston, report high dropout rates is unbelievable.

People up here in the North like to pride themselves on living in a region where progressive thinking, cutting-edge job opportunities and a healthy economy are the norm. But if cities like Boston continue to churn out students with no formal education or motivation to achieve one, we may start seeing the aforementioned trend take a swan dive.

And what is the end result? Our statewide economy will suffer, but more importantly, we will have a whole generation of people with no genuine opportunities or bright future in sight. What would be the best way to solve such a problem? Well, obviously it is difficult to attract the best teachers to a city like Boston where the education system is in such disarray.

Explaining to students that by dropping out of high school they are effectively shooting themselves in the foot for the future, is the best way to hopefully keep them in school.

With finals and stress coming up, be sure to study hard and break a leg. However, when the pressure is on, just remember that just by making it this far you are still in much better shape than the youth of Boston can claim.

Josh Wilder is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jhwilder@student.umass.edu.

No quick solutions for Iraq

John Gruenenfelder

The situation in Iraq has become noticeably better over the past couple of months. The number of soldiers and civilians dying is down, and some Iraqi refugees are even beginning to return to Baghdad. If only it were all sunshine and roses.

Conservative pundits to a perceived notion that the media was not reporting the good trend in Iraq quickly or widely enough. There may be some truth to this, though given the current administration's spin machine it's not hard to understand why they might not have taken initial reports at face value. Now, however, the media is abuzz with the good news but with some fairly large reservations.

The president, of course, sees these reports as proof that the surge has succeeded, but it is important to remember what the goals of the surge were to begin with. Much as the original impetus for war kept changing – from WMDs to spreading democracy to stopping terrorism – reducing violence was only part of what the surge was supposed to accomplish.

The primary goal was to reduce violence enough so that the fledgling government could pull itself together. In this aspect, the surge has failed. Perhaps it might be more accurate to say that the Iraqi government has failed miserably; no practical progress has been made.

The lack of progress is hardly surprising given the amount of sectarian violence and hatred. Part of the decrease in violence is directly due to the increased troop levels, but another important part is the greatly increased segregation of Baghdad.

With little but bickering in the Iraqi government, how can they proceed?

The ethnic warring between the Shiites and the Sunnis has cooled if only because the mixed areas of the city have largely been cauterized. A map in Friday's New York Times shows that in the past year and a half, Baghdad has gone from largely mixed to almost entirely split between Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. With clearly delineated boundaries, the amount of conflict between the two sects has decreased.

The same news story also describes the success of the surge possibly heading towards failure. Some residents of Baghdad, who had left as refugees in the face of violence, have begun to return to the city now that the danger level is lower. Due to the large scale reorganization of the layout of Baghdad, however, many returning residents have no homes.

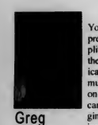
The returning refugees receive a payment from the government, but the military says that the government has no plan to deal with the inevitable conflicts between returning residents and squatters. Nor is there any plan to deal with refugees who have no place to return to in the city. The military's biggest worry is that without any resolution to these issues, there could be new sectarian violence.

The Iraqi police and defense forces are still lagging. Many of the recent gains have occurred on a local level with neighborhood leaders assisting U.S. military units.

This is a great development, but it will not remain indefinitely. The status quo is still very violent, and this cannot last. Unless progress continues, these new agreements could easily fall apart. Lower levels of violence are important, but without a functioning government, progress will surely stall.

With little but bickering in the Iraqi government, how can they proceed? It's been over four years now, and it is time to get out the "big stick." Our country has enormous influence over the Iraqi government, and we really need to start using it.

Spreading democracy means we can't just toss out elected, if ineffectual, leaders. We can pressure them, though, and strongly. The president has the ability to exert his own force over the Iraqi government, and he needs to begin exercising this power.



More than just pressuring leaders, sending a loud message means setting a date for troop withdrawals. With the new U.S. military city bases and polatial embassy in the green zone, our presence in Iraq will persist long into the future. But those levels will be far below current numbers and the Iraqi leaders need to know when our forces will be pulling out.

These leaders are not stupid and have no desire to lose the power they have gained. But they should also know that in a country left in turmoil, leaders are often in great danger.

Our military won't always be there to keep the peace, and the sooner the Iraqi leadership realizes this, the sooner they will make some real changes and compromises. Starting this process now, at a time of increased safety and peace, would be a fantastic idea.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jgruenen@student.umass.edu

Superficial campaigning

Greg Collins

The recent CNN/YouTube Republican presidential debate exemplified what is wrong with the current nature of political campaigns today. Too much attention is focused on the personality of the candidates and on the gimmicky tactics used to inspire people to become more politically active.

Instead, the candidates themselves, as well as voters, debate moderators and news outlets, should concentrate more on centering campaigns on the urgent domestic and international issues facing the U.S. Substantive issues, and not candidates' personalities, should dictate the direction and seriousness of campaigns.

For example, the dynamic of the relationship between the Republican candidates and audience members exhibited the deep superficiality of current debate formats. CNN allowed the live crowd to cheer and jeer after the candidates' responses as if they were at a sporting event rooting for one team and against another.

Allowing a live audience to respond in this manner created the impression that elected officials should be held directly accountable to Americans, which of course they should be. But as much as CNN and YouTube may have embraced this dynamic in order to infuse energy into the debate, their acceptance of crowd noise undermined the purpose of presidential debates in general.

The ultimate purpose is to provide a serious forum to hear candidates outline their views, absent from any passionate crowds or gimmicky YouTube videos. It is not to allow politicians to use witty sound bites and exchange clever insults with one another in order to appeal to the audience. Rather, debates should be a genuine way to hear candidates explicitly explain only their political philosophies and their viewpoints on the pressing political issues of our time.

Unfortunately, some of the videos selected by CNN and YouTube contributed to the contemporary superficiality of campaigns. In theory, these videos provide a refreshingly unorthodox way for flesh-and-blood Americans to confront isolated politicians in a direct and candid manner.

But this method is vulnerable to allow questions completely unrelated to contemporarily vital political subjects. For instance, CNN showed a video in which someone asked how the Republican candidates perceive the Confederate flag.

Instead, passion, gimmicks and personalities command the way campaigns are organized by political operatives and covered by the news.

One wonders what the organizers of the debate were thinking when they filtered this inquiry. Undoubtedly, a candidate's answer would reveal his personal views on this country's racial history and the legitimacy of the flag. This would have been an appropriate question if presidential candidates were campaigning to be professors of American history.

But they are not trying to win votes to become teachers. They are competing for a position which requires a person to hold a dispassionate view on relevant national security objectives and domestic public policy. Regardless of your personal views on the Civil War, it does not change the fact that the Confederate flag is not an urgent campaign issue. Would the candidates' answer to this question accurately reflect their judgment concerning the War on Terror, Social Security and health care?

In addition, other videos posed questions pertaining to people's personal lives, many of which were deeply touching. However, showing these videos undermines the notion that candidates should be asked about specific policy issues and not specific people. Sound public policy requires objective judgment independent from the passionate pleas of individuals. Our American conception of constitutional government, after all, is driven by laws – not by people.

Instead, passion, gimmicks and personalities command the way campaigns are organized by political operatives and covered by the news. How come we know about Rudy Giuliani's personal life or Mitt Romney's religious beliefs more than their views on the particular successes and failures of the Iraq War?

Some say the reality is that campaigns are first and foremost about people. Yet it is also a reality, and a more urgent reality at that, that campaigns are not about candidates as an ends. Rather, they are a means whose primary responsibility, if elected, is to enact policies which protect American lives and American liberty.

Why should campaigns be more about substantive issues rather than about people? Pressing political issues that define this particular campaign season will influence the lives of Americans far beyond the careers of politicians. Candidates will say whatever they want to get elected, as evidenced by the anti-war rhetoric from congressional candidates during the most recent midterm election campaigns, and continued nowadays by some Democratic candidates and Ron Paul.

But the Iraq War and the war against Islamic terrorists did not magically end after these elections. Sycophantic politicians frequently forget that reality is the most reliable reality check.

When deciding which candidate to support, don't be deceived by candidates' cute catch phrases, like Barack Obama's "politics of hope," rather, take a serious and dispassionate look at the experience, judgment and qualifications of a candidate. These factors will more accurately determine whether he or she is committed to combating issues that will far outlast term limits.

After all, the consequences of making wrong judgment calls on issues like the War on Terror are far more costly than losing an election.

Greg Collins is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu

Shifting from print to online journalism

Haley Navarro

Blogging is a rather ridiculous word. Its meaning doesn't seem to match the word at all. The term "blog" is a shortened version of "web log." Blogging, which is writing and maintaining entries on a Web site, seems to encompass a wide spectrum of people who use the verb.

Bloggers can vary from political figures to your normal college student. Facebook.com and Myspace.com have blog sections where users can post their ideas for their friends to read. It has escalated to the point where I keep up on my friends' lives from home by what they write in their blogs.

But then again, America is doing the same thing. Political and gossip blogs have become more popular than ever. So popular, in fact, that some television and radio shows are taking what they read from certain blogs and putting it on their programs. Three of the most influential blogs on the internet are the Drudge Report, the Huffington Post and Perez Hilton (for every teenage girl and gossip-loving middle-aged man).

Matt Drudge, who started off his career by working in the gift shop at CBS, now has one of the most influential political blogs on the Internet so influential that it's a featured topic in my Media Criticism class. The Drudge Report was also mentioned on the New York Times front page on Oct. 22, 2007.

Drudge was also said to have been the first media outlet to break the Monica Lewinsky story. Matt Drudge reportedly makes about 1.2 million dollars a year. His page, which is said to gain attention from network news executives and radio DJs, allegedly influences what does – or doesn't – go in that day's news. His site, Drudgereport.com, which looks like a 5th grader coded it in Dreamweaver, gains 360 million page views a month, according to Intermarkets.net. That's pretty good for a guy who used to work at 7-11.

The Huffington Post is a Jackson Pollock painting of political breaking news, editorials and opinions, pop culture and some celebrity articles. What sets this blog apart is that it's interactive – readers are encouraged to comment on the articles posted on the blog section of the site.

Why watch the evening news or get the newspaper if you can get the day's events from an online blog?

One can sign up for this blog with an avatar and a username – the works. The blog section is viewed by an uncountable number of viewers a day. There's also a link to each article for a "quick read" for those on the go.

The list of people who contribute to the Huffington Post is endless. From politicians to actors to journalists, it really is a culmination of all different opinions and viewpoints. Celebrities such as Alec Baldwin and Ellen DeGeneres are featured contributors, as well as journalists like Walter Cronkite and Eric Boehlert.

Perez Hilton, whose real name is Mario Lavandeira, has inarguably the most visited gossip site to date. His blog, which used to be called Pagesixsixsix.com is now his pseudonym, Perezhilton.com. According the Thegawker.com, Perez gets about 105 million page views a week. His blog reportedly costs 9,000 dollars a week.

Perez's blog has no substantial information on it. Besides the occasional post of a presidential candidate or the Hollywood writer's strike, it is mostly uncensored pictures of celebrity's naughty bits and unflattering celebrity pictures. These pictures are drawn on in Microsoft Paint with penises and offensive words. For the most part, this blog is for people who care about who goes to rehab or what Britney Spears did wrong this week.

What it boils down to is a new era of journalism. Why watch the evening news or get the newspaper if you can get the day's events from an online blog? Especially since people increasingly trust print and broadcast media less and less because of political bias, this is a new way to get the day's dish.

Even though the blogs are assumed to be right or left wing, people would rather swallow that then watch their local television news anchor furrow his brow when bringing up a certain issue. Blogs are the up-and-coming media; some blog owners make as much as a network executive. And Matt Drudge doesn't even consider himself a journalist. UMass is even tailoring to this change with the class about this, "Journ 392W: Writing for the Web."

People say that print journalism is dying. While this may not specifically be the case, Internet journalism is on the rise. It's easier to reach people electronically rather than print up papers or make a newscast. People can look at their newspaper Web site or blog of choice at any time of the day, they don't have to wait for the 7:00 news or pay for a newspaper.

The Internet just seems to be the answer – it's free, convenient and there all the time. It isn't going to be gone by 3:00. It's there if you get off work late. It never closes. All in all, the Internet is the next big thing in journalism.

Haley Navarro is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at hnavarro@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 04, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Local photographer Suzanne Bell opened her exhibit "Naturally Beautiful" in the Integrated Science and Engineering Library, which holds pictures of sunsets, wildlife and landscapes. Bell's most famous work is a set of eight photos that capture a horse rolling in the dirt taken in Jackson, N.H.

'Naturally Beautiful'

Local artist showcases scenic landscapes in Lederle exhibit

BY KERI LETOURNEAU
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Local amateur photographer, Suzanne Bell, 53, is currently putting on an exhibition in the Integrated Sciences and Engineering Library in the Lederle low rise.

The exhibition, labeled "Naturally Beautiful," showcases some of Bell's most scenic landscapes, including a particularly beautiful sunset captured through a dense fog, as well as various wildlife including a whimsical set of eight photos that show a horse rolling around in the dirt.

"The rolling horse came about one summer when we [Bell and her husband] were at a bed and breakfast in Jackson, New Hampshire," Bell said. "I was standing on a deck over the horse coral, and he started to roll. I snapped a series of photos and around a year later, played with them on Photoshop. My husband loved it, so I printed it and found that it was my most popular photo at my gallery show last summer."

Bell has a problem with labeling herself a true photographer, however. She sets the example as someone who did not go to school for photography nor work for any illustrious gallery or magazine. She has simply had a long-standing love of photography that has carried through to her work.

"A true photographer can get the picture no matter what," Bell said. "I am still learning. I enjoy playing with the camera and finding out how to be more consistent with getting the results I want. When you are happy with your photos is when you stop trying to do better. I didn't actually 'decide' to become a photographer. I've just carried a camera around since I was 12."

As a fellow UMass alum and current staff member, Bell enjoys aiming her camera both around campus and throughout the local culture. She contends that a person does not have to look far to find an interesting subject.

"Sometimes I set up my tripod and point it at our birdfeeder in the winter," Bell said. "I have a long plunger that allows me to be at the kitchen counter away from the camera and shoot when a bird is there."

Though Bell has a strong connection to the local fare, she considers traveling as a great opportunity to practice her talents and find inspiration on a more expansive scale.

"When you see something everyday, you stop seeing it" Bell said. "You have to learn to see things as new to take good photos. Guess you do still need to travel to be in photographer, but it helps to open your eyes."

Her favorite New England haunts include the White Mountains in New Hampshire, the Cape Cod National Seashore including the Provincetown area. Bell highly recommended traveling out west to the country's national parks including Yosemite, Yellowstone and especially Glacier, as great sources of inspiration. Bell's ultimate goal is to reach Alaska so she can both witness and capture the Northern Lights for her fans back home.

Bell's current exhibition boasts a wide variety of photographs from local wildlife to distant landscapes and will be on display until Dec. 31. For more of her work visit the Deerfield Gallery in South Deerfield, Mass.

Keri Letourneau can be reached at kletourn@student.umass.edu

Imus makes his way back onto the radio after famous scandal

BY GENE SEYMOUR
NEWSDAY

NEW YORK – Has Don Imus learned anything from what happened last spring? Has anyone?

The first question has often been asked since WABC-AM announced that it would put Imus back on the airwaves. He started his new radio show Monday from 6 to 10 a.m. EST, with a new cast that, according to the Associated Press, includes two black comedians, Karith Foster and Tony Powell.

Is Imus chastened enough to change his tone since losing his long-running morning talk show on WFAN-AM because he insulted the Rutgers women's basketball team as "nappy-headed hos." His detractors are not optimistic.

Barbara Ciara, current president of the National Association of Black Journalists, told Newsday that she's seen nothing in the months since Imus' slur "that gives Americans both Black and white any measure of comfort" over whether or not he deserves a chance to host another show that could draw many influential politicians and celebrities to trade quips with the I-Man."

Others perceive a teachable moment. "The best thing to come out of the whole Imus mess is that, at least, it set forth a national conversation about the consequences of language," says Byron Hurt, a filmmaker-activist whose documentary, "Hip-Hop: Beyond Beats and Rhymes," aired on PBS earlier this year. "People have needed to pay attention to the power of language and the power of words to hurt others for a long time and at least, with Imus saying what he did, it got put out there for everyone to talk about."

And then what? With the passage of eight months, the media-quake set off by Imus' slur appears now to have been little more than another tremor in the ongoing national debate over racist language. And as the infamous shock jock again slides behind the mic, the question of who can say what racially charged words to whom remains steeped in controversy and crossed signals.

Immediately after the April incident, for example, Bryan Monroe, former president of the NABJ, which spearheaded the campaign to discipline Imus, said that with his comments Imus "lost touch with all that is decent and honorable in America." But Michael Harrison, publisher of the talk-radio trade journal Talkers, says Imus' Rutgers remarks were just "the ill-fated attempt of a 67-year-old white man trying to be hip."

Indeed, in apologizing for his characterization of the Rutgers team, Imus said that it was, among other things, a clumsy appropriation of rap music's often crude and demeaning lyrics about women.

This in turn led hip-hop

See IMUS on page 6

Comedian talks about his enraged humor and its real life counterpart

BY JULIE HINDS
DIGITAL EDITOR

Lewis Black is sort of like 12 angry men rolled into one. At this year's Emmys, he was gloriously apoplectic, ranting at network executives for junking up TV screens with those annoying promos on what to watch next.

"We don't care about the next show! We're watching this show!" Black screamed, speaking for every viewer who has ever wanted to throw a shoe at a pop-up ad.

Black yells for all of us really. He has become famous for his "Back in Black" commentaries on "The Daily Show," where he rages with exasperated passion on politics and life. Next spring, he's scheduled to get his own show on Comedy Central, "The Root of All Evil," where he'll be in charge as pop culture's excesses are put on trial.

Given that Black also writes books, costars in movies and keeps up a rigorous touring schedule, it's hard to understand how he has the energy to maintain his fury. But that's the easy part. He only has to look at the daily headlines on global tensions, the economy or the presidential race to find fresh material.

"It just piles on," he says, speaking en route from New York to Connecticut for another show. "I ping for the days when I just talked about weather."

QUESTION: You get very worked up during your act. Have you ever fainted onstage like Marie Osmond's?

ANSWER: No, I haven't. I think it actually is healthy for me to do that. I would explode if I just kind of sat on this.

Q: Anger isn't an acceptable or popular emotion in everyday life. But do you think, in some ways, that rage is underrated?

A: I don't think rage, per se, is the best thing to bring out at parties. But I do think being angry about certain things and then channeling it in some ways is a smart thing. On side of politics, the next business you could be in that would inspire rage is entertainment. I used to actually go to meetings and blow up, which was really part of the reason it took so long for me to be found.

Q: How much of what you do onstage relates to your real life? I wonder about your threshold for the small irritations of life.

A: I'm not good. You know, you dial your information and it says what city, what state, what's the place you want to get. I literally sometimes, about every fifth time, just start yelling, "Jeannie a real person! Jeannie a real person!" And then nine times out of 10 they give you a real person, so what are we doing this for?

Q: Do you ever approach people who are irritating you, like, if you were in a movie with a loud talker or a restaurant with a loud cell phone conversation?

A: Usually not, because they're the ones I'm worried about. They're the ones that might snap. They're the ones who don't know where they are in time and space.

Q: Is there a challenge in staying upset, to being able to tap into life's frustrations when you're appreciated by a wider audience?

A: I'm as angry about the things I find wrong as I've always been. Just because somebody pays me more doesn't make it any better. Also, too, you have an audience that really lets you go further. I used to have to try to attract people to listen to the kind of stuff I was doing. Now I have this really great audience and I can go on and talk about things in ways I never imagined would be possible. A few times, the audience seems a bit more bitter than I am.

Comedian Lewis Black claims that even small things such as dialing information can throw him into a fit of rage.

Radio talk host returns after racial insult

WABC-AM puts Imus back on the air despite criticism

IMUS from page 5

impresario Russell Simmons and others to call for broadcasters to voluntarily "bleep" such misogynistic shorthand as "ho," "bitch" and the "n word" on rap recordings. Simmons' suggestion was largely symbolic, since most stations already "bleeped."

Adding to the who-can-say-what confusion, in September, a taped deposition from Isiah Thomas in his high-profile sexual harassment trial had the New York Knicks coach admitting that, while it was unacceptable for a white man to call a black woman "bitch," it was "not as much" so for a black man to do the same. The Rev. Al Sharpton quickly denounced the comment, telling ABCNews.com that "no person, regardless of his or her race, has the right to make misogynistic or sexist remarks against another person."

The Imus imbroglio also reflects the staggering speed with which the information has come to be processed and disseminated. The Internet, with its steady, often tone-deaf flow of conflicting opinion and interpretation, has helped make it possible for unmediated and uninhibited public expression of attitudes.

Amy Mitchell, deputy director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, adds, however, that such heavy and highly visible flow of information also means that "there's a better chance of being caught when you go too far." In other words, the atmosphere that allowed Imus to let loose also allowed his critics to bite back quick and hard.

And when hip-hop culture was implicated by Imus and others as an accessory after the fact, this issue, too, became a flash point for heated debate on the Internet and elsewhere.

Bob Law, a broadcasting consultant who once hosted an "urban"-oriented radio talk show, believes that blaming hip-hop is "bogus because not all black rappers go to such extremes. Those kinds of excuses come from the belief that the black community doesn't care what these rappers say or do. We have always had people in the community whose response to these lyrics and their offensive terminology has been swift and direct."

But if hip-hop isn't to blame, what made Imus think it would be all right to say what he did? Are the present times more open than usual to such crude racial outbursts? Jabari Asim, editor of the NAACP's magazine Crisis, doubts it, calling Imus' comments partly "the same-old same-old."

But, he says, "there's no question that, for a while, this overt racism was toned down. Consequently, whenever there were grievances about racism in the last couple decades, conservatives felt emboldened to deride it as 'political correctness.' Right now, though, it seems as though the culture overall is coarsening more and more."

Asim is the author of "The N Word," a socio-cultural history and dissection of the most troublesome and persistent racial epithet of all. The book was published the month before the Imus incident. And though the only "n word" involved in that controversy was "nappy," Asim is asked why Imus' insult aroused so much hostility, while black comedians such as Chris Rock and Dave Chappelle don't draw the same firestorm for using that other, more volatile "n word" for satiric purposes.

"I think the obvious difference is that unlike (Rock and Chappelle), Imus doesn't really have a record as an astute social critic on race," Asim says. "And when he made those remarks, it came off as bullying because he was perceived as nothing more than a wealthy entertainer picking on kids. Imus usually takes on targets that can defend themselves. This time, he didn't."

While the Imus comments may be indicative of a coarsening of the culture, as Asim and Law contend, the counterreaction - the pressure exerted by NABJ to remove Imus from the airwaves, Simmons' push for a soft-pedaled censorship of rap lyrics - has become pervasive.

This year, especially, there has been a concerted effort by influential black organizations and publications to restrict and even excise the "n word" examined in Asim's book. This summer, Black Enterprise publisher Earl Graves pulled the plug - literally - on black comedian Eddie Griffin, who had just started an epithet-laced routine at a high-powered event sponsored by the magazine.

In January, the mayor of Brazonia, Texas, Ken Corley, who is white, proposed an ordinance banning the "n word" outright, but stiff opposition caused the proposal to be withdrawn. The word has come under highly visible attack in such cities as Detroit, where the NAACP staged a mock funeral for the offending epithet.

So far, no one can say for sure what impact such gestures will have. But there are many who believe any gesture is better than none at all.

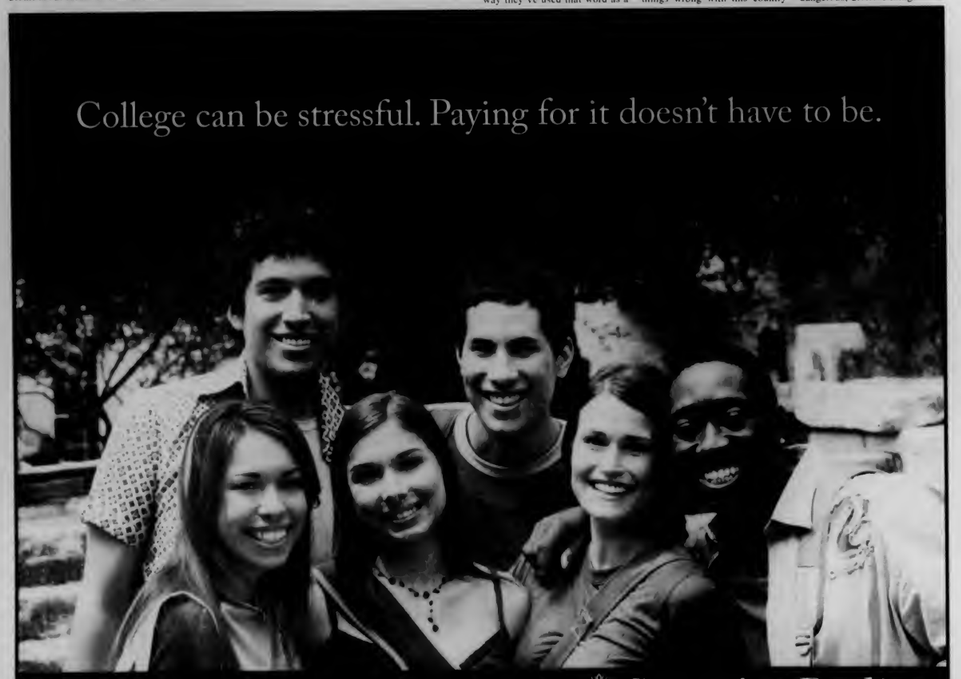
"What's become so wrong, especially among the young people of this country, is the way they've used that word as a term of endearment," says Hazel Dukes, president of the New York State Council of NAACP branches. "And they don't understand the history behind the use of that word and what it has done to us as a people. The word needs to go away completely. It is not a compliment or a term of friendship, but a word of disrespect that's not what we should be about in America of 2007."

In the February issue of Ebony magazine, the word "Enough!" was emblazoned across the cover to encourage its black readership to restrict its use of the "n word," though Bryan Monroe, the magazine's editor-in-chief, stops short of banning the word outright.

"I've never advocated banning any word," says Monroe, the former NABJ president. "What I've said all along is: Be responsible. Make personal choices. Don't just throw the word around so unconsciously that you're not aware of who's listening in, especially if it's your children. There are so many things wrong with this country that we don't need a word that hurts people. What we're saying is that we need to draw the line somewhere. You have to be the one who says, 'Don't say it in front of me or my children.' It's like handling any other dangerous and volatile material. And it also challenges us to find other ways to embrace each other whether it's a brother, son, a friend or even a stranger walking down the street."

Filmmaker Hurt, for his part, says he'd like to see how far such activity goes in attacking not just abusive language, "but also the institutional racism that lies beneath it. The words can hurt, but even after you go after the words, there's still racism ingrained in society that needs to be attacked just as aggressively."

"What's missing from all the discussion about these words, whether they come from Imus or anybody else, is context," says Harrison, who publishes Talker. "And words without context, ideas without context, can be dangerous, divisive things."



Imus' comments about the women's basketball team spurred much debate about racism in today's culture.

Don Imus insulted the Rutger's women's basketball team by calling them "nappy-headed hos." In repsonse, WFAN-AM took his morning show off the air.

College can be stressful. Paying for it doesn't have to be.

1.866.245.6179 | sovereignbank.com/forstudents

Sovereign Bank

You have enough on your plate. You shouldn't have to worry about getting the money you need for educational expenses. With a Sovereign Direct Student Loan, you get a smart way to pay for school when federal loans just aren't enough. For more information, call 1-866-245-6179 or visit sovereignbank.com/forstudents.

Member FDIC ©2007 Sovereign Bank | Sovereign Bank and its logo are registered trademarks of Sovereign Bank or its affiliates, or subsidiaries in the United States and other countries. Sovereign Direct Student Loans are funded by Sovereign Bank and are not guaranteed by the federal government and not classified as federal loans.

Dainton does it all

HOCKEY from page 10

to remain in these spots down the stretch, but the loss of conference points could determine whether or not the Minutemen host a quarterfinal matchup in the Hockey East Tournament.

Last season, Boston University found itself in similar circumstances. The Terriers tied eight Hockey East games and finished third behind New Hampshire and BC. So in the first round of the Hockey East Tournament, BU hosted Vermont instead of a weaker Northeastern team.

Conversely, Cahoon commented after Sunday's 5-2 win exhibition over the United States Under-18 National Team, that the ties saved the Minutemen some points in games they easily could've lost.

The Minutemen have a chance to make up some of those points on Saturday when they host third place New Hampshire.

After a New Year's Tournament in Tampa, Fla., when they take on Notre Dame and potentially Colorado College, the Minutemen end their regular season with 17 consecutive games against Hockey East opponents.

QUICK-LY FORGETTING

Freshman goaltender Paul Dainton started all five of the ties for the Minutemen this season. Although he has allowed some late goals in those games, the young net minder has earned a place for himself among the top goaltenders in Hockey East.

Jon Quick's departure for the Los Angeles Kings immediately after last season left an enormous whole for Cahoon to fill. Sophomore Dan Meyers figured to replace Quick, but an early season groin injury put him on the sideline.

He ranks first in Hockey East among goaltenders with at least 10 starts in goals-against average (2.10) and save percentage (.926). Nationally, he ranks 10th in GAA and 12th in save percentage.

Meyers returned from the groin injury against in UMass's win over Union and played well earning the win. Dainton responded with his first-career shutout, a 24-save effort against Cornell.

NATIONALLY RANKED

The tie with Cornell was the only action for the Minutemen last week. As a result, the Minutemen didn't move from the 11 spot in the latest USCHO.CSTV Division I Men's Poll.

In the USA Today/USA Hockey Magazine Men's College Hockey Poll, they moved up the No. 10.

The only Hockey East team above the Minutemen in either poll is UNH. The Wildcats are No. 8 in the USCHO poll and No. 7 in the USA rankings.

Cahoon doesn't judge his team's performance based on the polls, he but certainly keeps an eye on them.

"We use the national rankings as a barometer of what people think of the way we are playing," he said. "If you want stay in the national rankings and be a part of that mix, you need to play consistently well. We know that it doesn't matter until the playoffs, and we've earned the right to be there. It's not what the focus is, but it's a motivation for us. We want to be a part of the process."

The Minutemen were ranked No. 20 in the first USCHO poll and unranked in the initial USA Today poll. ... Kostka leads the Minutemen with a plus-9 rating through the first 14 games of the season. Senior defender David Leaderer is worst among UMass players at minus-4. ... Leaderer and PJ. Fenton, both assistant captains, are both on pace to break the school record for career games. Peter Frovato set the mark at 145 during his career from 2001-2005. ... The Minutemen ranked sixth among Hockey East teams in both penalty kill (83.3 percent) and power play (13 percent). They also rank second in scoring defense behind Providence (2.33), allowing 2.44 goals per game.

Joe Melioni can be reached at jmelioni@student.umass.edu.

Freshman goaltender Paul Dainton began this season alternating with sophomore Dan Meyers. But played well when Meyers suffered a groin injury and now sits atop Hockey East in goals-against average (2.10).

Woodward pitches in

FOOTBALL from page 10

mance this season.

Defensive lineman David Burris, linebackers Charles Walker and Jason Hatchell and cornerback Sean Smalls all represent the UMass defense, while offensive lineman Matt Austin was the lone offensive selection and cornerback Courtney Robinson made the team as a kick returner. Robinson ran back a 100-yard kickoff return for a touchdown in the season-opener against Holy Cross.

Burris finished second in the Colonial Athletic Association with 9.5 sacks, while Walker and Hatchell were Nos. 1 and 2 on the team in tackles by a large margin with 116 and 115, respectively. Smalls was the Minutemen's shutdown corner this season, recording two interceptions, though he rarely saw the ball thrown his way. Omar catches on

The UMass receiving list is usually topped by one of the Minutemen's senior wide receivers, Moore or Rancher. However, Coen's main target against SIU was slot receiver Omar.

Omar caught 10 passes for 114 yards Saturday, easily his highest output in either category this season. That increases his season totals to 44 receptions for 530 yards and a pair of scores.

SLASH WOODWARD

Scott Woodward has shown his versatility in numerous ways since he came here in 2005. The backup to starting quarterback Liam Coen, Woodward also handles the holding responsibilities on field goals. It's a duty he's excelled at this season.

Coen injured his knee a number of times this season, and Woodward stepped in and performed well. The left-handed quarterback completed 13-of-25 passes for 143 yards in spot duty.

In Saturday's loss to SIU, Woodward showed the fans watching on NESN what else he could do. Brown decided to bench starting punter Brett Arnold earlier in the week after struggling against Fordham, giving the starting duties to Woodward - who punted in high school.

Dealing with strong winds at approximately 20 miles per hour, Woodward handled the relatively unfamiliar responsibility well, helping the Minutemen in the field position game. He punted with his left foot five times for 185 yards (37-yard average) and had one downed inside the 20-yard line. His longest punt went for 51 yards.

Jeremy Rice and Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at sports@dailycollegian.com.

Backup quarterback Scott Woodward served as punter for the Minutemen in their loss to Southern Illinois on Saturday. Starting punter Brett Arnold was benched after struggling against Fordham.

Senior wide receiver Mike Omar set career highs in both receptions (10) and yards (110) in his final game in a UMass uniform. This season he had 44 catches, 530 yards and two touchdowns.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS LOOKING FOR WEB EDITORS

Email: editor@dailycollegian.com

Office of National Scholarship Advisement
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Scholarship Information Night
FIND YOUR PATHWAY TO SUCCESS
All UMass Amherst sophomores & juniors are invited.
Tuesday, December 11
5:30 p.m., Memorial Hall
Learn how to apply and receive merit-based scholarships, such as the Rhodes, Leaders in the Making, Fulbright, and Life Member Scholarship for Internships.
There are over $500,000 in scholarships available each year!
The Office of Field Experience will also discuss the many benefits of internships and co-ops.
FREE PIZZA • FREE REFRESHMENTS
Space is limited, to register visit UMassAlumni.com/students
For more information about scholarships, visit UMassAlumni.com/students and www.comcol.umass.edu/academics/onsa

Domino's Pizza
AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am-3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 583-9800
2XTUESDAY — Buy Any Large Pizza at Menu Price & Get a 2nd Pizza of Equal or Lesser Value FREE
THREE BREADSTICKS — Any 3 Bread Side Items $9.99
PIZZA & BREAD — One 1-Topping Pizza & Choice of Breadsticks MEDIUM $10.99 | LARGE $13.99
WHAT A DEAL I — Medium 1-Topping Pizza & Two 20oz. Sodas $9.98
YOUR CHOICE — One Large 1 Topping Brooklyn style Pizza OR A Medium Philly Cheese Steak Pizza $9.99
WHAT A DEAL 2 — 2 Medium 1 Topping Pizzas $13.99
WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

FRUSTRATED? PUZZLED? DO YOU HAVE...
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

DEC 4 2007

Delaware, Richmond move on to semifinals

Spiders, Blue Hens win national quarterfinal games

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

Richmond was picked to finish fourth in the Colonial Athletic Association South Division prior to the season, but the Spiders finished atop the division and are now headed to the semifinals of the Football Championship Subdivision.

CAA Football

The Spiders (11-2, 7-1 CAA) needed two Tim Hightower fourth-quarter touchdown runs to overcome Wofford (9-4, 5-2 Southern Conference), 21-10.

Before the two final scores, Richmond had struggled to convert on opportunities. They had the ball four times in the first half, and two ended in 34 and 39-yard missed field goal attempts. Another drive ended at midfield when running back Josh Vaughn fumbled the ball, which led to a Terrier field goal.

When the Spiders received the ball, down 10-7 with 3:34 left in the third quarter, Eric Ward got into a steady rhythm and completed 5-of-7 passes for 58 yards. Hightower had lost three yards on four carries before rushing for 17 yards to bring Richmond down to the Wofford 1-yard line. He then ran the ball into the end zone to give the Spiders a 14-10 lead.

On Wofford's next drive, it faced a fourth-and-three and was ready to punt the ball to Richmond. The snap went over punter Chris Tommie's head, and Richmond's Jordan Mitchell recovered the ball at the 1-yard line. Hightower reaped the benefits of this costly turnover and found the end zone for the second time to extend the lead to 21-10.

That was the all the scoring Richmond would need. The defense held Wofford to 195 rushing yards, which may sound unimpressive, but the Terriers came into the game second in the nation with 319 rushing yards per game.

Appalachian State up next

If Richmond wants to advance to its first-ever FCS National Championship Game, it's going to have to beat the defending national champions to do so.

The Mountaineers narrowly escaped for the second game in a row, this time beating Eastern Washington, 38-35. Quarterback Armanti Edwards ran for 126 yards and a touchdown and threw for another 241 yards and two scores.

EWU nearly came back late in the game, but its comeback fell short. The Eagles trailed by 17 and appeared to be out of the game but then scored on back-to-back 11 play, 66 yard drives to get within three with 28 seconds remaining. However, Chase Laws recovered the onside kick attempt to preserve an ASU victory.

The rushing game will be an area to watch in the Richmond-ASU matchup. The Mountaineers allowed 183 rush yards against EWU, and their secondary limited the Eagles to 185 yards, many of which came in the game's final five minutes.

Tim Hightower finished seventh in the voting for the Walter Payton Award list but had a subpar performance against Wofford. He rushed for 96 yards on 23 carries, and the Spiders will need a better performance from Hightower if they want to compete with the Mountaineers.

ASU has struggled against the run this season, and the 200.5 rush yards per game it allows lands them at 93rd in FCS.

Richmond is ranked 28th, allowed 130.8 per game but will face a stiff challenge trying to stop the duo of Edwards and Richardson.

Delaware downs UNI

A week after nearly falling to New Hampshire, top-ranked Northern Iowa fell to the Blue Hens, 37-29.

UD (10-3, 5-3 CAA) found themselves down 10-0 after the first quarter but responded with 19 unanswered points in the second quarter before a late Panther field goal cut the lead to 19-13 at halftime.

Along with two Joe Flacco touchdown passes, the Blue Hens also capitalized on Erik Johnson's 55-yard fumble recovery that resulted in their third touchdown of the half.

"I thought there was a point at the beginning of the game that [UNI] might run us out of town," Delaware coach K.C. Keeler said after the game. "But our defense has made big plays in all of our big wins this season and they did it again today."

The Panthers (12-1, 6-0 Gateway Conference) entered the game third in the country in scoring defense at 15 points allowed per game. UD quarterback Joe Flacco threw for 312 yards and two touchdowns without getting intercepted, and Omar Cuff rushed for 102 yards and a touchdown.

UNI's defense also came into the game allowing 296.2 total yards per game and allowed 486 to Delaware.

Kicker John Striefsky had his first two extra points blocked, but he hit key second half field goals from 45 and 47 yards.

Delaware quarterback Joe Flacco threw for 312 yards and two touchdowns in the Blue Hens win over top-seeded Northern Iowa. UD will take on SIU in the national semifinal.

Dave Clawson and Richmond advanced to the national semifinals with a win over Wofford in the national semifinal.

Travel to Carbondale

A week after beating CAA opponent Massachusetts, the Salukis will host UD this Saturday afternoon.

SIU (12-1, 5-1 Gateway) limited UMass to 101 yards rushing, and the Minutemen average 153 rush yards a game. The Blue Hens average 181 rushing yards per game, but if Cuff is unable to carry the load, then Flacco will have to expose a Saluki pass defense that ranks 60th in FCS.

Keeler has the utmost confidence in Flacco and projects him to be a first day pick in the National Football League. Flacco has thrown for 3,686 yards this season and 20 touchdowns, while throwing five interceptions.

Saluki quarterback Nick Hill threw for 216 yards and three touchdowns against the Minutemen and has 28 touchdowns passes and over 3,000 yards on the season.

Delaware has a strong pass defense that allows 183 yards per game, so SIU might run the ball frequently – something it did against UMass effectively. The Salukis amassed 246 yards on the ground, and Delaware ranks in the middle of the pack in FCS rush defense, allowing 163 yards on the ground per game.

This matchup was originally supposed to happen Friday night, but Delaware had a difficult time leaving Cedar Falls, Iowa due to inclement conditions. They will play Saturday afternoon instead. The Richmond-Appalachian State game was moved up to Friday night.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Dacko back in familiar territory

BASKETBALL from page 10

second on the team with 17 assists on the season. In Saturday's game, the freshman registered 13 points. It was her second-straight double-digit game and her fourth of the season.

Wright is just coming back from injury. In just her third game of the year, she tied Lindsay's performances of 13 points. The senior also scored the 1,200th point of her career and moved into the sixth spot on the school's all-time scoring list. She is averaging 6.3 points per game.

Dacko stressed, however, that the Minutewomen need to concentrate on the Red Storm as a whole and not just a bunch of individuals.

"They don't have a lot of size, so they're able to get in the lanes. They're able to score off the dribble. They use a lot of screens and rolls and things like that," Dacko said. "They run a four out, one in [defense]. We've got to be able to defend on the post and we've got to be able to rebound."

She added that she will stick with sophomore Kim Benton at point guard. Though junior Sakera Young started the first handful of games, both players struggled offensively and neither "won [the job] by default." Dacko started Benton Saturday against Hartford just to mix things up. Benton finished the game with eight points, while Young – who subbed in and out for Benton – scored seven.

Tonight will hold some nostalgia for Dacko. She was an assistant coach for St. John's from 1979-84. In the five years she spent there, the Red Storm went 118-43, including a school record 27 wins in 1982-83 and two Big East Championships. It also made four straight trips to the postseason, three of which were to the AIAW or NCAA tournaments.

"I love the people there. I loved my experience there. We had a great team," she said. "Some of the administrators are still in place.

"It will be fun for me to see some of my former players come back with their families."

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Junior Pam Rosario scored 22 points in the Minutewomen's 72-60 win over Hartford on Saturday. Rosario went 8-for-12 from field goal range in the game.

Rebounding woes for UMass

MINUTEWOMEN from page 10

in the frontcourt and combined to average over 11 rebounds per game. The Minutewomen limited the duo seven in the matchup.

"[Hartford] was big, so we definitely needed to get on the boards," said Mills. "I think they average about 40 rebounds a game, and we held them to about 30. So, that was huge for us."

Mills had a career-high 14 rebounds, and Dacko wants her star player to be putting in efforts like these. The power forward won't get 14 rebounds every night, but her coach would like her to average seven or eight. With her recent rebounding efforts, Mills has elevated her average to 6.7 rebounds per game.

Since Gerardot replaced McDonald in the starting lineup, the Minutewomen didn't have as much size as they normally do but received enough contributions from others defensively and on the boards.

One area the Minutewomen must improve in is offensive rebounding. Despite their impressive rebounding margin against Hartford, they still allowed the Hawks 16 offensive rebounds to their 11.

Second-chance points were virtually even (10 for Hartford and 11 for UMass), but if teams capitalize at a higher rate in the future, offensive rebounding will become even more important.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

OPEN HOUSE
THURSDAY, DEC. 6, 4–7 p.m.

Graduate Programs in:

- Occupational Therapy Professional and Post-professional
- Physician Assistant
- Physical Therapy
- Rehabilitation Counseling & Services

(Entry at graduate level or through undergraduate programs)

Allied Health Sciences Center
Call: 413-748-3225

SPRINGFIELD COLLEGE
SCHOOL OF HEALTH SCIENCES & REHABILITATION STUDIES
www.springfieldcollege.edu/hsrs

MOVE AHEAD TO YOUR HEALTH-CARE CAREER

The Daily Collegian
WANTS YOU

WE JUST LAUNCHED A NEW CLASSIFIED WEB SITE (UMASSLIST.COM) AND WE ARE LOOKING FOR ONE SUTDENT TO SERVE AS THE SALES/MARKETING DIRECTOR TO DRIVE REVENUE AND TRAFFIC TO THE WEB SITE.

WHO ARE WE LOOKING FOR?
YOU. THE COLLEGE STUDENT LOOKING FOR THE BEST SALES AND MARKETING EXPERIENCE AROUND.

WHAT'S IT IN FOR ME?
FOR EVERY PAID LISTING THAT IS PLACED YOU WILL EARN A COMMISSION FROM THE WEB SITE DEVELOPMENT COMPANY, CAMPUS AVE. THE COMPANY WILL PAY YOU 20 PERCENT OF THE COMMISSION YOU EARN FROM THE DAILY COLLEGIAN ON EACH PAID LISTING.

DURATION.
INITIALLY FOR 2 MONTHS AND THEN THE DAILY COLLEGIAN AND CAMPUS AVE WILL DETERMINE IF THEY WOULD LIKE TO EXTEND THE CONTRACT.

PLEASE CONTACT GREG EDSON AT greg@campusave.com INCLUDE NAME, TELEPHONE, MAJOR AND YEAR AND A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF YOUR QUALIFICATIONS.

comics@dailycollegian.com

plain and simple.

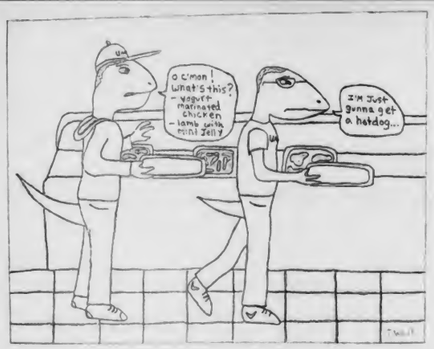
Proof that your class is boring.

8			7
3			6		5
	9			4
	5	8		9		2	3
	2	3				8	6
	6	1		3		9	5
				5			1
			2		1			6
					4			9

Quote of the Day

"Rhythm is something you either have or don't have, but when you have it, you have it all over."

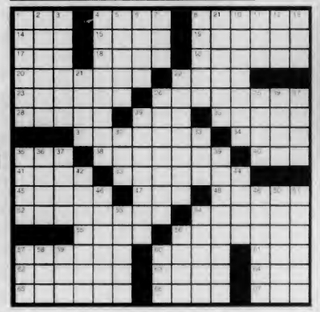
-Elvis Presley



Paul By Billy O'Keefe

Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

Zoomassic Park By Jake Whitt



ACROSS
1 Part of rpm
4 Actor Danny
8 Widely scattered
14 Pub preference
15 Terrible Hair?
16 More cautious
17 ___ Cruces, NM
18 Folk wisdom
19 Speak mechanically
20 Take a rest in bed
22 Engendered
23 Relatives by marriage
24 Organizational newsletter
28 Letter before epsilon
29 ___ Soffel
30 Teatime treat
31 God denier
34 Feedbag feed
35 Current unit briefly
38 Kitchen device
40 WWW follower
41 Bread unit
43 Latvia's neighbor
45 Napoleon Solo's org.
47 Cut off
48 Taboos
52 Military supplies
54 Deranged
55 Singer Tori
56 Insect's feeler
57 Potter's Peter
60 Explorer
61 Distant
62 Tropical lizard
63 Luna location
64 Had dinner
65 Evades
66 Fill past full
67 Well-arms of the Red Sox

DOWN
1 Wain
2 Actress/director May
3 Gear in used goods
4 Unit of electrical power
5 Declares openly
6 Campfire whopper
7 Opposite of WSW
8 Ice-cream flavor word
9 Juries
10 Fashionable style of the 30s
11 ___ de Janeiro
12 D.C. bigwig
13 Afore
21 Information
22 Marilyn Monroe movie
24 English port
25 Wary amphibian
26 Division word
27 Cozy retreat
29 Rube's
32 Sol lumen
33 X
35 Grad
36 Pole Vault Duo?
37 Agreement
39 Sound plausible
42 Cheap, run-
43 Down hose
44 First-rate
46 Weasel with a black-tipped tail
49 Mix choice
50 Flowery
51 Burned a bit
53 Tiny quantities
54 Motionless
56 Cruising
57 Make free (of)
58 In the past
59 Flower-to-be
60 Boom times

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Never take presents or candy from a strange bear.

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You need friends to watch your back because unlike an owl, you cannot rotate your head 360 degrees.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Exercise caution when forcing farts out of your body as sharting may occur.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Drop out of college and invest all your money in magnetic pants flies that never fall down.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You are homier than ovis canadensis and equally as apt to possess a creamy-white rump patch around your small brown tail.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
It is more than acceptable to wear highly inappropriate clothing if you are in a highly inappropriate situation.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Make it your goal in life to find Whoopi Goldberg's missing eyebrows.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
The Internet is a big place, but not nearly big enough to contain your ego.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Check all the snowflakes on campus for a pair of identical twins. It's not like you have anything better to do.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You are as delicate as the pedals of a bike.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Break out the boots and bust out the mittens, it's colder 'round here than a freezer full of kittens.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
As delicious as Bubblicious is, you must simply chew it and resist the undeniable urge to swallow.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Today is the most important day of your week. If you play it smooth like Usher, you'll be dancing your way to the weekend.

THIS IS THE LANGUAGE OF THE COMICS PAGE...YA DIG?

comics@dailycollegian.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Activities

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price. Best Hotels. 781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net

Apt. 4 rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

Apt. for rent

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Employment

50 Booksellers needed during winter break at the Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square! Stop by our Job Fair Tue. Dec 4 on the Umass Campus Center concourse or email bnhr@bu.edu.

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab. phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

Information

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza. Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

Services

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Services

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St. Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

Travel

#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Red Storm chasers

UMass takes on Saint John's in N.Y.

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

After snapping a three-game losing streak with a 72-60 win over Hartford on Saturday, the Massachusetts women's basketball team looks to keep it going against St. John's in Queens, N.Y., at 7 p.m. today.

The Red Storm (5-1) hosts the Minutewomen (3-4) after coming off a 76-69 victory over Boston University Saturday. The win was its third straight and kept the team undefeated at home.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko was thrilled with her team's performance over the weekend. After a back-and-forth first half, the Minutewomen got it together after halftime, suffocating the Hawks' offense and outplaying them on the boards. UMass out-rebounded Hartford, a team that was averaging 39.5 boards a game, 44-30.

Dacko hopes her players can bring to New York City the same agility that catapulted them over the Hawks.

"We've got to get a run game going. We've got to be able to defend and rebound. It's not so much about St. John's as it is about UMass," Dacko said.

The Minutewomen are 0-4 on the road. Dacko accredits the dismal figure to a lack of intensity and focus when in an opponent's arena.

After two straight wins, the Maroon and White lost to Northeastern, Jacksonville, East Carolina and Boston University consecutively. It will take the same drive UMass exhibits at home to beat the Red Storm, especially at Carnesecca Arena.

Yesterday at practice, Dacko drilled into her squad the importance of coming out aggressively against St. John's, one of the top teams in the Big East.

Three St. John's guards – Monique McLean, Sky Lindsay and Kia Wright – scored in double digits in Saturday's win.

McLean scored 21 points against the Terriers on a 7-of-15 performance. Averaging 15.7 points per game, the junior is the Red Storm's leading scorer this season.

Lindsay is second on the team's scoring list with an average of 10.3 points a game. She is also

See BASKETBALL on page 8

Junior guard Stephanie Gerardot and the Minutewomen travel to Queens, N.Y., tonight for a matchup with Saint John's. UMass snapped a four-game losing streak in its last game.

Gerardot, Benton thrive for Minutewomen in new roles

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

When basketball teams are struggling, they often alter the starting lineup to see if better results will follow. The Massachusetts women's basketball team had dropped four games in a row, and UMass coach Marnie Dacko thought changes were necessary.

UMass Basketball

Kim Benton started in place of Sakera Young at point guard, and Stephanie Gerardot got her first start of 2007-08 with Whitney McDonald coming off the bench.

"We got more ball movement and more of an outside presence, and leaving Kate [Mills] around to move helped," Dacko said.

It still remains to be seen what the starting lineup will look like against St. John's today, but the changes worked out well against Hartford. Gerardot scored 11 points, while Benton added eight and four assists.

Having a spark plug off the bench is also important, and Young filled that need. She pulled down four offensive rebounds and also scored seven points, including a 3-pointer in the second half with the shot clock expiring. Young is mostly a slasher who can play good defense, so any offensive contributions from her are a bonus.

"[Young] has a tendency to be just a little lethargic, but she's got a ton of energy," Dacko said. "She was happy with her role, and I was happy with what she gave to UMass."

McDonald played three minutes in the game and didn't record any numbers in the stat sheet for the Minutewomen (3-4).

FACIAL INJURIES MOUNTING

Pam Rosanio was the first member of the Minutewomen to be fitted for a mask when she was struck by an East Carolina player on Nov. 24 – now it's Teya Wright who dons one.

Wright was struck in the face by one of the men's practice players before Saturday's game and wasn't given much time to adjust to wearing a mask. After being hit in the face during the second half, she came out of the game and didn't return.

"What do you do for a broken nose? Just keep playing," Dacko said. "As long as she can breathe, she can play."

Though still raw on the offensive side, the freshman is averaging 5.4 rebounds per game, which is good for second on the team behind Mills. Dacko has stressed rebounding as one of the focus areas for her team, and losing Wright's rebounding ability would be a monumental loss for the Minutewomen.

In addition to having to adjust to the face mask, Rosanio has also been nursing a nagging Achilles tendon. She has been getting treatment for it about twice a day. Neither the face mask nor the Achilles injury seemed to bother her against Hartford, as she scored a game-high 22 points, including 16 in the second half.

REBOUNDING IMPROVING

Against a Hartford team that was out-rebounding opponents by four rebounds a game, UMass controlled the glass and out-rebounded the Hawks 44-30.

The Hawks' two best players, Danielle Hood and Diana Delva, play

See MINUTEWOMEN on page 8

Tough ending for Listorti

Tight end catches TD pass in lone action of senior season

By Jeremy Rice and Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

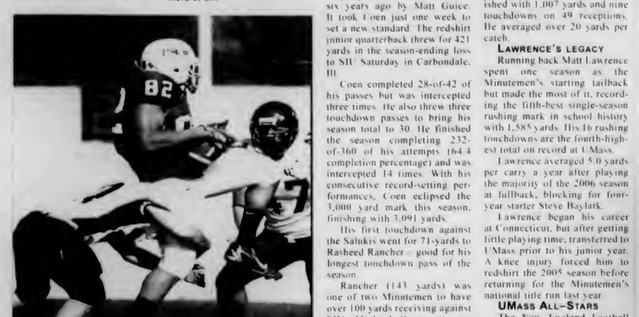
Massachusetts tight end Brad Listorti has caught a touchdown pass in each of the last two games in which he's played. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, both of those games were season-ending losses in the playoffs.

In last year's NCAA Division I Championship game against Appalachian State, Listorti scored the last touchdown of the game for his team – a game-tying score in the third quarter, though UMass went on to lose, 28-17.

UMass Football

In Saturday's matchup with Southern Illinois, Listorti also scored the final points for UMass, a 4-yard reception to bring the Minutemen within a touchdown of the Salukis. Once again, UMass fell, 34-27.

In between those games, Listorti almost missed the entire 2007 season with a lower back injury that kept him out of pads most of the year.



A senior, Listorti made the most of his final chance to see the collegiate field, adding one final touchdown to his career statistics.

Listorti finished his career with 39 receptions for 608 yards and four touchdowns.

He entered the season touted as possibly the Minutemen's most talented offensive player with a legitimate shot of reaching the National Football League when the season was over.

But after playing just a few snaps in the final game of the Minutemen's bid to return to the national title game, it is unclear how far Listorti can make it now.

Regardless, his celebration with teammates after the touchdown against SIU indicated how happy he was to be back on the field at all.

Redshirt senior wide receiver Rasheed Rancher's career ended Saturday when the Minutemen lost to Southern Illinois.

RECORD REDUX

With 419 passing yards against Fordham on Nov. 24, Liam Coen broke the UMass single-game passing record set six years ago by Matt Guice. It took Coen just one week to set a new standard. The redshirt junior quarterback threw for 421 yards in the season-ending loss to SIU Saturday in Carbondale, Ill.

Coen completed 28-of-42 of his passes but was intercepted three times. He also threw three touchdown passes to bring his season total to 30. He finished the season completing 232-of-360 of his attempts (64.4 completion percentage) and was intercepted 14 times. With his consecutive record-setting performances, Coen eclipsed the 3,000 yard mark this season, finishing with 3,091 yards.

His first touchdown against the Salukis went for 71-yards to Rasheed Rancher – good for his longest touchdown pass of the season.

Rancher (143 yards) was one of two Minutemen to have over 100 yards receiving against SIU. Michael Omar set new career-highs in both yards (114) and catches (10). J.J. Moore had seven receptions but finished six yards short of being the third UMass receiver with over 100.

Rancher caught 13 passes for 341 yards and three touchdowns in his final two games. Those two performances propelled him to join Moore (80 catches, 1,100 yards and five touchdowns) with over 1,000 yards receiving this season. Rancher finished with 1,007 yards and nine touchdowns on 49 receptions. He averaged over 20 yards per catch.

LAWRENCE'S LEGACY

Running back Matt Lawrence spent one season as the Minutemen's starting tailback but made the most of it, recording the fifth-best single-season rushing mark in school history with 1,585 yards. His 16 rushing touchdowns are the fourth-highest total on record at UMass.

Lawrence averaged 5.0 yards per carry a year after playing the majority of the 2006 season at fullback, blocking for four-year starter Steve Baylark.

Lawrence began his career at Connecticut, but after getting little playing time, transferred to UMass prior to his junior year. A knee injury forced him to redshirt the 2005 season before returning for the Minutemen's national title run last year.

UMASS ALL-STARS

The New England Football Writers Association named six Minutemen to its 2007 All-Star Team on Monday. Four defensive players, one offensive player and one special teams player were selected for their perfor-

See FOOTBALL on page 7

Tight end Brad Listorti caught a touchdown pass from Liam Coen in Saturday's loss to SIU. The senior missed every other game this season.

Change helps Mass Attack

Cahoon stresses shooting, Minutemen tie another one

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon prides himself on putting a good defense on the ice.

During his first few seasons in Amherst he brought in small, shifty players to fit his neutral-zone trap which became the hallmark of the Minutemen. But now, as UMass (6-3-5, 3-2-4 Hockey East) brings in more skilled players, Cahoon expects greater offensive production from his team.

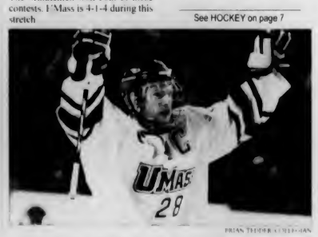
UMass Hockey

Following a 3-1 loss to Providence on Oct. 26, during which the Minutemen recorded a season-low 21 shots, he demanded his team shoot more. He didn't want them to force shots for the sake of shooting, but he understood that for his young team get in rhythm, it needed to create some offense.

In seven of their last nine games, the No. 11 Minutemen have taken at least 30 shots on goal. In two those games, a 5-2 win over Union and a scoreless tie against Cornell, the Minutemen took more than 40. The two times they didn't break 30 were against Boston University and at Boston College. However, those games weren't exactly poor offensive outings. Against the Terriers, UMass took 28 shots, and it tested BC goaltender John Muse 29 times. The Minutemen won both of those contests. UMass is 4-1-4 during this stretch.

The defensemen are among the most responsible for UMass's increased shot totals. Senior captain Mike Kostka played the first month of the season with a broken finger on his right hand, which severely hindered his ability to shoot. Since, he has scored two goals and assisted on five others. The seven points puts him fourth on the team, tied with Will Ortiz and Cory Quirk.

The Minutemen took their new-found offensive system into Ithaca, N.Y., on Friday for a matchup with Cornell but ran into goaltender Ben Scrivens who made 45 saves for the Big Red in the tie.



TYING ANOTHER ONE ON

The tie at Cornell continued another trend for the Minutemen. Although they have lost three of their first 14 games, five of those matchups ended in ties.

Four of the draws came in Hockey East play, which took crucial points away from the Minutemen. On Oct. 27 against Providence, the Minutemen lost a 3-2 lead with six seconds left on the clock. Similarly, against UMass Lowell in the 2007-08 season-opener, the Minutemen let a two-goal lead fall out of their grasp.

UMass is currently tied for fourth place in Hockey East with Providence and UMass Lowell. The Friars and River Hawks don't figure

See HOCKEY on page 7

Senior captain Mike Kostka has seven points this season on two goals and five assists for the Minutemen.

OHILL SERVES UP SWEETS | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY

MOSTLY CLOUDY : HI: 33 LO: 17 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2007

Town debates spring 'Extravaganja'

Nick Ortolani (Left) and Dan Melick stand outside of the Cannabis Reform Coalition office in the Student Union. Members of the group spoke in defense of the Extravaganja festival at Monday's town meeting.

New fee policy puts dampers on festival

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Select Board debated Monday night whether a permit would be given to the Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) to reserve the town commons for next year's annual "Extravaganja" festival.

The festival, organized by the University of Massachusetts CRC, found itself in a state of uncertainty after the town of Amherst contacted the coalition last month to alert it to a new policy, which requires a fee to use the space.

The fee, which is applied to those reserving the commons, helps pay for the police presence.

"It is our new policy to charge for event permits on the town common," Amherst Town Manager Laurence R. Shaffer said at the meeting. "Since the town has long since reached the point where we are in need of funds, we have decided that we can't pay for police details, and are going to have to charge a $500 to $1000 fee to the people who reserve it."

According to Shaffer, the town wanted to move "toward a gentle waiver process the first year, so the fee can be waived this year."

Some members of the Town Board noted that creative solutions to the problem were available, including getting help from UMass Police for security at events like the Extravaganja festival.

"I have nothing against the event," Shaffer said. "I attended it last year and thought it was great. It was a fun atmosphere. I didn't inhale, however."

CRC representatives at the meeting spoke out against the waiver and were opposed to the idea that the town could assess the fee.

"We do not think a police detail is necessary in the first place," said CRC representative Jerry Franklin. "But more importantly, there are very extensive legal

See CRC on page 3

This year Amherst is asking the CRC to pay a fee to hold the annual festival on the town common.

UM hosts healthcare hearing

State committee discusses shortage of rural professionals

By Andy Smith
Collegian Staff

Challenges recruiting and retaining health care professionals in rural Massachusetts was the focus of an informal state legislature hearing held on Nov. 27 at the University of Massachusetts.

"Rural areas of our state are facing increasing difficulties attracting and keeping physicians and other health-care professionals," said state representative Stephen Kulik of Worthington, vice chairman of the Committee on Health Care Finance. "What was once a challenge is becoming a crisis."

According to a 2007 report from the New England Rural Health Roundtable, rural areas have not only fewer health care providers per capita, but a greater percentage of practitioners over age 50.

"With the 'graying' of the provider population, ensuring access to quality health care will become an increasing challenge," said state representative Peter Kocot of Northampton.

The Massachusetts Medical Society released a study in July that said, "Massachusetts continues to experience physician shortages in primary care, psychiatry, and six other specialties that are adversely affecting patient access to care."

The study also found that recruitment has become more difficult for 68 percent of teaching hospitals, 83 percent of community hospitals and 70 percent of practicing physicians in the state. After sorting the numbers by region, the study determined that in the Pittsfield region, 87 percent of physicians reported that the pool of applicants is inadequate to fill vacancies, making it difficult to find quality health care professionals.

One problem of retaining health care workers is that an increasing number of pre-med students are going into other college majors. The cost of graduate and master's medical degree programs often leaves students with loans well after they are done their education.

Kulik and state representative Chris Donelan of Orange have been crafting legislation that would focus on loan forgiveness as a possible strategy for attracting primary care physicians and other health care professionals to rural areas.

"We understand the growing need to bring not only doctors but nurses, dentists, mental health workers and other professionals to rural areas," said Donelan. "We are aggressively pursuing legislative remedies and see forgiving education loans as a possible incentive for practicing in the state's underserved rural areas."

See HEARING on page 3

State Rep. Stephen Kulik chaired an informal hearing by the Legislature's Committee on Healthcare Finance at UMass last week.

Amherst approves downtown growth

Lord Jeffrey Inn rezoned to allow for future expansion

By Ashley Cotsomb
Collegian Staff

The town of Amherst approved the rezoning of land downtown to pave the way for the expansion of the Lord Jeffrey Inn during a recent town meeting.

The Inn, owned by Amherst College, is on one of seven parcels of land that was rezoned from general residence to general business during the town meeting to open the way for development.

It took more than an hour to arrive at the decision. Some members proposed rezoning only some of the seven parcels of land. Other members at the meeting maintained that all parts needed to be rezoned in order to prevent weakening the plan for the Lord Jeffrey Inn, according to an article in the Springfield Republican last week.

One disputed parcel contains an eight-unit apartment complex, which compelled some members to reject the rezoning on the grounds of keeping Amherst town leasing more housing.

Member Vincent L. O'Connor asked that the plan be referred to the Select Board, Planning Board, and town manager to be looked at in the future after voting rezoned the parcel.

O'Connor is requesting that town officials address issues like financial aid for free services with local colleges, according to the Republican.

The University of Massachusetts recently signed a five-year agreement with Amherst for town-provided fire services. The University will now pay, this year, the actual cost for using the town fire department, as well as for other arrangements regarding public utilities and services.

Most officials felt the rezoning and resulting improvements to the Inn would help the town of Amherst overall.

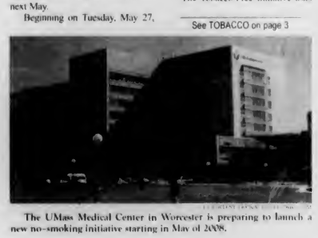
"The downtown is essential to our town," Select Board chairman Gerald N. Weiss told the Republican.

Weiss was in favor of the rezoning increase.

"This is a small change and will help increase the downtown a full block," he said.

Ashley Cotsomb can be reached at acotsomb@umass.edu.

UMass Med School to go tobacco-free



By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

The campuses of the University of Massachusetts Medical School (UMMS) and UMass Memorial Medical Center will be tobacco-free next May.

Beginning on Tuesday, May 27, the institutions will launch a six-month education and health effort that aims to eliminate the use of all tobacco products on school and medical center property, even including parking facilities.

The Tobacco-Free Initiative asks

See TOBACCO on page 3

The UMass Medical Center in Worcester is preparing to launch a new no-smoking initiative starting in May of 2008.

Web site rates military charity groups

By Katrina Cessna
Collegian Correspondent

With the official start of the holiday season – and with thousands of U.S. servicemen and women stationed abroad – Americans are trying to support military charities without giving into a "shad."

According to Jon Zagami, president and co-founder of the Veterans and Service Members Association (VASMA), a little but of extra help work goes a long way.

Having served in Iraq and Kuwait from April of 2003 to April of 2004, Zagami is more aware than most that there's been plenty of organizations that operated under the guise of "We're here to support the troops," and then two cents gets to the troops.

A good place to start research with charities is going to a Web site that rank organizations according to their efficiency and capacity. Important organizations exceed industry standards and outperform most charities, while "grossly" organizations perform far less industry standards.

Examples of national level organizations found lacking include the Disabled Veterans Associations which puts over 70 percent of its budget toward fund-raising expenses, and the Leather Military POW Foundation which devotes 81 percent of its budget to funds more and administrative expenses.

The Web site also exposes third organizations operating at the local level such as the New England Shelter for Homeless Veterans. Earning only one star, the organization spends more than 46 percent of its budget on administrative and fund-raising expenses.

A more transparent charitable

See CHARITIES on page 3

Offshore freshwater brightens future of coastal communities

By Kristen Healy
Collegian Correspondent

Mark Person of Indiana University spoke on undersea sources of freshwater yesterday as part of The Environmental Institute's (EI) Lecture series.

Person, soon to be a professor of hydrology at the New Mexico Institute of Mining and Technology, focused mainly on how abundant offshore freshwater sources could potentially be a large water resource for the growing populations of coastal cities.

According to Person, in recent years there has been an influx of people moving to coastal cities such as New York. With this comes a growing demand for freshwater in coastal regions. The question of where freshwater will come from if the trend continues has arisen among scientists studying water resources.

One potential solution, according to Person, is to tap into this unused source of freshwater under the sea.

He also discussed hypotheses on how freshwater came to be in saltwater regions and solicited evidence means for the future of coastal populations.

One hypothesis on how this offshore freshwater came to be undersea involves Pleistocene epoch glaciations, because the climate conditions of these glaciers have changed rapidly over the years.

"For the last two million years the Earth has been in an 'ice house' condition, but in recent years the warmer climates have caused ice sheets to retreat and this has had a profound effect on sea level," Person said.

See LECTURE on page 3

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 63

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Blonder
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING, EDITOR Tim McCall
COPYEDITOR Adam Yeagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marsea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenswaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Now Hiring
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN DISTRIBUTED SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Katie Huston

COPY EDITOR
Domenic Poli

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

Across the Nation Around the World
News Wire

Teacher accused of having sex with student violates parole

BY MITCH STACY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

A former middle school teacher under house arrest for having sex with a 14-year-old student was arrested Tuesday for violating her probation, state records showed.

According to a Department of Corrections report, Debra Lafave discussed her personal life and other subjects with a teenage waitress at a restaurant where they both worked. One of the terms of her probation had been that she was not allowed to have unsupervised contact with any minors without permission.

Lafave could technically be sentenced to prison for up to 15 years for a probation violation, but people close to the case say it's unlikely she'll serve any time behind bars for such a minor offense.

Her attorney, John Fitzgibbons, said he was disappointed that her probation officer ordered her arrest for what he called an "insignificant" violation. He characterized the conversation between Lafave and the 17-year-old girl as "typical workplace conversation that women have with their women colleagues."

"It was a workplace friendship — no more, no less," he said.

Lafave, 26, is serving three years house arrest and seven years probation after pleading guilty to having sex with a 14-year-old boy in a classroom and her home in June 2004.

She was arrested Tuesday morning and released from jail later on her promise to appear in court for a hearing later.

State attorney's office spokeswoman Pam Bondi said prosecutors will not comment on Lafave's arrest until the court hearing.

Probation records show Lafave worked at a Tampa-area restaurant called Donny Boy's until last month when she started working as a receptionist at her mother's barbershop.

Debra Lafave pleaded guilty to having sex with a 14-year-old boy.

While working at the restaurant, the report said, she and a fellow waitress discussed "non-work related issues such as family problems, friends, high school, personal life, boyfriend issues and sexual issues."

Online harrasment case spurs creation of Missouri task force

BY BETSY TAYLOR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

A woman linked to an online hoax played on a 13-year-old girl who committed suicide had no idea MySpace messages to the girl had turned cruel and did not write any of them herself, the woman's lawyer said Tuesday.

Attorney Jim Briscoe appeared on NBC's "Today" show, as did the parents of Megan Meier. Megan, a 13-year-old girl from the St. Louis suburb of Dardenne Prairie, hanged herself last year minutes after receiving mean messages on MySpace.

Briscoe said his client, Lori Drew, "absolutely, 100 percent" had nothing to do with negative, nasty comments posted online about Megan Meier, and wasn't home when they were sent.

"She didn't find out about it until after Megan had taken her own life," he said.

Megan, who took medication for depression and attention deficit disorder, thought she had been communicating with a good-looking 16-year-old boy online. It turned out he was fictitious, and the profile was created to find out what Megan was saying online about Drew's daughter, according to a report from St. Charles County Prosecutor Jack Banas.

Banas concluded Monday, as federal officials did weeks earlier, that there was no crime to charge anyone with in the case.

Changes to state law also have been proposed, and on Tuesday, Gov. Matt Blunt announced the creation of an Internet harassment task force that he wants to make recommendations within 30 days.

"Megan Meier's senseless death is a tragic lesson that social networking sites and technology have opened a new door for criminals and bullies to prey on their victims," Blunt said in a statement. "As families and friends continue to remember Megan and celebrate her life, we must ensure that our laws have the protections and penalties needed to safeguard Missourians from Internet harassment."

It is unclear who created the fictitious account, but a police report said that Drew and her then-18-year-old employee fabricated the profile. Banas said there are different accounts between Drew and the employee about the creation of the profile.

Institute takes aim at graphic games

BY ANDREW MIGA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Graphic scenes of gunshot victims spurting blood and a man urinating into a prisoner's cell are included among the 10 video games that a media watchdog group warns should be avoided by kids and teens under 17.

With the holiday shopping season in full swing, the National Institute on Media and the Family presented its 12th annual video game report card Tuesday to help parents decide what games are appropriate for their children.

"There's an endless stream of new games that will never be suitable for children," said Rep. Betty McCollum, D-Minn., who joined institute officials and other lawmakers at a news conference.

Efforts to protect children from the dangers posed by excessively violent video games have not kept pace with growth of the video game industry, the institute said.

Institute officials cited "growing complacency" among game retailers, parents and the gaming industry on video game ratings.

"Unfortunately, we're seeing some steps backwards," said institute president David Walsh.

Walsh said fewer retailers, for example, are participating in efforts to educate their customers and employers about the video game ratings.

The institute, a media watchdog group, cited figures showing that nearly half of kids between 8 and 12 have played M-rated games intended for those 17 and over.

Bus-sized 'monster' may be new species

Remains of a bus-sized prehistoric "monster" reptile found on a remote Arctic island may be a new species never before recorded by science, researchers said Tuesday.

Initial excavation of a site on the Svalbard islands in August yielded the remains, teeth, skull fragments and vertebrae of a reptile estimated to measure nearly 40 feet long, said Joern Harald Hurum of the University of Oslo.

"It seems the monster is a new species," he told The Associated Press.

The reptile appears be the same species as another sea predator whose remains were found nearby on Svalbard last year. His team described those 150-million-year-old remains as belonging to a short-necked plesiosaur measuring more than 30 feet — "as long as a bus ... with teeth larger than cucumbers."

The short-necked plesiosaur was a voracious reptile often compared to the Tyrannosaurus rex of the oceans.

Mark Evans, a plesiosaur expert at the Leicester City Museums in Britain, said he did not know enough about the Norwegian find to comment on it specifically. But he said new types of the sea reptiles are being found regularly.

"We are regularly seeing new species of plesiosaurs popping up in a way because, in the past 10 or 15 years, there has been what we call a renaissance in plesiosaur research," Evans said by telephone.

Hurum said the team had only managed to excavate a 3-meter (yard) area of the find. The Norwegian-led team plans to present more detailed findings early next year, and return to Svalbard, 300 miles north of Norway's mainland, to excavate further next year.

—Associated Press

Airfare vouchers and scholarships for participants

SIMMONS IN MADRID PROGRAM

TEACH ENGLISH ~ TRAVEL ABROAD ~ EARN A MASTER'S DEGREE

The Simmons in Madrid program is a unique opportunity to experience the educational system and culture of Spain. Graduate courses in Boston, a 10-month experience teaching English in a Madrid Charter school, together with opportunities for travel make an exceptional learning experience. You will grow personally and professionally, enrich the lives of your students, and earn a graduate degree in education.

Program Information Sessions
Starting at 7 pm in Room W303, Main College Building:
Tuesday, December 11 • Tuesday, December 18 •
Saturday, January 5 at 10am

For more information and program application, visit www.simmons.edu/gradstudies/education/madrid

Simmons College • 300 The Fenway • Boston, MA 02115

SIMMONS
Learning with Purpose.

Mass. hospitals make big gains in 2006

State Rep. Chris Donelan (right) of Orange discussed rural health-care issues during last week's committee meeting at the University.

HEARING from page 1

The problem of retaining health care professionals is not influenced by the hourly pay, which averages $37.75 in Massachusetts. The figure is second nationally to California.

However, according to a survey by the Massachusetts Hospital Association, Massachusetts hospitals made big gains in nurse recruitment last year. According to the survey, hiring climbed almost six percent during 2006, the biggest single-year growth in more than 10 years. The rate of hiring actually outpaced growth in patient volumes, the survey said.

"Massachusetts may be leading the nation in health care reform but we're falling behind in a critical aspect of patient care, and that's the supply of physicians," said R Dale Magee, M.D., president of the Massachusetts Medical Society.

"With an aging population, health care reform, and soaring rates of obesity and chronic diseases such as diabetes, hypertension, and arthritis, real questions are surfacing about whether enough physicians will be available in Massachusetts to handle the increased demand for health care services," he said. "Adequate physician supply is essential to the success of health care reform, and our latest analysis raises a host of concerns."

Aitch Smith can be reached at ajsmith@student.umass.edu

Offshore freshwater paradox discussed

LECTURE from page 1

With this sudden drop of sea level, precipitation has gathered on the exposed land after the ocean retreats and caused freshwater to gather on the continental shelf. In addition, studies have found that large ice sheets over Canada as thick as four kilometers have begun to melt over the past five to 10 years and the melted water has gathered in water basins in the northern United States.

In 1991, Person and a team of scientists began doing hydrology research on Nantucket and found that the major water company on the island, Sole Source Aquifer, continued to pump water at higher rates each year to keep up with the growing population of the island.

Person worried that if water continued to be pumped from these wells at an increased rate, the water level would eventually go below sea level and they would potentially pull up seawater.

His team concluded that there would be salt water intrusion on Nantucket by 2010 and since the water company was concerned, the Nantucket Land Council decided to fund the drilling of three new wells to try to locate the seawater.

Person and his team expected to find seawater underneath the freshwater, but found that the island contained only freshwater.

"The paradox of our discovery was that anomalous pressure in Cretaceous aquifers suggests a low permeability environment, yet flushing of seawater suggest high permeability," said Person.

The major question Person then had to ask himself was "How did all this freshwater come to be there?"

Two mechanisms were proposed to explain this placement of offshore freshwater, particularly in New England. One involved direct infiltration of water during sea-level low stands, and the other suggested thick ice sheets recharge in regions where the Laurentide ice sheet extends out on the shelf.

A cross-sectional analysis was done to test the two mechanisms, and Person concluded that a significant amount of freshwater was found in New Jersey, but ice-sheet forcing enables more water to gather below sea-level in New England, creating a significant water resource.

This is good news for large cities on the seashore such as New York and Sydney, Australia.

He also found that the pressure caused from the shifts in large glaciers could contribute to geological formations such as canyons.

Future work is focused on drilling on the Atlantic shelf in order to take advantage of these freshwater supplies," Person said. "There is also the possibility that ice sheets hydrology can contribute to modern sub-water discharge, so this is what we are looking towards in the future."

The lecture titled "Offshore Freshwater: A Potential Resource for Coastal Areas" is the last of four lectures, all of which focus in water sustainability, in the Environmental Lecture Series this semester.

Legal council to look into fee precedents that say that no fees can be assessed by government for political rallies. We will not apply for a waiver, because this fee will still be [unconstitutional] next year."

CRC from page 1

CRC members pointed to a 1992 U.S. Supreme Court decision regarding political rallies, which said only "nominal" fees could be assessed. They also noted that they were only a small group and paying for police on that one day in April would eat up half their yearly budget.

"I'm glad the commons is reserved in our name while we fight this," said CRC President Jon Werner when he took the microphone. "Extravaganja is by its nature a political event, and it cannot survive if we have to pay this fee. if we have to pay for all the police. I hope to see everyone here now at the Festival."

Mr. Shaffer and the remainder of the Board agreed to have the town legal council look into the fee, and agreed to schedule further debate of the topic at the next meeting. In the meantime, the fate of Extravaganja "its hangs is up in the air.

"Extravaganja has been going on for 17 years and it's going to keep on so long as the [CRC] is around," Werner said after the meeting. "The town of Amherst is poor, which I appreciate; practically every town in the state is facing deficits. But that doesn't change the fact that Extravaganja is a political rally, and it is illegal to charge for police protection at such an event."

According to Werner, the "War on Drugs" has been more harmful to the United States than marijuana use.

"Extravaganja brings this out to the open. It tells everyone that 'Hey, look here, we're loud and adamant, this isn't some stoner fantasy, this is a political movement,'" he said.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu

Low-cost treatment services offered to campus smokers

TOBACCO from page 1

for the institutions to provide a range of resources to encourage and support smokers in their attempts to end the habit.

UMass Medical School and UMass Memorial now find themselves as part of the growing number of health care institutions that are proactively engaging in the reduction of tobacco use. Officials from both institutions note the well-documented health risks associated with smoking and second-hand smoke. The initiative aims to support quitters with counseling and low-cost treatment services, including nicotine replacement therapy.

These options will be available to all employees, students, patients and visitors.

For the past year, UMMS and UMass Memorial have had a team of physicians and employees meeting to put together a viable tobacco-free policy, which culminated with the recent announcement of the new initiative.

"This is a milestone in the history of these two institutions and in the history of public health in Central Massachusetts," said Dr. Terence R. Flotte, Dean of the School of Medicine and Executive Deputy Chancellor at UMMS. "We have a responsibility to create a healthy environment for our patients, employees, students and visitors, and we're committed to doing just that."

The announcement came on the 40th anniversary of the American Cancer Society's annual Great American Smokeout. Critical to the success of the plan is the commitment of UMMS and UMass Memorial to have the resources necessary to make the new policy work.

"This is something other hospitals have done successfully," said the director of the Tobacco-Free Initiative, Gregory Seward, in the announcement of the new program.

The unveiling of the tobacco-free program comes on the same week as the UMMS's announcement marking the launch of their new Bioinformatics and Integrative Biology program at the Worcester campus. Professor of biochemistry and molecular pharmacology Zhiping Weng, formerly of Boston University, is joining the faculty to head the program.

UMass Medical won $3,000,000 in grants for further diabetes research in mid-November, and has seen significant increases in funding since the work of UMMS researcher Craig Mello was awarded the 2006 Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine last year.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu

Local groups lend a hand to soldiers alternative is to volunteer with or financially support one of the many local organizations dedicated to helping the troops.

CHARITIES from page 1

One local project, Cell Phones for Soldiers, is a "home front" charity based out of Norwell, Massachusetts that ships pre-paid phone cards to soldiers in the war zone and has recently been featured in USA Today and "The View."

According to USA Today, project founders and teenage siblings Robbie and Brittany Bergquist were inspired by news they'd heard that an army reservist making calls home from Iraq had racked up a $7,000 phone bill.

The Bergquists raise money for the phone cards through donations of old cell phones, which are then sold to a recycler. The revenue from the recycled cell phones has bought 24 million minutes since 2004, when the charity was founded.

Those looking to contribute to a source even closer to home need look no further than campus, says Zagami. VASMA has been active in the community since it earned Registered Student Organization (RSO) status two years ago, with members lending support through volunteering at the VA in Northampton and the Soldier's Home in Holyoke.

VASMA members are currently collecting money and gift donations to benefit Toys for Tots.

Zagami encourages students interested in donating to do so Dec. 10 in the Student Union Ballroom, where they can also attend a VASMA-sponsored panel discussion during which "Mass students, staff and faculty who have served in Iraq will talk about their experiences."

Zagami's deployment overseas was during the invasion, so "there really wasn't anything set up" in terms of aid for soldiers, he said.

When he returned home from Iraq, Zagami was lucky enough to have two sisters attending UMass to help him, but realized that not everyone was so lucky. "When other soldiers were coming back that we didn't have that support network to return to school," he said.

VASMA was founded with the goal of facilitating this transition from military life to academia as a key component of its mission.

Having obtained RSO status only two years ago, VASMA is "still kind of fighting for the University's support," according to Zagami. Without an operating budget, he says, funding for activities done by the group "basically comes out of my pocket, which is tough."

For those looking to give money to a national organization, Zagami recommends the Red Cross and the USO, which earned four- and three-star ratings from charitynavigator.org, respectively. During his time overseas, Zagami says, "The American Red Cross was huge and instrumental in keeping morale up."

The USO earned equal praise for "rolling out a stage" in "the far reaches of the battlefield." While serving abroad, Zagami, for example, caught Robin Williams' performance "from a guard tower because I was on duty that night."

Zagami cautioned potential donors to "do your research." By giving to an organization based solely on its name, he said, "You might feel better, and think that you are supporting the troops, but if all of that money ends up going to office supplies, then you really haven't done anything."

Want to see your name in the paper next semester outside of the police log?

Write for News

e-mail us at news@dailycollegian.com

The Daily Collegian WANTS YOU

WE JUST LAUNCHED A NEW CLASSIFIED WEBSITE (UMASSLINT.COM) AND WE ARE LOOKING FOR ONE STUDENT TO SERVE AS THE SALES/MARKETING DIRECTOR TO DRIVE REVENUE AND TRAFFIC TO THE WEBSITE.

WHO ARE WE LOOKING FOR?
YOU. THE COLLEGE STUDENT LOOKING FOR THE BEST SALES AND MARKETING EXPERIENCE AROUND.

WHAT'S IT IN FOR ME?
FOR EVERY PAID LISTING THAT IS PLACED YOU WILL EARN A COMMISSION. FROM THE WEBSITE DEVELOPMENT COMPANY, CAMPUSAVE, THE COMPANY WILL PAY YOU 20 PERCENT OF THE COMMISSION YOU EARN FROM THE DAILY COLLEGIAN ON EACH PAID LISTING.

DURATION.
INITIALLY FOR 2 MONTHS AND THEN THE DAILY COLLEGIAN AND CAMPUSAVE WILL DETERMINE IF THEY WOULD LIKE TO EXTEND THE CONTRACT.

PLEASE CONTACT GREG EDSON AT
greg@campusave.com
INCLUDE NAME, TELEPHONE, MAJOR AND YEAR AND A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF YOUR QUALIFICATIONS.

DEC 5 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
-Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Succumbing to the courts

Ben Duffy

MassEquality — a pro-same-sex marriage organization — launched a massive media campaign on May 17, 2007 entitled "It's wrong to vote on rights." MassEquality got its wish; barely a month later, the legislature officially denied the people of Massachusetts the opportunity to pursue a constitutional amendment to define marriage exactly the way it was defined before a bunch of anti-democratic authoritarians in black robes decided to make up their own definition.

For all practical purposes, the traditional-marriage movement in this state is dead. That doesn't mean that what happened was fair, democratic, or legitimate. It was a shameful act of elitism in which an oligarchy on Beacon Hill legitimatized the poor judicial reasoning of an even smaller oligarchy on the Supreme Judicial Court. Despite all of the talk about "civil rights" issues, Massachusetts lost sight of the most fundamental civil right — voting.

Same-sex marriage is frequently compared to interracial marriage and Loving v. Virginia, the 1967 Supreme Court case that overturned all racial requirements for marriage. The case involved a white man, Richard Loving, and a black woman, Mildred Jeter, who were married in Washington, D.C., because their native Virginia would not recognize their marriage. They later returned to Virginia. When authorities discovered that they were living together as husband and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Loving were charged with violating Virginia's 1924 Racial Integrity Act. The Lovings brought their case all the way to the Supreme Court and won. Since then, no state has been allowed to impose racial requirements on a marriage.

The Freedom to Marry Coalition, another advocate of same-sex marriage, even celebrated the 40th anniversary of Loving v. Virginia on its Web site. Is it right to draw a comparison between that case and Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, the Massachusetts case that imposed same-sex marriage on our state? Certainly not. The first and foremost reason is that race is irrelevant to marriage, but gender is not.

The same-sex marriage movement concludes that the court knows best, and if the people disagree, they shouldn't be allowed to vote.

The second reason is that there are better analogies. Rather than comparing gay marriage in Massachusetts to interracial marriage in Virginia, let's compare gay marriage laws in Massachusetts and Hawaii. In 1996, Hawaii's Supreme Court ruled in Baehr v. Miike that two men or two women could constitute a married couple. Hawaiians responded by amending their constitution to void the bogus decision of their court. The people of Hawaii were allowed to vote, and fascism has yet to fall upon the Aloha State.

Loving v. Virginia is a hot potato because of its racial overtones. If you suggest that the people — not the Supreme Court — should have the last say on the issue, you must be racist.

Let me start by saying that I agree with the result of Loving v. Virginia. Race should not be a factor in marriage. In fact, my sweetheart and I are not of the same race. Consulting my Liberal-to-English dictionary, I can see that the term I'm supposed to use this week is "woman of color." So I don't think that race-mixing is unnatural or wrong.

How about the court's legal reasoning in Loving v. Virginia? The Supreme Court determined that Virginia's marriage laws violated the equal protection and due process clauses of the 14th Amendment. Although those clauses are extremely vague, I can see how a reasonable argument could be made to that effect.

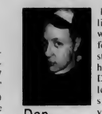
What flies me is the conclusion that gay advocates draw from their comparison of the two cases. In Loving v. Virginia, the court handed down its ruling, and no attempt was made to amend the Constitution. The same-sex marriage movement concludes that the court knows best, and if the people disagree, they shouldn't be allowed to vote.

This is a dangerous precedent. Our courts are quite capable of handing down horrendous decisions: Plessy v. Ferguson, Roe v. Wade, Kelo v. New London, and Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, to name a few. If a court hands down a ruling that is based on specious legal reasoning, then the people have one recourse — they can amend the Constitution. If the court rules that two plus two equals five, then the people can amend the Constitution, and set the court straight.

Am I saying that the people should have been allowed to vote on an amendment specifically designed to negate the effects of Loving v. Virginia? Yes, that's exactly what I'm saying. I certainly would have been opposed to such an amendment, but that doesn't mean that the process should not have been allowed to go forward. The two sides could have squared off and fought it out over the amendment. I know which side I would have been on.

The situation we have now in Massachusetts is conducive to tyranny. First, the court overruled the legislature (and common sense) in Goodridge v. Department of Public Health. Then the people attempted to overrule the court, and the legislature prevented it. Even people who approve of gay marriage have to admit that this is a perilous situation. The people should reign supreme over their government, not vice versa.

I was ashamed of my state when our Supreme Judicial Court redefined marriage. I was even more ashamed when my legislature refused to allow us to vote on it.



Ben Duffy writes on Wednesdays. He can be reached at bduffy@student.umass.edu.

CORRECTION:

On Dec. 3, 2007, The Daily Collegian ran an opinion column by Bruce Lerner entitled 'All in all, it's another wall.'

The column neglected to mention that Israel's security wall comprises only three percent of the structure; the rest is a security fence.

The all-day, all-night candid camera world

Dan Nicastro

Have you ever felt like you're being watched? Do you feel the gaze of strangers burning a hole in your neck? Do you sometimes look over your shoulder, convinced that there's someone keeping tabs on you? Do you constantly tell your 'friends' to trust no one because 'the man' is out to get you? Don't worry if any of these describe you, because your paranoia may not be as misguided as friends and family keep suggesting. Americans are, on average, caught on film about 200 times a day.

Think about that for a minute. Most of us are caught on tape 200 times in a 24 hour period. That means we get caught on camera roughly 73,000 times a year.

A new documentary called "Look" examines this degradation of privacy. Terrifyingly enough, the film is able to tell the stories of several different people even though it is shot by using only the point of view of security cameras. If you think just the concept of being filmed 200 times a day is scary, just think about where those recordings are going. As the film's producer, Barry Schuler, warned, the recordings used are being "digitized and archived forever, with highly advanced face-recognition technology," so forget about hiding from detection.

Don't give up hope, though. Before you lock yourself in your room and start telling friends that it's not safe to walk outside, try to think positively about this loss of privacy. You may even be able to use your public image to your advantage. TV executives could obviously foresee the forced transition from private to public, something which can be evidenced by the advent of "reality" television.

In fact, based on television trends of the last 15 years, we should have seen this comprehensive loss of privacy coming. Reality television, however, has grown stale. The market is oversaturated and concepts are continually rehashed on different networks.

Therefore, create a more personal, more localized reality show where you are the star. At the same time every week (or every day if you're really ambitious), grab a group of friends and strike up personal conversations about who's going out with whom or which "friend" everyone hates.

Try and craft your show to please security officers, FBI agents and NSA wiretappers who are forced by their superiors to watch hours and hours of painfully boring film. Think of how much better their jobs will be if you are there to entertain them. Throw in some buzzwords to keep them interested. Words like "terrorist," "Iraq," "liberal," "Clinton" and "civil liberties" will ensure that your ratings go through the roof. The first person to get a visit from the NSA/CIA/FBI wins and is entitled to an all-expense-paid trip to Cuba (note: "waterboarding" is not as much fun as it sounds").

Before you lock yourself in your room and start telling friends that it's not safe to walk outside, try to think positively about this loss of privacy.

If reality television isn't for you, turn to the coping mechanism used by most people: alcohol. Carry around a flask and every time you realize you're being videotaped, take a drink. This, however, could prove dangerous, as it may violate open container laws (and remember: the violation has been documented forever) and you may die of alcohol poisoning. Details can always be worked out later.

If you're trying to deal with this utter loss of privacy and reality television and drinking games are beneath your elitist sensibilities, look no further than Google's mail client, Gmail. Gmail, like any other corporate owned Web site, lists advertisements in the margins of its pages, hoping you will click and spend money. Unlike regular ads, however, Gmail ads are a bit more personal. Gmail scans the mail messages you send and receive and provides ads which correspond to key words within your message.

For example, when I send a message that includes something to the effect of "I just made dinner and it was delicious," I get ads which inform me of fast and easy dinner recipes, coupons for groceries, and guaranteed weight loss programs. This means that not only is Gmail calling me fat, it's actually reading my e-mail and crafting advertisements which reflect the contents of the message. While most people are shocked and appalled by this extreme invasion of privacy, you can use this to your advantage.

With Christmas fast approaching, it may be hard to find presents for all your family and friends, so let Gmail help you. Send yourself messages which list the likes of loved ones and when Gmail reads your e-mail, it will provide several suggestions of what to buy. Better yet, why not cut out the middleman and ask Gmail directly? Send yourself a message, asking "Dear Gmail, what should I get for ..." This is an added bonus if the person you're looking to buy presents for also has a Gmail account, since the server has probably read their mail and can therefore give you a better, more personal answer.

So remember to try and make the most of your complete lack of privacy. Be creative, be clever and most of all, have fun. But when you run out of ideas and the crushing reality of the situation sets in, remember: you're on candid camera.

Dan Nicastro is a low-level threat. Readers with proper clearance can reach him at dnicastr@student.umass.edu.

No ignoring race, gender

Michael Shulman

The 2008 presidential election is shaping up to be a historic contest that could lead our country down a path of minority leadership for years to come. We are ushering in an era of change and it is looking as though the two front-runners to become the 44th President of the United States of America are a woman and an African-American. This is monumental for a country that has had white, male leadership for over 200 years.

The uncertainty of how one of these minority candidates would handle the pressures of the presidency is cause for concern and I, for one, am of the opinion that this is not a positive change for the country and a candidate's race and gender are important issues. Clearly, when electing someone to the highest office in the country as well as one of the most important global leadership positions, all aspects of that candidate must be considered. Leadership skills, charisma and ideas for the country are important; race and gender are as well.

On the surface, the frenzy surrounding the campaigns of Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama this early in the election season is an issue of race and gender and the rise of minority candidates in mainstream politics. In reality, however, the presidential race is a question of how ready this country is to begin to act on its rhetoric of equality and open-mindedness. Despite all the programs and advances, and all the talk of a free and just society here in America, our government does not mirror these ideals and principles.

The tradition of having old, white men running the country one day will end.

Our free and equal society is filled with minority repression. For example, women only were granted suffrage in 1920; some African-Americans could not vote until 1964. The lack of participation from these two groups is a clear example of the majority opinion of the country — no matter how racist and sexist, we do not trust minorities to be incorporated in the government. With this mindset, it is no wonder why many Americans when surveyed relate similar opinions to this day.

With regards to Hillary Clinton, danger can lurk with a woman president, especially in matters of foreign affairs and the military. Many nations we deal with on a daily basis are very backward and have even less respect for women than the United States. These nations, including much of the Arab world, could get offended if they are forced to deal with a women president. This could hurt many relationships with several dangerous countries, particularly ones in the Middle East.

Domestically, a woman may not command the same respect from our generals and other armed forces personnel as a man would. Clinton has never served one day in the U.S. military and that is an issue for many voters and soldiers who look to an experienced commander-in-chief. Both of these scenarios are dangers if a woman president is elected.

On the other side, Barack Obama is a relative political unknown, who came onto the scene only several years ago. Obama not only has to answer to his inexperience but also to how being black will impact his presidency.

Much of the motivation surrounding the controversy of having an African-American president is purely racist. However, in a country where race relations remain a struggle and gang violence and racially-motivated crime are still a problem, a black man in the White House could enrage many people and add fuel to the fire. Also, a minority president could change many laws and attempt to create political equality for his fellow minorities, and disrupt the order of things in this country.

As a whole, the United States does not have a representative government in terms of the population distribution. Representation of women and African-Americans in Washington is disproportionately low compared to the American population. On a global scale, we are 68th in female representation in the federal government, behind Iraq and Afghanistan, and we are only one of a few industrialized nations that have not had a female as head of the government. These are issues that must be fixed, but gender and race are important factors that much be analyzed just as any other characteristic.

Ultimately, many factors impact a presidential election. In 2008, the close race between the two strongest candidates brings up the debate of how important race and gender are when electing a president. The reason these issues are so important is that a person's race or gender is part of their identity and from these traits comes the way a person thinks, acts and is developed. Therefore, if a person develops with these characteristics having played a role, than they should continue to play a role when they run for our nation's highest office.

The tradition of having old, white men running the country one day will end and people of all walks of life will be able to be in positions of power without judgment. However, let us not elect someone for their minority status just to shake things up and not truly think they can perform at the highest level.

Michael Shulman is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mshulman@student.umass.edu.

The election of Mr. Chavez

Evan Powers

On Sunday, Venezuelan citizens turned out to vote on whether or not to approve multiple changes to the country's constitution which, if passed, would give President Hugo Chavez a significant increase in power. The measures would abolish term limits to presidency, grant Hugo control over all of the major political institutions and allow him to move one step closer to turning Venezuela into a socialist state.

For a man who's long been criticized for heading a country where corruption and crime are rampant, the public feels that Chavez has failed at establishing infrastructure and health care, and is looking to acquire dictatorial power. It would be wise for the Venezuelan population to vote against this referendum.

Chavez has gained power and enormous popularity throughout his eight years in his presidency. He's done so through oil money, which has allowed him to essentially buy the support and votes of the poor population. He has likened his ideas of a socialist-run country to that of Cuba and Fidel Castro. Chavez has also gained power by convincing the public that the economic and labor problems within the country are the fault of others, such as the United States, the number one buyer of Venezuelan oil.

Supporters say that Chavez has done more for the country as far as spreading oil wealth to the poor. His calls to shorten work days, give pension to street workers, and reduce the minimum voting age could likely swing more votes in his favor. Opponents feel that he is slowly working on a plan to develop a full-fledged dictatorship in the country, doing away with basic human rights and free speech.

Opponents feel that [Chavez] is slowly working on a plan to develop a full-fledged dictatorship in the country.

Criticism has trigged a backlash over the last few weeks. Several former supporters have turned against him, including the former minister of defense and even Chavez's own ex-wife. Leading up to and through this past weekend, large demonstrations erupted in Caracas against the referendum.

Its opposers, and the poor population of Venezuela, are fully aware of the danger Chavez can pose if he's given unlimited power. Many of his programs for labor and land reform have either not lived up to the people's expectations or have failed completely. He has even threatened to cut off trade of oil with the United States should the Bush administration criticize the results — this coming after he already likened George Bush to "the devil."

Venezuelan citizens do have some power still left in their hands. They are the ones who can still cling to democracy in their country by voting against the referendum, and can send the message to Chavez that the voice of the people can trump the desires of one man to achieve total power. The people must vote against this referendum on Sunday night.

Chavez's history of failing to fulfill promises for better wealth distribution, land and labor rights, and a crack-down on crime are proof that he is simply looking for more power, rather than a way to improve his country. It's also proof that power can cause corruption. But for Venezuela, the future is in their hands to decide whether they want a few empty promises to keep a power-hungry man in charge for a long period of time, or if they want to keep Chavez in check.

For the sake of democracy, let's hope they say no to Hugo.

Evan Powers is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at epowers@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

No boss, just Sweets N' More

Quesadillas, milkshakes served at unique OHill eatery

BY JESSICA SACCO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

From plain view the Field Dormitory looks like nothing more than one of the many buildings scattered across campus. However, by taking the time to venture inside, one will be pleasantly surprised to find a small snack shop by the name of Sweets N' More.

This business has been around since about 1975 and was originally run by an outside vendor not a part of the University. However, he then decided to give it up to the students, and with the help of the Center for Student Business (CSB) and money provided by UMass, Sweets N' More has been run by students ever since.

There are currently 12 employees who run the shop, one consultant and a bookkeeper. Everything is overseen by Rosemary Schmidt, the director of CSB. Unlike many other campus businesses, Sweets N' More has no hierarchy. Everyone works at the same level, essentially co-managing the place together.

"[Co-management is] great for respect. It's the best condition to work in. You're more apt to share your ideas," said employee Kristin Filippelli, a senior.

Sweets N' More's employers do not like to follow the standard application when looking for new employees. In the personal interview, candidates are asked a series of serious and fun questions, so interviewers can really get to know who the applicant is. The more individual and unique the person appears, the better.

Once the current employees have decided who they will hire, they do what is called a "take-out" interview. This is done by making their future employees participate in a ridiculous task, such as creating an advertisement for the shop only using forks and paper. They are then told that the best idea wins the open position. In reality, all members taking part in the activity already have the job — it's just a way for employers to break the ice.

Filippelli says the best part about working in a place like Sweets N' More is the real world experience.

"It gives you a sense of how a real business works," she said.

The shop is open Sunday through Thursday from 7:30 p.m. to midnight. The menu consists of items ranging from the typical ice creams and cookies to the newly introduced chicken quesadillas, which have quickly become one of the most popular items.

Sweets N' More is now looking to expand into more than a simple snack shop. The goal is to make the shop into more of a late night dinner place by next semester. This will be done by bringing in more food like chicken fingers and french fries. Employers are also trying to bring in more people from all around campus. As of right now it is primarily students from the Field dorm and Orchard Hill Residential Area.

"We're very open to people outside [the dorm], and the food is good, so it's worth it," said Filippelli.

Jessica Sacco can be reached at jsacco@student.umass.edu.

Sometimes second is the best

Idol contestant's new CD offers tracks from Doug Fresh

BY JOE STAHL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Season six "American Idol" runner-up Blake Lewis is making his attempt to get back in the game by releasing a solo debut Dec. 4, "Audio Day Dream." If it is a matter of competition, Lewis has some fighting to do to reach the level of success of Idol champ Jordin Sparks.

Sparks is doing quite well for herself with a new album out. Not only is her self-titled debut album succeeding in sales, reaching Number 22 on the "Billboard Top 200"; ruthless critics are also enjoying Ms. Sparks. Rolling Stone made Sparks' album the feature review, giving it three stars. Entertainment Weekly gave the album a gracious B+ rating, even without the help of legendary Clive Davis, who has been involved in shaping Idol contestants' careers in the past.

After the hype of season six and the money-making "American Idol Tour," Lewis signed with 19 Recordings/ARISTA Records to finally continue the solo career the show laid out for him. The finale song for Sparks and Lewis was a typical Clive Davis ballad, clearly written for a big voice, much like Sparks'. After the two performed, it was obvious to predict the outcome of an already predictable show.

"This Is My Now' is definitely not my style. It's a song I would never sing if I didn't have to," said Lewis.

Despite the biased show, Lewis' fans are taking him back, making Lewis the most popular artist on "AOL Music" this week. These fans don't have to anxiously wait any longer since his album hit the shelves.

From the reactions of his first single, 'Break Anotha,' it sounds like Lewis is on the right track to mainstream success, emulating a sound heard on Justin Timberlake's album "FutureSex/LoveSounds."

"American Idol" Blake Lewis (left) and Jordan Sparks (right) posing for a picture inside the green room during last season.

Last years "American Idol" runner-up Blake Lewis' debut album is similar to Justin Timberlake's latest album.

Of course, Lewis does not forget his signature talent for beatboxing made famous on "Idol." In fact, he introduces 'Break Anotha' with the notorious skill. Surprisingly, he doesn't collaborate with the high-profile sensation Timbaland, but teams up with other notable producers like Doug E. Fresh, Gnarls Barkley, Darkchild (Jennifer Lopez, Destiny's Child) and a friend from "Idol" — Chris Richardson, the boyishly good-looking Virginian contestant who made the ladies swoon with his wry falsetto.

With the help of the many collaborators and Lewis' inspirations from bands and artists across the spectrum, ranging from Maroon 5 to Jamiroquai, "Audio Day Dream" is a gumbo album laden with electro-funk beats and atmospheric ballads. With a sound not at all subjective, it's a sure-fire bet to please the ears of an array of music fans.

From the expectations Lewis set for himself when he was a free-spirited artist living in Seattle and as an "American Idol" contestant, Lewis' expectations as an underground and eclectic music maker is as promising as his record company is allowing. Belonging to a record company that has worked with the majority of "Idol" successors can hinder his divergent and risky expectations.

Typically, 19 Recordings/ARISTA Records artists have had a squeaky clean image

See IDOL on page 6

Creatine can boost workout benefits

Justin Sorbo

The holidays are here again, bringing good food and festivities for all. The amount of food and drink we consume during these few months can bring some not-so-merry fat gain. For many of us, it's time to hit the gym and burn off those calories we've been storing in our bellies.

The workout regimen of the average college gym-goer often includes supplements. First used by athletes performing during the Olympic games of 1992, creatine, most popularly sold in the form of the brand name Xtra, has been on the rise in the fitness world.

With the growing popularity of creatine-containing supplements like BSN's N-O Xplode, many of us gym-goers need to be informed on what we are putting into our bodies. What is creatine and where does it come from? Will it give me... Should I be worried if my boyfriend or girlfriend is taking the supplement? How does creatine work? These are some of the questions that arise when one hears about or takes creatine.

Creatine is synthesized (created) by our bodies on a daily basis using three building blocks of protein called amino acids. Its purpose is to supply energy to muscle and nerve cells, with 95 percent of it stored in our skeletal muscle. Creatine is not a steroid — steroids are hormones with a different chemical makeup and has no meaningful effect on testosterone or growth hormone. Therefore, we can leave the "creatine rage" and talk of "roiding" in the high school locker room.

Basically, creatine gives the user energy by replenishing otherwise low stores of creatine dur-

See CREATINE on page 6

Creatine was first introduced in the 1992 Olympic games. It has since become popular with athletes of all ages.

Supplements not an excuse for poor diet

CRATINE from page 5

ing exercise. Creatine monohydrate is the most well-researched variety of creatine. Supplement companies attach other molecules to creatine in order to increase absorption rates, but there is very little research in this area. It's best to stick to the most researched form.

According to Dr. Barry Braun, a UMass professor specializing in energy metabolism, creatine has been shown to benefit short term performance by replenishing creatine stores between repetitions. Creatine works better in untrained people than those who have been training consistently for a while.

Of much interest to the gym junkie, creatine increases lean body mass gain when compared to one who is not supplementing. Creatine can cause water retention, but research shows a substantial amount of lean body mass gain is not water. The lean mass gain may be attributed to the ability to train harder while using creatine.

More muscle means a higher metabolism and less body fat. Most studies on creatine show only these kinds of benefits for fast-twitch exercise, or near max-effort physical exertion between six and 10 seconds. The vast majority of these effects have been shown in studies involving weightlifting and high-intensity cycling.

So what does all this really mean? Creatine works for most people. If one consistently trains and supplements with an adequate amount of creatine, he or she will most likely see benefits. A daily dose of 5g will get you where you want to be – your body will reach its peak within just under a month of use. Creatine is relatively free of side effects when used properly, which means drinking more than the daily recommendation of water when using any sort of creatine product, as the supplement pulls more water into the muscle cells than normal. With more creatine in the body, there will inevitably be more waste products excreted in the urine.

A gallon of water daily should be adequate for most people to flush the body of waste and provide sufficient water for the muscles to store. Anecdotal reports of muscle cramping are most likely due to inadequate water intake; studies do not support these claims. Furthermore, supplements like NO-Xplode do not contain an adequate amount of creatine and rely on stimulants to achieve the "energy" effect.

If one wants to see the full benefits, take pure creatine as well. As far as safety, creatine has a great track record over its relatively short period of supplemental use (20 years or so), but long-term safety has yet to be addressed. There has been little research on the effects of creatine supplementation on adolescents, and only healthy adults should take creatine.

The large amount of research regarding creatine shows that it safely works as it's supposed to, but the context of supplementation will ultimately determine how much benefit will be obtained. Besides caffeine, creatine is the most well-researched supplement, but it's no miracle drug. If you're eating a diet of dining commons french fries and ice cream or drinking heavily, you might as well not bother. Diet alone is far more important than any sort of supplement when trying to obtain a fit body. So if you're trying to get in shape and willing to dedicate yourself, creatine might be a good call for you.

Justin Sorbo is a Collegian Columnist. He can be reached at jsorbo@student.umass.edu.

Creatine has no serious side effects when used correctly, unlike illegal drugs such as steroids and animal hormones.

NCAA COLLEGE BASKETBALL
TWO GREAT TEAMS
ONE GREAT TICKET
UMASS MINUTEMEN
VS.
MARIST
Saturday, December 8th
Tickets on sale now
Mohegan Sun Arena
ticketmaster 860.888.0070 (CT) 212.307.7171 (NY) 413.733.2500 (MA)
TICKETMASTER.COM/MOHEGANSUN.COM

Blake releases debut album

Blake Lewis and a fellow "Idol" contestant sing a duet during the last season of "American Idol." Lewis is not the only "Idol" alumni to make its previous successful contestants include Kelly Clarkson, Clay Aiken and Carrie Underwood.

IDOL from page 5

it's a wonder how much leverage this traditionally prudent record label will give the wild tangent running Blake Lewis.

Recently, 19 Recordings has had to manage the feisty and erratic Amy Winehouse, who has risen to be an international star despite her atypical style and attitude from the other signed artists on 19 Recordings. With an artist like Winehouse, it makes it much more plausible to see an artist like Lewis on 19 Recordings. Lewis said in a press release by the record company that he is satisfied with what was done with "Audio Day Dreams." "This album is exactly how I wanted it to come out," he said.

Looking back in "Idol" history, there have been only three Idol artists that hit it big with album sales. With six seasons, Kelly Clarkson, Clay Aiken and Carrie Underwood have proven most successful by selling millions of records. Lewis has the talent to sell a lot of records. He somehow stays true to a current mainstream sound while sustaining his musical style.

It was a risk to closely release the album to competitor Jordin Sparks' newest album. This move could possibly inhibit people from buying his album because of costly CDs. Hopefully Lewis' current popularity will reflect his album sales. If not, then he will be just another "Idol" contestant that falls through the cracks of trying to make it on his own.

Joe Stahl can be reached at jstahl@student.umass.edu.

Classic shows get color redux

BY DIANE WERTS
NEWSDAY

Colorization got a bad name in the 1980s, when Ted Turner was slapping a pastel palette on every old black-and-white movie he could get his mitts on. Directors launched protests against meddling with their carefully crafted work, and film buffs like me recoiled at all the beige-and-blue mush defacing their monochrome favorites.

But colorization has since improved, they say today, thanks to advanced digital technology and enhanced appreciation for the aesthetic integrity of the process.

To which I say: Show me.

And wow. Did they ever. In the new "I Love Lucy: The Complete Series" DVD set is a bonus disc whose bounty includes a freshly colorized version of the 1956 fantasy-sequence musical episode "Lucy Goes to Scotland."

This one is so well done, it actually looks as if it were originally filmed in color. Bright (but not too bright) red and yellow tartans. Lucy's flame red (orange) hair. Textured green dragon costumes. Believable flesh tones. The whole thing comes alive, and feels livelier, in a way I wouldn't have imagined.

Which gets me imagining something else. Could this technology be used to revive interest in the early years of TV, from the late '40s to the mid-'60s, whose black-and-white shows we seldom see anymore? Let's go right to the source, as they sing in that monochrome marvel "Mister Ed," and look for an answer that we'll endorse.

We're on a steady course, says Barry Sandrew, whose Legend Films company did the colorization on both that "Lucy" episode and the newly released "It's a Wonderful Life: 2-Disc Collectors Set," which pairs the 1946 black-and-white original with the tastefully colorized version on a second DVD.

Sandrew was responsible for much of that '80s wave of colorization, and he admits now, "it was really, really bad. There were halos around people's faces and color didn't really stick to things, and it just looked unnatural." That's because "the computer horsepower wasn't there," he says. And now it is.

His colorized "Lucy" episode is wowing even the skeptics. DVD producer and persnickety purist Paul Brownstein, whose acclaimed vintage releases include "Get Smart," "The Dick Van Dyke Show" and "Sgt. Bilko," says, "I'm a guy who doesn't allow 5.1 remixes of mono, and I was totally blown away by 'Lucy.'" Imagine how many new viewers his "Van Dyke" and "Bilko" shows might lure if they could be realistically colorized.

"This is not 20 years ago," says colorizer Sandrew, referring to both advances in technology and preferences of the audience. Where boomer kids grew up largely before color TV was widespread, younger viewers are so accustomed to it that to them black-and-white can feel alien and inadequate. Sandrew says, "You have whole new generations of people looking at this black-and-white material that, with the colorization technology of today, can be a brand new product."

"Lucy" is one obvious candidate. So is the Don Knotts era of "The Andy Griffith Show," which switched to color filming after he left. "The Dick Van Dyke Show" has a modern sensibility. "Leave It to Beaver" is timeless. How about such color-begging productions as "Mister Ed," "The Munsters" and "Hawaiian Eye"? And then there are the orphan first seasons of such late color adopters as "The Man from U.N.C.L.E." and "Lost in Space."

"The nice thing about television," Sandrew notes, "is that the biggest cost is design. Yeah, one episode is expensive. But the design is essentially over after that. If the sets are the same, and the people are the same, it gets very reasonable (in price) at that point, and you can do it very fast, and the quality is maintained."

That's what Gregg Oppenheimer is hoping. The son of "I Love Lucy" producer Jess Oppenheimer produced the series' DVD sets and commissioned the "Scotland" colorization trial. That episode was easy, he says, since the crew had considered shooting it in color to compete with the splashy musical "Peter Pan" on a rival network. The production team created multihued designs for the studio audience if no one else at the time.

"We knew what the colors were because we had publicity stills and home movies on the set," Oppenheimer says. "A big part of colorization is you don't just need good technicians at putting the colors in. You have to be an artist."

AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am -3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 593-9500
MY WINGS OR CHICKEN KICKERS!
10 Buffalo Wings
Plus Cheesy Bread
$9.99
THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items
$9.99
PIZZA & CHICKEN
MEDIUM $12.99 | LARGE $15.99
888/777 DEAL
Three 1-Topping Pizzas
MEDIUM $5.55 | LARGE $7.77
SALAD & BREAD
Any Large Salad, Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water
$7.99
FAMILY MEAL DEAL
1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Bread & an Order of Buffalo Wings
$18.99
WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Forward Alisha Tatham was just 3-for-10 from the field, scoring six points and grabbing five rebounds in the loss to St. John's. The Minutewomen gave up a 10-point lead early in the first half, losing 84-68.

UM now 0-5 in road games

W HOOPS from page 10

Neither team shot nearly as well in the second half – UMass shot 29.7 percent and the Red Storm connected at 40.7 percent.

Dacko changed the lineup for the team's most recent game against Hartford, and continued to use this lineup tonight. Kate Mills and Pam Rosanio were joined by Alisha Tatham, Kim Benton, and Stephanie Gerardot.

UMass point guard Sakera Young appears to getting into an offensive rhythm. She scored seven points against Hartford on Saturday, and was 4-of-7 with nine points against St. Johns. If the junior can continue to give these kinds of effort on offense, she will help alleviate some of the scoring pressure of Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills.

"We want her to get more in the lane to set up our shooters," Dacko said, "but if she's open within around seven feet, she's very good."

Mills, coming off a 22-point, 14-rebound performance, was limited to eight points on 4-of-11 shooting and six rebounds.

One concern for UMass was the assist-to-turnover ratio. They came into the game ranked 45th in the NCAA in that category, but were careless with the ball and committed 18 turnovers, with 10 assists. They also ranked 32nd in Division 1 with 16.7 assists per game.

Rosanio led the Minutewomen with 14 points on 6-of-12 from the floor but also led the team with five turnovers.

"They have to step up and we feed off of that," Dacko said of senior leaders Mills, Tatham, and Rosanio. "When they're not emotionally vested in doing their job, so goes the team I guess."

With all of the turnovers and the poor defense, UMass had a chance to get back into the game by hitting their 3-point shots, but the Minutewomen struggled from beyond the arc. Stephanie Gerardot was 2-of-6 from deep, and the rest of the team combined to go 1-of-12.

There were few positives to take out of the game, but Dacko was pleased that Jene'e Jemison, Cerie Musgrove, and Stephanie Lawrence received playing time.

Neither team hit a 3-pointer in the second half. UMass was 0-for-8, and St. John's was 1-for-3. ... Cerie Musgrove hit all four of the free throws, while the Minutewomen went 15-for-22 (68.2 percent) for the game. ... Jemison has seen limited action this year, and saw 4 minutes tonight, missing her only shot, but recording a block and a steal. ... After starting the first four games of the season, Whitney McDonald saw three minutes for the second consecutive game. ... Tiina Sten finished third on St. John's with 11 points, and also led the team with 6 rebounds. ... Both teams finished the game with 38 rebounds, including 17 offensive boards for UMass.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Colonials fall from AP Top 25, Temple has tough going

BY COLEY MICHALIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

George Washington was sitting atop of the A-10 and in the midst of climbing the Top-25, sitting at No. 14 on Nov. 30. The Colonials (6-3) were stunned Friday by UNLV, 62-61, after leading 40-16 at halftime. The loss caused the Colonials to drop out of the Associated Press Top 25 for the first time all season and slip to No. 21 in the ESPN/USA Today Poll.

Sequoia Holmes had 22 of her 25 points in the second half for the Lady Rebels. Two of her 25 points came with 51 seconds left to give UNLV the lead for good. Her 22 points outscored the entire George Washington squad in the second half.

George Washington got 22 points from Sarah-Jo Lawrence, with Jazmine Adair contributing 17 points. The Colonials took a 48-28 lead with 14:55 left in the game before the Lady Rebels went on a 19-4 run for the next six minutes. The defense was to credit for this scoring drought as UNLV held the Colonials to 27 percent shooting in the second half. The Lady Rebels shot 60 percent from the field in the second half.

UNLV was out-rebounded 41-29, including 19 offensive boards by the Colonials. However, George Washington could grab only one more bucket in the last six minutes of the game. During two different six-minute stretches in the second half, George Washington was nearly shut out, scoring just six points total in those 12 minutes, while the Lady Rebels exploded for 46 second-half points.

GW's Kimberly Beck scored 21 points, while Jessica Adair chipped in 19 points and eight boards in their bounce-back win over Samford ending their two-game losing streak. The team struggled from the floor, shooting just 36 percent from the field, but had 10 more team rebounds than Samford – all offensive pushing the Colonials to a 64-57 win.

After senior guard Beck scored her 1,000th point on the opening night of the season, fellow senior guard Sarah-Jo Lawrence became the 22nd member of the Colonial's 1,000-point club in the win over Western Kentucky. The moment came when Lawrence hit a first-half jumper to give George Washington the early 22-21 lead.

TOUGH ROAD FOR TEMPLE CONTINUES

After beating Ball State, the Temple Owls (3-5) lost to No. 24 North Carolina State, 57-52, Saturday and look to regain their winning ways as they take on Kent State Wednesday. After facing Kent State, the road does not get any easier for Temple, which faces off against No. 3/6 Maryland Sunday.

Ashley Morris was voted Big Five Player of the Week after she averaged 20.5 points last week, this is her first-ever Big Five honor. As she is getting recognized for her good play, the Owls are also beginning to gain some respect nationwide. The ESPN/USA Today poll gave Temple two votes because of its play against ranked opponents. If Temple defeats No. 6/3 Maryland, expect to see them crack the Top-25 and rise quickly if they also knock off No. 3/4 Rutgers on Dec. 30.

WEEKLY HONORS

After dropping the first two games of the season, the Dayton Flyers (6-2) have won six straight behind senior forward Nikki Dakland, who won A-10 Player of the week honors. her first of the season, second of her career after she averaged 23.5 points and 10 rebounds per game while shooting 61 percent from the field.

Against Cincinnati on Thursday, Oakland dropped 15 points and 10 rebounds leading Dayton to a 69-53 win. It was the first time the Flyers beat the Bearcats in seven years. With that one block, Oakland became the Flyers' all-time leader in blocked shots, with 110.

Oakland then scored a career-high 32 points against Akron with a 13-19 shooting display, while going 6-6 from the charity. Dips in just 24 minutes of work. Dayton beat Akron 87-54 in order to notch their sixth straight win behind Oakland's strong play.

Xavier's center Ta'Shia Phillips and Richmond's guard Brittany Sheffs were named co-Rookies of the Week Monday. This is Phillips' third straight rookie of the week honor, while it was Sheffs' first recognition.

Phillips leads the A-10 with 12.7 rebounds per game and a 59 shooting percentage. Against Cincinnati, Phillips recorded her fourth double-double of the season with 16 points and 10 rebounds, making it the sixth straight game with double-digit rebounds. With Phillips' third straight rookie of the week award, Xavier has claimed six consecutive A-10 Rookie of the Week honors. The last three weeks of last season pegged current sophomore Amber Harris as the rookie of the week for the Musketeers.

For Shells, last week was all about consistent scoring, as she average 17.5 points, 3.5 rebounds and three assists a game. She dropped 17 points, four rebounds, and four assists on Longwood as the Spiders won, 62-45, Thursday night. Shells then put on an 18-point show, leading Richmond over George Mason, 71-55. Shells was the leading scorer in both games, and is the team's second-leading scorer this season with 12.8 points per game.

HAWKS TAKE TOURNEY

Saint Joseph's won the Brown Basketball Classic last week, beating Brown in the championship game. This is the Hawks' (5-2) 14th in-season tournament championship victory, 65-54.

Senior guard Amy Wold was named the tournament's most valuable player, dropping a career-high 20 points along with seven assists and four rebounds in the championship game.

Sophomore forward Ashley Logue put up 12 points and 11 rebounds while Jenna Loschiavo chipped in 11 points as the other Hawks in double digits.

In the first game of the tournament against Manhattan, Wold scored her previous career high with 11 points in her first career start to lead the Hawks to a 65-58 win over the Jaspers. Wold was also named to the All-Tournament team alongside senior Timisha Gomez, who averages 9.5 points per game.

St. Joe's visits Villanova Wednesday and No. 21 Wyoming Saturday.

The Colonial's Sarah-Jo Lawrence reached the 1,000-point mark for her career in the loss to UNLV.

UMass Sport

49ERS FALL TO GOLDEN GOPHERS

Charlotte had its three-game winning streak snapped by Minnesota at home Sunday. Junior center Danielle Burgin contributed 18 points in the 76-64 loss to the 8-2 Golden Gophers.

After sitting at 3-5, the 49ers (3-6) had 500 in sights but their plans were temporarily put on hold as the Golden Gophers used a 9-0 run to build their lead to 16 points with a minute left in the first half. Other than this hiccup, Charlotte played well outscoring Minnesota, 38-32, in the paint and 16-4 on the fast break.

Last week, senior guard Sabrina Gregory notched her 1,000th point, becoming the 15th player in 49ers history to achieve the feat. It happened against Hampton in their 72-47 win Nov. 21 when Gregory scored a game-high 13 points.

Charlotte will play Alabama on Dec. 5 before an 11-day break.

LA SALLE STUCK AT .500

La Salle continued to alternate wins and losses, splitting its two games last week. The Explorers defeated Delaware, 84-43, on the road for the first time in 11 years, while losing to Binghamton who shot 51 percent from the floor as a team.

The Explorers (3-4) look to ramp to .500 against Quinnipiac at home this Saturday. La Salle has yet to win consecutive games this season but has also not lost two in a row.

Coley Michalik can be reached at cmichalik@student.umass.edu.

NOTE: if sent through campus mail, no postage is required.
1 out of every 25 Respondents will be randomly chosen to receive a $5 "ANTONIO'S PIZZA GIFT CERTIFICATE!"
Return through campus mail at these locations:
• Dorm Mailbox
• Departmental Office Mailbox
• Class Building Mailbox
• 306 Goodell
Please Return To:
OFFICE OF WASTE MANAGEMENT
UMASS-AMHERST
151 TILLSON FARM ROAD
AMHERST, MA 01003
*Terms and Conditions: Survey must be complete in order to qualify for selection. Up to 80 winners will be selected. Certificate of $5 to be used at Antonio's Pizza in Amherst; not redeemable for cash value. Certificates supplied by the OWM.
For more information regarding this and other initiatives visit the SEAA website at WWW.UMASSSEAA.ORG or WWW.UMASS.EDU/RECYCLE
* Tear at Dotted Line
* Fold at Dotted Line

CAMPUS RECYLING & COMPOSTING SURVEY
Co-Sponsored by the Office of Waste Management (OWM) & Students for Environmental Awareness and Action (SEAA)
Please answer the following survey on student/staff beliefs and behavior regarding recycling food waste and the environment. Only honest and accurate answers will help us learn how to improve campus programs.
NOTE: Tear out the form and place in campus mail where no postage is required.
To enter the gift certificate drawing, please provide your email
RESPONDANT INFO:
1) Are you: Student Faculty Staff Other
2) Age: Gender: M / F Major: Home State/Country:
3) Do you live: Off Campus On Campus (Put Dorm Name):
SURVEY QUESTIONS:

Longhorns leaving marks

Texas jumps to No. 4 after win over Bruins

By Jeff Larnard
Collegian Correspondent

Texas continued its climb to the top of the rankings with its win over No. 2 UCLA Sunday night.

The victory moved Texas into the No. 4 spot in the rankings, up from No. 8. This was only a continuation of the Longhorns' significant jump the week before when they moved from the 15th spot in the rankings to the eighth, courtesy of their convincing win over now-No. 10 Tennessee.

The Longhorns (7-0) led for most of the game despite a late surge by the Bruins (7-1). With one minute left in the game junior Connor Atchley hit a 3-point shot tying the game at 61 for the Longhorns.

Handed the chance to take the lead, UCLA's Luc Richard Mbah a Moute went to the free-throw line, but missed the first shot leaving the game tied.

Texas sophomore Damion James drove to the basket on the next possession and threw up an off-balance shot, which he missed. Sophomore guard Justin Mason grabbed the offensive rebound and followed with a put-back to seal the victory with eight seconds remaining.

The key to Texas' victory was shutting down UCLA's freshman star, Kevin Love. The center averaged a double-double in the first seven games of the season, but struggles against the Longhorns, grabbing five rebounds.

Look for other teams to take a similar strategy against the Bruins, taking Love out of the game. Against Texas, Love got zero offensive rebounds for the first time this season.

USC falls to Kanas

USC fell in a close game to No. 4 Kansas on Sunday, 59-55.

Junior guard Mario Chalmers made the difference in the end by scoring the final four points for the Jayhawks, on a 3-point shot and a free throw. Chalmers led all scorers with 20 points and also grabbed nabbed seven boards.

Kansas rose to No. 3 in this week's Associated Press Top 25 with its victory and UCLA's loss to Texas. The Trojans loss dropped them from No. 22 to No. 24 and could cause them to fall from the rankings if they do not bounce back in their next game.

Texas A&M falls seven spots to No. 16

Texas A&M took the largest drop of the week in the AP poll after its loss at Arizona. The Aggies surged out to a 40-28 lead in the first half, only to struggle in the second.

Luc Richard Mbah a Moute and the Bruins were upset by the upstart Texas Longhorns, who moved up to No. 4 in the latest national polls. UCLA fell from No. 2 to No. 8 in the Associated Press Top 25.

Texas A&M (7-1) led by 20 at one point, but with 14:30 left in the second half Arizona went on an 11-0 run to take the lead. It was a back-and-forth game until Arizona took a 62-60 lead with six minutes left.

A-10 Basketball

The Wildcats were unranked before the match but climbed into the top 25 settling at No. 22 with the win. Arizona had met with one other ranked team prior to its matchup with Texas A&M, playing Kansas, losing 76-72 in overtime.

Arizona will look to stay ranked with a somewhat easy schedule in the following weeks, but may struggle once conference play begins. Playing in the Pacific 10 may give Arizona some struggles because it is a conference with three other Top 25 teams.

In addition, Arizona plays No. 2 Memphis later this month.

Davidson loses again

A team with high expectations at the season's beginning, Davidson, has struggled early due to a tough non-conference schedule.

The Wildcats, who lost four games all of last season on its way to winning the Southern Conference's South Division, has already lost three, though two were against high-ranked teams.

The most recent of the losses took place Saturday night against now-No. 6 Duke. The Wildcats outscored the Blue Devils in the second half, but the Blue Devils, who shot 44 percent from 3-point range, won 76-73.

Davidson's other loss to a high-ranked team came against No. 1 North Carolina, but has some impressive wins against lesser opponents. With these results Davidson had received a lot of consideration for the Top 25 but has yet to break through.

The Wildcats' rebounding struggles have hurt them this season. The Wildcats are 3-0 when they out rebound their opponent and 0-3 when they do not.

DC has one more chance to prove it belongs with the elite teams in the nation when the Wildcats take on UCLA Dec. 8.

Jeff Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@student.umass.edu

Dayton ends Red Hawks' home streak

M. HOOPS from page 10

Island receiving votes, the A-10 is turning more and more heads as the season progresses.

Dayton wins at Miami (OH)

Dayton guard Brian Roberts led the Flyers to a 63-62 come-from-behind victory over Miami (OH). In the final 64 seconds of Wednesday's contest the 6-foot-2, 185-pound senior scored 12 of his team's 20 points, which included a 3-pointer with 4.2 seconds left in regulation. The loss was the first at home in nearly a year for the Red Hawks, the last coming against Michigan Dec. 7, 2006.

For the first time in 20 years, (1987-1988 Ohio State and Caminade), Dayton won back-to-back road games. The Flyers collected their two road wins against the Red Hawks Wednesday and Holy Cross Saturday. The two road wins equal Dayton's total victories away from home all of last season.

Owls win late

The Temple Owls won a nail-biter of their own when they knocked off the Ohio Bobcats Thursday in Philadelphia. With time winding down and the Owls trailing, senior Chris Clark sank a 3-pointer with 1.4 seconds left to carry Temple to a 90-88 victory.

Ohio's Bubba Walther sank three free throws with 7.6 seconds remaining to put the Bobcats up, 88-87. Temple's senior captain Mark Tyndale then drove the ball the length of the court to find a wide open Clark standing beyond the arc anticipating the game-winner.

"Mark did a great job of penetrating," Clark was quoted as saying on the university's Web site. "I told Mark I was going to knock it down if he gave me a pass. It was a great drive to the basket and I was able to knock the shot down. That definitely was the biggest shot of my life, mostly because we needed that win."

Dukes suffer first loss

The Duquesne Dukes, who ripped off six straight wins to start the year, lost for the first time Saturday, 77-73, to Drake. The Dukes are averaging 92.3 points per game through their first seven contests and all six wins have come by a margin of at least 15 points. After being ranked 324th of 325 Division 1 teams last season in opponents' field goal percentage (.507), the Dukes held all seven opponents to under 34.5 percent shooting.

Duquesne forward/center Shawn James leads the A-10 with 32 blocks (5.2 per game), and compiled a conference-record 12 stuffs in Duquesne's 92-77 win over Oakland senior, who is also averaging 12.7 points and 7.3 rebounds per game.

Weekly honors

Two individuals shared the player of the week honors and one young forward captured the rookie of the week for Charlotte.

Forward Joe Mbang averaged 19 points and six rebounds per game for URI in two victories. The 6-foot-6, 235-pound senior went 8-for-9 from the field, tying his career high of 22 points in the Rams' 87-76 win over New Hampshire.

St. Bonaventure's Michael Lee recorded 23 points and 9.5 rebounds per game making 19-of-32 shots from the field, and also recorded seven steals, four assists and three blocks in the Bonnies' two contests last week. Lee also cashed in his third double-double of the season Nov. 28 in the Bonnies' 80-75 loss against Niagara.

An'Juan Wilderness brought home the rookie of the week for the Charlotte 49ers. Wilderness scored a career-high 21 points, shooting 9-of-13 with six rebounds in the 49ers' 63-59 victory over Wake Forest Thursday. The freshman made his three free-throw attempts, including two with 9.8 seconds left.

Milestones in the A-10

In Rhode Island, seven-year coach Jim Baron won his 300th career game as his squad beat the Northeastern Huskies, 92-72, Thursday in Kingston, R.I. Baron has amassed 94 wins with URI, 74 with St. Francis (PA) and 132 with A-10 foe St. Bonaventure.

"The wins are really for the players and the teams – it's been a total team effort," Baron told the team's Web site regarding the milestone.

St. Bonaventure's Michael Lee became the fourth player in school history to reach the 1,000-point, 500-rebound plateau Thursday in the Bonnies' 80-75 loss against the Niagara Purple Eagles. Lee scored 21 points and rung-up 13 boards in Wednesday's contest, and leads the A-10 with three double-doubles this season. The 6-foot-9, 215-pound senior forward is averaging 21.1 points and 9.1 rebounds per game this season, up from his 2006-2007 averages of 12.8 ppg and 6.2 rpg.

George Washington's senior guard Maurice Rice notched the 1,000th point of his career in the Colonials' 83-60 loss to No. 7 St. UCLA. Rice stands at 39th on GWU's all-time scoring list, with 1,005 points, and eighth in three-point field goals, with 125.

Duquesne's senior forward/center Kieron Achara enters today's game against No. 12/9 Pittsburgh, two points shy of becoming the 31st 1,000-point scorer in program history. Achara is second on the team in scoring with 13.9 ppg and shooting a team-best 64 percent from the field and 84 percent from the foul line.

Mike Barba can be reached at mbarba@student.umass.edu

UMass comes around on corner kicks the 2006 season and connected on just one during the 2007 regular season.

SOCCER from page 10

In the three tournament games, five of the team's seven goals came off of corners. Freshman Ben Arikian takes the kicks from the right of the goal mouth and Rappaport does so from the left.

The versatility of UMass's targets on these kicks is the main reason for its success. The classical approach of aiming for the tallest player makes Cook a vital target, but at times, other players can make plays for the Minutemen.

On Sunday's first goal, Arikian's service stayed lower than normal. Sophomore Mark DeSantis recognized this and headed the ball to sophomore Bryan Hogan who finished the play.

Both DeSantis brothers have high soccer IQs, allowing them to quickly read and react to different circumstances.

Mike DeSantis, a junior, features on a play that requires him to streak to the back post on balls played long into the box off corners. Against Boston College, DeSantis read a lob from Rappaport perfectly and lined it into the net for the game-winner.

"Last year, I don't think we scored a single goal on corner kicks. So I'm just excited that we're finally getting the hang of it," Hogan said. "It's about time, I think. We can be really dangerous on corners."

Non-conference, not welcome

The Minutemen are undefeated this season at home against non-conference opponents.

In the first game of the tournament, UMass disposed of Boston University, 2-1, who they also defeated on Sept. 29 at Rudd Field. The other two wins came Sunday and against Northeastern on Sept. 22.

Overall, the Minutemen are 8-1 at home this season. The loss came against Rhode Island on Oct. 27. UMass later avenged the defeat in the Atlantic 10 Tournament with a 1-0 victory ... Junior Prince Ofosu scored the final goal in the win over CCSU, his third in his last seven games ... Hogan's eight goals give him twice as many as the team-leading four he had last season. He also leads the team in game-winning goals with three ... Arikian's assist on the first Hogan score gave him six on the season. He is the first rookie to record at least six assists since Ofosu in 2005.

Joe Melom can be reached at jmelom@student.umass.edu

Stanley Burrell and the Xavier Musketeers broke into the top 25 last week and continued their climb this week, moving from No. 23 to No. 21.

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM

- Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
- More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
- Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
- Post unlimited online listings
- Little to no spam
- By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

SPHS University of Massachusetts Amherst
School of Public Health and Health Sciences

The Department of Public Health cordially invites you to....

AN OPEN HOUSE FOR PROSPECTIVE GRADUATE STUDENTS INTERESTED IN PUBLIC HEALTH

Please join us from 10am – 12 noon
Friday, December 7th
UMASS Campus Center
Reading Room

Come meet public health faculty, staff and students from Biostatistics, Epidemiology, Environmental Health Sciences, Community Health Education, and Health Policy & Management.
Learn about the admissions process, financial aid opportunities, and our curriculum.

Please RSVP with Diane Wolf - email: dwolf@schoolph.umass.edu

Visit our website (www.umass.edu/sphhs) to learn more about our degree programs

Seven O's
Every Wednesday
Karaoke
* * * * * *
Friday, 12/7/07
Deep Pocket Band
Saturday, 12/8/07
Shut Up & Dance

Looking for exposure? Student Bands welcome to play at Seven O's

Looking for a place to have a private event/party?
Call 413-530-6996

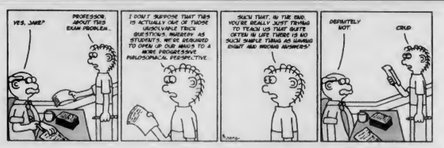
Route 116, 330 Amherst Rd
Sunderland, MA 01375
(413) 665-6788

3 PM to 1 AM M-F
1 PM to 1 AM Sat/Sun
Next to Cumberland Farms

Jonesin' for some arithmetic?

7								6
		2	5	1	8	3
1								9
		5	6		2	9
	6						4
		7	9		4	5
5								7
		1	2	6	7	8
2								3

Quote of the Day



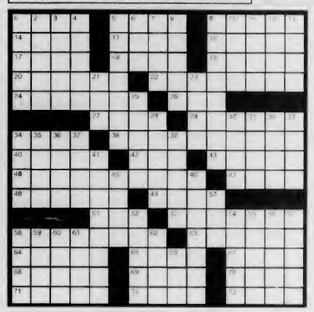
"Politics is my hobby. Smut is my vocation."

–Larry Flynt

Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

Last Ditch Effort By John Kroes

Labrat By Richard Martelly



Jumble

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!

ACROSS
1 Mineral springs
5 Movie dog
9 One laid
14 Landed
15 Greenish blue color
16 Adoree or Taylor
17 Tibetan holy man
18 Period for lasting
19 Writer Loos
20 Nevada
22 Days of rest
24 Salutation
26 Michael Stipe's band
27 Arrangement
29 Pee Wee and Della
34 Small bills
38 Telescope owners
40 Sponsorship
42 Frozen expanse
43 Pick up the tab
44 Deceived
47 Onyx
48 Hidden
49 Logic
51 LAX posting
53 Closet's capacity
58 Inventors
63 Library patron
64 Make two
65 Bat
67 Actress Foch
68 Fiery felony
69 Actor Baldwin
70 Attends
71 College bigwigs
72 Tinker into
73 Latin being

DOWN
1 Chip dip
2 Cam pattern
3 Directed, as a weapon
4 Ex-QB Bart
5 Some library tomes
6 Understand
7 Brown shades
8 Rides sides
9 Cocktail maternal
10 Actress Olin
11 ICU element
12 "Little Women" woman
13 Saison and Sangaree
21 Primary color
23 Actress Ge Hude
25 Glossy fabric
28 Doesn't have
30 Poet Pound
31 Appear
32 QED part
33 Machu pits
34 Diamond Head's island
35 Light gas
36 Prima donnas problems
37 Viewpoint
39 Staggers
41 Artist's susan to
45 Division word
46 Take away (from)
50 John's last name?
52 Opera songs
54 Mountain dominion
55 Mexican farewell
56 Hereditary units
57 Fractuses
58 African nation
59 Hard to find
60 "Lohengrin" lass
61 Bard's river
62 Fish fish
66 Squelching or oozing

Student Union Craft Center
ANNUAL HOLIDAY CRAFT FAIR
In UMass Campus Center Concourse
Dec 5th 6th and 7th
9am - 4pm

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session 2008
Classes begin January 2nd
Plan Now for Winter Break
3 Credits = 3 Weeks
Registration begins November 13th
www.UMassULearn.net

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
In the midst of a world stained by coffee, soda and tea, take time to appreciate the miracle of whitening toothpaste.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You have difficulty expressing your feelings, but this problem can easily be solved by purchasing a stylish yet practical mood ring.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
The spit valve on your bodily trombone needs to be emptied. Pump that slide and enjoy the ride.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
If your face is flecked, be proud. Freckles are where it's at.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Starlight, starbright, steal a whole bowl of mint candies from the DC tonight.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
If this were the broadway musical Cats, then you would play the part of the saucy female known as Bombalurina. Meow.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Have you ever buttered yourself up and run out in the street screaming "I'm a muffin?" Well, you should do it now.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You are a strong prime number; only solitude can divide you.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Your success this semester will echo throughout the rest of the academic year, year, year, year, year.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Your pen will explode in your pocket today if you aren't careful. Quick, take off your pants.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
There is snow and yet the campus does not reek of soy sauce...something must be wrong.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Increase your desirability by ignoring every third phone call you recieve. Every third person always wants what they can't have.

Do you believe in magic, on the comics page?

comics@dailycollegian.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

ACTIVITIES

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price, Best Hotels. 781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net

APT. 4 RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

APT. FOR RENT

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab. phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101

SERVICES

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St. Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

TRAVEL

*#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

DEC

6

2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Red Storm too much for UMass

Early surge derailed as defense, shooting fade in second half

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

For the fifth time in five tries this season, the Massachusetts women's basketball team dropped a road game.

St. John's (6-1) built a 51-38 halftime lead and never looked back. By the time the final horn sounded, the Red Storm left with an 84-68 victory.

St. John's	84
UMass	68

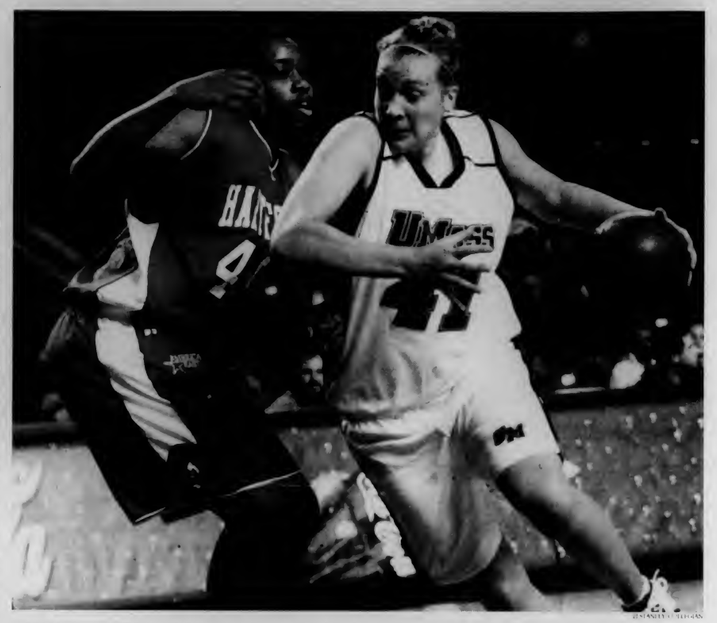
When going on the road, it's imperative that a team remains within striking distance prior to the second half, and UMass (3-5) was unable to do so.

The Minutewomen are back at home this weekend against Maine on Saturday, where they'll be looking to remain perfect at home. They've already defeated Vermont, Boston College, and Hartford at the Mullins Center.

"I thought we came out and handled ourselves very well in the first ten minutes of the first half," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We got out to a 10-point lead and executed and ended up shooting well, and then we stopped playing defense."

The Maroon and White were up 27-17 after 10 minutes of play, but were outscored 34-11 the final ten minutes of the half. In that second 10 minute span, St. John's hit 4-of-5 shots from 3-point range.

Sky Lindsay and Monique McLean led Red Storm scorers coming into the game, and they combined for 34 first-half points.



McLean finished the first half with 18 points on 7-of-10 shooting from the floor. The junior guard finished the game with 22 points on 9-of-14 shooting. McLean came into the contest averaging 15.7 points, 3 assists, and 5.8 rebounds, the latter an impressive number for someone in the backcourt.

Lindsay opened just as hot – she scored 14 points in the first half on 6-of-8 from the floor, and finished with 16 points and four assists.

While Dacko was disappointed with her team's defense, she also said these players were hitting shots even when a hand was in their face.

The Minutewomen shot nearly 49 percent in the first half, but their opponent shot 62.7 percent from the floor, including 5-of-7 from behind the arc.

See W. HOOPS on page 7

Senior forward Kate Mills scored eight points and gathered six rebounds in the Minutewomen's road loss to St. John's. UMass is now 0-5 away from the Mullins Center and 3-0 at home, where they face Maine this Saturday.

Zack Simmons tied the school record for career wins with his 31st Sunday. A 32nd win against Illinois-Chicago puts UMass in the College Cup.

UM at home another week

Minutemen host Ill.-Chicago, Simmons ties career wins mark

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

When the final second of the Massachusetts men's soccer team's win over Central Connecticut State fell from the clock, it appeared certain the Minutemen would host a national quarterfinal match.

Initially, it looked like the NCAA may have delayed its decision. But, according to officials within the athletic department, the NCAA had to go through the process before awarding UMass the home game.

Following Sunday's game, the athletic department submitted a bid to host the quarterfinal and it learned the NCAA accepted the bid shortly after noon on Monday. UMass's record when hosting NCAA Tournament games in other sports – namely softball, football and lacrosse – was among the items formally mentioned in the bid. Also, the two games the school hosted during this season's soccer tournament helped the cause.

The situation with the conditions was not considered greatly because Connecticut will also host a quarterfinal matchup against South Florida this weekend. The weather forecast for the weekend predicts little snow, although the temperature should be below freezing all weekend.

UMass Soccer

RECORDS, RECORDS AND MORE RECORDS

The longer the 2007 season lasts, the more records redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons breaks.

The win over Central Connecticut earned him a tie with Bryan O'Quinn for the program's career wins record at 31. Earlier this season, he set school marks in career saves, shutouts and goals-against average.

He is on pace to break the single-season record for goals-against average. His current mark of 0.77 is more than a tenth of a point better than the current mark of 0.87 set by Mark Hodgdon.

Simmons isn't alone. Senior Kenny Cook and redshirt junior Chris Brown will extend their consecutive games-started record to 64 Sunday. The pair is a great force within the UMass backfield between fullbacks Dan Lepone and Doug Rappaport.

The win over CCSU was UMass's 16th of the season, which broke the record of 15 set in 2001.

CORNERING SUCCESS

The Minutemen did not score any goals off corner kicks during

See SOCCER on page 8

Xavier rising in national polls

By Mike Barba
Collegian Correspondent

The Atlantic 10 was no stranger to upsets, milestones, last minute comebacks and record-setting performances in men's basketball this week. There were no conference matchups, but recent action in the A-10 has been nothing short of dramatic.

UMass took the Syracuse Orange down in an upset at the Carrier Dome, 107-100. Wednesday in Syracuse, and Dayton's senior guard Brian Roberts led the Flyers to a last-minute comeback over Miami (OH). St. Bonaventure's sophomore forward Michael Lee and Rhode Island's head coach Jim Baron were among several A-10 members to reach milestones in their respective programs as well.

UMass Basketball

CREAM OF THE CROP

A week after breaking into the Associated Press Top 25 for the first time in a year, the Musketeers moved up two spots, from 23 to 21. After beating No. 8 Indiana on Nov. 24 to win the Chicago Challenge, the Musketeers stood at 23rd in the AP poll and 25th in the USPN/USA Today Coach's Poll.

"It was amazing," said Xavier's senior guard Stanley Burrell after the victory over the Hoosiers. "I grew up watching [Indiana], and even for a time I wanted to go there. It was a great feeling."

After dismantling the Belmont Bruins, 90-49, Saturday, the Musketeers extended their winning streak to five games and improved their positioning in the polls. The Musketeers sit 21st in the AP Top 25, and 20th in the ESPN/USA Today Top 25.

Typically, when thinking of dominance in men's college basketball, conferences like the Big East and Big 12 come to mind. In the month of November, however, the A-10 went 57-16 in non-conference action (10 the 16 losses compiled by the 14 teams, 12 of them were by four points or less. With Xavier moving up in the polls and Rhode

See M. HOOPS on page 8

COLLEGIAN SPORTS ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

BRYAN HOGAN, FORWARD MEN'S SOCCER

Sophomore forward Bryan Hogan scored two goals in the Massachusetts men's soccer team's 3-1 win over Central Connecticut State on Sunday.

The goals were the seventh and eighth of the season for Hogan, who scored four last year as a freshman. He leads the team in both goals and total points.

At 6-foot-2, Hogan can use his size as well as any forward to finish plays. But his ball skills also allow him to beat defenders 1-on-1. He used both talents to score his goals Sunday.

The first goal broke a scoreless tie in the 54th minute. Freshman Ben Arikian lined up for a corner kick and lined it to the near post. Sophomore Mark DeSantis kept the play alive and nodded it on to the center of the penalty area. Hogan accelerated forward and lined it into the net to give UMass a 1-0 lead.

UMass coach Sam Koch explained early in the season that Hogan had the potential to be one of the best goal scorers in the Atlantic 10. He felt Hogan needed to develop a sense of urgency and self-confidence to become that player. The performance of the young forward Sunday showed his progress.

Early in the game, Hogan found a seam between two CCSU defenders and made a run toward the goal. Arikian played the ball into to him, but Hogan lost his footing on the slippery grass and fell down.

Minutes after his first goal, Hogan displayed his new-found confidence in his ability. Freshman Stuart Amick received a ball after a CCSU rush and turned it up the left side. Hogan paralleled his teammate, dashing up the center of the field. Amick sent a low cross into the box where Hogan redirected it home without breaking stride.

RUNNER UP: KATE MILLS, FORWARD WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Though the Massachusetts women's basketball team lost, 72-60, against Boston University on Nov. 28, Kate Mills registered her 10th double-double at UMass.

The senior ward finished second on the team behind Stephanie Gerardot with 10 points, and her 10 rebounds were good enough to lead the team with freshman Teya Wright.

It wouldn't take long for Mills to record her 11th double-double. In Saturday's home game against Hartford, she scored 18 points on 8-of-16 shooting and also grabbed a season-high 14 rebounds.

BID TO COLLEGE CUP AT STAKE | PAGE 12

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

PARTLY CLOUDY : HI: 33 LO: 18 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2007

Fundraising a success

By Caitlin Quinn
Collegian Staff

A sign that the holiday season has started are the charity drives and fund raisers that emerge in communities across the country – but also in the Amherst area.

The Public Health Club, a newly founded University of Massachusetts Registered Student Organization (RSO), recently held their first event – a successful clothing drive for the Amherst Survival Center.

The members of the Public Health Club said they were surprised by the six to seven cars full of donations and over 400 donors that contributed to the drive.

A table in the campus center along with boxes in classrooms collected winter clothes, coats, gloves, blankets, and leather jackets, as well as apparel from the University Store.

"Some people actually bought new stuff," said club member Megan Griffin.

"I was overwhelmed by the people that brought full bags of clothes," said club member Amanda Mitchell.

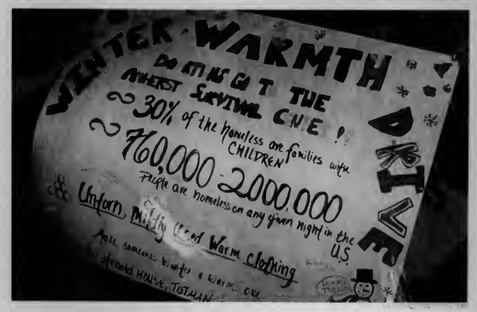
Mitchell was especially surprised that there was so much success despite the drive being right after Thanksgiving break. Some incentive originated from Professors Dan Gerber and Chris Overtree, who gave extra credit for students who participated in the drive.

In addition to the Amherst Survival Center, the donations will go to the Northampton Survival Center, and the Main Street Shelter in Holyoke.

"We started out with just Amherst Survival Center and it was so successful we wanted to expand," said Griffin.

The club got involved with the Survival Center through Griffin, who started volunteering there through her Dean's Book, Community Service Learning course.

"We started out by using the assets we had on the group," said Mitchell.



Griffin says she will continue working at the center after her Dean's Book course ends.

"It's a lot of fun," she said. "You learn to break the stigma about who is homeless. You wouldn't understand how big the problem is, especially with the increase in the cost of living."

"People think the problem is just in Springfield or Worcester but it's in Amherst too," said club member Abby Harper.

The Amherst Survival Center is a nonprofit organization supported by contributions from mostly individual donors such as local businesses and community and religious groups. They also receive funding from the

See DONATIONS on page 3

The Public Health Club, a new UMass RSO, holds a sign which gives statistics on the homeless in the United States and encourages the community to donate.

Weapons found on students

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

Two students at the University of Massachusetts Dartmouth have been summoned to court for allegedly possessing firearms on campus.

Both students have valid Class A licenses to carry firearms, but possessing firearms on campus is against university policy and Massachusetts law. The students are charged with carrying a firearm on campus and improper storage of a firearm.

Colonel Emil Fiorvanti, director of Public Safety at UMass Dartmouth, said in an e-mail that "both students have been interim suspended pending an outcome of the judicial process."

According to police records, campus police responded to a disturbance on the third floor of Hickory Hall at 2:18 a.m on Nov. 9. The police officers broke up a fight in between two male students inside of a dormitory room.

The police searched the room after hearing from a student that there allegedly was a gun inside. UMass-Dartmouth student Matthew Mauger, 22, admitted to having a gun and allowed police to search his room. The officers reported finding a disassembled 9mm handgun, a BB gun and various firearm paraphernalia.

On Nov. 22, police found an unloaded AR15 assault rifle with a trigger safety lock in the trunk of 22-year-old Eric Bowlin's car.

"The student was in the process of taking the weapon home when his car was stolen," said UMass Dartmouth junior Drew Josefson.

Bowlin had informed police that the rifle was in his trunk when he reported it stolen the previous day.

See GUNS on page 3

'Tis the season

Cameron Proctor (top), a member of the Republican Club, strings lights on the Christmas tree in front of the campus pond on Tuesday. Last night, students gathered at Hillel House (bottom) to celebrate the second day of Hanukkah by lighting an outdoor menorah.

VTech shapes safety at UM

By Sruthi Valluri
Collegian Staff

Seven months after the Virginia Tech shootings, the University of Massachusetts continues to improve its handling of emergency situations and providing support for troubled students.

The university's efforts have yielded several new protocols, including a campus-wide e-mail system and an upgraded Emergency Operation Center (EOC).

Deputy Chief of Administration for the UMass Police Department (UMPD), Patrick Archbald, said that now, security and safety have become an even more urgent matter.

"It changed the tenor of our conversations," he said of the Virginia Tech shootings. "Both within the department and outside."

Although the EOC had been in place before the shootings, there was room for improvement.

Part of the tragedy of the Virginia Tech shootings was that the campus failed to issue a notification to the campus. Two hours passed before an electronic message was sent to students and faculty members.

UMass is now taking action, along with countless other universities around the country.

In preparing to avoid such a situation, UMass's large student body makes it all the more susceptible to incurring heavy loss in emergency situations, which range from weather situations, health threats, and active shooters.

"We need to be working in concert with one another to ensure that no institution as large as ours falls between the cracks," said Archbald.

The EOC is an effort to dilute the responsibilities during an emergency situation, and in effect, make responses more effective. Rather than leave the job to one or two specific departments, the EOC assembles representatives from departments across campus in two or three rooms.

Senior officials from the Provost's Office, health services, housing operations, News and Information office, OIT telecom, UMPD, and Transit Services represent the campus at the meetings. Information to analyze the situation flows freely between these departments, and decisions are made about the outsourcing of information.

Edward Meinika, associate director of Environmental Health and Safety, said that the communication strategies that the EOC employs are extensive. The goal is to reach each and every single student on, and if necessary, off campus.

"We use the university website radio stations, television stations, and outdoor emergency communication centers, like sound trucks," said Meinika. "We're hoping to improve the way we communi-

See SAFETY on page 3

Student bring in dollars for Darfur Fast

MassPIRG raises $2,000

By Katrina Cessna
Collegian Correspondent

Members of MassPIRG's Save Darfur Campaign intensified fundraising efforts yesterday, canvassing the campus and collecting donations for "DarfurFast."

Coordinated annually by STAND (a Student Anti-Genocide Coalition), DarfurFast is a nationwide fundraising event based on the request that people abstain from making an everyday purchase for one day, instead donating the money to Darfur.

According to STAND's website, DarfurFast has earned celebrity support, with "notable fasters" including Danny Glover, Mia Farrow, and Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, social justice advocates and co-founders of Ben and Jerry's Ice Cream.

Students engaged in yesterday's fundraising effort stationed themselves all over campus, in buildings including Fletcher, Lederle, Bartlett, and the Dining Commons. All totaled, members volunteered 40 hours of their time, and raised $2,000, enough to pay for a full year of protection for 600 Darfuri women from sexual abuse and violence so common in refugee camps for one full year.

Part of the fundraiser's success can be attributed to diverse publicity efforts made by volunteers, which Aines said included a Facebook group, word of mouth, going door-to-door in dorms, talking to professors and their classes, and coverage in campus media. Aines also cited access to other networks associated with Darfur fundraising, including those of MASSPIRG and STAND, as instrumental in getting the word out in a wider base via e-mail.

Proceeds generated by yesterday's massive effort will be distributed by the Genocide Intervention Network (GI-Net), an 8(c)0 based out of Washington D.C. which works with NGOs in Darfur, to ensure that the money makes it to the refugees.

"This year was the first time our campus collected," said Stephanie Aines, STAND's Massachusetts Outreach Coordinator.

Fellow fundraiser and MASSPIRG State Executive Committee vice chair, Tiffany Yee, 21, said she hoped it will be the last, partially because she had to kick her self-diagnosed "Rockstar addict" had to kick caffeine for the day, but more so, she explained, "we're really hyping this up, because we want this genocide to end now."

Aines also spoke to the urgency of the campaign's mission, explaining that "part of what we were going for was almost shock value...we're right here, we're asking for money right now because the genocide's going on right now."

Although yesterday was the only day funds were collected on campus, GI-Net is always collecting, and according to Aines, 100 percent of their profits go to DarfurFast.

See DARFUR on page 3

MassPIRG students gather donations for their Darfur Fast program, which raised about $2,000 last night.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 64
113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Szagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Mareea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Joan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenswaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Toan Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING SO, AND OTHER MATERIAL APPEARING IN THE COLLEGIAN IS PROTECTED BY COPYRIGHT LAW. © 2007 THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED FIRST SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today
NIGHT EDITOR
Jeremy Rice
COPY EDITOR
Nichole Amaral
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Mike Sarkes

Across the Nation Around the World

Holiday shopping trip turns deadly

BY OSKAR GARCIA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

OMAHA, Neb. — A man opened fire with a rifle at a busy department store Wednesday, killing eight people in an attack that made holiday shoppers run screaming through a mall and barricade themselves in dressing rooms.

The young shooter, who left a note predicting, "Now I'll be famous," wounded five others, two critically, then took his own life.

Witnesses said the gunman sprayed fired down on shoppers from a third-floor balcony of the Von Maur store using what police said was an SKS assault rifle they found at the scene.

"My knees rocked. I didn't know what to do, so I just ran with everybody else," said Kevin Kleine, 29, who was shopping with her 4-year-old daughter at the Westroads Mall, in a prosperous neighborhood on the city's west side. She said she hid in a dressing room with four other shoppers and an employee.

Police found the first victim on the second floor, then several more near a customer service station on the third floor.

The shooter, identified by police as 20-year-old Robert A. Hawkins, was found dead on the third floor with a self-inflicted gunshot wound.

Omaha Police Chief Thomas Warren said the shooting appeared to be random. He would not release the victims' identities and gave no motive for the attack.

Police received a 911 call from someone inside the mall, and shots could be heard in the background, Sgt. Teresa Negron said. By the time officers arrived six minutes later, the shooting was over, she said.

"We sent every available officer in the city of Omaha," Negron said.

It was the second mass shooting at a mall this year.

A Douglas County officer guards the parking lot of the Westroads mall following a shooting at the Von Maur store in Omaha, Nebraska.

Verizon aims to open mobile network soon

BY PETER SVENSSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Verizon Communications Inc.'s plan to open its wireless network to any devices, not just Verizon cell phones, is partly motivated by a desire to cut costs, the company's chief operating officer said Wednesday.

The move to open access, announced last week, is a departure from cellular carriers' long-standing practice of tightly controlling what devices and services, like music downloads, are available to customers.

By opening up the network, starting late next year, Verizon hopes to carry traffic generated by third-party companies that could build in access to Verizon's data network not only into phones, but also digital cameras and other gadgets.

"We think it's a phenomenal new source of revenue for us," COO Denny Strigl said at an investor conference hosted by UBS on Wednesday.

"It is also, to be totally fair here, something which helps us reduce cost in this new business," Strigl added. The third parties will handle marketing and customer service and pay Verizon based on the network usage racked up by their customers.

"This is not something customers will buy through Verizon," Strigl said.

Last week's announcement by Verizon Wireless — a joint venture of New York-based Verizon Communications and Britain's Vodafone Group PLC — comes as some customers want more flexibility in what they can do with their phones — even though it could leave the carrier as a basic provider of wireless access rather than a value-added content provider as well.

Strigl said he did not expect Verizon to be alone in offering open access.

"My gut feeling is that our competitors will arrive at the same conclusions we did," he said.

Verizon competitor Sprint Nextel Corp. is already providing a similar service to Amazon.com Inc., which last month launched a reading device for electronic books. E-books are downloaded wirelessly through Sprint's network, and Kindle owners never deal with Sprint, only with Amazon.

Antibiotics not always effective

BY LINDSEY TANNER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Just in time for runny nose season, new research suggests routine sinus infections aren't really helped by antibiotics and other medicine that's often prescribed.

In the British study, people suffering from facial pain and a runny nose with greenish or yellowish mucous generally improved within about two weeks — whether they took the standard antibiotic amoxicillin, steroid nose spray or fake medicine.

The results, based on patients' reporting whether their symptoms had improved, echo previous findings in children.

Antibiotics, particularly the penicillin-like drug amoxicillin, are among the most commonly prescribed medicines for sinus infections.

Steroid sprays sometimes are used, but the study found they also were no better than dummy drugs, although they appeared to provide some relief for patients with only minor symptoms.

The study should lead to a "reconsideration of antibiotic use for acute sinusitis. The current view that antibiotics are effective can now be challenged, particularly for the routine cases which physicians treat," said lead author Dr. Ian Williamson of the University of Southampton in England.

"Physicians can focus on effective remedies that improve symptom control," which include ibuprofen and other over-the-counter painkillers, Williamson said.

Inhaling steam and squirting salt water into the nose to flush out thick mucous are among other methods that sometimes provide relief, he said.

The study appears in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association.

Researchers randomly assigned 240 adults to receive one of four treatments: 500 milligrams of amoxicillin three times daily for seven days and 400 units of steroid spray for 10 days; only amoxicillin; only steroid spray; or fake medicine.

Patients on the drugs didn't get better quicker than those using the placebo.

Sinus infections are diagnosed in about 31 million Americans each year and are among the most common reasons for doctor visits. In the United Kingdom, primary care doctors see 50 or more cases a year, the study authors said.

The infections affect air spaces called sinuses around the nose and in the lower forehead. Inflammation and excess mucous can cause nose congestion, headaches and eye and face pain. Causes include bacteria, viruses, fungal infections and allergies.

Despite a long-held notion, recent studies have found that yellowish or greenish mucous doesn't always mean the infections are bacterial, said Dr. Vincenza Snow, a Philadelphia internist and director of clinical programs and quality of care at the American College of Physicians.

Moreover, while antibiotics are designed to treat bacteria, these drugs aren't always very effective at treating bacterial sinus infections because the medicine has a tough time reaching the sinuses, she said.

The U.S. physicians' group issued guidelines in 2001 advising against using antibiotics for most sinus infections in otherwise healthy people, blaming overuse for contributing to the growing problem of bacteria resistant to drugs.

The group is considering updating the guidelines to say recent evidence reaffirms the drugs "don't really change the course of the illness," Snow said.

1 out of every 25 respondents will be randomly chosen to receive a $5
'ANTONIO'S PIZZA' GIFT CERTIFICATE!*

NOTE: Please fold on the dotted line and place in campus mail (no postage required) at these locations:

• Dorm Mailbox
• Departmental Office Mailbox
• Class Building Mailbox
• 306 Goodell

Please Return To:

OFFICE OF WASTE MANAGEMENT
UMASS-AMHERST
151 TILLSON FARM ROAD
AMHERST, MA 01003

*Terms and Conditions. Survey must be complete in order to qualify for selection. Up to 80 winners will be selected. Certificate of $5 to be used at Antonio's Pizza in Amherst, not redeemable for cash value. Certificates supplied by the OWM

For more information regarding this and other initiatives visit the SEAA website at

WWW.UMASSSEAA.ORG or WWW.UMASS.EDU/RECYCLE

* Tear at Dotted Line
* Fold at Dotted Line

CAMPUS RECYLING & COMPOSTING SURVEY

Co-Sponsored by the Office of Waste Management (OWM) & Students for Environmental Awareness and Action (SEAA)

Please answer the following survey on student/staff beliefs and behavior regarding recycling, food waste and the environment. Only honest and accurate answers will help us learn how to improve campus programs.

NOTE: Tear out the form, fold on dotted line and place in campus mail where no postage is required.

To enter the gift certificate drawing, please provide your email:
_____

RESPONDENT INFO:

1) Are you: Student ___ Faculty ___ Staff ___ Other ___
2) Age: ____ Gender: (M / F) Major: _____ Home State/Country: _____
3) Do you live: Off-Campus____ On-Campus (Put Dorm Name)_____

SURVEY QUESTIONS:

4) Do you recycle?
___Always – everything allowed
___Usually – most items
___Occasionally – a few items
___No – never

5) If not "always" above, why? (Please check all that apply)
___I don't know where to recycle
___I don't know what can be recycled
___I can't be bothered
___I don't think it really helps the environment
___Recycling rules are too complicated

6) Which of the following materials can you recycle in your dorm/office/class room recycling bins?
(Please check all that apply)
___Food containers
___Beverage containers
___Scrap metal
___Paper tissue and cups
___Cardboard
___Plastic bags

7) Reasons I recycle (Please order them most (1) to least (5) important).
___Conserve scarce energy/ resources
___Cut greenhouse gas generation
___Save landfill space
___Save $$ for UMass and students on operational costs
___There are no worthwhile reasons to recycle

8) If a student, do you use the recycling containers in your dorm room?
___Yes, for recycling
___No
___Yes, for trash

9) I know where my dorm/office building recycling bins are (Yes / No)

10) I've seen recycling information/guidelines posted in my dorm/office: (Yes / No)

If yes: did you read them? (Yes / No)

11) If there was composting at the Blue Wall eating area, would you use it? (Yes / No)

12) How much food do you discard each meal when eating at the Blue Wall or campus center eateries?
___ 0%
___ 25%
___ 50%
___ 75%

13) Would you use take-out containers in the Blue Wall to save uneaten food if they were made available? (Yes / No)

14) What would be the easiest way for you to reduce food waste at the Blue Wall eating area?
(Please order them most (1) to least (3) convenient):
___Option for smaller meal portion with price reduction
___Have take-out containers provided
___Compost-bin for food waste

15) Are you willing to pay a little more for biodegradable/ compostable service-ware and utensils in the Blue Wall eating area?
(Yes / No)

Dr. Klaus Nusslein, a Microbiology professor at U-Mass, contributed to the invention "Mighty Microbes," hilighted by Time Magazine.

Invention honored by Time

BY ELIZABETH HAWLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Time Magazine has recognized the invention, "Mighty Microbes," the work of one UMass professor, as one of the best of 2007.

"Mighty Microbes" are the work of Dr. Klaus Nusslein, an associate professor of Microbiology at UMass, Dr. Doug Nelson, Professor and Chair of the Microbiology department at the University of California Davis, and Dr. Jason DeJong Assistant Professor of Civil and Environmental Engineering, also at UC Davis.

"We have a thousand trillion microbes or bacterial organisms per cubic meter of soil, and they're living there naturally," Dr. DeJong explained in an interview with Jeffrey Callison of "Insight," a radio program on California NPR station, KXJZ. "It turns out that if we can help them in their activity we can actually precipitate calcite and bind particles together."

The microbes, soil-dwelling bacteria, could help solidify sandy ground, making it more stable for buildings.

The lab uses bacillus pasteurii, a bacteria which raises the pH of its surrounding environment, consequentially creating calcium carbonate cement. According to Dr. DeJong, bacillus pasteurii are just one of a wide range of bacteria that perform this function.

"The idea is to take a loose type of soil that would liquefy in an earthquake, and bind it... into sandstone," said DeJong.

There are a few methods for injecting the bacteria and their food into soil, involving pushing probes into the ground temporarily to pump the microbes and calcium in a solution into the ground, or creating rows of injections to help the treatment flow through an area.

"In the lab we can do it in about 24 hours," said DeJong. "In the field that time frame will probably lengthen. Realistically it could be a few weeks to even a couple months."

Both the amount of time the process of solidifying soil could take, and the amount of time the soil will remain solidified depend on the type of soil the bacteria has been injected into. DeJong says the effects could potentially last several decades or longer.

"These bacteria can hold up buildings," Dr. Nusslein said to the UMass media office, adding that the bacteria could help solidify foundations, and make sandy soils resistant to earthquakes, among other uses.

Currently, foundations are solidified using chemicals or cement, both of which pose serious environmental problems and sometimes leak into local wells or other water sources.

The newly solidified soil still needs to be tested under simulated earthquake conditions, but already Hayward Baker, a ground-improvement company, is interested in trying the bacteria out in the field.

Elizabeth Hawley can be reached at ehawley@student.umass.edu

Student group claims success with first event

HEALTH CLUB from page 1

Town of Amherst and the Department of Mental Health. The Center provides daily lunch, clothing and household goods, a drop-in support center, and information and referral services.

"A lot of the people who come have homes but they need a little extra help," said Griffin.

The RSO has plans to hold the clothing drive again next year.

Their next event will be a "give back luncheon" for the Nursing and Public Health departments. Discussions about their future activities have included Habitat for Humanity and HeadStart.

"Whatever we do, we want it to be something continuous," said Griffin.

The Public Health Club members are mostly junior and senior public health majors. They are hoping to recruit more members and began the drive as a way to advertise both the club and the major.

Other charity drives in the Amherst area are Newman Center's hat, mitten and glove drive which ended yesterday, and the Salvation Army Kettle Drive which will be collecting money in storefronts until Dec. 22.

Caitlin Quast can be reached at cquast@student.umass.edu

The UMass Public Health Club stands behind their large pile of donations, which will go to the Amherst Survival Center.

UMass's new safety procedures

SAFTEY from page 1

cate, between us and the students, and amongst ourselves as well."

One of the new systems that will be implemented early next year is a text-messaging system. The move is a state-wide mandate that affects institutions of higher education.

Patrick J. Callahan, a UMass spokesman, said the end goal is to build a "layered system," one that operates on many levels to address a situation in multiple ways.

He gave an example of a generic emergency situation a campus-wide e-mail is sent, the university website is updated, and television stations broadcast the news. But this all works out with the assumption that the power works, telephones are up, and internet servers are functioning.

Preparing for emergency situations leads to tricky situations.

"Is two minutes fast enough?" Callahan said of response time. "Is two minutes better than three minutes." He added that the standards are arbitrary, and vary for each situation.

UMass is still working to fine-tune their strategies.

"With each time we come together, we learn more about how to work as a cohesive unit," said Archibald. "I think we're learning."

Two recent bomb threats helped evaluate the developing system. Robert Connolly, spokesman for the President's Office, said that although the EOC convened rapidly on the day of the letter bomb, the university servers experienced heavy demand, which prevented some people from accessing information immediately.

"We will continually update our planning based on incidents at UMass and across the country," said Connolly.

The university is not limiting itself to preparing for the emergency itself but it also focusing on the aftermath.

Mental health services at University Health Services is expanding its outreach efforts for troubled students. Dr. Harry S. Rockland-Miller, mental health director for UMass campus, told the Springfield Republican that there has been an increase in client volume in recent years.

There was a system that helped troubled or grieving students before the Virginia Tech incident, but like the EOC, it is in the process of being "refined" to be more effective.

"We're not in the business of predicting emergency situations," said Archibald, when asked if there was a chance of preventing future situations. "But certainly we are in the business of preparing for it. Virginia Tech was a reminder for us that we always have to be vigilant."

Nicolle Vallieri can be reached at vallieri@student.umass.edu

Students found with firearms

GUNS from page 1

An e-mail was sent out last Tuesday informing the UMD community of the incidents after the New Bedford Standard Times picked up the story. Some students at the university are concerned that the information was released too late.

"I heard about the incident through word-of-mouth," said UMass Dartmouth sophomore Josh Terceira. "All types of stories are being thrown around."

For thousands of students, this campus is their home," UMass Dartmouth senior Allison Reitz said in a statement. "It's important for them to know what's going on in their community just as much as it is for anyone to know if their neighbor is arrested for having an assault rifle in their home."

UMass-Dartmouth spokesman John Hoey told the press that officials did not send out the e-mail right away because the incident was not seen as a threat to public safety.

"In both cases, police readily seized the firearms. You don't want to flood the campus with too many messages," said Hoey.

Maugeri of East Bridgewater and Bowlin of Dudley have not been arrested, but were both ordered to appear before a magistrate at New Bedford District Court.

Lucas Correia can be reached at lcorreia@student.umass.edu

Police found firearms at the UMass-Dartmouth campus.

UM Darfur Fast raises $2,000

DARFUR from page 1

The website created by STAND for the event, standwww.org/darfurfast, also will also be accepting donations electronically, through credit or debit card, for a few more days. An address is also listed on the site, for those who prefer to send contributions through the mail.

Yee stressed that even students unable to financially contribute could help Darfuris.

"Simply write a letter or make a phone call to your local rep or state senator," she said. "There's actually a website called darfurscores.org where you can find out what their voting records are."

In the wake of a hectic day of pitching, collecting, and counting, Amos remained optimistic.

"I think one of the really great things about this fundraiser in particular is that it's humanitarian," she said. "We can really make a difference. The political solution to this conflict, I've been working on this for two years, and I have no idea. I do know that this money is going to get to the Darfuris who do need it in the refugee camps."

Katrina Cossins can be reached at kcossins@student.umass.edu

DEC 6 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself." - Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

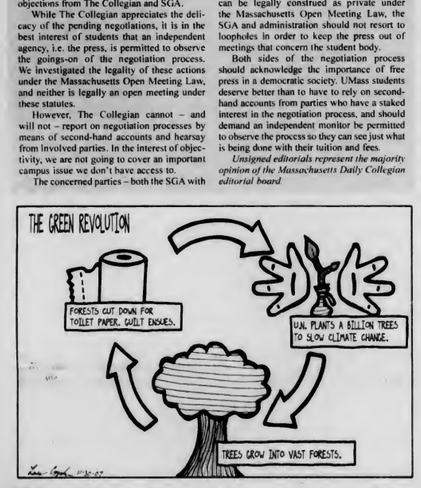
Right to report

Negotiations resulting from the recent student strike that brought the University of Massachusetts into the national spotlight are underway. The Daily Collegian, however, is being left out of the process.

Collegian reporters were recently barred by the Student Government Association from attending an all-student strategy meeting. This meeting, although not legally a public meeting, is held in a public area and open to all students. Collegian reporters were told they were welcome as students, but could not cover the event. A conflict-of-interest issue arises, however, if Collegian staff members engage in SGA strategy-planning; we are independent monitors of the situation, and integrity behooves us not to participate on that level.

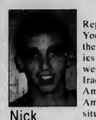
Members of the press have also been barred from the pending meeting between 10 elected student representatives and administrators, including Chancellor Thomas Cole, despite objections from The Collegian and SGA.

While The Collegian appreciates the delicacy of the pending negotiations, it is in the best interest of students that an independent agency, i.e. the press, is permitted to observe the goings-on of the negotiation process. We investigated the legality of these actions under the Massachusetts Open Meeting Law, and neither is legally an open meeting under these statutes.



However, The Collegian cannot – and will not – report on negotiation processes by means of second-hand accounts and hearsay from involved parties. In the interest of objectivity, we are not going to cover an important campus issue we don't have access to.

The concerned parties – both the SGA with respect to their all-student strategy meeting and the administration with respect to negotiations – are, in effect, shooting themselves in the foot. To eliminate the possibility of post-negotiation finger-pointing from either side, it's essential that the concerned parties practice the utmost transparency. Likewise, transparency means more than simply informing Collegian reporters beforehand that they are not allowed to attend these meetings. It means leaving them open to the press so an objective account – and not one skewed by the interests of either side – is delivered to the students, whom both parties are acting in the best interest of to begin with.



The SGA has agreed to meet with editors of The Collegian on Monday to discuss the current situation; from all reports the SGA is in support of press presence at negotiations to be held with administration. Although our legal advisors have concluded that negotiations and all-student strategy meetings can be legally construed as private under the Massachusetts Open Meeting Law, the SGA and administration should not resort to loopholes in order to keep the press out of meetings that concern the student body.

Both sides of the negotiation process should acknowledge the importance of free press in a democratic society. UMass students deserve better than to have to rely on second-hand accounts from parties who have a staked interest in the negotiation process, and should demand an independent monitor be permitted to observe the process so they can see just what is being done with their tuition and fees.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian editorial board.

The GOP gun frenzy

Nick Milano

At last, week's Republican CNN/YouTube Debate, the four major topics for discussion were immigration, Iraq, the Second Amendment and America's financial situation. As contentious as each of those issues are, the most disconcerting answers came on questions regarding guns and gun laws. It seemed each candidate was trying to outgun his foes. Duncan Hunter of California bragged about getting his first hunting license at ten-years-old and described in detail a gun he had just recently purchased. It is frightening to see such educated men so thoroughly defend the right to bear arms.

When riding the Massachusetts Turnpike into Boston, a 252-foot billboard in the back of Fenway Park greets drivers with this ominous message in newspaper type print: "We have your President and Congress-NRA." In years past, the billboard featured the pictures of 15 children who were killed by gun violence accompanied by text boasting "You're More Likely to Live Here" because the state has some of the most effective gun laws in the country. The proliferation of guns and the ease of purchasing such tools of death must be curtailed if the United States ever hopes to see its disgusting gun violence rate fall below its current, barbarous level.

In the United Kingdom, home to just under 60 million people, there were only 247 shootings in the three-year period from 2001 to 2004. By a point of comparison, California with its population of over 36 million witnessed the deaths by gun of 3,323 people in 2004. On a larger scale, the United States, with just five times as many people as the UK, suffered 11,346 homicides by firearm in 2005 alone. The UK has banned the possession of handguns since a 17-person massacre in 1997. Even after the Columbine massacre and the spate of school shootings that have occurred since, Congress and the president did not renew the ban on assault weapons. You cannot own a simple handgun in the United Kingdom, but in the United States, if you want to walk around with the world famous AK-47, no one's stopping you.

What about the 32 people who were killed just last year at Virginia Tech? In the aftermath, the university was slammed for missing the warning signs and the police department was criticized for its response. What of the killer's ability to arm himself with the guns he used in the attack? Congress and President Bush have only considered forbidding the purchase of guns by people demonstrating a mental disability.

Even after … the spate of school shootings that have occurred since, Congress and the president did not renew the ban on assault weapons.

In addition to school shootings, guns play an important role in inner-city violence. When asked about stemming gang violence at the Republican CNN/YouTube Debate Mitt Romney stressed the importance of having stable two-parent families. Obviously, a single parent may not be around his or her family as much as is desired, but there are other factors at play.

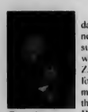
While ignoring poverty and the availability of guns, Romney immediately blamed the rate of out-of-wedlock births in the African-American community. He then suggested that he will focus on providing an education to inner-city youths to prepare them for the "jobs of tomorrow." These are only some of the possible solutions to one of the most important questions of our time: how do we erase violence from inner-cities?

Preventing the flow of guns into urban areas is one of the keys to reducing homicides. Rudy Giuliani was booed for arguing in favor of certain federal restrictions on the purchase of guns. His critics should let the statistics speak for themselves. While he was mayor, shootings dropped by 74 percent and homicides by 67 percent. He credited this to the enforcement of gun laws. Really, what is more important: People having guns to hunt and show off, or reducing the likelihood of horrible school massacres and brutal gangland killings?

There is a scene in The West Wing in which members of Jed Bartlett's staff argue with a Republican over guns. One staffer notes that the men who had just recently attacked the president, "bought guns, loaded them, drove from Wheeling to Roslyn and, until they fired them, they had yet to commit a crime." The too many perpetrators of even more school massacres bought guns legally or used their parents' guns.

The kids on the corners of inner cities have guns made available because of the enormous illegal gun industry in this country. How long will it take for reality to set in? The Second Amendment allows guns for the militia. Drug dealers do not make up the militia. Hunters are not the militia. The mafia is not the militia. We have a militia; it's called the National Guard. The next president of the United States must acknowledge the truth and force through Congress a real gun law – one that makes cities and schools safer.

Nick Milano writes on Thursdays. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu.



LIKE WHAT YOU SEE? DON'T LIKE WHAT YOU SEE?

You can make a difference!

The Daily Collegian Editorial/Opinion section needs a new assistant web editor for next year. Web/HTML skills are a plus, but not necessary; writing/editing skills important.

Inquire at editorial@dailycollegian.com

The President's no prophet

Brad Leibowitz

You know, that Nostradamus was a smart guy. It's never been found, but I am sure that somewhere in his writings, he predicted that ZZ-Top would look to him for facial hair inspiration. The man knew a thing or two about the future.

His predictions are famous and infamous. People say he predicted the burning of London, the rise of Napoleon, Hitler and the Apollo moon landings. But that's the thing – people say.

In jest, when we look back at Nostradamus looking forward to us, we see a mystic – a man with a very long beard, a belief in the end of the world and an addiction to opium. Like most seers back in the day, the man was a chronic drug user who needed to be high to see into the future.

Again, this makes him very smart. Again, the guy knew a thing or two. Regardless if you believe in Nostradamus and his predictions, this much is certain: No matter what any of his drug induced visions meant or mean, he was smart enough to know that he himself had no grasp of their meaning.

We look back at Nostradamus looking forward to us, we see a mystic; a man with a very long beard.

By this fact alone, he wrote his visions in the language of a mystic – someone who saw something, but wasn't sure of their meaning or how to properly present it.

He was smart enough to write down his visions through a method which obscured their meanings called "Virgilianized" syntax. It was a combination of word games, poetics and the mixture of languages such as Latin, Italian, Greek and Provençal.

He did this for three reasons. One, he was a religious fanatic who thought "The Book of Revelations" was poetic in its ciphered insanity and end-of-the-world predictions. Two, he was afraid of religious kick-back. Three, he knew that if he made people debate the meaning of his writings, nothing could ever be proven truthful or false and thus, he held no accountability to wrong predictions, yet fame to correct ones.

Essentially, he, like Socrates, knew enough to know that he knew nothing – much unlike the men and women who are currently in power.

I would love to be able to make a joke about the ineptness of President Bush and his presiding cabinet of flunkies and fools, but I can't. Their track record in the realm of predictions is just that bad.

A few months ago while at a press conference, Bush, when asked about his legacy said time will treat him kindly. As if, at present, we just don't see his genius. He then added, "The jury is still out on our first president." Sorry, but no. George, he's on the "one." Our capitol is named for him and his face is on Mt. Rushmore. Verdict's in.

You've all heard this one: "If we leave, the terrorists will follow us home." It could just be me, but when a bad house guest leaves my home, I crack open a beer, grill up a big steak and try avoiding that person for at least a year.

"Hurricane Katrina won't be that bad." Um, no.

"Sadam has weapons of mass destruction." Um, no.

"Gay marriage is a slippery slope to beastiality." Yeah, because once two men are betrothed their next urge is to fool around with their cat. Again, um, no.

"Global warming is a natural happening." Um, no.

But my favorite prediction the Bush people have made comes every time something bad happens. It happened after September 11th, it happened after Hurricane Katrina and it will happen again. This prediction being when Bush says, "I will pray for their well-being."

Praying is a prediction or a hope that God will fix the problem. Sorry, Mr. President, but praying is only as good as saying, "I almost did something." In every prediction the Bush people have made they have been dead wrong. Absolutely dead wrong. No matter the prediction, no matter who made it, dead wrong.

To add insult to injury, every time Bush makes a prediction in one of his language mangling speeches, he always walks off the stage with that smirk on his face as if to say, "Nailed it." Sadly, he and his cronies seem to be the only ones laughing at their incompetence and false predictions.

Well, come to think of it, the only prediction they have proven right is one Republicans make during every presidential race: "Government is inefficient."

In the end, if Bush were more like Nostradamus, you couldn't complain and nor could I. Nostradamus was a drug-using religious nut who spoke in broken patterns and ciphered terms and thus, no one took him seriously. Sh*t.

Brad Leibowitz writes on Thursdays. He can be reached at bleibowi@student.umass.edu.

Ideas or the lack of them

C.A. Chase

As I tripped down the stairwell during Sunday's library fire-alarm bizarrity, I thought about what books should be saved, whether most students – rather than saving the precious literature – would opt to save the vending machine with the NO-DOZ ($1.30, D5) and Jolt gum ($1.60, I4) instead.

You can read the books in the W.E.B. DuBois Library dryly, for class and for requirements, or you can use them and desperately need them, to think – and learn how to think. Thought is something to be earned. People complain about exercising their right to free speech but most don't utilize the most inalienable right of all: the right to free thought.

In higher education, by sifting through all of the raw material out there, you are somehow expected to declare a major, to set down a precursor to a career, the working week, the rat race.

But when you commit yourself to viewing the world through a certain prism, you lose yourself. Even within one particular field of thought or study, your focus is on a facet. You could, for example, focus on the practical side of political science or on the theoretical side, that is, political theory. Then there are subdivisions within those subdivisions.

Looking closer at the practical Political side, you could tackle it from a public health perspective, or an economic perspective. Different facets of thought and life are infinitely parsed down, until you find yourself more and more trapped.

Does committing one's self to a field of thought, even to your own personal theories tied together with a major, equal spiritual ossification? How do you go about keeping the doors to intellectual exploration open, while still being able to function? When do you become comfortable with a tentative theory of life, of ideas, and let the wound heal over, and let the doors close, allow yourself to accept an ideology?

The next time the library threatens to implode or spontaneously combust, we should consider which approach to learning we want to salvage. Whether or not you are comfortable with declaring a major, with settling down with at least a semi-pragmatic four-year academic plan throws light on the different types of thought that a fairly intelligent student could take. You could be more utilitarian and channel your energies towards graduate or professional school; or you could explore – try to understand yourself and the world, and your relation to both.

Obviously, as a semi-undecided student I am going to side more with the latter, but I deeply understand – and resent – the attraction and validity of the former. I suppose you could try to combine both, but on this topic, any flashes of insight or intelligence serve to only illuminate the failings of my mind.

So what books should be saved? What ideas are valid, what mode of thought is appropriate, when is casting-off and categorizing sheer naiveté, and when is it pragmatic, and are they mutually exclusive? To what degree is looking to others for ways of articulating my life a crutch, stupid, or wrong? There's always something lost in the gap between thought and articulation, between speech and writing, but then, any idea or work of art is outside of the world and lives by its own laws.

The next time the library threatens to implode or spontaneously combust, we should consider which approach to learning we want to salvage.

Everything is a picture, and pictures skew. It is tempting to conflate existence with the Platonic existence of ideas in books: somehow that's more real than the small-talk and parties of real people. More interested in what you can know? Once you're in that deep, it's murky, you're lost, but that's where it really matters. It's the existential dilemma of how do you relate to the world. Only through books? How is it that I can understand books better than someone that I could actually talk to?

People will frustrate because it's the exterior that is always presented, when it's the interior that matters the most. That's the only way you can express yourself holistically. Knowing that you can trust that the unnameable and unknowable is really there, and that what you can't express, and what other writers have outlined and sketched, is common to other human beings.

I'm not catching up with my thoughts, or my thoughts are not catching up with me, but its all there in books, not in course catalogues or on SPIRE.

Next to the study carrels with "studying sux" etched onto a desk are stacks containing the squabbling inner real-politics of the mind, of the body, of the soul, interests dustily and dutifully examined, labeled, and put away to the sixth floor, seventh floor, 20th floor, 21st floor, packed away and forgotten for the weekend. Where is the intersection? How can you dovetail the squalidness, the love at first sight, the hung-over winks and nudges into a major? All of these academic arenas are artificial approaches to something that we can never understand, part of something that we will die trying to – or not trying to.

What is the library? All it is bricks and mortar. What can a cement shell say to me about love and life?

What are the books? All they are is ink and paper. Sometimes they say something, but whoever said it is gone and away, they don't know if they have caused you pleasure or caused you pain. The author has deserted you. What are you? All you are is, well, never mind.

All I can say is that when I see everyone else with their majors and their minors and certificates and modes of thought, and gen-eds, getting by and getting high, in biology, in physics, in political science and philosophy, I think of those signs you see sometimes, that say, "If you lived here you'd be home already."

C.A. Chase writes on Thursdays. She can be reached at cchase@student.umass.edu.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

Should the U.S. continue aid to Pakistan?

For stability's sake

Brad DeFlumeri

In contemplating a strategic decision of national security-level importance, one must consider first and foremost all the possible outcomes and impacts resulting from prospective courses of actions.

More specifically, in the world's current infinitely complex geopolitical landscape, the United States must make many hard decisions about important issues where, at times, all of the possible choices seem undesirable or even unacceptable. However, at the National Command Authority level of the President and Secretary of Defense the luxury of criticizing and shielding oneself from criticism in return – so often a perk of misguided liberals in the media and academia – is never an option.

These two key officials, along with the Secretary of State, must determine where and how the United States will respond to a multitude of worldwide contingencies. Should they make the wrong choice insofar as supporting the wrong movements or politicians in specific politically important nations, our national security could be at risk. But again, what must always be foremost on the minds of our political and military leadership is the safety and security of the United States.

As coarse as it sounds, our national leadership has a compelling obligation to care more about the security of our own citizens.

When weighed against all other factors, this one key consideration cannot be sacrificed in favor of other considerations.

In the case of our response to the recent political crisis in Pakistan, our national security and the protection of American interests and goals abroad are simply more important than the triumph of democracy or legitimate Constitution rule in this enormously consequential Middle Eastern nation. These factors, additionally, must also outweigh the victory of humanitarian legitimacy in Pakistan.

That is, as coarse as it sounds, our national leadership has a compelling obligation to care more about the security of our own citizens than about the mistreatment of political dissidents half a world away. This is the case not because we should view Pakistanis as any less deserving of democracy and its advantages as Americans – they most assuredly would benefit from an infusion of democracy.

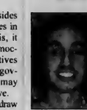
Rather, continuing to support Pakistan's military in light of General Pervez Musharraf's declaration of martial law, is a necessary strategic consideration because Musharraf has been a loyal and effective opponent of Al-Qaeda and other rogue Islamic extremist elements within his country. Indeed, as many liberals cry out in horror at the suspension of the Pakistani constitution and demand that the U.S. immediately cut off all aid to the country, I pose to them the question of why cutting off aid to Pakistan would help either of our causes in the country: leveraging military and political forces to help us fight anti-U.S terrorists and setting Pakistan on a path toward a sustainable democracy that continues to repel terrorism.

My argument is a nuanced one that does not assert the notion that Musharraf is a magnificent asset of the United States. To the contrary, as Daniel Twiling of the Weekly Standard wrote last month, "Musharraf has managed to rob Pakistan's most respected institution – its army- of its political legitimacy."

However, without a strong and believable assurance that pro-democracy leader and former Pakistani Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto would actually ascend to national leadership should we withhold aid to Musharraf's army then I am left wholly unconvinced that withholding or eliminating aid is an advantageous course of action in our fight against Islamic extremism in that part of the world.

For all the recent attempts by Musharraf to trample all over democratic energy, he has unquestionably been an ally in our coordinated struggle against Islamic extremism. And it is precisely because of this that we need to choose sides wisely as the political outcomes in Pakistan are registered. That is, it may be true – as many pro-democracy spreading neoconservatives are arguing – that a coalition government that includes Bhutto may be the most palatable alternative.

However, we must only withdraw our support for Musharraf and his pro-America army if we are immutably certain that our interests in the form of firstly fighting terrorists in the region, and secondly democratizing Pakistan will be served.



In this high-stakes and all-too important game of geopolitical chess, many liberal commentators and activists are more than willing to sacrifice our national security and our long-term accomplishments in fighting Islamic extremism. These liberals see the slightest hint of humanitarian abuses in Pakistan and quickly forget or ignore the fact that for the last six years Musharraf has greatly helped in our efforts to destabilize Al-Qaeda. Islamist political forces abound in Pakistan and they are eager to assert their growing influence and dive into a political power vacuum should one open up.

And, what is even more concretely not in our interest is withholding aid from a nation currently ruled by one of our friends in the fight against extremism when we are unsure who – or what – would assume power should Musharraf be overthrown.

The devil you know is better than the devil you don't know, particularly when the unknown devil may be a pro-Al Qaeda group ruling a country in which Osama Bin Laden enjoys widespread popularity. Musharraf is far from Pol Pot and his stepping down as Army Chief, as he announced he would shortly after the declaration of martial law, is a step in the right direction. Aid to Pakistan should and will continue, hopefully for as long as liberals keep ignoring our national security in favor of anything and everything else – which is to say: indefinitely.

Brad DeFlumeri writes regularly on Mondays. He can be reached at bdeflume@student.umass.edu.

In the name of democracy

Bruce Lerner

Pakistan has been in the throes of a military dictatorship that has taken further illegitimate actions. Most specifically, this is in reference to General Musharraf's declaration of martial law and his abduction and jailing of dissidents.

Now, the question is: Should the United States continue aid to this supposedly valuable ally in the war on terror? Naturally, if the question is phrased in this fashion, as if Musharraf is the ally of the people of the U.S., then aid should continue to flow. If one looks at it from a different angle – and a historical one – perhaps another decision will be come to. Perhaps the question should not be "Should we?" but, "Is it even legal under international law?" This columnist attempts to stay away from the very narrow constraints that are often imposed on such discussions.

What is striking is that there have been studies documenting the fact that the worse a country's human rights violations are, the greater the aid the given country will receive from the U.S. Certainly, upon quick inspection, this is true for nations such as Egypt, Colombia, Israel, Turkey and Indonesia. The pattern holds for Pakistan, where Musharraf has jailed opponents such as Benazir Bhutto, as well as judges and lawyers who question his authority. Bush has even the gall to call Pakistan a 'democracy' in classic Orwellian lingo. So, the real question is, then, who is it benefiting to give aid to Pakistan?

Do Americans want to support feudal relationships, destruction of independent media, and jailing of dissidents?

First, several assumptions have to be overturned in regards to mainstream politics in America. One cannot win a war on terror by committing terror. This is a simple fact, and one that the U.S. leadership cannot seem to understand.

Therefore, the legitimacy of the war on terror as a humanitarian goal is thrown out the window, especially as the illegal and bloody occupation of Iraq continues. There are, however, other, unstated goals of the U.S. government, goals that many people are not aware of, especially in the mainstream press. This current administration, not departing from former policies too much, is bent on global domination and the imposition of U.S. will on any state that can be crushed.

As Dahr Jamail mentioned in his talk on campus a few weeks ago, one can see a pattern of trying to encircle China and Russia with "Allies." For these hawks, it is imperative to give aid to Pakistan, as Musharraf will continue to carry out whatever policy the U.S. needs to have in that region, especially in regards to terrorizing Afghanistan further. It is probably of great benefit to the U.S. power elite to funnel U.S. taxpayer dollars to some monster in South Asia. For ordinary folks like UMass students, the aid is of absolutely no benefit whatsoever, and in fact is quite harmful, given the actions it fuels.

This means that the real goal of giving aid to Pakistan is to destroy democracy in Pakistan. One can read all about the contempt for democracy by the U.S. government in the report by the Trilateral Commission called, aptly, 'The Crisis of Democracy,' meaning that when there is too much democracy it is a crisis. If people like democracy and have morals, they should not give aid to Pakistan, and if they don't like democracy or international law, for that matter, then they should. It is pretty much that simple, and this model could be used for many other countries as well. The problem is that U.S. policies breed anger and resentment all across the globe because of their callousness and violence. Musharraf is not a democratic teddy bear, as Bush makes him seem like, but a violator of basic human principles of freedom.

It is very hard to put forth an argument for giving or not giving aid to Pakistan without talking about the role that Pakistan plays in U.S. global domination. Also, the other question is, do Americans want to support feudal relationships, destruction of independent media, and jailing of dissidents? If yes, then give more aid and again declare the U.S. immune from the standards that it subjects other countries such as Iran to, in regards to actions such as 'meddling.' As far as groups like Amnesty International are concerned, it is a flagrant violation of human rights to give aid to Pakistan, as the state is breeching international humanitarian law.

The longer U.S. administrations continue to purvey violence and support crackdowns on democracy, the more global problems everyone will encounter. Pakistan is a nuclear armed country and is in conflict with certain neighbors who are also nuclear-armed. This is not a laughing matter, as it could end in the death of the entire world. Naturally, the people of Pakistan know that the U.S. is supporting their brutal dictator, and they know exactly who to turn their anger against. To help the people of Pakistan is of course a noble goal, but it is quite obvious that Bush and his cronies have other matters on their minds.

Bruce Lerner writes regularly on Fridays. He can be reached at bvlerner@student.umass.edu.

KNOW OF A HOT-BUTTON ISSUE YOU'D LIKE TO SEE DEBATED TO HERE? EMAIL EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM. PLEASE INCLUDE "POINT-COUNTER-POINT" IN THE SUBJECT FIELD OF SUGGESTIONS.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

QUALITY CONCERN

Dear Editor

Re: "Land of the free, home of the woefully dumb," Ben Duffy, Ed/Op, Nov. 21, 2007

The Daily Collegian sunk to a new low in the Nov. 21, 2007 edition, cementing it as the premier embarrassment to our university and its students. Would any other editorial board allow an article with this paragraph, among others, to be published?

"But let's be hypothetical for a moment. Imagine having to pass a test in order to vote. Nothing too difficult, of course, only the things we should have learned in our primary education, but probably didn't learn because our teachers were too busy presenting "Heather has Two Mommies" and various other liberal pet causes."

A disgrace.

Scott Harris
UMass student

ELEVATOR ABUSE A REAL PROBLEM

Dear Editor:

Re: "Stairs and Elevators," Devon Courtney, Ed/Op, Nov. 27

Mr. Courtney's column about library elevator use is basically one long ignorant ramble. His ignorance comes from an utter lack of respect for the people who suffer from elevator abuse. Elevator abuse is a disease and it affects people everywhere. It's time I speak out.

The urge to take an elevator just one or two flights has been linked in humans to the hippo-neuronal receptor. For those affected, the urge to take an elevator is overwhelming. I am sure your first time was both amazing and fantastic. Your mother let you push the buttons, the door closed, and then it opened up on a different floor! For some of us, the constant repetition of this pleasurable stimulus is all that links us to sanity.

In the early 1990's elevator abuse was not frowned upon, it was praised. On the cartoon series "Tiny Toon Adventures," one episode was about a tiny ducky who had a fascination with the elevator. He walked into an elevator with his little white diaper on and began pressing the buttons while saying the famous lines: "Hllaluor goes up! Hllaluor goes down!" and "Wanna push the button!" The other passengers on the elevator were quite amused. We elevator abusers had it made back then.

I guess the point I am trying to make with the duck story is that people are in too much of a hurry these days. A long time ago everyone had to use stairs and before that, there were dinosaurs eating people. So now that this wonderful levitation device has been introduced to us and the dinosaurs are gone, we should just relax and go for the ride. Whether it be a ride to the top of an enjoyable 26-story library or just a ride to the second floor, no one should elevator-hate.

Elevator abuse has nothing to do with time-management or laziness. When I travel on an elevator, I like to push the shiny buttons and watch the big doors open. Elevators are a great place to read a book too. Try reading a book and traversing a staircase at the same time. Actually, don't do this. I can't afford a lawsuit.

Mr. Courtney's depiction of closing the elevator doors on an abuser's ankles is borderline sadistic. I last year in Kennedy dorm a boy attempted to ride the elevator one floor above him so he could play Magic: The Gathering with his friend. On the elevator, the boy was greeted by an elevator-hate group. They locked him in a dumpster, hit luckily he got out. These types of crimes happen all the time on campuses with tall buildings and ignorant elevator-hate groups.

I hope that the good students of UMass have become a little less ignorant by reading this letter. Students like Mr. Courtney should not be the only voices heard on this important topic. Please do your own research on this subject. Google "elevator" or just try riding an elevator.

Costa Tsolirides
UMass student

DID IMUS SOMETHING?

Dear Editor:

Re: "Imus makes his way back onto the radio after famous scandal," Arts & Living, Dec. 4 2007

Are you serious, people? We just can't get over this Imus thing, can we? It is unbelievable to me that this has been brought up as an issue of race in the first place, but again? I thought it was only fodder for late-night monologues, but I guess I was mistaken.

First of all, let's look at the phrase "nappy-headed hos." Wow. That's a real doozy. I'd probably ignite a national crisis too if I were called that. Since I have never actually heard the term "nappy-headed," it is meaningless to me. It sounds like something an eight-year-old girl would say to me in the third grade. Then we get to "ho." Are you kidding, people? In a society where middle schoolers grind against each others crotches to lyrics like "Superman that ho" (referring to an explicit sex act) and "I lit the sweat drip down my balls, all these bitches crawl," we, as intelligent, grown citizens are offended by the word "ho?"

And I don't even understand how this could possibly be a race issue. Sure, it was directed toward a black woman (yes I said black, I don't believe in euphemisms) there were still white women in the club. I've heard that word directed toward all races, and I just don't see how that word specifically is racist. So am I saying it was an Ok thing to say? Of course not, it wasn't nice. But it doesn't justify bringing up irrelevant issues.

Well, maybe this isn't even about a specific word, but rather, prominent racism in the country today. Of course, when referring to language, the "N-word" always comes up. This word in particular confuses me. If it is so offensive, and has such a racist history, why do black people continue to use it, directing it toward each other no less? I understand that it means brother, but then just use the word "brother" and there won't be a problem. How hypocritical can people be? That's like being taught that money doesn't buy you happiness as a kid and then going home and watching rap music videos where the rappers have money pouring out of his backs and women and cars everywhere and…oh wait. Bad example.

My favorite quote of all has to be the comment made by Brian Monroe, the former president of the National Association of Black Journalists, saying that with his comments, Imus "lost touch with all that is decent and honorable in America." Maybe I've been missing out, but when was the last "decent and honorable" act we participated in as a country? Was invading Iraq "decent and honorable?" Is not providing free health care to citizens "decent and honorable?" Maybe that's us then: just decent. Not great, not horrible, just plain decent. We have a decent president who does a decent job of leading the decently intelligent and informed citizens, who are decently nice to each other every once in a while. And when there's a problem, specifically involving race, we blame the decently rich white guy. Well, if that's the case, maybe I'll move to another country that's "hella pimp" instead. That means "good…right?

Chris Rio
UMass student

RUSHED JUDGMENT ON TRAVEL WOES

Dear Editor

To make travel home easier at holiday time, in their letter published on Nov. 29 Shawn Trivette suggests some calendar and final exam changes. Trivette's suggestions are less appealing than they seem at first glance.

Trivette suggests making Columbus Day or Veterans Day a class day. Years ago that was proposed. I'm told it brought forth vigorous protests from organized Italian-American groups and veterans' groups, and even legislative counter-initiatives. Today, I suspect, such groups would feel no less "dissed" by the proposal. Even if the proposal were now politically feasible, it would be far better to add a class day to our woefully short semester rather than replace a day subtracted at semester's end.

Trivette also proposes to eliminate alternate-chair seating for finals so as to require fewer rooms and thereby allow a more compact final exam period. While some courses may seat students adjacently for mid-semester exams, I don't recommend that practice. In any case, the number of rooms available for finals is not the sole factor (although here I speculate) a more compact final exam period would give students less breathing time between exams, and it would create more conflicts for students, perhaps even forcing a significant number to stick around longer at the end of finals to take make-ups.

Murray Eisenberg
Mathematics and Statistics Department

The Daily Collegian encourages reader responses. Letters to the editor should be no longer than 350 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com.

'Importance of Being Earnest' hits campus

UMass theater department brings Wilde classic to stage

By Kevin Koczwara
Collegian Staff

Oscar Wilde's masterpiece "The Importance of Being Ernest" is set to start a run by the University of Massachusetts Theatre Department with the first performance tonight at 8 p.m. in the Rand Theater.

Oscar Wilde's play is about a young man named Jack who is not as he always seems. Jack is a land owner who has many servants and employees who depend on his farm and the jobs that come with the farm so they can make money to support themselves and their families. Jack is also the guardian of a young girl Cecily Cardew.

Cardew was left for Jack's custody after his adopted father dies, who is her grandfather. Jack is in charge of all of Cardew's finances and raising her. At the beginning of the play she is 18-years-old and dependent on Jack's farm and business.

Jack is the consonant good man but he has an alter ego that is believed to be his brother. The alter ego is Ernest. Ernest is a man who is not a good man in the sense of the word during the Victorian era. He goes off to London and voyages into the world that is far from the country life that Jack lives. Jack tells everyone that Ernest is his brother when it is in fact Jack himself who is venturing off to the city to go on the adventures.

Ernest becomes infatuated with Gwendolen Fairfax, a girl from London. She eventually falls for him but not Jack. The play revolves around the controversy of who is Ernest exactly and who is Jack. Jack, being adopted as a baby, has no idea to his true identity or past and only knows that he was found, taken-in and raised. The play centers on this and the love stories between Ernest and Gwendolen.

There is also the love story between Cecily and Algernon Moncrieff, Jack's cousin, who is also believed to be Jack's brother Ernest. The two relationships hit a head, fall apart and come together with a story of identity and person.

Wilde uses the play to bring out the ideas of persona and person. It's a play as much about who we are as who we want to be. It's a play about being "Ernest" or "earnest," meaning serious in intention –and that we as human beings cannot always be serious. The play also touches on the ideas of marriage and the moral dilemmas each person faces daily.

The play is part of the UMass Theatre Department and the second play being performed by them this year after "The Pillowman." It will be followed by "Ondine," which will begin at the end of February.

The show runs from Dec. 6 through Dec. 8. It will also be shown on Dec 13 and Dec. 14 at 8 p.m. A student matinee will be on Dec. 12 at 10 a.m. and a final showing on Dec. 15 at 2 p.m. All performances will take place at the Rand Theatre in the Fine Arts Center.

The cost to see "The Importance of Being Ernest" is $12 for general public and $6 for students. There are also group rates ($20 or more people) and the cost of each ticket is $5.

To purchase tickets for "The Importance of Being Ernest" call 413-545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

Kevin Koczwara can be reached at kkoczwar@student.umass.edu.

The Oscar Wilde masterpiece "The Importance of Being Earnest" begins tonight at the Rand Theater. Megan Buskirk (left) as Gwendolen and Leland Kam (right) as Jack in the UMass production of Earnest.

Alaska In Winter mesh style for new CD

Latest project mix electronic, urban sound

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Correspondent

Alaska In Winter's new record Dance Party In The Balkans' achieves a fresh sound through numerous, seemingly-clashing, contemporary reference points. A delicate, pastoral feel permeates through the electronic, urban songs' backbones.

With the exception of two tracks, the album's songs hover between two-and-a-half and three-and-a-half minutes in length, facilitating quick listens, though many songs do not seem fully consummated. The key reference is that of Zach Condon (Beirut), though the album's success hardly relies on his vocal, trumpet and ukulele as benefactor. Other contributors include Heather Trost of A Hawk And A Hacksaw and viola from Rosina Roybal of Kanye West's concert symphony, an idea which, oddly enough, fits into the record's aforementioned urban sensibility.

The brain behind the operation is Brandon Bethancourt, a student who recorded in Alaska and touched up the album in his native New Mexico. The songs reside somewhere between Arcade Fire's church organ leanings in "Lovely Lovely Love" and the dainty piano of Slowdive's more pristine moments in the first track "The Homeless And The Hummingbirds." Vocal effects and harmonies in the title track and "Rain on Every Weekend" echo a less mechanical Black Moth Super Rainbow, whose vocoder often times turns completely robotic.

Alaska In Winter, however, hover between natural landscapes and artificial rhythms. Horns, strings and organs are paired up with electronic drum sounds and pitch corrections normally associated with mainstream hip-hop/R&B artists Akon or T-Pain on "Lovely Lovely Love" to create an entirely new experience. Spanish-sounding horns ring out in "Your Red Dress (Wedding Song At Cemetery)" and "The Beautiful Burial Flowers We Will Never See," separating themselves from the piano's refined monotony and the angelic grandeur of the chorus.

One stand-out track comes in the form of the curiously titled "Balkan Low Rider Anthem." The backbeat suggests top-40 hip-hop, while strings weep and a short piano phrase is repeated throughout, before dissolving into funereal minimalism.

Another shining moment is found in the second-to-last song, during which the track's title "Don't Read Dostoyevsky" is repeated ethereally like an extraterrestrial command.

Vocals and drums stutter throughout the record, channeling Dntel (Postal Service) and his glitchy production. Interestingly enough, this record's pop triumph is carried out with no guitars whatsoever. Eastern European influences are more prominent, with the horns and strings taking over as the main instrumentation. This album could very well exist by itself, apart from any "featuring Zach Condon of Beirut" labels. The electronic backings shatter exact comparisons.

The album's only real weakness may lie in the shortness of most songs. Due to this limitation, songs are oftentimes merely foreplay, as opposed to ending in glorious culmination. Songs teeter on the verge of an explosion, though never quite feel their way toward a climactic breakthrough. Weaknesses aside, "Dance Party In The Balkans" is brimming with excitement. One never knows when the natural will give way to the artificial. This record leans toward a meshing of styles, a theme which continues to dominate modern music.

Ian Nelson can be reached at inelson@student.umass.edu

Brandon Bethancourt is the brain child behind Alaska In Winter and their first album "Dance Party in the Balkans."

DANCE PARTY IN THE BALKANS

ALASKA IN WINTER

NORMAN RECORDS

3.5/5

Jazz duo bring new sound to Amherst

By Bruce Lerner
Collegian Staff

Tonight at 7:30 p.m., Saxophonist Lena Bloch will perform with pianist Doug Abrams, at the Nacul Center Gallery located at 592 Main St. in Amherst.

The duo will be performing original pieces that have never been played before, in the style of contemporary jazz that has traditional influences. The aim of the performance is to engage in creative improvisation.

Each musician will focus on the interaction of the duo and will listen to the other empathically. Bloch and Abrams feed off each other to truly express the music to the best extent possible.

Bloch, a Russian musician, has been involved in music since she was six-years-old, first playing piano, then guitar, and finally picking up the sax after hearing John Coltrane's "A Love Supreme." Starting as a self-taught musician, Bloch attended the Rubin Academy of Music and Dance in Israel. While there, Bloch won an award and also performed at the Red Sea Jazz festival.

Cologne, Germany was Bloch's next stop, where she went to study at the jazz department of Cologne Conservatory, one of the most prestigious schools in the world, graduating Cum Laude. She learned from musicians such as Lee Konitz, Adam Kolker, Salvatore Macchia, and Keith Copeland.

Bloch's past projects include groups such as: the Steve Reid Quartet, Ambassadors of Light, Vishnu Wood Safari East, Pyramid, Inner Fires with Frances De Ribaupierre, Free-O with Claire Arenius and Dave Shapiro, and Lena Bloch-Doug Abrams-George Kaye.

Bloch has released two albums, "Live in Europe," with the Steve Reid Quartet, and "Inner Fires." As a European musician, and an experienced traveler, she hopes to share here experiences musically and to broaden the lines of communication with her sound.

Swing is what Bloch specializes in. Staying away from the fusion and rock influences that have been prevalent in previous years, Bloch prefers the sounds of classics such as Lester Young, John Coltrane and Sonny Rollins.

Despite having a prestigious education in jazz music, it is apparent that Bloch plays with tremendous passion.

Doug Abrams is an experienced Pianist who has a Master of Music in piano performance, classical, and jazz from the well known Manhattan School of Music. Melody and empathy are two of Abrams's specialties. His influences include, but are not limited to, Bill Evans, McCoy Tyner, Chick Corea and Hampton Hawes.

Abrams regularly performs at the Evolution Cafe in Northampton with his trio including Alec Derian and Alex Snyderman.

Jazz is traditionally an African-American music, combining European melodies and harmonies with African rhythms. Over the years, jazz has expanded to include a majority of non-African-American players and has traveled throughout the entire world.

The appeal of jazz is quite strong, as many different types of people find solace in its capacity for evoking deep feelings. The duo continues this tradition of expressing feeling through melody, rhythm, and harmony on Thursday.

Importantly, although jazz is traditionally an African-American music, Europe has influenced jazz as well.

Simply put, cultures that express themselves through this particular idiom always add something new to the pot. With a sensitive piano player such as Doug, the duo really brings a capacity to appreciate the international sounds that people in distant lands understand, while still maintaining an air of familiarity that listeners in the U.S. can relate to.

Bloch has teached the saxophone to aspiring players. She has taught for 16 years in Israel, Germany, and the United States at the University of Massachusetts.

Tickets are $10 for non-students and $5 for students.

Bruce Lerner can be reached at blerner@student.umass.edu

Lena Bloch, along with Doug Abrams, will be performing Jazz as a sax/piano duo tonight at the Nacul Center Gallery in Amherst.

Abundant selection at subterranean eatery

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Correspondent

Beneath the Student Union, unbeknownst to much of the University of Massachusetts populace, lies a bustling daytime eatery called The Hatch. At one point or another in its long history at UMass, this historic location has played host to a bar, bowling alley, comedy club, and popular dinner spot. These days, it's primarily a lunch operation, designed to handle travelers from the ever-busy Campus Center eateries.

Open Monday to Friday between the hours of 11 a.m. and 2 p.m., this underground food court accepts YCMP. It's a popular stop among upperclassmen and faculty, and for a good reason. It serves up a variety of ethnic foods and college staples in its six individual stations.

Kettle Cuisine: Commonly referred to as "the bread bowl" by its customers, the first lunch counter to greet oncoming diners is the Kettle Cuisine soup kitchen. The soup, served up in hollowed Italian bread or regular cups, is restaurant-quality. In fact, Kettle Cuisine is one of the top restaurant suppliers of soup in the United States.

Although the eponymous flour-based serving dishes are more popular, they are more expensive and actually hold less soup than the regular paper cups. The daily soup are always good and the clam chowder is genuine New England, but the chili is fairly bland and a bit disappointing.

Taj Mahal: Arguably the hidden gem of this much-over-looked café, the Taj Mahal serves up surprisingly authentic Indian cuisine. Stewed curry chicken and spicy beef are served over traditional steamed white rice for a hearty meal that is sure to satisfy fans of Indian cooking.

The Pita Pit: Nearly identical to its two sister locations on campus, the Pita Pit located in The Hatch proudly displays its slogan of "Healthy Eating. Fresh Thinking." The healthy aspect, however, is up to the customer, as options range from vegetarian hummus to Philly Steak. Anyone who has been to the Pita Pits in Worcester Dining Commons, Southwest Café or the Campus Center will be familiar with the on-the-go wrap menu.

Zane's Famous Noodle Bowl: One of the most popular stations in The Hatch, Zane's sits under a massive blue sign which simply reads "noodles" and enjoys a fanatical flowing among a small core of soup enthusiasts.

A multiethnic stream of students can always be found lining up to enjoy a made-to-order bowl of either egg or rice noodles in steaming hot broth. In the Vietnamese tradition of pho, the bowls come in chicken, beef, and fish varieties. Customers dictate what meats and veggies go into the concoction and can add their own spices once they get the dish (caution: red chili sauce is hotter than it looks).

Tamales: For those looking to get the most grub for their YCMP swipes, Tamales offers the biggest portions around. Burritos wrapped in various flavored tortillas are stuffed with your choice of meat, as well as beans, rice, and other typical faux-Mexican fare. The "taco salad" is much the same thing, but served in a crispy, deep-fried flour shell.

Sunset Strips: Easily the busiest establishment in The Hatch, Sunset Strips offers a plethora of chicken items. Chicken sandwiches, strips, and salads are served up alongside the ever-popular buffalo chicken wrap, all available with spicy waffle fries. Although it is decidedly less cultured than many of the other outlets, Sunset Strips is convenient for the diner on the go, and their high turnover rate ensures that every item is fresh out of the deep-fryer.

Next time you decide to stop by the crowded Blue Wall for a slice of lukewarm pizza, head down the hall for something a little fresher and a little different. Head for the subterranean watering hole known as The Hatch.

Andrew Sheridan can be reached at asheridan@umass.edu

Disney reinvents old classic in new movie

Latest film delivers a sweet and frothy time

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

Once upon a Friday ago, mere mortals ventured out of their respective castles to brave a new spin on a familiar tale in the movie "Enchanted." The result – a sugary-sweet fairytale about a cartoon princess who falls down a well and into the heart of New York City – is one of the most entertaining films of the season.

Paramount to the film's success is the inclusion of actress Amy Adams as the film's princess de jour. A mainstay on the Hollywood scene for several years now, her Oscar-nominated turn in 2005's "Junebug" was supposed to be the film that turned her into a household name. It wasn't. But if the scores of little girls carrying around Princess Giselle dolls are any indication, Adams' luck is about to change.

The film begins by treating its audience to a sight almost long forgotten, that of a hand drawn animation sequence. It's a nostalgic touch due to bring even the most repressed Disney fan inside to tears.

The animation gives life to the kingdom of Andalasia, where Giselle, a young maiden of the forest a la Snow White, bides her time in preparation of true love's kiss. In typical fairytale form, her true love is none other than the adorably clueless Prince Edward (James Marsden). Swooping in on his mighty steed to rescue Giselle from the clutches of an ogre, the two quickly embark on a collision course towards happily-ever-after.

Unfortunately for the loving pair, the Prince comes with in-laws. And in the case of Giselle, her future stepmother in-law (Susan Sarandon) doesn't take too kindly to female competition. Disguising herself as a wretched hag, she diverts the bride to be from her impending nuptials to the sight of a magic wishing well. As she peers down the other side, the hag delivers a blow that sends Giselle – and the audience – veering straight into reality.

Hexed into the bowels of New York's sewer system, it doesn't take Giselle long to realize that she isn't in Andalasia anymore. Even if her poufy wedding dress wasn't a dead giveaway, it's clear she's a newcomer to the area. As she fumbles and stumbles, and tries to reach home by climbing up to a neon castle perched near the sky, she attracts the attention of Robert (Patrick Dempsey) and his young daughter, Morgan (Rachel Covey).

Robert takes sympathy on the disheveled maiden in distress, although for reasons never quite told. His girlfriend (Idina Menzel) is less sensitive to her plight, but lets it slide. Meanwhile, with the help of her new human friends, Giselle makes herself at home, weaving contemporary dresses for herself out of Robert's curtains, and inviting the local wildlife (rats, roaches, and other unsavory sorts) over to help with the chores.

Soon enough, Giselle isn't the only Andalasian in town. Following her into the world of live action is the Prince, an annoying chipmunk buddy named Pip, a manservant, Nathaniel (Timothy Spall), and eventually even the evil Queen herself.

As the Prince scours the city in an attempt to rescue Giselle from unseen horrors, the Queen and Nathaniel conspire to keep her there indefinitely.

Yet little are they aware that the journey has wrought changes in Giselle; no longer stuck in a one-dimensional plane of thought, the princess of old has transformed into a full-fledged city girl. For the Prince especially, this could be a problem.

Director Kevin Lima's spin on the classic fairytale owes much to the kitschy script of screenwriter Bill Kelley. Kelley, whose past works include "Blast from the Past" and the 2007 film "Premonition," successfully turns the most infamous of fairytale clichés and caricatures into punch lines. By cross referencing fairytale notions of happily-ever-after with the cynicism of the modern world, Kelley gives the film some bite.

It doesn't hurt that the cast recruited is in top form. Marsden, relegated to second string in "Superman Returns" and "X-Men 3: The Last Stand," pulls out all the stops in a comedic performance as worthy as Adams' own. With these two playing the parts of fairytale figures come to life, the film truly hits pay dirt.

The script does falter occasionally, failing in some respects to fully exploit the comedic material available. It goes where it ought to, but it could go further.

Simultaneously, the film has difficulty deciding what kind of comedy it is. Is it a family-friendly affair, as the cartoon aspect and friendly animal sidekick would suggest, or a romantic comedy? Is it just a full blown satire? The indecision leads to a finale that tries to accomplish all, but with meager results.

"Enchanted" is a sugar rush, with the crash hitting before the credits roll. Still, those in the market for a sweet and frothy flick need look no further for their holiday needs than this enchanted adventure.

Shayna Murphy can be reached at skmurphy@student.umass.edu

ENCHANTED

STARRING: AMY ADAMS, PATRICK DEMPSEY, JAMES MARSDEN AND SUSAN SARANDON

B

"Enchanted" boasts an impressive cast including Patrick Dempsey, James Marsden and Susan Sarandon in the roles of New Yorker Robert, clueless Prince Edward and the evil step-mother respectively.

Amy Adams plays the young maiden of the forest Giselle in Disney's newest movie "Encanted." The film revolves around fairy tale characters who find themselves teleported into the real world in New York City.

WRITE FOR ARTS

Email:

arts@dailycollegian.com

BOSTON BARTENDERS SCHOOL - W. SPFLD

Special Student Rate

Local National Placement

Includes Certification

1-800-357-3210

BostonBartender.com

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!

Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP

POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL

• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates

Potter's Collision Repair

at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.potterauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Collision Repair & Glass Replacement

Campus and Community Coalition
Working to Reduce High Risk Drinking
www.umass.edu/ccc

We got the facts from you.

9 out of 10 UMass students know how to have fun without alcohol. Are you one of them?

Based on a 2006 CCC survey of UMass students

Domino's Pizza

AMHERST / HADLEY
413-256-8911
Rt 9 Across From Stop & Shop
Store Hours:
Open 11am-4am Thurs.-Sat.
11am -3am Sun.-Wed
Mt. Holyoke Location: 593-9500

MY WINGS OF CHICKEN BUCKET
10 Buffalo Wings Plus Cheesy Bread
$9.99

THREE BREADSTICKS
Any 3 Bread Side Items
$9.99

PIZZA & CHICKEN
MEDIUM 1-Topping Pizza & 6pc Order Of Buffalo Wings OR 2-Topping Pizza & 4pc Order Of Buffalo Wings $12.99
LARGE
$15.99

555/777 DEAL
Three 1-Topping Pizzas
MEDIUM
$5.55
LARGE
$7.77

SALAD & BREAD
Any Large Salad, Breadsticks & a Bottle of Water
$7.99

FAMILY MEAL DEAL
1 Large 2-Topping Pizza, Choice of Salad & an Order of Buffalo Wings
$18.99

WE ACCEPT OCMP
Find Out More About autismspeaks.org

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS

WINE SALE 10% OFF
6 BOTTLES* OF WINE EVERYDAY!!
MIX & MATCH
*REGULAR PRICED 750 ML BOTTLES OF VARIETAL WINES

GIFT SETS ARRIVING DAILY!!! GIFT BASKETS MADE TO ORDER!!!
GIFT CARDS AVAILABLE!!! DON'T FORGET TO TREAT YOURSELF!!!

Liquor

Hennessy Cognac X.O.	750 ml	$119.99	Grand Marnier Cordon Rouge	750 ml	$32.99
Grand Marnier 100yr Centenaire	750 ml	$99.99	Hennessy Cognac V.S.	750 ml	$28.99
Crown Royal Cask 16 Whiskey	750 ml	$89.99	Jack Daniels Tennessee Whiskey	1.0 liter	$28.99
Glenmorangie Burgundy Wood Finish	750 ml	$49.99	Belvedere Pure Vodka	750 ml	$26.99
Jose Cuervo Platino Tequila	750 ml	$49.99	10 Cane Rum	750 ml	$26.99
Glenmorangie Madiera Wood Finish	750 ml	$49.99	Chopin Polish Vodka	750 ml	$26.99
Ardbeg 10yr Islay Single Malt Scotch	750 ml	$42.99	Jim Beam Bourbon	1.75 liter	$20.99
Tanqueray Gin	1.75 liter	$34.99	Bailey's Original Irish Cream	750 ml	$20.99
Hennessy Cognac V.S.O.P.	750 ml	$34.99	Bailey's Flavored Irish Cream*	750 ml	$20.99
			*Mint Chocolate and Caramel
			Jose Cuervo Flavored Tequila*	1.0 liter	$20.99
			*Citrico Tropical Orange
Meyer's Platinum Rum	1.75 liter	$19.99
Pinnacle Vodka	1.75 liter	$19.99
Godiva Caramel and Mocha Liqueur	750 ml	$19.99
Jose Cuervo Gold	750 ml	$18.99
Sobieski Polish Vodka	1.75 liter	$16.99
Captain Morgan Spiced Rum	750 ml	$14.99
Captain Morgan Parrot Bay Rum*	750 ml	$14.99
*Including Coconut, Mango, Pineapple, Passion Fruit
Smirnoff Vodka 80	750 ml	$10.99
Smirnoff Twist Flavored Vodka*	750 ml	$10.99
*Including Strawberry Watermelon Raspberry, Black Cherry

Sale 12/06 - 12/13 333 Russell St., Rte. 9, Hadley, MA
584-8174 • Mon.-Sat. 9AM-11PM • Sun. Noon-11PM

DEC 6 2007

DEC 6 2007

Funny not on strike

Writers turn to youtube, blogs and myspace for creative outlet

By Sam McManis
Mc Clatchy Newspapers

The thing about writers is, they just can't stop. Addictive personalities, one and all.

And TV writers are no different.

You'd think that, a month into the Writers Guild of America strike, they would be too busy protesting and fretting over making the mortgage payment. You'd think that that dreaded affliction, "writer's block," would take hold and lead them straight from the picket line to the neighborhood watering hole.

Wrong.

Paid or gratis, these men and women just keep writing. On blogs. On YouTube. On newspaper op-ed pages. On MySpace and Facebook. And, yeah, on their own protest signs, with such creative slogans as: "Winter of our Dissed Content." Yes, we know it's resulted in loads of good PR for the writers, who resumed talks with producers Tuesday.

Though, as striking writer John Ridley quipped last week on National Public Radio, "How hard is it to win a PR war against giant, soulless corporations? I think even Michael Vick could do that."

Besides, these writers have got wit. In spades. May as well use it.

Such wit may not be making a whit of difference at the bargaining table. But in the court of public opinion, it certainly helps the ink-stained wretches. A recent Pepperdine University survey found that 64 percent of people polled support the writers, four percent the producers.

As the writing staff of "Late Show With David Letterman" states on its Web site, lateshowwritersonstrike.com: "We are not making light of this situation. One way to get people to pay attention to the strike and its issues is through humor."

The remaining 32 percent, perhaps, just want the two sides to quit bickering. However, if the strike is prolonged and new prime-time episodes run out, leading to a steady diet of reruns and reality shows, the majority may turn on the strikers.

Too soon to tell.

What we do know is that watching the strike videos, which are all over YouTube and other sharing sites, is the next best thing to watching TV. We're still waiting for the producers to, er, produce some YouTube gems.

Actually, some of the writers' videos are funnier than stale late-night reruns.

Here's a rundown:

The hilarious

"Not The Daily Show, With Some Writer": The premise of this video is as comforting as it is familiar: "The Daily Show" writers put a card table on the picket line in New York and placed Jason Ross (one of the show's 14 writers) behind it with what looks like a script. Hilarity ensues for the most part.

It's strange, hearing Jon Stewart's intonation coming out of Ross' mouth. Ross even feigns credulity, a la Stewart, when he speaks the corporate line and then is confronted with soundbites from corporate bosses who seemingly discredit it.

Example:

Ross: "Media conglomerates say it's too soon to put a dollar value on internet content."

(A man holding a cue card whispers in Ross' ear.)

Ross: "What's that? Viacom is suing YouTube for a billion dollars for using its content online? I can't believe it, unless there's some 'Daily Show' montage."

Then, a real clip is shown of Viacom chairman Sumner Redstone, crowing about how lucrative Viacom's digital properties will be.

The topper: A cameo by "Daily Show" correspondent/actor John Oliver (you know, the British guy) as "Viacom President John J. Viacom Jr. III," redolent in top hat, tails and spats.

The merely funny

"Videologblog: Writers Strike," by writers of "The Colbert Report": Here we get a faux smarmy studio mogul making a plea to the public about how the writers' demands are unreasonable.

Some of the best lines:

"Writers control the media. It's time our voices are heard."

"Because of them, my son had to settle for a non-endangered birthday tiger."

"It's impossible to make money off the Internet. And, if you don't believe me, Google it."

The clever

"A World Without Writers": A montage video showing how important screenwriters and punchy dialogue are to a movie. Iconic still pictures are flashed, followed by wordy, badly rewritten iconic lines.

Such as:

Jack Nicholson in "A Few Good Men": "The truth? You'd be extremely surprised if I told you the truth."

Instead of the line "Badges, we don't need no stinkin' badges" from "Treasures of the Sierra Madre," we get: "Unfortunately, I mislaid my official ID."

Rhett Butler's classic retort in "Gone With the Wind": "Whatever, Scarlett."

The strident

"Voices of Uncertainty": This video, posted on the WGA-sponsored site www.unitedhollywood.com, uses clips from studio heads, such as Viacom's Redstone, Fox's Rupert Murdoch, NBC's Jeff Silverman and CBS' Les Moonves, bragging about the worth of their online ventures, then juxtaposes that with snarky graphics.

Example: After Redstone says "Viacom will double its revenues this year from digital," these words flash on the screen: "Writers will also double their revenues from digital, from $0.00 to $0.00."

The wistful

"The Office' is Closed": Writers and a few actors from NBC's hit show "The Office" ad-lib on the picket line, lamenting their plight. The cinema verite routine is typical "Office" banter – pointed, yet somehow sweet.

At one point, a writer on a walkie-talkie laments: "I'd very badly like to punch up this routine, but I'm on strike. Over."

The best conceit is when the writers ape the NBC/General Electric lawyers, who have called Webisodes of "The Office" "promotions" rather than "episodes." They also lament how one of their online-only "Office" shows won a daytime Emmy award, but that NBC suits "wouldn't pony up the 28 bucks" to pay for the statue.

The one-joke gems

"Hollywood Writers Strike Day 72": This one is a 30-second spot with five corporate suits around a table, trying to come up with movie ideas. "You have 15 minutes to wow me. Ideas?" Awkward silence, followed by stumbling and mumbling. Then it cuts to the intentionally grammatically incorrect graphic: "Hollywood Don't Need Writers."

The historical perspective

"Same Old Story": The guild trotted out 93-year-old writer Irving Brecher, who penned "Meet Me in St. Louis" and many Marx Brothers pictures, to provide the long view about how he believes writers have been exploited.

"All we'd like is a little squirt of milk," he says, voice shaking. "They won't even give a drop."

The desperate

Bob Kushell, a writer for the sitcom "Samantha Who?," enlists the show's star, Christina Applegate, to portray his put-upon wife who really, really wants her writer hubby to get back to work.

The strangely appealing

"Speechless" with Sean Penn: An arty black-and-white close-up of actor Sean Penn, who speaks earnestly into the camera for 45 seconds. Only his mike is turned off, so we can't hear him.

The silence speaks volumes.

With the writers strike still in full swing, the writers for shows like "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart" and "The Office" have turned to outlets like youtube and created humorous strike videos to gather support.

College can be stressful. Paying for it doesn't have to be.

1.866.245.6179 | sovereignbank.com/forstudents

Sovereign Bank

You have enough on your plate. You shouldn't have to worry about getting the money you need for educational expenses. With a Sovereign Direct Student Loan, you get a smart way to pay for school when federal loans just aren't enough. For more information, call 1-866-245-6179 or visit sovereignbank.com/forstudents.

Member FDIC © 2007 Sovereign Bank. Sovereign Bank and its logo are registered trademarks of Sovereign Bank or its affiliates or subsidiaries in the United States and other countries. Sovereign Direct Student Loans are funded by Sovereign Bank and are not guaranteed by the federal government and not classified as federal loans.

Goalie battle at Rudd

SOCCER from page 12

ward Mark DeSantis said. "We've beaten some of the top teams in the country."

Yet UMass coach Sam Koch knows that it won't be a simple task to solve the Flame defense.

"We've been trying to work a lot on ball movement and understand that we're facing a high-pressure defense," he said. "For us to be successful, we'll have to be able to move the ball quickly."

And the similarities don't end there. Like the Minutemen, UIC had a slow start to the season and entered its conference tournament with only eight wins.

Once the postseason began, the Flames began playing their best soccer. UIC defeated Saint Louis, Northwestern and Creighton – all on the road and it hasn't played a home game in nearly a month.

Historically, the Maroon and White are a strong defensive team. But the Minutemen offensive has allowed the team to advance deep into postseason play.

"Defensively, I think we're doing a good job of winning balls in areas where we're allowing our offense to get the ball a little earlier," Koch said. "The frontrunners are also playing well together. Mark DeSantis is really playing well right now and he has been able to work with Hogan up top. I think they're creating better chances for each other.

After a rather forgettable start, senior captain Kenny Cook cites his team's maturation as the reason for its ability to venture this far into the postseason.

"We have a young team and it takes a while for guys to understand our style of play," he said. "I think as the season went on, our lineup became set, we got a better chemistry and guys have been able to understand what's expected of them."

But even as the team continues to defeat every team in its path, the Minutemen have not forgotten what can happen if a team becomes too comfortable. Koch cites his team's loss to Temple in its last regular season match as evidence of what can happen.

"We were reminded again [against Temple] that anybody can beat anybody any given day," Koch said. "And there isn't anyone on this team that takes that for granted."

The match-up also features two of the best goalkeepers in the country. UIC goalie Jovan Bubonja ranks for in goals-against average in the nation. He's allowed only 12 goals in competition for a 0.50 GAA.

Meanwhile, redshirt junior goalie Zack Simmons is not far behind with a 0.77 goals-against average.

By virtue of a higher RPI than the Flames, UMass earned the right to host its third postseason game. But regardless on the outcome, Sunday's game will be the last at Rudd Field for the 2007 season. Yet, it remains to be seen if the Minutemen will be able to practice in North Carolina next week.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

The Minutemen hope to avoid hitting the turf as much as possible this weekend. Last Sunday's game against CCSU was delayed one hour due to potentially dangerous field conditions at Rudd Field.

Freshman midfielder Ben Arikian plays an important role on the Minuteman offense, starting all but one game. He is also one of the team's primary corner kick takers and has assisted on six goals this season.

Freshman pair add offensive flavor to Minuteman midfield

FRESHMEN from page 12

"Ben Arikian is a very hard worker and works his tail off all over the field. But there are some times that he can't go running into a corner to win a ball," senior captain Kenny Cook said. "Sometimes we need him to hold his position as a center midfielder. It's the same for Stu Amick on the outside mid. We need him staying wide and running up and down the outside of the field. He needs to get on line and serve balls across. Those are those guys' roles. And it takes a while for guys to get a feel for how you fit into our system. They did a great job of understanding what's expected of them."

The early season struggles didn't surprise many, especially Arikian. The physical and emotional demands of Division I differ greatly from that of the high school and club levels. And the more important games became, the more obvious it becomes who is ready to play college soccer and who isn't.

"I definitely wasn't ready for the physical aspect of it. I always thought that I was a lot stronger than I am until I actually started playing in the conference games," Arikian said. "When we started the season, everyone goes in not as full-on tackles. As soon as [Atlantic 10] play started, it got harder. Once the A-10 tournament started, it got even harder. And now, I've never played in a level of soccer like this."

But the Minutemen kicks this duo would contribute sooner rather than later. Hogan remembers instances during preseason training where both players displayed a confidence on the ball that impressed both players and coaches. Arikian knew he had the ability to compete at this level, as well. His teammates listed confidence as one of his strongest traits at a pregame conference, mixed in with several telling laughs.

Amick was a little less sure of his impact as a rookie. Without the Bissett injury, he may have never gotten the chance to excel. But the first chance he got, he took. And the Minutemen haven't stopped winning since. Down 2-0 to Harvard, Amick slid the ball past the Crimson goalkeeper. Arikian immediately sprinted into the net, grabbed the ball and placed the ball on the center circle to quickly build on the momentum.

Time ran out on the Minutemen that day, as the Crimson won 2-1. But they have gone 13-3-2 since and the play of their freshman midfielders is among the main reasons for the success.

"I felt like we weren't really pumped for games [early in the season]," Amick said. "I don't know how much effect my goal had on the team, but it let us see that we had a lot of potential. Had we not made some mistakes in that game, we could've gone on to beat Harvard, who was ranked pretty high in the country at that point."

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Skating ability will be a factor

HOCKEY EAST from page 12

ly as anyone, but its 13.4 percent conversion rate places the Wildcats seventh in Hockey East. Their struggles are something of an anomaly. Aside from their fluid puck movement, their top lines posses all the pieces of a successful unit.

Last season, the Minutemen won the season series during the regular season. A win at the Whittemore Center in the beginning of October for UMass paired with a home-and-home split at the end of January turned the set in UMass' favor. But the win at the TD Bankonorth Garden on March 16 made everyone forget about that quickly.

For the first time in 2007, the Minutemen welcome an opponent to the Mullins Center who plays on a surface larger than their own. Both teams rely on their skating ability to beat opponents, but the Wildcats hold the advantage in size. Most of their forwards stand at least six feet tall, and vanRiemsdyk is the largest at 6-foot-3. The talented rookie was the second overall pick in the 2007 NHL Draft by the Philadelphia Flyers after spending time in the United States National Team Developmental Program.

UMass's next three Hockey East games actually come against the Wildcats. After Saturday's match, UMass has a 21-day layoff before a New Year's Tournament in Tampa, Fla. The next two games are on Jan. 11 and 12, the first of the two is at the Mullins Center.

The Wildcats are coming off a split with UMass Lowell last weekend. After winning the first game with the River Hawks to push their winning streak to three games, UNH dropped the second, 3-2.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

For more coverage of UMass Athletics, check out:

dailycollegiansports.blogspot.com

FRUSTRATED? PUZZLED? DO YOU HAVE:

A grade dispute?

Teacher, roomate or job concerns?

Billing problems?

...or any other University related problems?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP

(confidentially, of course)

Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community

823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

JAMAICA SPRING BREAK 2008

JAM FEST SPRING BREAK '08

THE JAMAICA MUSIC FESTIVAL FEATURING ARTISTS SUCH AS: SHAGGY, BEENIE MAN, and much, much more!

Concert Dates: March 3rd, 10th, 17th & 24th

Book Your Trip Today! Contact:

1.800.426.7710 1.800.648.4849

JAMAICA

The Office of Jewish Affairs, Center for Student Development, and Office of Student Affairs & Campus Life extend our holiday greetings to Jewish students, faculty, and staff.

Happy Hanukkah!

The Hebrew word chanukah means "dedication." The eight-day festival of Hanukkah commemorates the victory of the Maccabees, who fought against the religious persecution of the Jews, and the rededication of the Temple in Jerusalem. To remind us of the miracle of the oil which burned for eight days, when there was only enough oil for one day, it is customary to eat fried foods such as potato pancakes (latkes) or doughnuts.

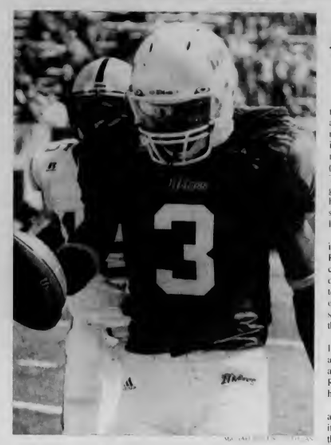
Hanukkah began the evening of Tuesday, December 4th and ends the evening of Wednesday, December 12th

UMASS AMHERST

For more information about Jewish holidays, visit our website at umass.edu/jewish or call the Office of Jewish Affairs at 413.545.9642

SKYPLEX

18 Plus College Night
Thursdays
The #1 Place to Party!



3 Different Rooms/3 DJ's spinning the best in Top 40, Dance, House and Select Mashup

THE ULTIMATE HOT BODY CONTEST
EVERY WEEK!
$100 Best Male $100 Best Female

The Hottest 18 Plus SATURDAY NIGHT Dance Party

PROMOTORS WANTED FOR 10+ SATURDAYS! TO SIGNUP VISIT: WWW.SKYPLEX.US

SkyPlex 10 Stearns Sq. Downtown Springfield 413.827.9000 www.SkyPlex.us

Senior wide receiver Rasheed Rancher capped his final season at U Mass with a 1,000-yard receiving campaign, including nine touchdowns.

A season in review for UMass

RICE from page 12

throw his headset to the ground as he did throw it up in the air, made a couple of spectacular plays in both playoff games and did for moments resemble Randy Moss (especially with the dreadlocks). Though, the announcers for the SIU game on NESN overplayed that so badly that they appeared ready to ship Rancher's highlight reel to Bill Belichick for next April's draft.

However, the always exciting and even more unpredictable Rancher had some key drops that cost his team. Brown has admitted on several occasions that consistency is the biggest – if perhaps the only – drawback in Rancher's talent set, and it was one that really hurt the UMass offense.

Without the graduated Brandon London, Coen was expected to send a lot of balls to senior J.J. Moore and athletic tight end Brad Listorti, with Rancher providing the big plays as he did all season.

However, as Listorti missed game after game with a lower back injury, it was clear Moore was going to be the only reliable target for Coen as the season progressed. And when Moore was covered? Coen went to Rancher time and again. Sometimes you got a first down, sometimes you got a punt, but certainly, you never knew.

Listorti was one of Coen's favorite targets last season and was arguably the Minutemen's best athlete entering the season. He is also the one player regarded to have any chance of being drafted to the National Football League.

His senior season was a sad story, as the former Rutgers transfer did not get to see the field until the final game of the year. Though it ended on a classy note, as Brown gave Listorti one last chance with the Minutemen's final touchdown of 2007, a 4-yard pass from Coen that closed the gap to seven in the fourth quarter.

However, there's nothing a team can do about graduated players and injured ones, but the signs were still there early on. At one point, UMass was a field goal away from tying the score with Boston College, at one point ranked No. 2 in the country in the Bowl Subdivision. A month later, Brown calls for consecutive passing plays in the fourth quarter of a game against Rhode Island that was played in a hurricane.

Rancher was not on the field for much of the latter part of that game, likely due to a couple of drops he made in the first half. Regardless, Coen – whose lingering knee injury certainly did not help either – was slogging through the mud against a team that was winless in the Colonial Athletic Association, throwing passes to Victor Cruz, the team's sixth wide receiver who dropped two more passes with the clock winding down.

A game that was winnable until the final play, the defense produced three safeties just to get the game to overtime, but the offense couldn't hold up its end of the bargain.

Against the Salukis, whose only loss this season was to Northern Iowa, the undefeated No. 1 seed in the playoffs, the Minutemen's shortcomings were exposed early, leading to a 14-point halftime deficit and a 21-point hole in the third quarter.

SIU has a powerful offense, and you knew they were going to score points, even against a staunch UMass defense. However, when pushed up against the ropes, the Minuteman offense just didn't seem to have enough to climb all the way back.

To get within a touchdown was impressive, but it was clear Coen needed more reliable targets to throw to. Slot receiver Michael Omar had a career game with 10 receptions, and it seemed like his quarterback trusted him more than he trusted Rancher in that game.

Other than Rancher's 71-yard touchdown reception in the first quarter – which you almost come to expect from him at this point – the 6-foot-5 receiver caught four passes for 72 yards. Certainly not bad, but not enough in a game that important.

The running game suffered no setbacks this season, as Matt Lawrence picked up easily where the departed Steve Baylark left off. And it may have even been improved with the development of Tony Nelson who actually had a higher yards-per-carry average than Lawrence (5.3 to 5.0).

In the end, this UMass squad, as good as it was, simply didn't have the same amount of talent as the 2006 version that almost brought a title home.

It's certain Coach Brown's guys will be a front runner at the beginning of next season with Liam Coen ready for his senior season and Tony Nelson a junior with a couple years of running behind him.

But after a disappointing loss to the Salukis, next year is the best the Minutemen can hope for.

Jeremy Rice is the Collegian's sports editor. He can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

Northeastern unbeaten in last 7

HOCKEY EAST from page 12

a 2-1 advantage. Their lead, however, would be short-lived. Just 44 seconds later sophomore Ben Smith scored a goal, tying the game at 2.

Smith scored another goal at the 12:32 mark of the second period to give BC a 3-2 lead. Smith would cap off his night with a third goal in the third period, giving him a hat trick for the game. BU's Matt Gilroy scored a power-play goal with 13:48 left in the game, cutting BC's lead to a single goal, but the Terriers were unable to score in the final minutes of the game.

BU outshot BC 44-25 in the game and 35-12 in the final two periods of the contest, but were unable to capitalize. BU goalie Brett Bennett allowed four goals on 25 shots, BC goalie John Muse stopped 41 of 44 shots on goal, enough to improve his record to 5-4-5.

MAINE STRUGGLES

Maine, normally a powerhouse in Hockey East is undergoing one of its worst starts in recent memory. Its struggles can immediately be attributed to the lack of offensive firepower it has displayed this season, scoring only 26 goals, while allowing 33 goals against. The Black Bears have scored two or fewer goals in eight out of the 12 games this season, and have a 0-6-2 record in these games.

As of today, the Black Bears are 4-6-2 overall and 2-4-2 in conference play. Both non-conference victories came against the 3-12-1 Mercyhurst College. Their two conference victories, strangely enough, came against current Hockey East leader Northeastern, both games being played at NU. Since beating the Huskies, though, the Black Bears have gone 0-4-2, losing to Providence (twice) and fellow seller dweller Merrimack (twice), while tying with Vermont and BC. Maine still has time to right the ship, but the road will not be easy. Still having to play another game against Northeastern, three games with Massachusetts and UMass Lowell, and two games against BC, BU, UNH and Vermont, the road will not be an easy one for Maine.

TOP 20 PARTY

Hockey East has four teams represented in this week's USCHO.com/CSTV Men's Top 20 poll. New Hampshire led the way earning a No. 8 ranking, falling two spots from last week's No. 6 ranking. UMass is ranked No. 11, Northeastern jumped four spots to No. 12, and Boston College rose two spots to No. 17.

Miami (Ohio) was once again No. 1, followed by Colorado College, Michigan, Denver, and Michigan State round out the top five ... The Minutemen are undefeated this season when scoring more than three goals (6-0-2) and are undefeated at the Mullins Center (3-0-3). The Minutemen have not lost at home in the last 12 games (8-0-4) dating back to last season ... UNH has captured at least two points in all five Hockey East weekends this season ... Northeastern's seven-game unbeaten streak (6-0-1) is tied with Notre Dame for the longest current streak in the country. The last time Northeastern had a longer unbeaten streak was an eight-game stretch from Nov. 22 to Dec. 28, 1997 in which they went 6-0-2 ... BU sophomore Brian Strait and freshman Colin Wilson have been named to the 2008 U.S. National Junior Team. Strait is a former captain of the U.S. National Under-18 Team. UNH freshman James vanRiemsdyk also has been named to the team and will join them when the team plays in the 2008 International Ice Hockey Federation World Junior Championship Dec. 26-Jan. 5 in Czech Republic.

Rick Eddleston can be reached at reddlest@student.umass.edu

Junior goaltender Ben Bishop ranks seventh in Hockey East with a goals-against average of 2.48. However, Maine has struggled to meet its success of last season, as the team currently sits last in the conference.

HOCKEY EAST STANDINGS

	Hockey East				Overall
Team	W	L	T	Pts.	W	L	T
1 Northeastern	6	3	1	13	7	4	1
2 Boston College	4	3	4	12	5	4	5
3 New Hampshire	5	3	1	11	7	2	1
4 Massachusetts	3	2	4	10	6	3	5
Providence	4	3	2	10	5	6	2
UMass Lowell	3	4	4	10	5	4	4
7 Vermont	3	3	2	8	3	6	2
8 Boston University	3	5	1	7	4	9	2
Merrimack	3	6	1	7	6	6	2
10 Maine	2	4	2	6	4	6	2

THE FINE ARTS CENTER
LET'S GO GLOBE HOPPING!
CENTER SERIES 07-08 SEASON
Cherish the Ladies – A Celtic Christmas Celebration
Wednesday, December 12, 7:30 pm, Concert Hall
With a spectacular blend of instrumental talents: beautiful vocals, captivating arrangements and stunning step dancing, this powerhouse group combines all facets of Celtic culture in an immensely warm, humorous and entertaining event.
$35, $25, $15. Five College Students $15, $10, $7. Youth 17 and under $12
Sponsored by Coca Cola, Cooley Dickinson Hospital/Easthampton Savings Bank, The Rainbow Times and 93.9 The River

UMass Amherst FINE ARTS CENTER
For tickets call 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMASS or go online to www.fineartscenter.com!

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM
- Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
- More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
- Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
- Post unlimited online listings
- Little to no spam
- By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

This is the photo for this week's caption contest. Submit funny, witty, or absurd captions at www.dailycollegian.com/caption Knock yourself out.

			8	5	1			4
4							7
	5	9			3
6		7	3
8	9						5	3
					8	4		9
			4			8	2
	7							6
3			2	8	6

ACROSS
1 Simon and Tsongas
6 Eject violently
10 Confront
14 Knock over
15 Poet Teasdale
16 Fighting force
17 Actress Davis
18 Interpret
20 Branch
22 ___ Park, CO
23 Approx.
26 Chip off the old block
28 Does a slow burn
32 Exclude
36 "___ the Horrible"
37 Complains
39 Eye of peacock or TV
40 Xanadu' grp
41 German river
42 Actress Solhern
43 Oil cartel
44 Of Capitol Hill
47 Chances
49 Expression of feeling
50 Trick into difficulty
52 Part of AT&T
53 Zany Caesar
54 Gather
57 Aerial RBIs
59 Poisonous fungus
63 Separated
67 Opposed to
68 Angelic aura
69 "West Side Story" heroine
70 Ralph Lauren's company
71 Distort
72 Preceding in order

DOWN
1 Thicksell dog
2 Simian
3 Function
4 Olin or Horne
5 "... and Hutch"
6 Mach+ jet
7 Remove rind
8 Historic period
9 Has a yen for 10 Groundless signal
11 Coach Parseghian
12 G&W fan's channel
13 Hurricane center
19 Actor Green
21 Grinding teeth
23 Flow back
24 Ignore the alarm
25 Most lofty
27 Receivers
29 Torrents
30 "The Rose Tattoo" Oscar winner
31 Ni-seals-available letters
33 Alarm choice
34 Polish
35 Lessee
38 Small sofa
43 Mixed mineral
45 Aladdin's possession
46 Inc. kin
48 Neill and Watterson
51 Hiking trails
55 Water bed well
56 Cobbler's concern
58 Practice punching
59 Barnicorn spigot
60 John's Yoko
61 NL Braves
62 Sad
64 Jackie's second
65 Spanish river
66 Viscous liquid

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

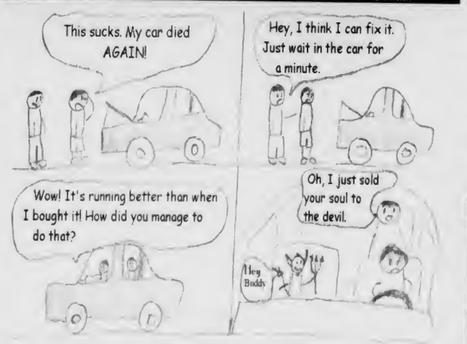
amherst cinema
FRI 12/7-THU 12/13
OPENS FRIDAY 12/7

"YOU DON'T WATCH THIS MOVIE, YOU LIVE IT" - Peter Travers, Rolling Stone
CONTROL
1:30 4:00 6:30 9:15
NO COUNTRY FOR OLD MEN 1:45 4:15 7:00 9:45
INTO THE WILD 1:30 6:45
LARS AND THE REAL GIRL 4:30 9:30
28 AMITY ST. DOWNTOWN AMHERST
413-253-2547
www.AmherstCinema.org

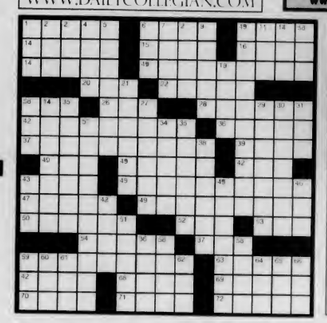
QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I don't love studying. I hate studying. I like learning. Learning is beautiful."

-Natalie Portman



KILGORE BY KNOX YEOMAN



LAST DITCH EFFORT BY JOHN KROES

LEAVE YOU SHOES ON: I HATE THE SMELL OF FEET BY THOMAS FRINK

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You may have very nice hair but that's no excuse to never come to campus or to any of your classes.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Make sure to thank your bus driver today for rescuing your lazy keister from a long walk on a cold day.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Buy a box of clementines and perfect the art of peeling them in one piece.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Squeeze every last drop of brain you have into your final assignments. Metaphorically of course.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Try to count the number of Ugg boot footprints left in the frozen tundra of UMass.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Complete your image with a magnificent pair of grillz and a beret.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Some people get lucky, you were just born that way.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
You're looking at life from only one angle, like a flounder of sorts. Get off the ocean floor and fish for a new vantage point.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Steal the power cable to your neighbor's computer and watch them act confused for the next hour.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Every fetus starts as a female and everyone starts as a baby. Ergo, women and children first.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
It is inappropriate and gluttonous to hoard more than 10 full grab and go meals at a time.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
You better start carrying some tissues around with you because your nose is leaking worse than the roof in Herter.

Chicago Pizzaria
Free Delivery!
PIZZA - CALZONES - SUBS - WRAPS
SALADS - PASTA - DINNERS
RIBS - SEAFOOD - SLICES
PARTY SIZE PIZZA NOW AVAILABLE!
Now Hiring
Counter/Cashiers and Drivers
HOURS
Sun-Wed: 3pm-2am
Thurs-Sat: 3pm-3am
Order For DELIVERY or PICK-UP
(413) 549-6073
150 Fearing Street
Next to Patterson Dorm
Amherst, MA 01002

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price. Best Hotels. 781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net

APT. 4 RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

INFORMATION

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Put up Posters! For professional promotion company in towns and colleges. $7-$10/hr. 20 hrs Monday-Wednesday. 10 hrs must be during daylight business hrs. Looking for outdoorsy, rugged person w/car, references, daily email and voicemail. Must be coordinated, timely, organized, have excellent attention to detail, and communication with employer. 413-259-1111 box 2 postering@artspromo.org

EMPLOYMENT

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab. phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline Free Pregnancy test. 233 N Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic. 577-5101.

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St. Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

INFORMATION

"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips Low prices guaranteed Group discounts for 8+ Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips. Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations 800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

INFORMATION

EGG DONORS WANTED Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Must be a non-smoking female between the ages of 21 and 32. For more info, please visit our website at www.robertnicholsesq.com or contact Julie at 781-551-0600

DEC 6 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Then there were eight

College Cup birth at stake as UM looks to make history

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The 2007 season has been about exceeding expectations for the Massachusetts men's soccer team. The team's goal evolved from qualifying for the Atlantic 10 Tournament to winning every postseason opponent it has faced.

Coming off an 8-8-3 season in 2005, the A-10 coaches picked UMass to finish 10th in the conference at the beginning of the year.

Now, with a six-game winning streak, the Minutemen have a chance to advance further than any other squad in program history. Illinois-Chicago is the only team that stands in the way of NCAA College Cup, the soccer equivalent of the basketball's Final Four.

Should UMass win, it will play one week from today in the national semifinal at host school North Carolina State.

The theme of the Maroon and White's most impressive wins this season is its ability to shut down prolific offenses. Whether it was Saint Louis, Harvard or Boston College, the Minutemen very rarely allowed teams to score more than two goals.

Now UMass will have a chance to prove it can defeat a team with an exceptional defense. The squad that will invade Rudd Field this Sunday has a defense that's playing better than any the Minutemen have faced in the postseason. In fact, the Flames have yet to surrender a goal in their three-game NCAA Tournament run.

But that doesn't intimidate the UMass offense one bit.

"You have to respect that, but you go into every game like you do every other game," sophomore for-

See SOCCER on page 9

Senior captain Kenny Cook and the Minutemen take on Illinois-Chicago Sunday at Rudd Field. It will be the last opportunity for UMass to play at home, as the winner of this NCAA Tournament quarterfinal match moves on to the College Cup in Cary, North Carolina.

Freshmen Arikian and Amick boost Minutemen offensively

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch knew his team had to create more offense to improve upon 2006's mediocrity.

He initially switched the team's formation, opting for a 4-3-3 to increase his team's offensive width. But after a 2-4 start, something needed to change – and fast.

Freshman Ben Arikian started the season alongside Mike DeSantis in middle of the UMass midfield. But not until Koch shifted back to the 4-4-2 he used in seasons past and Stuart Amick began playing regularly, did the Minutemen take off.

Arikian provides UMass with an aggressive, versatile offensive threat. He also features as one of Koch's primary corner kick takers. Toward the end of the season, he developed the consistency he lacked early in 2007. In Sunday's victory over Central Connecticut, he assisted on his sixth goal of the season with a service off a corner. As he became more fluent in that role, the Minutemen became more dangerous on set pieces.

But the width Koch wanted when he put a third forward on the field isn't something Arikian can focus on from his position. Amick, however, is more than capable of quickly moving balls up the wing. The second goal UMass scored against CCSU came off a beautiful low cross from Amick on the left flank to sophomore Bryan Hogan in the box.

See FRESHMEN on page 9

Only three points out of first place, the Mass Attack looks to gain some ground with this weekend's tilt with New Hampshire. After this game, the Minutemen do not take the ice again for three weeks.

Wildcats visit Mullins

UMass looks to take advantage of struggling UNH power-play

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In an early-season clash of Hockey East rivals, the No. 11 Massachusetts hockey team hosts No. 8 New Hampshire Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

The Minutemen enter the weekend tied for fourth place with Providence and UMass Lowell, while the Wildcats are one spot in front of them and the only Hockey East team who holds a higher ranking in either national poll. Before the season, UNH was tied with Boston College as the preseason favorite to win the conference.

This is the first time UMass and UNH have met since the 2006-07 Hockey East Semifinals. The Wildcats upended the Minutemen, 3-2, in double-overtime on a Bobby Butler score.

And as different as UMass's team looks, the Wildcats experienced an equally drastic overhaul. Gone are Brett Hemingway, Jacob McFlicker, but freshman James van Riemsdyk and senior Matt Fornataro replaced the output of the departed UNH forwards. After leading Hockey East in offense last year, the Wildcats are back on top at 3.67 goals per game.

Probably the most important of the returnees is goaltender Kevin Regan. So far this season he is 6-3-0 with a 2.35 goals-against average. The Minutemen are well acquainted with Regan, especially sophomore winger Will Ortiz, who missed a breakaway on Regan in the first overtime of the Hockey East semifinal.

The Minutemen have also continued a trend, but on the other side of the puck. UMass's 2.14 goal-allowed per game is the best in Hockey East thanks to an effective core of defenseman led by seniors Mike Kostka and David Leaderer. But the emergence of freshman goaltender Paul Dainton factors into the stingy defense as well.

The UNH power-play unit, however, has not been as productive as expected. At even strength the Wildcats score as frequent-

See HOCKEY on page 9

Brown and Co. ran out of gas too soon

Jeremy Rice

Larry Warner's 64-yard touchdown run in the third quarter of the Massachusetts football team's NCAA quarterfinal game at Southern Illinois effectively ended the Minutemen's season. But it is not what doomed them from the start.

From Game 1 back on Sept. 1, a 10-30 win over Holy Cross, a game the then-third-ranked Maroon and White should have concluded late in the second quarter, you could see that this simply was not the same team that was a rough fourth quarter away from its second national championship in less than a decade.

UMass proved time and again that it deserved to be regarded with the best the Division I Football Championship Subdivision (still a little weird-sounding). But then again – and there always seemed to be that moment of hesitation after every performance – each great play or convincing win came with a hint of worry.

No team is perfect, sure, and any football coach at any level will tell you football games are played so you can see what to work on before the next one. But every 10-penalty performance, every game the Minutemen couldn't close out until the final minute, letting a lesser opponent hang around and every precisely-thrown Liam Coen pass on a third down that was dropped made you wonder how this team would fair against a really good team. You know, the type of team that ended their season in Carbondale, Ill.

We found when UMass trailed 34-13 in the third quarter and had to play catch-up like it hadn't had to do all season. The Minutemen made of a game of it, which was no surprise, but eventually fell by a touchdown.

And many of those same problems ended up coming back to haunt them in the end. UMass committed eight penalties for 71 yards and was just 6-for-13 on third down conversions.

Wide receiver Rasheed Rancher, who must have given UMass coach Don Brown as many reasons to

See RICE on page 10

Eagles dominate rivals in weekend pair

Maine continues to struggle, UNH keeps first place position

BY RICK EDELSTEIN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Boston College-Boston University rivalry was renewed this past weekend as the two schools played a home-and-home series. The Eagles won the first game of the weekend, 6-2, and followed that up with a 4-3 victory on Saturday. Junior forward Nathan Gerbe put in a seven-point (4 goals, 3 assists) effort in the two games, helping the Eagles past the Terriers and earning him COMERBK Player of the Week honors. With the sweep of BU, the Eagles moved to second place in Hockey East with 12 points, one point behind conference leader Northeastern.

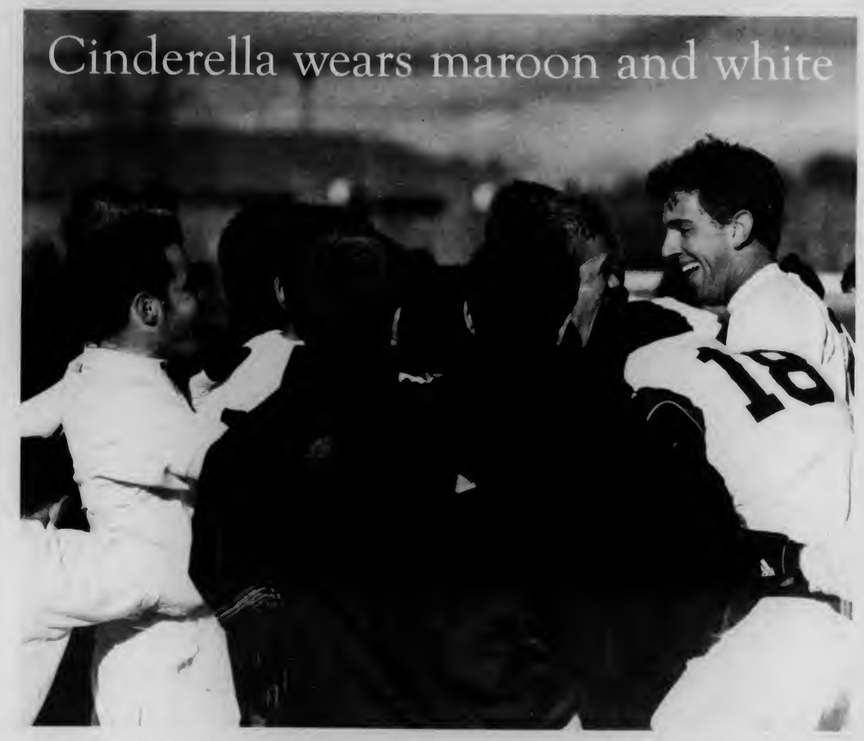
Hockey East

In the first game, BC dominated both sides of the puck on its way to an easy victory. The Eagles started off quickly in the game, scoring three goals in the first period. They scored two more in the second, and capped the night with a short-handed goal by Gerbe in the third, giving him a hat trick on the night. Gerbe also netted two goals in the first period for BC, senior Pat Gannon scored at the 6:32 mark of the first period, sophomore Ben Smith scored at the 4:48 mark of the second and junior Andrew Orpik netted a power-play goal at 18:45. BU junior Brandon Yip and senior Pete MacArthur both scored power-play goals for the Terriers in the loss.

Eagle freshman John Muse made 33 saves to earn his fourth win of the season. BU sophomore Brett Bennett made 25 saves on 30 shots for the Terriers. Senior Karson Gillespie relieved Bennett in the third, giving up one goal on nine shots.

The second game of the weekend was much closer. BC's Gerbe once again got the scoring started for the Eagles, scoring a short-handed goal at 2:06, giving BC a 1-0 lead. BU would respond with two power-play goals, one by freshman Kevin Shattenkirk at 9:56, and the second by Yip at 17:53, giving the Terriers

See HOCKEY EAST on page 10



One of Boston College's top forwards, junior Benn Ferriero has three assists on the season, including one against UMass last month.

COLLEGIAN
WEEKEND EDITION

FRI H:36 | SAT H:41 | SUN H:35 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2007

Cinderella wears maroon and white

The Massachusetts men's soccer team hopes to continue its magical run this season in a NCAA quarterfinal match against Illinois-Chicago Sunday at Rudd Field. The Minutemen [illegible] this year, the most wins in program history. The winner of Sunday's game will get a berth into the College Cup, to be played in Cary, N.C. beginning next Friday.

DEC 7 2007

DEC 7 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 65

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Staiger
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marissa Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Brian McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olasch
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenoff-Lake
WEB EDITOR James Hale
PHOTO EDITOR Evan Trnka
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS' ACADEMIC SEMESTERS BY THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING AS A NON-PROFIT CORPORATION. BUSINESS, EDITORIAL, AND ADVERTISING OFFICES ARE LOCATED IN THE COLLEGIAN BUILDING ON NORTH PLEASANT STREET. THE COLLEGIAN IS A MEMBER OF THE WORLD COLLEGIATE PRESS. PUBLISHED SINCE 1890. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED THE PACEMAKER AWARD FOR EXCELLENCE SEVEN TIMES SINCE JANUARY 1990. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 9 AM AND 5 PM.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nicholas Belanger

COPY EDITOR
Amber Vaillancourt

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

Lawyers march in Protest

By Paul Alexander
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Thousands of lawyers boycotted courts across Pakistan on Thursday, hoisting black flags and staging rallies to demand an end to emergency rule, and police blocked former Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif from marching to the heavily guarded home of the deposed Supreme Court chief justice.

Riot police turned out en masse and blocked the route to the official residence of Iftikhar Mohammed Chaudhry with concrete and steel barriers and barbed wire. Sharif led his followers to the blockade and addressed them briefly before they dispersed peacefully, defusing a potential showdown.

Chaudhry has been under house arrest since Nov. 3, when President Pervez Musharraf declared a state of emergency and dismissed most of the Supreme Court justices just before they were to rule on the validity of his October re-election by a parliament controlled by his supporters.

Musharraf has since stacked the court with loyalists, who promptly dismissed all complaints against the former general's election.

Representatives of his two biggest rivals, former prime ministers and longtime political foes Sharif and Benazir Bhutto — announced they had finished work on a list of 15 demands for the government to ensure their participation in Jan. 8 parliamentary elections.

They would not specify the demands, but they are expected to include restoration of an independent judiciary and the constitution, as well as creation of a neutral caretaker government and independent election commission.

Speaking to his supporters outside Chaudhry's home, Sharif vowed to continue pressing for the reinstatement of the deposed chief justice and other judges.

"I want to tell the nation that past dictators were also used to ousting prime ministers, arresting them from their houses and hanging even one of them," said Sharif, who was ousted by Musharraf in a 1999 coup and returned from exile 10 days ago.

"Now a dictator has attacked the judiciary, and if the nation today ignores these actions of a dictator, history will not forgive it."

Attorneys, who have called Musharraf's moves an attack on the judiciary's independence, boycotted court proceedings in Islamabad, Peshawar, Quetta, Lahore, Karachi and elsewhere. Several lawyers and police were injured in scuffles at a rally in the central city of Multan, witnesses said.

Former Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif speaks to supporters during the march.

Bhutto indicated her party may call for anti-government protests if the elections are rigged.

"Either the elections will be fair and the people will get their own Parliament, or if elections are not fair, then the movement will start," she told reporters.

Bhutto reiterated that her party will take part in the electoral campaign, but reserved the right to pull out later.

Mitt addresses Mormanism

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — His campaign at a crossroads, Republican Mitt Romney said Thursday his Mormon faith should neither help nor hinder his quest for the White House and vowed to serve the interests of the nation, not the church, if elected president.

"When I place my hand on the Bible and take the oath of office, that oath becomes my highest promise to God," Romney said in a speech that explicitly recalled remarks John F. Kennedy made in 1960 in an effort to quell anti-Catholic bias.

After declining for months to address the issue of his Mormonism directly, Romney switched course as polls showed widespread unease about his religion — and showed him losing his once-sizable lead in the opening Iowa caucuses to Mike Huckabee, a Baptist minister and former governor of Arkansas.

Romney said some believe that a forthright embrace of his religion will "sink my candidacy. If they are right, so be it. But I think they underestimate the American people."

"Americans tire of those who would jettison their beliefs, even to gain the world," he said.

The Jan. 3 Iowa caucuses provide the first test of the race for the White House, followed closely by the Jan. 8 primary in New Hampshire. Romney has campaigned and spent energetically in both states in hopes of gaining unstoppable momentum for the rush of elections that will soon follow.

A defeat in Iowa would be particularly difficult to absorb, given Huckabee's shoestring operation. Polls show Romney's religion is a political drag on his campaign, and Huckabee has risen in surveys by gaining the support of evangelical Christians, who comprise an estimated 40 percent of likely caucus goers in Iowa.

"Let me assure you that no authorities of my church, or of any other church for that matter, will ever exert influence on presidential decisions," he pledged. "Their authority is theirs, within the province of church affairs, and it ends where the affairs of the nation begin."

He added: "If I am fortunate to become your president, I will serve no one religion, no one group, no one cause and no one interest. A president must serve only the common cause of the people of the United States."

Mormons believe that authentic Christianity vanished a century after Jesus and was restored only through Joseph Smith, who founded the religion and is viewed as a prophet by its adherents. Smith revised — and in his view corrected — large sections of the Bible in the 19th century, an act of heresy in the eyes of Protestant and Roman Catholic leaders.

Hoax leaves family shunned, outcasts

By Christopher Leonard
Associated Press

DARDENNE PRAIRIE, Mo. — Waterford Crystal Drive is one of those suburban streets that seem so new as to have no history at all. But the suicide of a teenage girl — and allegations she had been tormented by a neighbor over the Internet — have brought a reaction that is old, almost tribal, in its nature.

Residents of the middle-class subdivision have turned against the neighbor, Lori Drew, and her family, demanding the Drews move out. Interviews, they have warned darkly, that someone might be tempted to "take matters into their own hands."

"It's like they used to do in the 1700s and 1800s. If you wronged a community, you were basically shunned. That's basically what happened to her," said Trevor Buckley, a 20-year-old who lives next door to the Drews.

Drew became an outcast after she participated in a hoax in which a fictional teenager by the name of "Josh Evans" exchanged online messages with 13-year-old Megan Meier. Megan received cruel messages from Josh that apparently drove her to hang herself in her closet in 2006.

Through her lawyer, Drew, a mother of two in her 40s, has denied having hurtful things to the girl over the Internet, and prosecutors have said they found no grounds for charges against the woman. Nevertheless, the community's reaction has been vengeful and the pressure on the Drews intense.

More than 100 residents gathered in front of their home on a recent evening, holding candles and reciting stories about Megan.

Last December, after neighbors learned of the Internet hoax, someone threw a brick through a window in the Drew home. A few weeks ago, someone made a prank call to police reporting that there had been a shooting inside the Drews' house, prompting squad cars to arrive with sirens flashing.

Someone recently obtained the password to change the Drews' outgoing cell phone recording, and replaced it with a disturbing message. Police would not detail the content.

Tina Meier, 37, holds two pictures of her daughter Megan who committed suicide.

Jakubowska shares Cold War collection

By Elizabeth Hawley
Collegian Staff

Barbara Jakubowska, a former member of the democratic resistance in Communist Warsaw, spoke to a group of about 20 people in Herter Hall last night.

Jakubowska recently donated a significant collection to the W.E.B. DuBois Library's special collections department at the University of Massachusetts.

"Under a communist regime… you have a list of books which you are not allowed to read," said Jakubowska, who was a literature student at the University of Warsaw before joining the movement, explaining her decision to get involved with the resistance movement. "I really hate the idea of telling me what I can or cannot read."

Jakubowska initially got involved in the Committee for the Defense of Workers in 1977, collecting and eventually printing books that were forbidden. She later worked with Solidarity, another resistance group.

She also interacted with resistance groups around Eastern Europe at the time, and at one point smuggled machinery from Sweden. Before leaving the movement in 1989, Jakubowska also participated in round table discussions in the late 1980s while working in the press office for the talks at the time.

"You risked your life, yes," Jakubowska said when asked by one audience member if she risked mortal danger. She was quick, however, to point out that those who resisted under Stalin suffered far worse punishments than Solidarity members.

"I've been arrested and interrogated, I don't know how many times, maybe 10, maybe 15," said Jakubowska.

She added that men were treated worse than women, and mentioned friends who were beaten in their interrogations.

"I was never touched by anybody. Nobody even hit me… it was only psychological warfare," she said.

She went on to tell an anecdote about receiving special treatment from a group of jailers at one prison because she gave up her watch in an effort to keep them out of trouble. After the secret police left, the jailers gave her use of their private bathroom to shower and wash her underwear.

Because there was nothing to hang the wet cloth on in her cell, she then sat in the sunlit hallway chatting with one jailer while the underwear lay out to dry.

"It sounds funny right now, but it wasn't funny when I was going through it," Jakubowska told a captive audience. "They really helped me out, those jailers, because I didn't treat them like enemies."

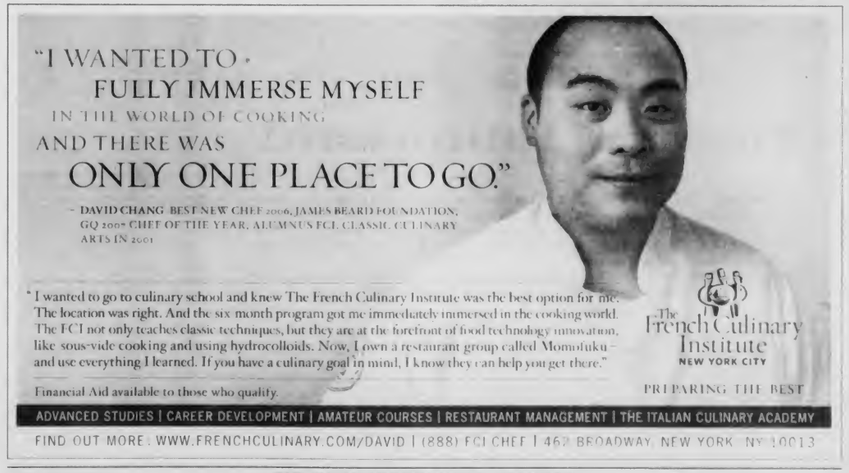
Jakubowska spoke of disguising herself and leaving Warsaw to make sure the Secret Police couldn't follow her to spy on the movement.

She was sent to a house outside the city where she was allowed out only by night for a short walk around a cemetery. "It really sounds like an action movie," she said. "Believe me, it's not."

The donated collection includes books of literature, poetry, political lectures and essays. Of these, all were forbidden or released during the occupation.

The collection also includes news bulletins, which were released as often as the different resistance groups could manage to write and print them. The donation also includes tapes of radio-format programs that were never broadcast and taped recordings of radio broadcasts, some of which Jakubowska broadcast herself.

She describes the radio broadcasting as "one of the most dangerous things we have done."



"It is very selfish to sit on this material," Jakubowska said of her decision to donate the collection. "Maybe early on I thought that I would do something with it; organize it myself or maybe write something about it. But as I got older, it became clear that I wasn't going to do that."

"The timing, the quality, the depth of this collection couldn't be better," said Bob Cox, the head of the Special Collections Department at the W.E.B. DuBois library. The department had been looking for materials on both social movements and Cold War culture. He said Jakubowska's collection is "remarkably complete, particularly given the circumstances."

Elizabeth Hawley can be reached at ehawley@student.umass.edu.

Jakubowska addresses a crowd last night after donating a collection of Cold War pieces.

DEC 7 2007

Politicians on Beacon hill scramble to find funds to patch Massachusetts' infrastructure, one that has been described as aging rapidly.

Infrastructure corrodes as State scrambles for funds

By Hannah Nelson
Collegian Staff

Potholes are anything but an unnoticed rarity in Massachusetts and are an all-too-familiar sign that the state isn't aging gracefully on the dawn of its 220th birthday.

The recognizable State House has been around since the 1790s and is the oldest building that remains on Beacon Hill. But its most notable feature, the golden dome, is pealing and its walls are cracking. It is only one the state's of buildings that hint the Commonwealth is in desperate of some sprucing.

Governor Patrick's current five-year plan to improve the state sets aside $750 million for higher education. The UMass system alone is facing over $2.5 billion in maintenance bills. The remaining public colleges and institutes are looking collectively at a similar number. The funding needed will come from the millions expected from a new three-casino plan as well as $9 billion in borrowed funds in order to proceed with the $12 billion plan for improvements across the state, which excludes supporting transportation system longevity.

The early seventies were a swinging time for construction on campus with the arrival of the Campus Center, Fine Arts Center and the W.E.B. Du Bois Library. They may not be the oldest by a long shot, but that hasn't spared some from problems. The mention of disrepair on campus generally brings to mind the library for many students, in particular the indefinite retirement of elevator number four

Just recently there was a leak on the second floor in the quiet study area, which was temporarily remedied by a plastic trash can.

UMass also has a history of keeping its oldest structures integrated into the campus image. Some $1 million went to the Old Chapel's clock tower repair despite the fact that the building, which dates back to 1885, is no longer in use.

According to August's one hundred page Five Year Capital Investment, "This chronic underinvestment in the state's public colleges and universities has had negative effects. To keep up with capital needs, the institutions have borrowed funds through the University of Massachusetts Building Authority, the State College Building Authority and the Health and Educational Finance Authority. They have paid for needed capital projects from operating funds."

The plan even addresses the effect the aging infrastructure has had on the price of a public higher education.

"Not only does this practice put an undue strain on already-tight operating budgets, but it also drives these institutions to seek new revenue sources. The Board of Higher Education has required state and community college campuses to provide matching funds for state capital investments, leading campuses to increase student fees. This had deepened problems of student access and affordability," the plan reads.

State parks are ranked third worst in the nation, and the state has penultimate placing in infrastructure advancement. Parks and recreation have a $1.2 billion maintenance debt.

Earlier this year on myissue.devalpatrick.com, a group of concerned citizens under the Conservation and Recreation Campaign posted their concern for the lack of funding in the state park system. They were requesting $70 million for the Department of Conservation and Recreation [DCR]. Under the new plan $653 million is down for energy and the environment, but it is unknown how much of that will be specifically set aside for the park system.

Part of the official statement by the Governor reads, "It will be a challenging road, and I hope all of you will help us as we move to focus DCR on its core mission of parks, recreation and beaches. Unfortunately, the last administration left us with a $1.3 billion budget deficit – a financial situation which is far worse than what they led us to believe. That means that in the meantime, we have to look for some creative solutions to help improve our parks."

The $1.3 billion is the same amount that has been invested into UMass Amherst over the past seven years due to state and university funding. According to the UMass Amherst Building Condition Report and the companion Legacy Buildings study that came out in May, UMass Amherst is facing $833 million in improvement cost over the next five years. An additional $37 million was marked as specifically in regards to infrastructure on campus during that same time frame for athletic fields, parking lots, sewer and electrical costs, among others.

Hannah Nelson can be reached at nelsonra@student.umass.edu

The Office of Jewish Affairs, Center for Student Development, and Office of Student Affairs & Campus Life extend our holiday greetings to Jewish students, faculty, and staff.

Happy Hanukkah!

The Hebrew word chanukah means "dedication." The eight-day festival of Hanukkah commemorates the victory of the Maccabees, who fought against the religious persecution of the Jews, and the rededication of the Temple in Jerusalem. To remind us of the miracle of the oil which burned for eight days, when there was only enough oil for one day, it is customary to eat fried foods such as potato pancakes (latkes) or doughnuts.

Hanukkah began the evening of Tuesday, December 4th and ends the evening of Wednesday, December 12th

UMASS AMHERST

For more information about Jewish holidays, visit our website at umass.edu/jewish or call the Office of Jewish Affairs at 413.545.9642

Patrick visits the great wall country

By Ben Williams
Collegian Staff

Governor Deval Patrick left for China last week with a delegation that included members from the University of Massachusetts.

The Governor said he feels an obligation not to sit back while the state's economy is impacted by a new era of global competition and that he had a responsibility to promote Massachusetts "effectively and aggressively," reports the Worchester Telegram.

The trip is billed as a foreign trade mission and includes representatives from Massachusetts businesses, and hopes to capitalize on China's interest in clean technologies, among other things.

As China industrializes, it's also looking towards modernizing and upgrading medical care in its booming cities, an area where Massachusetts has some of the best minds and businesses.

Joining the Governor was Nobel laureate Dr. Craig Mello of the University of Massachusetts Medical School, who according to iberkshires.com, gave a talk at Tsinghua University in Bejing.

"We not only need great scientists, but we also need great leaders and policies to create the right environment for scientific discovery that lead to new treatments for diseases we have yet to tackle," said Mello.

"We have come to refresh and renew a 200-year-old relationship," said Patrick, in a statement. "We seek to build new partnerships on old friendships. We want to learn how you are meeting the challenges you face for advances in education, healing and clean power. And we seek to share lessons we have learned and are still learning in each of these fields."

In 2006, Massachusetts made $1.3 billion in exports to China, a trend Patrick hopes to continue.

Other delegates included UMass president Jack Wilson and representatives from MassPort, Mass Technology Collaborative and representatives from Harvard and MIT.

Ben Williams can be reached at bwilliams@student.umass.edu

Pressure builds as colleges get strict on acceptance

By Jennifer Bergen
Collegian Staff

Increased competition in the college admissions process has created more pressure than ever on high school seniors.

The application process brings much stress to a college-bound high school student and with the acceptance rates of colleges tightening, applicants need to make themselves stand out from the crowd. Not only are they asked to maintain excellent grades and achieve a high score on the SATs, they also need to show that they are involved in extracurricular activities.

Students are reacting to the rise in competition of the admissions process by adding to the number of schools to which they apply.

In "The Advocate," an article titled "College-bound students face crush of application deadlines," Staff Writer Lisa Chamoff said, " It's an anxious time for high school seniors as application deadlines approach, and these days, it's not uncommon for students to apply to a half-dozen or more schools to increase their chances of being accepted somewhere."

The application requirements are lengthy and stressful for high school students trying to get into their top choice school. The requirements for being considered at UMass Amherst include a completed application form, SAT-I or ACT scores, an essay, letters of recommendation, an official high school transcript, as well as an application fee which tends to range from $50 to $75.

Between the deadlines, requirements, fees and the increase in selectivity, students have a lot to handle during their final year of high school. Selectivity is one of the more major and recent problems in the application process this year.

University of Massachusetts Director of Admissions Kevin Kelly said, "Our selectivity has dropped from over 80 percent admitted in the fall of 2005 to 72 percent in the fall of 2006 to 65 percent in the fall of 2007. So we have become more selective as the numbers of applications has increased."

UMass Sophomore Rachel Hildebrand recalls a time when she was enduring the application process. "The competition that was enforced by everyone at school was the most stressing part of the process. I feel that competition gets worse each year, and my friends that I know who are currently applying to schools are experiencing the pressures that I felt to a greater extent, which could be due to the increased selectivity."

Jennifer Bergen can be reached at jbergen@student.umass.edu

Animal tracking explored

By Josh Walowitch
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Amherst scientists are developing new technology that will aid in the ability to identify and monitor individual animals in their environments. This new computer vision technology can be critical for studying things like migration patterns or habitat use.

Dr. Kevin McGarigal Department of the Natural Resources Conservation discovered the need for this technology through his study of threatened marbled salamanders, which rely on vernal pools to lay their eggs and to breed.

According to McGarigal "developing individual pattern recognition algorithms for large biological databases and applying them to several case study application which includes developing capture histories for marbled salamanders as part of a long-term investigation into their population structrue and dynamics" is the basis of the research.

To comprehend McGarigal's research, one should understand that no two people look exactly alike, but each unique features like a fingerprint. Fingerprints are what law enforcement agencies count on when analyzing forensic evidence and applying this concept to animals will find that they, too, have unique features that can be used to distinguish one from another. Amphibians have unique dorsal patterns that biologists are now starting to take advantage of just as people do with finger prints.

"We are simply creating animal passport photos to keep track of individuals the same as Uncle Sam uses passports to keep track of us," said McGarigal.

This new research will offer the potential for an efficient, effective and more importantly a non-invasive procedure, for tracking the fate of individuals in capture recapture studies. Capture-recapture data is essential for estimating many important population parameters, such as survivorship and dispersal.

Biologists have found it difficult to track thousands of individuals within a single population due to a overflow of data in the past.

"There is a great need for efficient, non-invasive procedures for tracking individuals in wildlife studies. Especially those involving large numbers of individuals where invasive procedures [such as implanting a tag] are either too time-consuming [e.g., requiring surgery], too costly [e.g., radio transmitters] or too disruptive of animal behavior," McGarigal said. "In our quest to study the population, structure and dynamics of marbled salamander populations in western Massachusetts, we need an efficient and effective means of tracking the fate of many individuals in the population. Given the individually unique dorsal patterns of this species, it lends itself beautifully to pattern recognition using state-of-the-art computer visions technology."

Scientists are currently altering the algorithms to other amphibians including the Fowler's toad and whale shark. They hope that the future will bring an to apply the technique to a wide variety of animals.

Once the algorithms are completed and fully functional they will be part of a public domain eventually being made available to other scientists for free.

"Now we can test out several algorithms and expand them to deal with a broader array of individual pattern recognition problems in the field," commented McGarigal. "We're excited to see how far we can push the envelope in wildlife recognition with this new technology."

There are a few graduate students and technicians currently working on the research. The scientists have been enlisting the help of numerous student and non-student volunteers to help collect and record data on "big movement nights."

Josh Walowitch can be reached at jwalowit@student.umass.edu

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM

- Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
- More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
- Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
- Post unlimited online listings
- Little to no spam
- By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

DEC 7 2007

EDITORIAL OPINION

"It is even harder for the average ape to know he has descended from man." -H.L. Mencken

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2007 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Donald trumps MA

Hannah Nelson

Apparently bringing casinos to Massachusetts, let alone the Western part of the state isn't just big news, it's big business. It is official; Donald Trump is exploring his options in the Bay State. From the beginning, Trump wanted in on the casino scene.

Perhaps I have seen "Ocean's 11" once too many times because I was surprisingly accepting of Governor Patrick's plans to bring three casinos into the state. Hey, why not give the people what they want? Except of course for the tiny, insignificant detail that not all the people want it and that includes some of our politicians as well.

The last thing I expected (perhaps too naively) was a big boots businessman coming in to brand us with his well recognized name. After all, this casino plan is also supposed to help provide Patrick with funds to fix up ailing state buildings. Perhaps he could fix up elevator number four in the library?

The Donald doesn't have a very good track record in the casino biz.

Trump is part of a quickly growing group of developers who want to get in on the ground floor of Patrick's plan. Predictably this includes Boston, which Trump has looked into in the past. The biggest surprise however comes with Trump's attention to the Holyoke Mall. Western Mass could get its very own piece of the Trump Empire in the not so distant future.

The three resort-casino plan would allow for one casino in Western, and Southeastern Massachusetts, and the metro Boston area. And those are already covered by the seven towns and cities (and regions in the case of Boston) that Trump has on his radar according to the Boston Globe.

In Southeastern Massachusetts there is Fall River, New Bedford, and Plainville, the latter of which is being eyed by Trump Entertainment for a dog racing track. (I can see the protestors now.) And here in Western Mass there are Holyoke, Chicopee, and Warren. Holyoke of course surrounded by the most buzz.

DO YOU LIKE VOICING YOUR OBNOXIOUS OPINIONS?

You have come to the right place

Send e-mail to: editorial@dailycollegian.com

There are politicians in the State House however who aren't willing to make this an easy fight, and have not yet granted Trump or any other developer a hearing. And Holyoke's Mayor Sullivan has had his qualms as well about the impact a casino could have economically and socially.

"It's a challenge for a community like Holyoke, but I'm a pragmatic guy," Sullivan said. "If there's a benefit for the city of Holyoke, I want us to be at the table." Sullivan already met with Trump Entertainment's Senior Vice President Eric L. Hausler two months back. Also on the Trump radar is the former amusement park, Mountain Park. The very real possibility of bringing a casino to either location was discussed.

The tourism factor for Holyoke could no doubt help boost the city's economy, but I'm always the skeptic. The fact that Holyoke's numbers are so low is either a sign that they are the perfect guinea pig, or that a casino is the last thing they want.

The elderly population is all for a casino (though is that really that surprising?) But when faced with an alternative revenue machine like some form of power plant, it doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out what the majority will want.

That in mind, I want to know who will get the multitude of jobs that will need filling. What's the point of bringing in a staff when there is already a need for jobs in the first place? I certainly would not want to deny Holyoke's residents a chance like this when seven percent are unemployed and one fourth are below the poverty line, making it one of the poorest Massachusetts communities.

Despite the possible plusses, the negatives are the ones that keep popping out. The Donald doesn't have a very good track record in the casino biz. His Atlantic City pursuits haven't exactly been flourishing, and there was that Chapter 11 bankruptcy suit in 2004.

Now that is the last thing that Holyoke needs. Sure a Holyoke casino would mean competition for Connecticut's Mohegan Sun and Foxwoods, but those are two well established power players to be messing with. Mentioning which, Foxwoods as well as MGM Mirage are looking into Warren, so naturally Trump's been there too.

This may sound anti-capitalist, but entertainment hubs have an odd way of taking a chunk out of this state. Just look at Fenway, it was at one time an actual fen. Holyoke certainly does not deserve to pay for the price of progress. So as far as I am concerned, you are fired, Mr. Trump.

Hannah Nelson is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at hnelson@student.umass.edu

Who needs homemade?

Katherine Marr

With the holiday season in full-swing, everyone is focused on gifts, snow, decorations and food. Holiday recipes are sprouting up in the newspapers, while magazines feature spreads of spectacular looking entrees. Advice columns are printed everywhere, describing how to cook impeccable meals. It is no wonder that society has become so enthralled with food and cooking, turning the holidays into a hectic, stressful toil for culinary perfection.

Perhaps this is because I come from a family where a home-cooked meal is no more than a distant reality. We have hosted exactly one Thanksgiving dinner at our house – naturally, the turkey somehow failed to cook. While cleaning out our refrigerator this past summer, we discovered food that expired in 1996.

Holiday parties send us searching Big Y's bakery department for whatever sale items look most "homemade." And to us, "cleaning out the oven" does not refer to wiping away spills and baked-on food. Rather, it means emptying the oven of cereal boxes, granola bars, loaves of bread, Pop Tarts, cookie packages, and as I noticed recently, a white chocolate rabbit from a frightening number of Easters ago.

I would have a hard time distinguishing between an entrée from a five-star restaurant and the UMass Dining Commons.

Clearly, our anti-cooking philosophy, and consequent dependency on pizza shops, strips us of any resemblance to the idealized American family. Yet I hardly view us as deprived. The pressure to receive awe and approval from friends and relatives only leads to countless hours of cooking or trying a recipe a dozen times. People should realize something when the media, alongside its many recipes and cooking shows, has to offer tips on how to relax and regroup after the tension of preparing holiday dinners.

More than two weeks before Thanksgiving, a Martha Stewart newspaper column entitled, "Holiday Planning, Week by Week," caught my eye. As the title suggests, the article neatly divided the stretch from Thanksgiving to Christmas into intervals of when to make certain holiday preparations.

For example, in "Week Two," Stewart advises, "Take an inventory of baking staples, and replace those that are running low." Now, I do not even know precisely what qualifies as a baking staple. For me, the translation equals: "Make certain that the can opener, microwave, and Big Y's rotisserie are in good working order."

And, by "Week Four," you should "Prepare make-ahead side dishes. Cranberry sauce, for example, can be made early and refrigerated." Well, my idea of "preparing" cranberry sauce is dumping the cylinder-shaped jelly mold into a bowl.

The intention behind this column is to make cooking more manageable, but it simultaneously encourages the impractical strive for perfection. As a result, cooking further evolves into something more stressful than enjoyable.

Picture the many frazzled, bleary-eyed people who on Christmas day, say, "I was so disorganized this year that I was up until 3:00 in the morning making my sugar cookies." How can baking cookies at that hour be enjoyable? I may have a hard time finding baking alluring at all, but cooking at 3:00 AM seems outrageous and unnecessary.

Despite Stewart's "Week Three" suggestion to "Make and freeze cookie dough to bake as needed," there is a significantly easier alternative. Simply omit her words, "Make and," and prospects are already looking brighter.

Perhaps you think that only the June Cleaver-type women, with their flour-dusted aprons and wooden spoons in hand, are the culprits. But, everyone – even children – can be drawn into the madness. I pity the poor children who, under their parents watchful eyes, have to make gourmet-style cookies for Santa.

The attitude at my house was always: "Who cares if the cookies are burnt as long as they are hidden beneath a heavy coating of frosting, sprinkles, icing, marshmallows, M&Ms, and chocolate chips?" Our culinary creations could have easily been mistaken for a spill in the candy aisle. But in circumstances like these, when there is no intention to produce the perfect food, cooking is most fun.

Even beyond the holiday season, do you realize how much time and energy that we (well, of course, not me, personally, as I have well-established) spend seeking out the best-tasting food?

And if we cannot cook it ourselves, we dine at expensive restaurants. Just as homemade gingerbread men and Stop and Shop's gingerbread men taste the same to me, I would likewise have a hard time distinguishing between an entrée from a five-star restaurant and the UMass Dining Commons.

Honestly, to be in the realm of the UMass Dining Commons is like having a Thanksgiving feast everyday (excluding, of course, that aforementioned Thanksgiving dinner when the turkey failed to cook). Furthermore, my biggest food preparation steps here are sprinkling salt and pepper on scrambled eggs, squirting mayonnaise into a sandwich, or maybe making a Belgian waffle (if I am feeling really ambitious).

To some people, this "do not cook" philosophy seems atrocious, but being a devout Iron Chef addict suits me just fine. It makes the holiday season, and life in general, significantly less stressful, and more relaxing and enjoyable. That has been my motto since the third grade, when years of culinary incapability culminated in an oven fire that was definitely not worth a homemade batch of peanut cookies.

Katherine Marr is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at kmarr@student.umass.edu.

Diversity in the workplace

Devon Courtney

I just got a form in my mailbox last week, a questionnaire requiring me to provide "feedback" about my experience as a television news intern this fall. As far as I understand it, "feedback" is a kind of thing that you do which involves circling arbitrary numbers and writing adjectives about the experience you gained carrying coffee to different people who are more important than you.

An internship is essential for getting a job, when combined with the four years of heavy episodic drinking known more familiarly as "college." In fond recollection of all of the fun I had at my internship shuffling papers, answering phones, and rummaging for excuses to frequently use the bathroom, I wrote random adjectives willy-nilly and circled as many numbers as I could find.

That is, until I got to a question that alarmed me right out of my circling spree: "Please rate your improvement in working with people of diverse backgrounds (with the numbers one through three representing "very much improved," "somewhat improved," "no improvement")."

I dropped my pen and stared ahead in disbelief. What exactly were these feedback mongers getting at? I thought about it for a moment and came to a simple conclusion; the internship department of career services was indirectly calling me a racist.

You see, when someone asks you how much your ability to work with people of "diverse backgrounds" has improved, they are subtly asserting that you've never worked with a diverse group of people ever before.

Furthermore, they are assuming that since you have interned in a workplace where there is a presumed diversity quota, you have had no other choice but for you to "improve" (in one of three ways) working relations with people who are different from you.

And here I was thinking that I was just fine while working in diverse environments. But now all that was being called directly into question.

As a side note, whenever anybody says "diversity," it is understood to be strictly a racial term. True diversity, according to an editorial written by the great online blogger Maddox, "only comes from people who look different." Obviously.

And here I was thinking that I was just fine while working in diverse environments.

I had to do something about this. I couldn't possibly express how I felt with just one colorful adjective or an angrily-drawn circle. This called for several adjectives, gathered into sentences. I would take those sentences and throw them together into a paragraph, print that paragraph out, and stick it into the envelope along with my feedback sheet. What I said went something like this:

"Working with diverse populations is a stupid thing to ask about. In our contemporary society, it is almost certain that most people grow up and spend their entire lives surrounded by different kinds of people.

Implying that someone would be ordinarily inefficient while working with a diverse panel of people (were it not for the field experience office's crucial assistance) is like assuming that everyone is racist sexist intolerant before they take on their internship. I refuse this basis of judgment."

Satisfied with that, I licked the envelope and closed it well before I actually finished my survey. I dropped my paragraph and feedback sheet with several un-circled numbers off into the mailbox, and then stopped suddenly in a moment of familiar recollection.

Hadn't I run into this basis of judgment before this moment? Yes, I had. I took a class three or four semesters ago about race and diversity. It was a discussion class where we discussed things like privilege, class difference, and the almighty trump card known as skin color.

I've come to understand the differences between living in a big city like Worcester or Boston and going to a big University out in the sticks. In the city, you can be poor, underprivileged, go to a public school, have friends of many different races and backgrounds, and nobody will judge you.

Here at UMass (just to name one place), when people see a white face, they assume that person knows nothing about working and associating with people of "diverse backgrounds," which may not always be true.

That, I feel, is the problem with social justice education. That is why I will forevermore refuse to draw circles around numbers that coincide with the improvement of my work in a "diverse" environment. I always figured that if we treat each other the way we'd like to be treated, that these questions won't ever need to be asked.

So I leave you with this. If we persist in evaluating our work through changes in our efficiency when surrounded by diverse people, we'll ultimately just be going in circles.

Devon Courtney is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dkourtne@student.umass.edu

Putting a stop to genocide

Evil is alive and well around the world, but certainly most visible (or perhaps invisible) in Africa. The Janjaweed in Darfur continue to murder men, rape women, throw babies alive into fires, and commit other crimes.

Mathew M. Robare

This is all happening while the people of Sudan call for the execution of a teacher who let her students name the class teddy bear "Muhammed." If the Sudanese government truly is not supporting the Arab militias in Darfur – like it has claimed several times then it has really got its priorities mixed up.

This past Wednesday the Darfur East was held around the nation. On that day participants abstained from luxury items for the day and donated the money they would have spent on to the Genocide Intervention Network's Civilian Protection Program.

Many people from Darfur have been forced out of their homes and into refugee camps. Since these camps are without electricity or any Western conveniences (as were their villages before them) the women must gather firewood for their cooking.

Firewood is growing scarcer so they must roam farther afield, putting themselves at greater risk of running across a Janjaweed detachment and being gang raped at gunpoint. The Civilian Protection Program uses the money it raises to provide the women with alternative cooking fuels, like propane or Sterno.

It is likely no coincidence that in his latest encyclical, "Spe Salvi" ("Saved by Hope"), Pope Benedict XVI devoted almost an entire chapter of the 18,000 word document to a biography of St. Josephine Bakhita, who was born in Darfur in the 19th century and is the patron saint of Sudan.

Benedict names St. Josephine as exemplifying hope and if he selected her because of her ties to Darfur, then his message is clear: the world cannot give up on Darfur. Or, by extension, any of the other places like it.

One of those places is Iraq, according to a UK report between 730,000 and 1.4 million Iraqis have died as a result of the violence. Violence that decreases the further one gets from U.S. military activity.

Iraqi Christians are suffering an especially high amount of suffering for their faith. To highlight their situation, Pope Benedict named Chaldean Patriarch Emmanuel III Delly a Cardinal in his last consistory. The Mandeans of Iraq are even closer to extinction, with hardly any immigration to the United States being allowed.

Every time some genocide or other mass murder happens, the cry is always "Never again."

After Iraq comes Somalia, which has seen foreign-imposed transition government after transition government since 1991 that will not be accepted by any of the people living there.

The only widely accepted government was the Islamic Courts Union, which was a union of essentially private law courts that based their decisions on Islamic Law with the interpretation depending on each judge in each region. With the support of local businessmen the ICU took control of Mogadishu from the warlords that had been fighting among themselves for dominance and restored peace for the first time in decades.

But earlier this year the defeated warlords told the U.S. that the ICU consisted of Islamic radicals of the al-Qaida variety, which it does not, and so the Bush administration sent money and military advisors to Ethiopia and the Ethiopians invaded, assisted by air strikes from American forces.

The Union promptly collapsed, plunging the country into chaos once more. The warlord returned and their militias hijack food and supplies brought in by aid workers. UN officials now believe that the crisis in Somalia is worse than Darfur.

Even Somalia pales at what is happening in the Sud-Kivu Province of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, on the borders of Rwanda. In the wake of the 1994 Rwandan genocide, the Interahamwe – the Hutu death squads – fled to the DRC by, finding among real refugees.

Eventually they provoked two wars and now are outlaws from international justice. In Sud-Kivu they have repeatedly raped and enslaved women and even young girls. Men have been forced to rape their wives and daughters and it destroys their lives better than any bullet. The Congolese Army, serving without pay for months on end, is even joining in the raping and pillaging. Many of the perpetrators are deliberately infecting their victims with HIV.

Yes, Bukavu is a silent genocide. The United Nations (as usual) is ignoring it and no one in the United States has heard of it – journalists from America and the UK have passed through and reported on it. But where are the bracelets, the big movements, the websites, the rallies, the protests, the letters to Congressmen and Senators?

Has the evil that permeates the world become so omnipresent that we're collectively deaf to all but the loudest or most recent cries for help? The Darfur genocide started in 2003 and has taken two or three years to become implanted in the American consciousness.

Every time some genocide or other mass murder happens, the cry is always "Never again." But they continue. To paraphrase Sr. James, hope without works is dead. We must have the hope that genocide will never be committed again and transform it into the faith that we can prevent it, and transform that into the actions that will prevent it.

Matthew M. Robare is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mrobare@student.umass.edu

DEC 7 2007

Mystical marriage of rock, goth, classical

BY NICHOLAS BROWN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Pop Quiz: What do Chelsea Clinton, General Douglas MacArthur, and rock band Evanescence have in common? If you answered with something like "they all like to rock out with their presidential parents while commanding the pacific fleet," you would be wrong. The fact is they all were spawned in the great state of Arkansas, specifically, the all-American hotspot known as Little Rock. First-daughters and military geniuses aside, rock and roll has been known to grow out of stranger places. If you shop at the local goth mecca Hot Topic, Evanescence probably makes you go moist with pseudo-masochistic delight.

With the release of their second album "The Open Door," Evanescence continues to broaden their fan base with their unique take on alternative rock. In a genre typically dominated by masculine grunts, Evanescence's lead female vocalist and pianist Amy Lee brings a hint of melody and a touch of taste and decency to the otherwise incoherent mosh-pit of noise called nu-metal.

As a self described fusion of "rock, goth, and classical," as stated in their Web site bio, Evanescence brings a breath of fresh air to a sound that often seems recycled. God help us if Limp Bizket ever returns. Unless Fred Durst can ever produce that Britney Spears sex tape we've all heard so much about. In that case, let's hear it for the nookie.

Lee's angelic vocals and melodic piano work juxtaposed against a backdrop of screeching guitars, choirs, string sections, and thunderous drums creates a unique sound not touched upon since the epic Trans-Siberian Orchestra. Lee was classically trained in piano at a young age, yet her love of metal probably made her instructor numb with fear. By combining the textures of classically inspired leads and the driving force of nu-metal, Evanescence has taken the genre beyond the whisky soaked guttural sounds of yesteryear.

In 2003 the band released their first full length cd "Fallen," which won them two Grammy Awards, one for Best Hard Rock Performance and the other for Best New Artist. Since then, they have become an international touring monster, touching down in places like Spain, New Zealand, Canada, and Russia, not to mention all over the U.S.

What separates Evanescence from the pack is their unique combination of styles that results in a sound that's all their own. Lee's lyrics are dark and introspective, with a longing for that glimmer of redemption. In other words, life can be nasty but there's beauty to be found in the struggle. Lee sings, in "Bring Me to Life," "all this time I can't believe I couldn't see kept in the dark but you were there in front of me I've been sleeping a thousand years it seems got to open my eyes to everything."

The music flows in similar terms. Most of the songs begin with a tender piano that hints at regret and sadness. That docile sorrow can quickly turn into a guitar driven blitzkrieg of frustration and anger. Thrown into the mix are these passive ethereal soundscapes that make you wonder if this band is sad, angry, stoned, or all of the above.

What stands above all are Lee's pristine vocals. Her voice is refreshing and gives Evanescence's sound a unique edge that shows no signs of slowing down. No matter how you look at it, this band is anything but typical.

If you haven't had the chance to catch them live, tonight is your chance to see them at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m. Opening for Evanescence will be the rock outfit Sick Puppies and the electronica act Julien-K. Tickets are $34 and can be purchased at the Mullins Center box office or through Ticketmaster.

Nicholas Brown can be reached at nebrown@student.umass.edu

Deck the halls with holiday five pack

BY TIM MCCALL AND DERRICK PERKINS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The holiday season has once again descended upon New England and the University of Massachusetts with the official start of the Feast of Saint Nicholas yesterday. For the medieval European students attending what can barely be called universities by today's standards. Dec. 6 marked the beginning of a three week long drinking binge culminating with the Feast of Fools on Jan. 1 and a drunken march through the city streets.

That sort of behavior wasn't limited to the holiday season. In Paris, classes were cancelled for two years after a group of students, having discovered "wine that was good and sweet to drink," started a riot which ended with a brawl between a tavern-keeper and the students.

And they didn't even have a football team.

Still, to stay in the holiday spirit, this week's column is about that ever popular Christmas present among college students: the holiday five-pack. A sampling of domestic microbrews, the Beer Dudes present you with the official breakdown of what beers you should buy your friends if you planned on actually drinking it yourself. Enjoy.

BROOKLYN BROWN ALE

Brewed in Brooklyn, N.Y., this brown ale is one of the heavier brown ales available. This malty brew is not for drinking games, but to be enjoyed while relaxing on the couch waiting for "The Office" to return to television. The dry after taste may leave you longing for more, but with the 5.5 APV two or three is enough.

LIBERTY ALE

Anchor Brewing Company, which led the way for microbreweries in the 1970s and 80s, is behind this traditional top-fermented ale. Hazy in appearance, though filtered, the ale is naturally carbonated in a process called bunging. The bitter aftertaste and sharp hoppy bite offsets the almost bland immediate flavor. However, the San Francisco treat loses points for employing a twist-off cap. No one said drinking beer should be easy.

SAMUEL ADAMS BOSTON ALE

This beer is part of the brew-master collection by Sam Adams. In this beer dudes humble opinion, Sam Adams can never let you down and their brew-master collection is no personal favorites. The bitter and fruity combination is good together making the brew filling. If you let it linger in your mouth, a scotch-candy flavor will slowly invade your taste buds.

CIRCUS BOY

Sure, it's not summer and sure, it's a hefeweizen, but who doesn't love a Magic Hat Circus Boy? With a distinct lemon citrus taste and a light body, the carme-inspired brew refreshes and relaxes. The yeast, still present in the unfiltered German-style weizen beer, requires you give the bottle a quick swish before pouring. With a strong aroma and sweet flavor Circus Boy is good year round. Magic Hat sweetens the deal by imparting little nuggets of advice under the cap.

WOLAVER'S BROWN ALE

This organic brown ale would right fit in on a Trader Joes shelf. Carbonated, but not too filling, making it perfect for dessert. Or better yet, Otter Creek Brewing's wolaver brown ale can be your dessert with its hint of cherry and black currant. Otter Creek Brewing is known for it's organic brews all across Vermont. The bottle's twist off cap creates a flow of head to hit the top before the first taste, but after the first sip the head dissipates and you are left with a creamy brown ale.

BONUS ROUND BEER: OTTER CREEK STOVEPIPE PORTER

In the off chance that you decide to be generous and part with every beer in the six-pack, the Stovepipe Porter is the final recommendation. A dark and extremely filling version of the English porter, the Stovepipe has a rich chocolate and malt flavor. Smooth and thick bodied, the porter is well filtered. By using roasted malt during the brewing process Otter Creek has crafted a strong, dry beer with an aftertaste close to that of a good cup of coffee.

Happy shopping and always remember, a good six pack is always better than a cheap thirty-rack.

The Beer Dudes can be reached at artsa dailycollegian.com

171 Trails
5 Parks
25 Lifts
1 Pass!

$229! Until 12/21/07

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE BREAKOUT PASS

The Best Deal On Skiing & Riding in the East!

No Blackout Dates!!!

GUNSTOCK MOUNTAIN RESORT
MOUNT SUNAPEE
CANNON
PASS

BUY NOW! Call 1-800-GUNSTOCK or Visit www.GUNSTOCK.com

DEC 7 2007

'The Golden Compass' roars into theaters

By Stephanie McPherson
Collegian Staff

Move over, Frodo. Harry, hop on your broom and get ready to fly from the spotlight. A new fantasy book series turned blockbuster film is in town and it means business. "The Golden Compass," opening today in theaters nationwide, is the first installment in a trilogy of films that could give "Harry Potter" and "The Lord of the Rings" a run for their money.

"The Golden Compass," based on the first book of the "His Dark Materials" series by Philip Pullman, is set in a parallel universe much like our own, where humans' spirits live outside their body in the form of an animal, called a daemon, and everything is ruled over by the subtly threatening Magisterium.

COURTESY NEW LINE CINEMA

"The Golden Compass" is a well made, exciting adventure with unforgettable characters.

Lyra Belacqua, played by silver screen newcomer Dakota Blue Richards, is a free-spirited young girl of about 12, living at the old and prestigious Jordan College in Oxford. Most of her days are spent carefree, until one afternoon, when her world is turned upside down. She and her daemon Pantalaimon (voiced by Freddie Highmore) overhear a presentation on a mysterious and controversial substance called Dust, given by her uncle, Lord Asriel, played by Daniel Craig of "Casino Royale" fame. Lyra becomes obsessed with traveling North to learn more about this Dust, and how it ties in to the recent disappearances of children around the country.

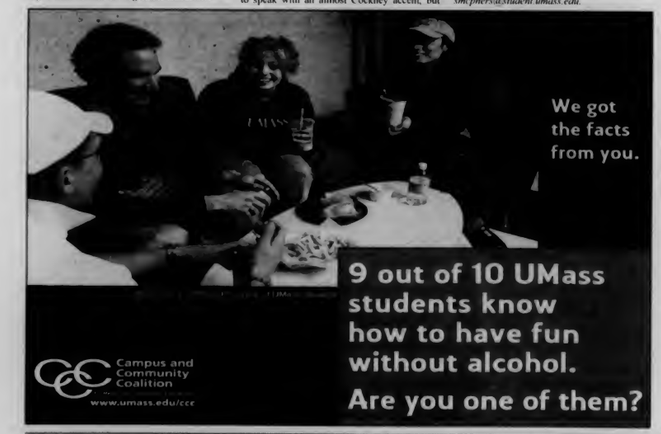
Lyra soon meets Mrs. Coulter (Nicole Kidman), the elegant and fascinating Magisterium worker who offers to take Lyra to the North during her next exhibition. Ecstatic, Lyra agrees, and leaves the only home she's ever known to live the extravagant life of a London socialite.

Before she leaves, the Master of Jordan College gives her a strange gift, with a warning to keep it secret, especially from Mrs. Coulter. It's an alethiometer, a golden compass that only tells the truth, if one can figure out how to read it.

With the compass, her daemon, and a slew of other characters she meets along the way, including an armored bear named Iorek Byrnison (voiced by Ian McKellen), Lyra faces a series of adventures that bring up far more questions than they answer.

From beginning to end, this movie is beautiful to watch. The special effects are flawless, and the acting is strong.

Richards is, for the most part, a natural on the screen. It seems as though she actually is the clever Lyra, thinking and talking fast to get herself out of sticky situations. Lyra is supposed to speak with an almost Cockney accent, but Richards seems to struggle sticking to it. When she has to say her "ain'ts" and other slang, it seems out of place with the accent she uses throughout the rest of the film.



Craig doesn't have too much to do, but when he is on screen, he's convincing as an authoritative societal figure. Kidman is picture perfect as Mrs. Coulter, engaging and delightfully deceitful, with surprising secrets that are revealed as the movie progresses. McKellen as Iorek Byrnison was the perfect casting choice. Even without being on camera, he commands attention as an exiled polar bear looking for vengeance.

Much of the movie is computer animated every human has a different animal-form daemon, witches are flying everywhere, and there is an entire kingdom of polar bears. One of the best scenes in the entire movie, a battle between Iorek and the usurper of his throne, was almost completely CGI, and it left the audience gasping and clapping.

For whatever reason, director and screenwriter Chris Weitz cut the movie short, leaving out the last few chapters of the book. Any longtime fan of "His Dark Materials" may be a little disappointed, as is the case with any book-turned-movie, but will still find the film to be fun and entertaining, and will agree that it hit on the most important plot points, which is impressive, considering the page count is over 400.

"The Golden Compass" leaves the audience with scores of unanswered questions, without ever adequately explaining Dust, or many other problems brought up during the movie. It ends with a warning of war for free will, and a feeling of foreboding. It's a well crafted, well told story, leaving even those who have read the series excited for the next film.

Stephanie McPherson can be reached at smcphers@student.umass.edu.

The Source

(the sors) n. key to discovering the weekly happenings of Western Mass.

FRIDAY
MOVIE
A screening of "One Night with the King," a retelling of the biblical story of Esther as she saved the Jewish people from extermination, will take place at 7 p.m. at Mount Holyoke College in Dwight Hall, Room 101. The event is free and open to the public.

SHOPPING
Take advantage of the last day of the Annual Holiday Craft Fair in the Campus Center Concourse. Professional and student artisans will be selling jewelry, clothing, quilts, photographs, and other items from 9 a.m. until 4 p.m.

ART
Check out the last day of the Student Union Art Gallery's "A Community Drawing," a project that invites local students, residents, and community members to contribute works of art for display. The gallery is open from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. and all art materials will be provided.

SATURDAY
SHOPPING
If you buy a book at the Jeffery Amherst Bookshop & College Store, 10% of the proceeds will go to benefit the UMass Libraries. The bookstore is located at 55 South Pleasant Street and is open from 8:30 a.m. to 8 p.m. There will also be free on-site gift wrapping.

ART
There will be an opening reception for an exhibit at the Burnett Gallery in the Jones Library from 2-4 p.m. The exhibit is of abstract acrylic works by Tess Rock called "Of Earth and Sky" and a group of mixed media pieces by Caitlyn Waugh called "Flight." The works will be on display through December 30.

SPOKEN WORD
The 10th annual "Voices for the Voiceless Diaspora Poetry Concert" will take place at 6:30 p.m. in the Friedmann Room of the Keefe Campus Center at Amherst College. Renowned poets including Louis Reyes Rivera, Tony Medina, and Mariposa will be appearinG. At 5:45 p.m., dinner will be served at La Veracruzana. The event is free and open to the public.

SUNDAY
MUSIC
The UMass Vocal Jazz Ensemble will be performing in the Bezanson Recital Hall at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and ARE $3 for UMass students.

Compiled by Allie Roth, Collegian Staff

Ford: keep IUPUI loss in mind vs. Marist

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Coming into last weekend, the Massachusetts men's basketball team's win over Syracuse was in the back of its mind. Now this weekend, the Minutemen's loss to Indiana University Purdue University Indianapolis last Saturday is fresh in their collective memory as they face Marist Saturday at Mohegan Sun Arena.

Gary Forbes (center) celebrates a big shot in the victory over Syracuse on Nov. 28 with teammates Chris Lowe (left) and Etienne Brower (right). UMass lost to IUPUI after beating the Orange.

A combination of offensive inconsistency and lack of defense allowed the Minutemen to extricate a win from their first Garner Dome experience. Those same factors also led to a let down against IUPUI just three days later.

While the team's offense has clicked at times, UMass is still struggling to play pressure defense for 40 consecutive minutes. The Minutemen's 14 3-pointers and strong overall effort on offense masked an otherwise lackluster defensive performance against Syracuse.

Establishing a new scoring record for a road team at the Garner Dome overshadowed the fact that UMass surrendered 100 points.

As UMass's 3-point shooting percentage fell to 36 percent last Saturday, it exposed the team's defensive flaws. And since that game, UMass coach Travis Ford has not let his players forget the loss and their lack of effort on defense.

"We've put more of an emphasis on defense," Ford said. "We understand that offense is our strength, but the defense needs to be picked up immensely. We've gone back to the basics. I don't want them to forget the IUPUI game and I want them to remember the practices we had the two days after that. That effort [against IUPUI] is unacceptable and won't be tolerated."

Ford wants his team to press on defense after every made basket and change of possession, something the Maroon and White failed to do against IUPUI.

The Minutemen know that they won't get away with the same defensive effort against Marist, since both squads appear very similar on paper. Considering just size, UMass (5-2) has the advantage as Marist (5-3) lacks a player over 6-foot-8.

"We match-up very well, but they're a more experienced team than we are," Ford said. "They have a few transfers and a lot of their players have played in some big games. They're possibly going to be the best team we played thus far."

Luckily for the Minutemen, they will not have to deal with two-time NCAA assist leader, Jared Jordan. The point guard led the Red Foxes to the second-round of the NIT last year in his senior season at Marist. The MAAC team upset Oklahoma State on the road before falling to NC State.

This season, scoring threat Louis McCroskey headlines the Red Foxes guard-based rotation. The Syracuse transfer averages 12.5 points per game and is also the team's second-leading rebounder.

And it's the fact that 6-foot-7 forward Spongy Benjamin leads the team in rebounding that should allow UMass to establish a physical presence in the frontcourt. Although a similar-sized Gary Forbes leads the Minutemen in the same category, centers Dante Milligan and Luke Bonner should thrive in the paint.

Besides its overall defensive effort, the front court has been the team's primary area of concern. Not only have the Minutemen been outrebounded by an average of five per game, the team has struggled to defend the frontcourt at times. The Orange scored 52 of its 100-point effort in the frontcourt.

Like the Minutemen, inconsistent play characterizes Marist's beginning to the 2007-08 season. The Red Foxes lost to Temple, Miami and Hofstra before starting their current four-game winning streak.

Saturday's neutral-site game will mark the fifth time the Minutemen have played at the resort. Though, all four previous meetings were against Central Connecticut.

The annual game gives fans the chance to watch the team in a different venue. Even though the contest is technically a home game for the Minutemen, Ford justifies the change in venue as it allows the program to get exposure in the southern Conn. area.

"I think it's great for our fans," Ford said. "It's a game that hopefully we can continue every year. It's one of my favorite arenas."

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu

Harris raising game in sophomore season

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Ricky Harris has missed a lot of shots this season.

But that's fine with him and Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford, because his struggles from the floor have enabled him to become a more versatile offensive player – rather than a prototypical shooter.

UMass's upset victory over Syracuse on Nov. 28 displayed the variety that Harris has to his game. In the first half he settled for jump shots and couldn't find the net, missing all but two of his nine shots (1-for-6 from 3-point range), while scoring just five points. During halftime, teammate Gary Forbes provided Harris with some words of encouragement.

"Early on obviously my shot wasn't falling like I wanted it to, so Gary turned to me and told me to go to the basket, get yourself banged up a little bit, get fouled and get into the flow of the game," Harris said after beating the Orange. "I just got comfortable after that."

With an improved mindset, Harris went about breaking down the Syracuse defense in a different way. Instead of spotting up for the three, he made a concerted effort to get to the rim – resulting in a 20-point scoring outburst after halftime. His nine free-throw attempts helped him get comfortable with his jump shot, and he proceeded to knock down two of his five 3-point attempts. Harris led all scorers with 25 points.

That game is a good example of what he can do offensively, but his entire season has essentially been that way. Harris has struggled with his 3-point shot all year long (16-for-52, 30.8 percent) but he still ranks second on the Minutemen in scoring behind Forbes with a 19.9 scoring average. Forbes (22nd) and Harris (38th) are the only pair of teammates in the entire country that each rank in the top 40 in scoring.

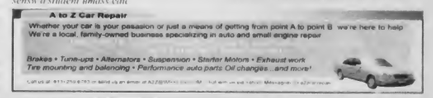
"He's a scorer, I wouldn't necessarily categorize him as a great shooter, he's a scorer who can get hot," Ford said. "He can miss five [shots] and make five in a row. He can score in a variety of ways; he can go under the 3-point line, beyond the 3-point line, drive to the basket or go to the foul line. He goes to the foul line a lot for someone his size."

In seven games this season, Harris has nearly made as many baskets (43) as he did all of last year (45). He spent the majority of the 2006-07 season on the bench, learning from veteran guards James Life and Brandon Thomas. This year, he has both the opportunity and responsibility to be a player the Minutemen can rely upon to score.

The 6-foot-2 sophomore shooting guard from Baltimore, Md., averaged just 4.5 points per game last year but his limited playing time then has helped him prepare for now.

"I got to watch older guys in front of me, so I learned from what I've seen them do by watching a lot last year," Harris said. "I think I've grown a lot as a player, as an individual and as a person. My maturity level has gone up; I've accepted a bigger role on the team so it was basically a matter of having to grow up."

The huge jump in production and maturity from Harris isn't surprising to Ford.



"He's grown a lot and it's something we expected from him," Ford said. "He didn't get a chance last year because of who he was playing behind, but he's always had this ability. We knew he would score, he's a competitor, and he's got great emotion for the game. But what he's doing now is what I expected."

Harris will continue to miss shots. That's not a problem for Ford, because he expects his sophomore guard will find ways to score anyway.

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu

Ricky Harris averages 19.9 points per game this season, after averaging 4.5 in 2006-07.

DEC
7
2007

Home kind to UM; five players sign NLI's

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Home is where the heart is. And for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, it is also where the wins are.

The Minutewomen are 3-5, with all three victories coming at the Mullins Center. They beat Vermont on Nov. 9, Boston College five days later and Hartford on Dec. 1. Whether it is the hometown crowd, familiarity with the arena or shear coincidence, the Maroon and White seem to have a better chance of winning when playing at home.

Though their games do not carry as big a crowd as the men's team, whatever support the Minutewomen can drum up for a Mullins Center game lets them know the home-court advantage is on their side.

"We just love playing at home. It's obvious that we're very comfortable at home – the routine is the same. [The players] like playing here, as do I," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "We love having the fans come in and see us and the more people we can show off our game to, we'll attract more people."

The actual amount of impact a home-court advantage can have on a team will likely never truly be known, but as far as UMass is concerned, facts are facts.

Though they average 65.6 points per game on the road, the Minutewomen average 70 points when they play in the friendly confines of their own court. In fact most of their offensive statistics are much better in home games. They are shooting .450 from the floor when at home, compared to .306 away. From behind the arc at the Mullins Center, they are 15-for-38, but on the road they shoot 17-for-70.

Despite not seating a packed house like the men's team, Dacko's squad often draws a few scores of parents and spectators. Senior Pam Rosamo said, however, that some of the parents show up no matter where the game is played but that it always helps to play on familiar hardwood.

"It definitely contributes. I mean, we're used to being here. We're here every day. We're used to the lighting and the rims and everything," she said. "I think it definitely helps. We like playing here."

Though regular play in the Mullins Center has helped the Minutewomen develop a comfort zone that aids them during games, Dacko says a big factor is one that isn't on the court at all: the band.

"The band is nice," she said. "This is a huge arena. If we were filling it, the crowd would be a huge sixth man, but right now the band is."

No one really knows if the familiarity of the court, the home crowd, or band members loudly playing the UMass fight song actually have an effect on the game, but one thing definitely is for certain – the Mullins Center is Dacko's home sweet home.

Dominic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Dacko pleased with 2008 recruiting class

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko announced yesterday the signing of five players to National Letters of Intent. The players – to be a part of UMass's Class of 2011 are Alesia Howard, Emilhe Teuscher, Sarah Rogers, Nicki Jones and Kristina Danella.

Dacko and company searched far and wide for new talent and they think they found a good foundation on which to base solid teams some years down the road.

"I think that they're probably the best recruiting class since [I've] gotten here, from top to bottom," said Dacko. "I think that them, combined with our freshmen, are the future of the program."

According to the UMass athletics Web site, Howard is a highly-ranked swing player from Columbus, Ohio. She averaged 11.8 points and 7.5 rebounds per game at Africentric High School last year and was named First Team All-City and All-District. She helped lead her team to a 27-1 record and a Division IV Tournament victory last year.

"She's a worker. She's much like Alisha Latham," Dacko said. "She comes from a great high school program, she comes from a great AAU program and she's very, very coachable. She's a kid you want to have on your team."

Teuscher is a 5-foot-8 guard from Miamisbury, Ohio. She averaged 14 points per game last year and shoots 37 percent from the 3-point line.

"She's an outstanding scorer. She can get in the lane – she's a good ball-handler," Dacko said. "She's a very inspirational kind of kid."

Rogers is a 5-foot-8 combo guard from Chicago, Ill. She averaged 15 points a game and was named All-City and All-Conference as a junior.

Jones is from Rochester, N.Y. The 6-foot-2 post player averaged 11 points and eight boards per game in her career at Nazareth Academy.

Danella is a 6-foot-1 forward from Manalapan, N.J. So far in her high school career she averages 14 points and nine rebounds per game. Danella was named the 2007 Asbury Park Press Player of the Year as she led her school to two Shore Conference Championships the last two years.

Dominic Poli can be reached dpoli at student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen host Maine

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

If Maine hopes to get its first road win of the season, it has to hand the Massachusetts women's basketball team its first home loss.

This scenario seems rather unlikely. Maine (1-6) has lost road games by 13 and 22 points, as well as losing a 63-62 game against William & Mary. The Minutewomen (3-5) have similar problems on the road, but have excelled at the Mullins Center early this season.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko was disappointed with her team's 84-68 loss to St. John's on Tuesday. It was their fifth loss away from home this season.

"We're more effective running what we want to run in practice than we are in games," Dacko said. "We have a men's practice team that is better than any college team we've played to date, and we can break them down."

Maine isn't likely to score the 84 points that the Red Storm did. The Black Bears average 59.9 points per game, while opponents average 11 more.

Brittany Boser leads Maine with 11.6 points, but no other player averages double digits.

Kate Mills and Pam Rosamo lead the Minutewomen with 15.9 and 15.4 points per game, respectably.

Despite all its struggles, Maine hasn't been outplayed in the rebounding department through seven games. It averages 35 rebounds, while the opposition averages 34. Rebounding is one of Dacko's main concerns, and the Minutewomen have been out-rebounded 38.4 to 35.8 this year. While they have nine more defensive rebounds than opponents, they have been pounded on the offensive glass, 124-94.

Ball movement and working the shot clock are effective in making opposing teams play solid defense for extended periods of time, and this is precisely what Dacko hopes her team can improve upon against Maine.

After back-to-back double-doubles against Boston University and Hartford, Mills had eight points and six rebounds against the Red Storm.

"If Kate's not scoring points, I want her emotionally vested," Dacko said. "I want her to be able to crash the boards. She's only been to the foul line nine times this year. That's sixth on our list. Pam's been to the line 46 times. If she's going to be aggressive, then get three of four or five fouls a game going to the boards."

Mills was a preseason selection for Atlantic 10 All-Conference second team, and Dacko would like her to start playing more effectively.

The team had a meeting during Wednesday's practice and discussed how they start to panic once they gain a lead on the road. Dacko wants the seniors to relax and lead the team, but these problems haven't been evident at home.

UMass has excelled at home in games that come down to the final minute. Point guard Sakera Young hit two late free throws in a one-point game against Vermont to push the lead to three. Five days later, on Nov. 14, Rosamo hit two free throws against Boston College with 10.6 seconds remaining to extend the Minutewoman lead to 69-66, the eventual final score.

For the first time in three games, Rosamo will likely be playing without a facemask. These masks limit a player's vision, and Teya Wright will continue to have to wear one for another week, as she cannot risk re-breaking her nose.

Young's quickness on the defensive end could play a factor in the game. Maine averages 23.6 turnovers per game, while UMass averages 17.9 turnovers of its own.

The Black Bears have also struggled from the field, shooting just under 40 percent.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnors@student.umass.edu.

Senior forward Kate Mills leads the Minutewomen this season in both scoring (15.9 points per game) and rebounding (6.6). UMass is 3-5 this season, losing five of its last six games.

DEC 7 2007

COMIXXX

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ACTIVITIES

New Years in Montreal $149.00 includes Luxury Motor Coach, Hotel and More. 3 Days 2 Nights. Best Party, Best Price, Best Hotels. 781-979-9001 montrealexpress.net

APT. FOR RENT

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- contact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

EMPLOYMENT

Put up Posters! For professional promotion company in towns and colleges. $7-$10/hr. 20 hrs Monday-Wednesday. 10 hrs must be during daylight business hrs. Looking for outdoorsy, rugged person w/car, references, daily email and voicemail. Must be coordinated, timely, organized, have excellent attention to detail, and communication with employer. 413-259-1111 box 2 postering@artspromo.org

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab, phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837.

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza, Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

LOST

REWARD
Women's Ring. Silver with garnet (red) stone. Campus Center. Nov 1. Contact Donald Depiro 516-456-7662

ROOM 4 RENT

Hillel's Jewish Living Community 338 N.Pleasant Winter session or Spring term Single/Double. Any 5 college student(except freshmen). laundry, internet, pool table, big rooms. Walk to UM. Parking, cable avail. Quiet. 549-1710 x 205 or www.UMASSHILLEL.ORG/JLLC

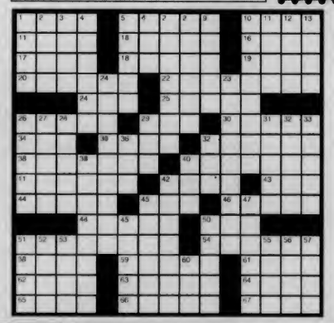
SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthright.org.

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services' Eating Disorders Clinic: 577-5101.

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St., Amherst. Call 413-548-9992 www.tapestryhealth.org

TRAVEL



"#1 Spring Break Website! 4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations. 800-648-4849/www.ststravel.com

ACROSS
1 Infamous pirate
5 Dice, e.g.
10 Roe source
14 Garfield's pal
15 Really enjoyed
16 Skin opening
17 Silent assents
18 Jouster's weapon
19 Theater section
20 Dark and dreary
22 Lift, in London
24 Cowboy's moniker
25 Bona ___ (good faith)
26 Cocktail twist
29 Helping hand
30 1990 Whoopi Goldberg movie
34 ___ Dhabi
35 " Misbehavin'"
37 Kitchen gadget
38 Italian sausage
40 Where it's cold, baby
41 1 and 1, side-by-side
42 Gyro bread
43 Delivery vehicle
44 Type of printer
45 Guy's date
46 Mix
48 Free from error
50 Winter bug
51 Single guy
54 Newscast location
58 Come-on
59 Spirited board?
61 Wild swine
62 Mental spark
63 Healthy glow
64 Old Testament book
65 ___ Piper
66 Lauder of cosmetics
67 Gym counts

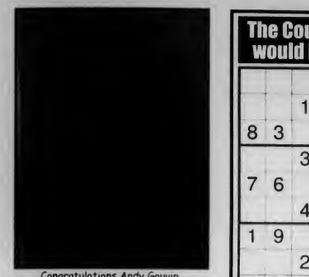
DOWN
1 Donkey or King follower
2 Graven image
3 Queen of Carthage
4 Early Florida explorer
5 Flower part
6 Tony winner Harper
7 Charity event
8 Geometry pioneer
9 Pace
10 Makes a watery impact
11 Loud, raucous cry
12 Jason's ship
13 Forest ruminant
21 Zoo
23 20 Questions category
26 Shirt tag
27 Deadly virus
28 Hybrid equines
29 Santa ___ winds
31 Popeye's love
32 Family car
33 Prevailing tide
36 Roadhouse
37 Set down
39 General business costs
40 Lubricant
42 Nationalist
45 Grave robbers
47 Sawmill output
49 Earth model
50 Incriminate falsely
51 Radar signal
52 Autobahn auto
53 Native American tribe
55 Seep
56 Infield cover, for short
57 Periods of time
60 Regular guy

We post the crossword solutions... sometimes.
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian...

we've got brains and body.

Also we have lots of books about punctuation.



Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes begin January 2nd
Hibernating this winter?
Get credit without leaving your room!
REGISTER NOW
www.UMassULearn.net

LAST DITCH EFFORT BY JOHN KROES

WELCOME TO FALLING ROCK NATIONAL PARK BY JOSH SHALEK

Congratulations Andy Gouvin,
Not only do you have enough time to do the Sudoku, you have time to make crafty whiteboard backdrops for your photos.

The Count from Sesame St. would be so proud of you.

			5		3
						3
		1
8	3						2	4
		3	9		5	7
7	6						8	9
		4	7		1	2
1	9						3	2
		2				6
			1		6

QUOTE OF THE WEEKEND

"Even if you are on the right track, you'll get run over if you just sit there."

— Will Rogers

CAPTION CONTEST

Winning Caption Submitted by: Michael Linnehan

Next week's contest will start on monday. See the picture and submit captions at www.dailycollegian.com/caption

I don't think that's what he meant by "Superman that..."

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Tomatoes are actually a fruit and yet we treat them like a vegetable. Did you ever think about how that makes them feel?

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Have your tonsils removed as an excuse to eat heinous amounts of ice cream for the next three weeks.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
The only reason you woke up on Monday was to get to today so you best make the most of it.

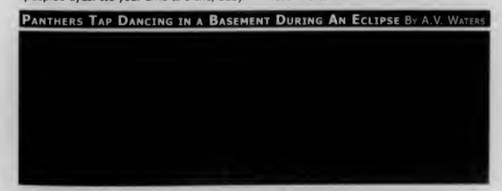
taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Your cute but not in a human kind of way, more like an elf or a frightened squirrel.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You are in a Fri-daze. Snap out of it and crank it into beast-mode.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Make a suit of armor from aluminum and bathe in sunlight. Aim your reflection into people's eyes. It's your time to shine, baby.

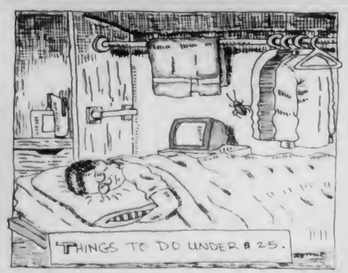
leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
You always give the people what they want and then some. You really are the best.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Today will bring you challenges, fight them off with Jazz Hands. Jazz Hands are so powerful they have to be capitalized.



libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You have groped your last neighborhood pet, chill out and get a hobby creepster.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Being excessively skinny and having a giant collarbone is a recipe for success as a singer. e.g. Celine Dion



sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Hey Dumbledork, get your nose out of the fantasy magic book and join the rest of us muggles.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
This weekend will find you happy and healthy, it will leave you haggard with your head in a toilet.

PANTHERS TAP DANCING IN A BASEMENT DURING AN ECLIPSE BY A.V. WATERS

LABRAT BY RICHARD MARTELLY

DEC 10 2007

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 2007 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Forging ahead vs. Marist

Minutewomen host Maine | Page 13

EVANESCENCE FILLS THE VOID | PAGE 5

THE MASSACHUSETTS

DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

❄ WINTRY MIX: HI: 37 LO: 20 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2007

Final Four awaits

Members of the Massachusetts men's soccer team celebrate their 2-1 win over Illinois-Chicago in yesterday's national quarterfinal match at Rudd Field. The Minutemen advanced to the College Cup, and will take on Ohio State in the national semifinals on Friday in Cary, N.C. See page 10 for coverage of UMass's run to the Final Four.

HP intends to aid UM group

BY TIM SABIN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

On Nov. 30, the National Science Foundation's Center for Collaborative and Adaptive Sensing of the Atmosphere (CASA), led by the University of Massachusetts, announced that the technology company Hewlett Packard (HP) agreed to join its industrial advisory board.

By accepting this position, the Palo Alto, Calif., computer firm will assist CASA with new computing strategies for its variety of programs aimed at improving weather analysis and prediction.

CASA consists of a diversity of engineers, computer scientists, meteorologists, sociologists, graduate and undergraduate students, and industry and government partners from around the area. UMass is the leading institution in this project, and it works together with other colleges such as the University of Oklahoma, Colorado State University, and the University of Puerto Rico to try and improve their works.

With HP on the advisory board, CASA and faculty members are looking forward to the help.

"I am delighted that HP is joining CASA as industrial affiliate partner. I look forward to building on our long-standing ties with HP and the software research lab," said Prashant Shenoy, a UMass computer science faculty member.

CASA as a group conducts fundamental research, develops tech-

See CASA on page 2

Project examines youth vote obstacles

BY FRANK VITALI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Many restrictive voting practices are depressing already-low youth voting numbers, according to a study released last Tuesday by the Student PIRG's New Voters Project.

The New Voters Project, a non-partisan program aimed at increasing student turnout at the polls, studied voting trends in Arizona and New Mexico, two states with exceptionally restrictive voting laws, and compiled a report titled "Restrictive Voter Registration Laws: Impacts and Short Term Mitigation Strategies."

New Mexico law requires third-party registration agents to swear an oath to obey all election laws to a local county clerk. New Mexico also limits the number of voter registration forms any third-party registration organizations can obtain at a time.

Arizona requires a person registering for the first time to provide an Arizona state driver's license number. In lieu of such a number, the prospective voter may present another document verifying citizenship, such as a birth certificate along with "supporting legal documentation (i.e. marriage certificate)."

The author of the study pointed out that most college students would be unlikely to have such documents with them at school, making it harder to register.

By comparison, Massachusetts allows citizens to register without identification, though if they do not present ID when they register, they must show identification when they vote for the first time in a federal election. Acceptable identification must include the voters name and address at which they are registered to vote, and include driver's licenses, current utility bills, paychecks or even bank statements.

David J. Rosenfield, the study's author and director of the Student PIRG's national program, assured that these

See VOTER PROJECT on page 2

Bookstore donates to UMass

Community members purchase books from the Jeffrey Amherst Bookshop in Amherst center on Saturday. The bookstore donated 10 percent of the day's proceeds to benefit the UMass research libraries.

Howard and Joy Gersten, owners of the Jeffrey Amherst Bookshop, have been recognized for their charitable efforts by the Siegfried Feller Award for Outstanding Service to the Libraries.

On Dec. 8, the bookshop held its fifth annual benefit, where the Gerstens donated 10 percent of their proceeds to the UMass campus libraries.

The fundraiser is held in order to honor the UMass libraries, the only public research libraries in the region.

The proceeds from the benefit will go to improving library facilities to help provide the newest information, resources and services.

According to the Gerstens, the benefit for UMass libraries is a very important event for them.

"We love the library and we wanted to do anything we could to help," said Howard Gersten.

The UMass Amherst campus libraries are open to the general public in addition to students and faculty. The campus libraries also allow borrowing privileges to all adult residents of Massachusetts. UMass Amherst alumni and secondary school students under 18 years old.

The Jeffrey Amherst Bookshop & College Store was founded in 1937 by an Amherst College alum. The bookshop is a general independent bookstore with a specialty in Emily Dickinson and children's books.

Jennifer Heshion

Campus diversity discussed

Arizona prof. lectures at UM

BY KRISTEN HEALY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

President-elect of the Association for the Study of Higher Education Jeffrey Milem called for a multi-faceted approach to campus diversity on Thursday as part of a School of Education lecture series.

His speech, titled "Making Diversity Work on Campus: A Research-Based Perspective," targeted the racial dynamics of higher education, some educational outcomes of diversity, what impact college has on students and ways in which faculty incorporate diversity into the classroom.

According to Milem, there are three types of diversity within the college and university systems.

The first is compositional diversity, which is the numerical representation of students, staff and faculty from different ethnic and racial groups. There is also a diversity of interactions, which involves students interacting with diverse people, information and ideas. Finally, there are institutional diversity-related initiatives, like when a campus tries to enact diversity by instituting workshops and diversity class requirements.

Milem felt that all three types allow for more opportunity for students to engage in diversity.

"It's not simply enough to bring diverse people together on campus. You have to actually do something by engaging everyone in interactive processes when they do come together," Milem said.

Milem was adamant however that students who are educated in a more varied environment gaining exposure to different perspectives – not only have more wrinkles and accepting viewpoints, but actually gain material advantages such as better jobs and increased salaries upon graduation.

"If institutions want to remain viable they have to find a way to embrace diversity and let that diversity increase learning on

See DIVERSITY on page 2

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 66

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Stagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Szymczak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Marsea Whooten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenswaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
ASST. PHOTO Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALPHA TAU, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1904 AND THE DAY WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1906. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN AWARDED SEVEN PACEMAKER AWARDS FOR ADVERTISING, EDITORIAL AND PHOTOGRAPHY. CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Katie Huston

COPY EDITOR
Greg McCarthy

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Chris Martin

We'd all like to thank you for reading the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Please let us know what you think by visiting www.DailyCollegian.com.

Young voters limited by laws

VOTER PROJECT from page 1

losses could be offset with a little effort and involvement.

"We had a theory that there are things you can do to mitigate it," he told the Harvard Crimson.

He went on to explain that the New Mexico laws limiting third-party involvement were subject to the interpretation of local registrars. By developing good relations with the registrars, the Student PIRGs were able to attain a little breathing room, and it showed.

The study found that at campuses where the New Voters Project operated, New Mexico youth voted at a rate of 3.8 percent, a rate equal to that of campuses operating in states with less restrictive voting laws.

The report included several recommendations designed to increase youth voter turnout.

Citizens should be able to register and vote wherever they currently choose to reside, with no interference from the state.

Any identification requirements for voter registration or voting should be as broad as possible and should include items that average citizens commonly have in their possession — not items that students do not typically carry.

Citizens should be able to register and vote up to election day and should be given an opportunity to register to vote as soon as they become eligible.

Citizens should be notified in writing, by phone and electronically, anytime their registration status is changed, and citizen-sponsored registration drives should be encouraged, not discouraged.

"Only when we see national reform that removes barriers to student voting," said Rosenfield, "will we fully hear young people's voices in this country."

More information can be found at newvotersproject.org, civicyouth.org and www.sec.state.ma.us/ele/eleidx.htm.

Frank Vitale can be reached at fvitale@student.umass.edu

CASA boosted by HP

CASA from page 1

CASA, which recently teamed up with HP, put this tower on Orchard Hill, a prototype for a radar network intended to transform weather monitoring.

nology and installs prototype-engineering systems based on a technology called "distributed adaptive sensing networks."

These networks help CASA understand and predict atmospheric hazards. By assisting to this work, members of HP feel as if this could be a giant step for the company.

"HP has a good handle on traditional utility computing applications, and we believe that utility computing will involve other classes of applications in the future," said Rich Friedrich, director of Enterprise Systems and Software at HP Labs.

"The relationship enables HP to closely work on and understand a new class of applications represented by CASA."

HP hopes to be a big help for CASA to continue to pursue their vision.

This vision is to create a network of low-cost, and low-power radars that can be easily placed on cell phone towers and rooftops. With HP aboard, CASA plans to continue to work towards their goals and researchers expect to fulfill their vision within a decade.

Tim Subin can be reached at tsubin@student.umass.edu.

Milem: diversity pros clear

DIVERSITY from page 1

campus," said Milem.

Both institutional and external forces shape the diversity climate on campuses, he said.

The institutional forces all affect one another and they include historical legacy of inclusion or exclusion, compositional diversity, psychological climate, behavioral climate and organizational and structural dimension. This includes programs on campus to help students engage in diversity issues.

External forces, including government policies, programs and initiatives such as financial aid, and court cases for affirmative action, often inhibit diversity growth on campuses.

According to Milem's research, more government aid is going toward loans, and not grants and aid for low-income students, like it should be.

"Research shows that loans do not predict success for low income students," said Milem. "And one of the major reasons for having governmental funded financial aid is to make higher education more available to low income students, which can include minorities."

As an educator and advocate for an increase in minority programs within the higher education system, Milem has worked on various studies focusing on how to make diversity on college and university campuses an interactive part of the learning process.

Milem stated some of the ideas were the keys to create unity engage in discussions on campus. These included dialogue, implementation of programs on campus and focusing on processes including diversity challenge between students.

It is also important to enact all students, not just those in the minority, because all students need to be considered when calculating what will and will not work when it comes to creating diversity issues and programs, he said.

Milem is a professor in the Center for the Study of Higher Education at the University of Arizona. He spoke as part of the Deans' Graduate Lecture Series at the School of Education.

Jeffery Milem spoke in Hills South Thursday about the importance of a diverse education, especially on college campuses.

BUY MORE, SAVE MORE
SALE
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12 - FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14
Shop the UMASS Bookstore, and when you buy more, save more!
With any apparel or gift purchase, when you spend:
$50, save 5%
$75, save 10%
$100, save 15%
$150, save 20%
$200, save 25%
* Valid on regular and clearance purchases in apparel and gifts. Visit bkstr.com/umassstore for details.
UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619
efollett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

Across the Nation Around the World

Iranians protest pres.

By Stuart Williams
AFP

TEHRAN — Hundreds of Iranian students held a new protest at Tehran University on Sunday, damaging the main gate to allow outsiders into the campus and denouncing President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran's news agencies reported.

The protesters chanted slogans against the president and carried banners calling for the release of three fellow students who have been held since May in a high-profile case, the Fars news agency and state-run IRNA reported.

"The students marched on the gate and damaged it, and this allowed several non-students to enter the campus. The students chanted slogans and carried protesting placards," IRNA reported.

"Ahmadi-Pinochet, Iran will not become a Chile!" chanted the protesters, playing on the names of the Iranian president and late Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, Fars reported.

Pictures published by the student ISNA agency showed the students crowded round the main gate and bending back its iron railings to allow others through.

A dense crowd of hundreds of people then gathered inside the university grounds for the protest, the pictures showed. "Live Free or Die," read one of the banners.

The students also burned a copy of Kayhan newspaper, the mouthpiece of the clerical establishment and a bitter foe of the Iranian reformist movement, Fars said.

According to IRNA, anti-riot police were stationed outside the campus but did not intervene. The demonstration had been called by the radical wing of the Office to Foster Unity, a reformist student group, it said.

Unusually, state television's news bulletin broadcast brief footage of the protest, showing the students yelling in excitement as they tried to open the university gate.

There has been a string of demonstrations at Tehran universities in past months as students protest against the replacement of liberal professors, authority pressure on activists and the detention of three students.

The demonstration — the second within a week at Tehran University after dozens of students held a similar protest on Tuesday — appeared to be one of the largest held this year.

Mehdi Arabshahi, a member of the central board of the Office to Foster Unity, said that 1,500 people joined the latest protest, although there was no confirmation of this figure from Iranian media.

"They protested against the detention of the students, the oppressive policies of the government and advocated rights for all Iranians," he told AFP, saying that the participants included liberals and ethnic Kurds.

Arabshahi said the protest lasted for more than two hours after starting at 12 p.m. and that it was peaceful.

Iranian students chant beneath pictures of classmates during a demonstration at Tehran University on Sunday, resulting in damage to the main gate, which allowed non-students to enter the campus.

Seafood industry hit

By Hyung-Jin Kim
Associated Press

SHINDURI BEACH, South Korea - Chung Hwan-hyang surveyed the damage from South Korea's worst oil spill, saddened by the knowledge that the oyster farm she and her husband ran for 30 years was lost.

"My oysters are all dead," the 70-year-old woman said Sunday as she and thousands of others cleaned foul-smelling oil from Shinduri Beach. "I cried and cried last night. I don't know what to do."

Some 2.7 million gallons of crude gushed into the ocean after a collision Friday between a barge and a supertanker carrying more than 260,000 tons of crude oil.

For Chung and other residents of Taean County, nearly 100 miles southwest of Seoul, the spill brought despair and shock at how the pollution shattered lives and businesses.

The South Korean government declared a "state of disaster" as the oil slick began hitting the shore early Saturday, coming in waves of mucky, stinking crude. The spill now threatens the livelihood of an area that includes beaches like Shinduri and better-known Mallipo, which is considered one of South Korea's most scenic areas and serves as an important stopover for mallards, great crested grebes and others migrating birds.

More than 20 million tourists a year visit the area, providing an economic boost to the area's 63,800 residents heavily dependent on fishing and seafood farming.

At Mallipo Beach, about a 30-minute drive from Shinduri Beach, raw fish restaurant owner Kim Eung-ku was helping with the cleanup, but said he feared the situation was hopeless.

"We have no choice but to leave this place," he said. "This ocean is dead."

Among those affected by the slick were 181 aquatic farms producing abalone, seaweed, littleneck clams and sea cucumbers, according to Lee Seung-yop, a Taean County official. There are about 4,000 aquatic farmers.

No detailed damage estimates for the area as a whole have been released, though Lee said officials feared it would be substantial.

Ku Bon-chun, chief of a local fishermen's association at Mohang Port near Mallipo, said 32 acres of aquatic farms raising abalone, oysters and other marine life there were all submerged by oil-coated waters.

"I feel like my heart is empty," he said. "These fishing farms are all finished."

He said some fishermen had been hauling in crab catches worth up to $5,400 a day. "But they are all gone," he said.

Tourists shunned the beach, too, because of news of the disaster, said Chun Kwang-ho, who runs a 10-room motel nearby.

"My business is ruined," he said. "People have repeatedly called me to cancel their reservations and ask me about what's going on here."

Chun said that hundreds — maybe thousands — of seagulls and other birds used to come at this time of year to the beach, where tourists would feed them.

"That really looked splendid," he said. "But you see now there are no seagulls and birds at all. Seagulls don't come here because of this terrible smell."

This migratory bird was found covered in oil. The seafood industry is now feeling the spill's effects.

Chun showed two dead birds coated in dark oil. He said they were mallards.

"I feel so bad and sorry for them," he said.

Some of the 7,500 volunteers who helped scoop up the oil from the beach, including civil servants and members of the coast guard, police and military, contended with headaches and nausea from the petroleum's stench.

Still others worked aboard 105 ships along South Korea's western coast trying to clean the sea, plugging the leaks in the tanker, dropping oil fences into the ocean and using chemicals to break up the slick. The nation's previous biggest spill, less than half the size of this one, was in 1995.

The South Korean government has stopped short of promising direct aid, saying any compensation would have to be paid by insurance policies covering the two ships and an international fund that covers oil pollution damage.

Prime Minister Han Duck-soo, however, instructed officials to help afflicted fish and seafood farmers receive quick compensation, his office said in a news release. No details were given.

Chung, the oyster farmer, said her damage would amount to $21,800, with the oil slick appearing just as oyster harvesting had begun.

Can. farmer found guilty of murder, fed victims to pigs

By Rob Gillies
Associated Press

NEW WESTMINSTER, British Columbia — A pig farmer accused of being Canada's worst serial killer was found guilty Sunday of six counts of second-degree murder, which carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison.

The verdict ended the trial of Robert "Willie" Pickton on the first six of 26 murder charges in the deaths of women, most of them prostitutes and drug addicts from a seedy Vancouver neighborhood.

Pickton, 58, was tried for the killings of Mona Wilson, Sereena Abotsway, Marnie Frey, Brenda Wolfe, Andrea Joesbury and Georgina Papin. The defense acknowledged that their remains were found on Pickton's farm outside Vancouver, but denied he was responsible for their deaths.

The jury of seven men and five women began its deliberations Friday night. They had the option of finding Pickton guilty of first-degree murder, second-degree murder or manslaughter or not guilty on any of the six counts.

Pickton listened to the verdict with his head bowed. He will receive a mandatory sentence of life in prison and will not be eligible for parole for at least 10 years. The only significant testimony of witness Lynn Ellingson, who said she walked in on a blood-covered Pickton as Papin's body dangled from a chain in the farm's slaughterhouse.

Prosecution witness Andrew Bellwood had testified that Pickton told him how he strangled his alleged victims and fed their remains to his pigs.

Last week, Judge James Williams reviewed the transcript of a video-tape in which Pickton is heard telling an undercover police officer that he had planned to kill one more woman before stopping at 50, taking a break and then killing another 25 women.

"I was going to do one more; make it an even 50," Pickton told the officer, who had been planted in the accused killer's cell and gained his trust.

A day earlier, Papin's three sisters cried and clutched each other's hands in court while the judge reviewed the testimony of witness Lynn Ellingson, who said she walked in on a blood-covered Pickton as Papin's body dangled from a chain in the farm's slaughterhouse.

Prosecution witness Andrew Bellwood had testified that Pickton told him how he strangled his alleged victims and fed their remains to his pigs.

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM
• Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
• More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
• Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
• Post unlimited online listings
• Little to no spam
• By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

DEC 10 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself." Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Tis the season to rethink giving

Katy Bruck

Driving down Route 9 toward Northampton, I witnessed something the other day that I found both jarring and familiar: a large Jeep Wrangler with a Christmas bow wrapped around it. Although, like most of my generation, I've grown up watching car commercials that attempt to cater to that henceforth-invisible-to-me segment of the population that actually considers a motor vehicle a feasible Christmas present, I'd never actually witnessed the idea in 'real life.'

Though Christmas has, much to the delight of cynics around the globe, become burdened with the association of unburdened commercialism, I see nothing shameful in wanting to go a little nuts on family and friends if you have the means. Christmas provides a perfect excuse, for those of us who don't take the origins of the holiday too literally, to appreciate the important people in our lives via gifts. I mean, Jesus got frankincense and myrrh; why not give your mom a cashmere scarf?

But seeing that big Jeep wrapped up like a Tonka truck really solidified an experience for me. This Christmas, for the first time since coming to college, I've actually been able to save up a decent amount of money, and was able to actually buy (not stitch, mold or glue) presents for my large and deserving family.

I was met with a minor dilemma when I reached the little check box next to my grandfather's name on my list of people to buy for. This is a man who grew up during the Depression. In his own house, he voluntarily chooses a bedroom so small it makes the 9-by-8 singles in Sylvan look like presidential suites. His idea of fun is repairing fences, spreading mulch, fixing electrical things. In general, this man either has everything he needs, or the things he would find useful involve large piles of dirt or tractor parts.

Despite the meaning attached to it, handing someone a flimsy cardboard card instead of a box tied with ribbon just doesn't feel as satisfying.

So, stealthily stealing the idea of a friend, I decided to purchase something I thought he would really appreciate: I made a donation in his name to a charitable organization. The Heifer Organization is a charity that works to end hunger around the world by providing livestock (like chickens, cows, sheep and water buffalo) and seedlings to Third World communities and teaching sustainable agriculture and animal care to the families who receive theses animals and plants as gifts – funded by the donations of formerly stumped Christmas givers.

This column could easily turn into some sanctimonious speech about how innovative I was in choosing such an altruistic gift. But, since I already admitted that I hadn't even considered the Heifer Foundation until a friend reminded me of its existence, I don't think I could pull that off. It did, however, make me really take a step back and look at all my yet-to-be-wrapped presents and think about what they really meant.

Despite the meaning attached to it, handing someone a flimsy cardboard card instead of a box tied with ribbon just doesn't feel as satisfying. Around this time of year, I think everyone's had those moments where they fantasize about that day sometime in the future when they'll be rich enough to give someone a car, or a house, or their favorite celebrity to serenade them with "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas."

Let me just connect an interesting story I read in The New York Times. Apparently, Honda has actually designed and has ready for production a four-door sedan that runs on hydrogen fuel cells. The photo and design analysis of the car looks very much like any other modern sedan. It has a 270-mile driving radius, it keeps up with gasoline-powered vehicles with no problem. It's even already been leased to several hundred California drivers. The only problem, however, is that there isn't the infrastructure anywhere in this country to support hydrogen vehicles.

This might seem unrelated to my earlier point that charitable or thoughtful gifts never seem as impressive as cars wrapped with bows. Imagine the internal surge of satisfaction you'd get whipping a cover off of a Honda FCX Clarity. You'd get that initial mouth-covering, jumping-up-and-down, squealing reaction of giving someone a car, but then you'd get to sit down and explain to your mom or dad or grandparent that not only is this gift impressive, but it just might save the world.

I guess it's too bad that, even if you could afford to give such a well-rounded, awe-inspiring gift, you still couldn't change that in most of America. There's no room for gifts that will really change the world. It makes me not feel so bad about my little cardboard card. Even if I could do something big and extravagant, I don't think it would have the impact I'd want it to.

Katy Bruck is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at kbruck@student.umass.edu

Unsportsmanlike journalism

Thomas Sitzer

In the wide world of sports, there is no aspect of the game held in greater regard than sportsmanship. Any player with a sense of decency and respect for the game they play believes personal integrity is the saving grace from all the love and hate of fans and critics.

When athletes cross into the professional realm, they have to put up with intensified criticism and boos and cheers, all things that may motivate somebody to act obnoxiously. But our favorite professional athletes are those who carry themselves with respect and seem to perform with an invisible shield from provocations to act unsportsmanlike.

Likewise, in the wide world of media, journalism is guided by a set of ethical procedures. These standards are intended to protect journalists from the persuasion of cheap attention grabbing, money scheming crap that we often stumble across in newspapers, online blogging and in the case of my rant, polling.

Friday, Dec. 7, I SPN, the "worldwide leader in sports," asked us in an online poll if we'd rather see at the Steelers beat the Patriots, b) Johan Santana traded to anyone but the Red Sox, or c) Kevin Garnett blow out his kneecaps.

Besides the appalling condition that there was no option to wish the worst to the Yankees, the tastelessness with which this poll was formulated is disrespectful. Kevin Garnett of the Celtics is a moral, inspiring player. He has brought a struggling sports team with great potential together to admirably crush the opposition. The spirit he brings out in his teammates becomes a tangible presence from the court into the stands. If the Sox bring faith, then the Celtics bring out spirit.

If there were a red flag to wave in the media, here is one example where it would be thrown.

In an outright personal attack on Garnett, I hold ESPN responsible for a formal, public apology. Mark Murphy of The Boston Herald quoted the 6'11" forward.

Garnett, his mouth ajar in disbelief upon hearing about the poll after last night's game, recovered long enough to say, "Wow, that's really distasteful, man. Man, I mean, that's my life, my career. You don't joke about something like that."

Garnett is absolutely right, and I hope people are aware of the severity of a proposal like that. Athletes rely on their bodies. They build them and tune them to standards that we normal people can barely appreciate. They invest their lives in perfecting the human form, and a suggestion so base and vile should be appropriately addressed.

If there were a red flag to wave in the media, here is one example where it would be thrown. You can't make jokes like that. Besides, there is a massive psychological aspect to professional athletics. Games are won and lost on confidence and crowds, players dominate by instilling fear in other players. And look at all the fascinating careers in all different sports that were ruined by blown-out knees, from figure skating to football.

I think it is worth the while to mention the superstitious nature of the thing. All Boston sports fans are durable, loyal and highly superstitious. So is Garnett, apparently; Murphy reported that he walked to the nearest door (wooden) and proceeded to knock.

Sports journalism has seen a slew of bad taste lately – take, for example, the Canon camera lens advertisements. Football coverage rules require photojournalists to, wear bright orange vests with the brand name Canon slapped across the back. After touching up the images, Canon took unfair advantage of a mixed up rule, violating journalistic ethics by incorporating it into their advertising campaign.

The recently updated ESPN.com page 2 poll asked "Who should win the Heisman Trophy?"

Who cares? As if the Heisman has recently produced anything in the NFL, and as if Tebow wasn't going to win it. Can we really let them off the hook that easy?

I think that we will. But, as an optimist, I like to find the good in things.

At least somebody out there was respectful enough to cry foul, ensuring a speedy edit to the worldwide leader in sports' big mouth. I also think that Garnett is too great a man to fall victim to scare tactics and slander.

It is time to take a cue from the harmless bull that we have to put up with in athletics (and, dare I say, in political discourse) and start talking about real, honest things: character, will and respect for the competition. Can these human qualities overshadow the less flattering antics of corporate media? Let's hope so.

Thomas Sitzer is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at tsitzer@student.umass.edu.

Wanted:

ASSISTANT ED/OP WEB EDITOR TO FIELD LETTERS TO THE EDITOR AND MANAGE EDITORIAL FORUM.

NOT SPECIFIC TO SHORT-HAIRED MALES WITH QUESTION MARKS ON THEIR FACES.

APPLICATION DEADLINE IS TODAY!

INQUIRE AT EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM.

Regarding a rogue nation

Greg Collins

Should we be relieved that Iran halted its nuclear weapons program, according to a recent National Intelligence Estimate? The NIE, consolidating information from the federal government's sixteen intelligence agencies, explained that Iran had terminated the program in 2003 and had not restarted the program as of mid-2007.

The official 150-page classified report included over 1,000 pieces of evidence leading to this conclusion. For instance, intercepted communications showed that Iranian military officers expressed concern that the program had been shut down years earlier. Those resistant to this method of wiretapping to uncover sensitive information about our enemies should seriously reconsider their position in light of the NIE's revelations.

The grim reality is that the report's conclusions do not acquit Iran from its past patterns of deceiving the international community about its pursuit toward nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles. Only by looking at the Iranian government's historical trends of downright dishonesty can we form an educated assessment in the present about their contemporary nuclear ambitions.

Iran has lied unceasingly to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN nuclear watchdog overseeing worldwide nuclear development, for decades. For example, as journalist Bill Gertz has reported, Iran claimed that the heavy-water nuclear reactors at the Arak facility in Iran were being used to produce radioisotopes for medical and industrial purposes. Yet there was no sign that "hot cells," containers used as protection for researchers in pharmaceutical production, were being designed. Iran later claimed that the hot cells would be developed in another facility at Arak.

This inconsistency exemplified Iran's systematic pattern of providing suspicious excuses for pursuing weapons-grade material. In light of the second excuse, IAEA officials still maintain that the Arak facility is being used to develop plutonium, an explosive ingredient for nuclear bombs.

Moreover, in 2003 Iran asserted that uranium enrichment was not taking place at a Tehran plant inspected by the IAEA, which later concluded this was a blatant lie. Iran later admitted that the plant had produced centrifuge parts, which were used in enrichment tests one year before.

Major world powers have further encouraged this dishonesty, which demonstrates the lack of a serious commitment from the international community to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions. China sold large shipments of ballistic missiles to Iran in the early 1990s, and it collaborated with the Iranian nuclear energy ministry to build a nuclear reactor in the western part of the country. In addition, Russia in 1995 secured a nuclear deal with Iran to build nuclear reactors at the Bushehr power plant.

Why should we assume Iran has departed from this pattern of deception and covert nuclear operations?

Why should we assume Iran has departed from this pattern of deception and covert nuclear operations? Regardless of whether Iran has supposedly halted its program or not, it does not change the fact that it continues to enrich uranium – a major step toward developing weapons-grade material for a nuke. As the NIE emphasized, Iran successfully installed centrifuges at Natanz, an area with prominent uranium enrichment facilities.

Furthermore, some may accept Iran's claims that it is pursuing nuclear energy for civilian purposes. But its past trend of dishonesty, accompanied by the fact that Iran already has large amounts of fuel at Bushehr and huge oil reserves in general, reveal this belief to be remarkably naïve.

It is crucial to recognize the reality that Iran has not abandoned its plan to develop nuclear weapons. But alarmists who claim that a U.S. military attack on the country is imminent should take a step back. Of course the United States is preparing to deal with Iran decisively, either diplomatically and/or militarily. Any rational person who is the leader of the most powerful country in the world and is responsible for the safety of 300 million people and Americans overseas would do so unequivocally.

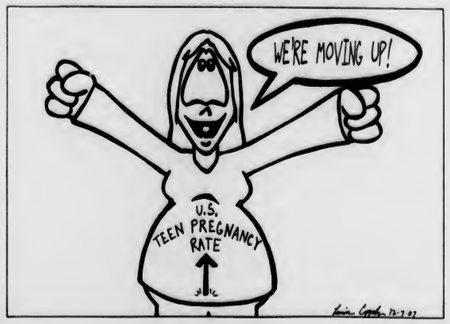
But just because the U.S. is preparing contingency plans does not mean it will implement them in the near future. As the NIE elucidated, it will take at least seven or eight years before Iran has the capacity and resources to produce and reprocess enough plutonium for a nuclear weapon.

Additionally, the recent intelligence estimate does not reflect poorly on the Bush Administration or the CIA as much as on the insidious deceptiveness of the Iranian regime. Keep in mind that U.S. intelligence would not be nearly as flawed if Iran had been truthful to the UN and the IAEA in the past. No person should claim the Iraq War violated international law without first saying that Iraq and Iran, in a ubiquitous and deceitful fashion, had rejected international standards intended to monitor nuclear weapons development.

All in all, the NIE should not be perceived to clear Iran of any wrongdoing. If anything, it reminds us that we must confront, without fear, the geopolitical realities of rogue nations. And to dismiss Iran's pursuit toward nuclear weapons is to deny reality.

Greg Collins writes regularly on Tuesdays. He can be reached at gcollins@student.umass.edu

DAILY COLLEGIAN READER POLL



The Daily Collegian has a new weekend edition. What do you think of it?

☐ It looks great!

☐ I liked the old broadsheet better.

☐ What's a tabloid?

Cast your vote online at www.dailycollegian.com!

DEC 10 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Evanescence fills the void

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

Loud guitars and power chords entertained the Mullins Center Saturday night as Evanescence played to a small crowd, with opening acts Sick Puppies and Julien-K.

The Grammy-nominated "Sweet Sacrafice" by Evanescence was a highlight of the show. The song showcases Amy Lee's ability to create catchy melodies backed by a pounding of guitars, fast riffs and a palpable sense of energy.

Lee took the dimly lit stage alone to begin the set. A black grand piano graced the front of the stage, where Lee sat alone, gently playing the first measures of "Taking Over Me." The song encompassed what makes the band so popular. A mix of soft piano, Lee's smooth voice and a sudden crash of instrumentals made the performance exciting for an enthusiastic floor audience that ate up every minute.

The show at the Mullins Center was the second to last of a year-long tour for Evanescence. It was hard to believe that the band had not taken a break for such a period of time, the whole group looked as though there was no place they would rather be.

At the end of the night it was clear why Evanescence has sold nearly 15 million records worldwide.

Evanescence was backed up well by Sick Puppies, a group that carries three members, including a female bassist who demonstrated why the Australian band has made it to the American stage.

The lead singer for Sick Puppies made an effort throughout their set to involve the crowd. The front-man shouted to the audience for more energy, using the band momentum for the remainder of their set and transforming the quiet crowd into a lively one.

Sick Puppies showed their experience. The band has played together since the age of 15. With impressive guitar riffs and a generally talented group, a crowd that might have been skeptical about a band with a name like "Sick Puppies" came away from the show remembering a good performance.

At seven sharp the show started with a techno-influenced Julien-K that included a surreal band look. The lead-singer, Ryan Shuck, moved his hips in a pair of skin-tight black pants and a slick pair of sunglasses. His shirt would only last through the first couple of songs.

While every band played enthusiastically, their sets were moderately received by a small crowd in the arena.

Michael Phillis can be reached at mphillis@student.umass.edu

PHOTOS BY MICHAEL PHILLIS/COLLEGIAN – DESIGN BY JORDAN MARTIN

Chopra explains Bollywood to America

Film critic brings to life the ups and downs of the Indian movie industry

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Correspondent

If you've only seen one Bollywood movie, it's likely he was in it. If you've never seen one, pick one up at the store and he's probably in it. With over 50 films to his name, Shah Rukh Khan has dominated the world of Bollywood for the past 15 years.

"KING OF BOLLYWOOD"
BY ANUPAMA CHOPRA
B+

This is a story about much more than an overly confident and always energetic actor. It is about the culture of Bollywood

Author Anupama Chopra has previously published three books, and her articles about Bollywood appear in several publications.

Anupama Chopra's new novel, "King of Bollywood," traces Shah Rukh's transformation from a young boy living on the edge of poverty into a superstar. Her storytelling is exciting and smart, yet honest, revealing both the successes and failures of the actor.

Chopra makes her living as a film critic and journalist. Her past works include a few novels about Bollywood films, such as "Sholay: The Making of a Classic" (2003). She has also written for numerous American publications about the Indian film industry.

"King of Bollywood" is her first attempt at something broader. Through Shah Rukh's fairytale story, Chopra is also able to give the reader a closer look at the industry of Indian film.

Chopra seamlessly blends the metamorphosis of Shah Rukh into a star with the similar change of Bollywood and of India itself.

This is a story about much more than an overly confident and always energetic actor. It is about the culture of Bollywood as a whole.

As Chopra artfully makes clear, Bollywood is about more than just movies. It's about connecting people, preserving traditions and the importance of being honorable. Essentially, it tells people how to live.

Nonetheless, a literary work of genius it is not. The language is simple, at times bordering on juvenile, but this simplicity keeps it fast-paced and accessible to readers. It's clear from her writing style that most of Chopra's experience is in journalism.

The style works in "King of Bollywood," however, because Chopra's high-speed writing matches the high-speed way of Indian cinema. She flits between describing various actors, films or directors in the same way that actors move from set to set, often working on three or four films in one day.

Chopra's detailed description of the Hindi film industry is bound to be of interest to any lover of cinema, but her energetic style makes her novel something that could be interesting to anyone. The book is written for an American audience, and is further directed toward those who have minimal knowledge of the industry.

Those who don't know much about Indian cinema may get confused among the plethora of actors, directors and producers discussed. To counteract this, Chopra has kindly provided a "Cast of Characters," explaining who each person is and their importance in the business. She has clearly catered this book to the average American with little outside knowledge. Moreover, the novel itself goes into such depth about each person and movie discussed that the reader will never feel lost.

What is so refreshing about Chopra's novel is its honesty. She does not gloss over the harshness and ugliness of the business of Bollywood. Business is business. Bollywood is corrupt. It is a world where family connection is the only way you'll ever get anywhere, and Chopra is not afraid to reveal this to the reader. One entire chapter is devoted to the Mumbai mafia's involvement in the industry. In the not too distant past, mobsters easily controlled actors and directors.

Just as Chopra refuses to skim the darker side of Bollywood, she also refuses to present Shah Rukh in a light of perfection. He is wildly successful as well as kind to others, but he is confident almost to a fault. His arrogance is clear to everyone, yet Chopra makes it clear that it was likely also a key factor in his success.

However, Shah Rukh was also, at times, a failure. The novel divulges his flops, his failed production company and his inability to break from the romantic hero character that audiences loved so much. Nonetheless, this rags-to-riches tale has a feel-good quality that will keep the reader wanting to turn page after page.

This novel will change the way you think about Bollywood films. Beneath the breathtaking colors and lighthearted songs, the world of Bollywood can be harsh. Chopra rightfully refers to it as the "seductive world of Indian cinema," for it can bring both pleasure and pain.

Michelle Fredette can be reached at mfredett@student.umass.edu.

Anupama Chopra's novel "King of Bollywood" chronicles the career of actor Shah Rukh Khan. Khan is one of the leading actors in India's Bollywood film industry.

DEC 10 2007

CASH FOR BOOKS

Buyback Locations and Times

Textbook Annex
Monday - Friday, December 10th - 14th 9AM - 4PM
Saturday, December 15th 11AM – 4PM
Monday - Thursday, December 17th - 20th 9AM – 5PM
Friday, December 21st 9AM – 4PM

Southwest- Hampden Lobby
Monday - Thursday, December 17th - 20th 10AM – 5PM
Friday, December 21st 10AM – 1PM

Commons Corner Commons
Monday - Friday, December 10th - 14th 9AM - 4PM
Saturday, December 15th 11AM – 4PM
Monday - Thursday, December 17th - 20th 9AM – 5PM
Friday, December 21st 9AM – 2PM

home of HALF BACK GUARANTEE
We'll pay half of the purchase price of textbooks for books with this sticker guaranteed. See stores for details.

UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619

efollett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

We want books with this sticker!

790

Four teams remaining

SOCCER from page 10

and past a diving Jovan Bubonja.

"It was a set piece again, what we're good at. Greg hit it to me, I just came across the middle from the back post and hit it opposite corner. The goalie didn't see it coming," DeSantis said.

"Before the goal, they were kind of taking it to us. But we knew it would come. We wanted it more."

The Flames also capitalized on set pieces, using a corner kick to score their lone goal of the afternoon.

Charlie Trout lined up a corner kick to the left of Simmons. UMass back Chris Brown cleared the initial service, but it fell right to the feet of defender Mike Griffin. The junior didn't hesitate, immediately lining the ball into the top left of the net off a half-volley from 20 yards out to even the score at 1-1.

"I saw the shot, but the kid just ripped it to the upper corner. I saw it perfectly. I saw him shoot it, I saw it sail right by me," Simmons said.

Following DeSantis' goal, the Minutemen held off the Flame offense and prevented any scoring chances from close range. But moments after the UIC goal, the Flames rode the momentum and repeatedly tested Simmons and the UMass defense.

In the 71st minute, midfielder Cesar Zambrano dribbled into the UMass penalty area and pulled a defender with him. Pavle Dundjer trailed the play, and Zambrano passed the ball to Dundjer with the back his foot. Dundjer lined a low, hard shot on net, but Simmons dove to his left and corralled the attempt to maintain the tie.

"UIC played incredibly well today. They made us battle for everything that we got," Simmons said. "They certainly took control of the game in the last five minutes. I was trying to keep all the backs as high as I could because if they dropped too much, it would've been a problem. They did a great job in front of me. And even though [the Flames] had a lot of possession, they didn't get a lot of good shots on goal."

Luck also made it clear which side it stood on late in the game. UIC's Alen Husidic lined a half-volley toward the UMass net. Simmons leapt to deflect the ball as it sailed over the cross bar to the delight of the 1,963 in attendance.

Both teams struggled for possession in the first half of the game, trying to dictate the pace of the match for the 19th time this season, a game featuring UMass entered the break in a scoreless tie. Freshman Stuart Amick broke that tie less than three minutes into the second half. Once again, Cirillo factored into the play.

Cirillo streaked quickly up the right side of the field and crossed the ball into the box. Sophomore Mark DeSantis headed it on to Amick who tucked it into the net for his fifth goal of the season.

"The scouting report on [UIC] was that balls played in from the wings were what the keeper had trouble with," Koch said. "The gameplan was to try to get those services in because we felt that gave us the best chance to make some plays."

Joe Melton can be reached at jmelton@student.umass.edu.

Senior midfielder Greg Cirillo assisted on both UMass goals Sunday afternoon in the 2-1 victory over Illinois-Chicago. The Minutemen advance to the College Cup in Cary, N.C., to play Ohio State Friday.

UMass keeper comes up big over Flames

SIMMONS from page 10

He easily could have had a greater number of saves yesterday and in every other game this year, had he not mastered his aggressive brand of goalkeeping.

Yet even when the Flames managed to get the ball on net, Simmons was in position to make a save. None was more impressive than his jumping tip on a one-time shot during the second half.

The results of his positioning were evident on UIC set pieces and when the Flames attempted to cross the ball into the 18-yard box from either side. Several attempts required Simmons to make leaping catches while avoiding a collision with UIC players.

He also made multiple diving saves on balls that seemed destined for the goal.

The UMass defense only got into trouble when it struggled to clear the ball out of the box. UIC forced a corner kick 14 minutes into the second half, but the ball was headed away from the net by defender Chris Brown.

With what happened next, Simmons had little chance to prevent his team from losing its one-goal lead. Flame defender Mike Griffin launched a forceful shot into the upper-right corner of the net that was nearly in the netting before Simmons could react.

"I had a good angle from the bench and [Griffin] ripped a laser," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "I don't think many people could have stopped that."

But on the Flames' four other corner kicks, Simmons and the defense had better success. With eight minutes left in the match, Brown again forced the ball out of the box, which prevented the Flames from getting a direct shot on net.

"Every coach tells their players that if a ball gets hit out after a corner to put it back in," Simmons said. "I finally we got it out [on UIC's last corner kick] and that was probably a lucky point in the game. Sometimes you need the ball to bounce your way."

Simmons is also one of the team's most vocal leaders. Even from his position on the defensive third, the captain can be heard shouting to his teammates all the way down the field. He tends to be the most vocal while the Minutemen are on offense.

Since all four defenders play an integral role in the offensive zone, the coordination between the backs and Simmons is important to avoid getting caught out of position on any counterattack possibilities.

On one corner kick during the second half, Doug Rappaport lined up on the right corner arc to take the kick, with the 6-foot-5 Kenny Cook in front of the net. That left only Brown and Dan Lepone to maintain the team's defensive posture while Cook and Rappaport sprinted back to their primary positions.

Meanwhile, the keeper barked instructions to Lepone about his positioning to minimize UIC's counterattacking potential.

Michael King can be reached at mking@student.umass.edu.

Contributions from reserves key in win

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

In the Massachusetts women's basketball team's 74-55 triumph over Maine Saturday, the UMass starters made their presence known. They shot .489 percent from the field, scoring 58 points. But one of the unsung stories of the game was the performance of the team's alternates.

The Maroon and White bench saw a combined 45 minutes in the trumping of the Black Bears (1-7) and hit 48 percent of its shots. When UMass (4-5) removed its starters in the middle of the second half, the subs stepped in and did an impressive job. After the game, everybody was talking about how much the bench contributes to the team's victories this season.

"They did great, especially at the end of the first half. We were getting a lot of stops and we were able to get the offense flowing," senior captain Kate Mills said. "We're a great offensive team, so to have that lift off the bench, that's something we really need to see.

"And just our bench enthusiasm, too, during the game. I think we're one of the most exciting benches to watch, so it's good."

UMass coach Marnie Dacko was also pleased with the bench's performance, but, in typical Dacko fashion, she said there is still room for improvement.

"I think they contributed. I think they still have to learn," she said. "I still want to give them minutes."

She mentioned that bench players need to start doing on offense what Pam Rosanio does. Dacko said the senior guard moves without the ball better than any player she has seen in a long time and that her intensity and grit around the court get her open to take plenty of shots. She said her subs need the same kind of agility as Rosanio in order to get more scoring opportunities.

Dacko was quick to mention the performance of freshman Cerie Mosgrove off the bench. The Needham, Mass., native is one of the better shooters on the team, despite taking just 14 shots this season. The first Massachusetts native to play on a Dacko-coached UMass squad, Mosgrove had five points in 12 minutes in Saturday's win, going 2-of-4 from the floor, including 1-of-3 from the 3-point line.

Dacko said the 19-year-old is getting some crucial games under her belt and is starting to understand what the college game takes offensively. Mosgrove could've been happier with her performance.

"I think I could've done better. I think defensively, I haven't been playing very well," she said. "I think I did all right [offensively]. I looked for my shot and tried to get things going."

She added, however, that the bench as a whole has played more derfully and is a huge part of its success.

"The bench brings a lot to the table, beside what the starters do," Mosgrove said. "I mean, obviously the starters are all excellent players, but coming off the bench I think you get kind of fired up and you see the team doing so well and you really want to keep that up and keep bringing the intensity that they brought."

She said the bench players pride themselves on being the ones that spring off the sidelines to bring back some liveliness if a starter gets injured or has an off-game.

She said she is confident the alternates will continue to be a sparkplug for the team. She does have been all season and help improve the team's record as the season progresses.

Dominic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

UM rolls over Black Bears

Minutewomen remain perfect at Mullins Center in 2007

By Mike Connors
Collegian Staff

If you're the Massachusetts women's basketball team it's good to be in the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen remain undefeated in their four home games this season.

Maine (1-7) kept the game close until the end of the first half. An Emily Rousseau jumper cut the UMass lead to 27-26, but the Minutewomen finished the half on a 9-0 run and prevailed, 74-55 Saturday afternoon.

UMass	74
Maine	55

UMass (4-5) travels to Philadelphia to take on Villanova on Tuesday.

Pam Rosanio led the Minutewomen with 19 points and also finished with a game-high six assists.

"When you look at how she played, she made the offense go," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I mean, she hustles, she's gritty, she really works and she moves better than anybody. I've seen in a long time without the ball. Hats off to her and hopefully she can continue."

The Minutewomen received some contributions off the bench in addition to the starting lineup that saw three players score in double figures. Cerie Mosgrove played 12 minutes off the bench and scored five points.

Dacko wants these bench players to continue to give significant minutes off the bench, especially to lower the starters' minutes. Whitney McDonald began the season in the starting lineup, but is now coming off the bench and put up a productive game with three rebounds and four assists.

Coming into the contest, Kim Benton was struggling with her 3-point shot. All but eight of Benton's 52 field goal attempts this year have come from beyond the arc, and she got into a good rhythm against Maine.

The sophomore point guard, now starting with Sakera Young coming off the bench, was 4-of-7 from the floor, including 3-of-6 from behind the 3-point line. She finished third on the team with 13 points.

"She's always in working doing extra shooting," Rosanio said, "and Kate and I always joke like, you know, 'stop shooting and maybe it will help them go in,' but today she was in a rhythm and knocking them down."

Kate Mills tallied 16 points and took the majority of the shots in the beginning of the game. Dacko wants Mills to be taking more shots, but was hoping she'd drive to the hoop rather than settle for outside jumpers.

Sandra Vaitkute scored 12 points for Maine and came into the game averaging four points per night. The sophomore center is 6-foot-6 and was able to use her size to shoot over the significantly shorter Minutewoman defenders.

UMass hasn't solved its rebounding problems yet. They were out-rebounded by the Black Bears, 34-29, and 9-5 on the offensive glass. The team is usually relatively even with the opponent on the defensive glass, but have struggled on the offensive rebounding aspect of the game.

Freshman Stephanie Lawrence is starting to play a significant role in the rotation but went down with an ankle injury near the end of the second half. She told Dacko after the game that she'd be okay. The injury first appeared to be to the knee, but it looks less severe than it originally appeared.

In addition to the rebounding problem, UMass still needs to work on its defense of the 3-point line. Maine's Tanna Ross led the Black Bears with a game-high 20 points. She did most of her damage with her 6-of-8 effort behind the arc.

When players like Ross are routinely hitting shots from 3-point territory, it's good to extend the defense and make the player drive to the hoop. On her two-point field goal attempts, Ross went 1-of-5.

UMass distributed the ball well, registering 24 assists on its 27 baskets. They limited their turnovers to 14, while Maine had 26 turnovers and 15 assists.

Maine used a three-guard system to start the game, but none of the three players scored a single point. Maine's Amanda Tesky-bury, Kris Younan and Kristin Baker combined to go 0-for-10 from the field. Maine's other two starters combined for 10 points, while three bench players scored in double-figures. No one else scored for Maine, while UMass had 10 different players score.

Game Notes

Kate Mills' two blocks were the only blocks in the game. She now lead the team with 22.

UMass freshman Teya Wright played eight minutes and fouled out. The Minutewomen opened the game with a 6-0 lead, but Maine responded with a 13-4 run to take an 18-17 lead with just under nine minutes remaining.

Mike Connors can be reached at mjconnor@student.umass.edu.

Office of National Scholarship Advisement
ONSA
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Scholarship Information Night
FIND YOUR PATHWAY TO SUCCESS
All UMass Amherst sophomores & juniors are invited.

Tuesday, December 11
5:30 p.m., Memorial Hall

Learn how to apply and receive merit-based scholarships, such as the Rhodes, Leaders in the Making, Fulbright, and Life Member Scholarship for Internships.

There are over $500,000 in scholarships available each year!

The Office of Field Experience will also discuss the many benefits of internships and co-ops.

FREE PIZZA • FREE REFRESHMENTS
Space is limited, to register visit UMassAlumni.com/students

For more information about scholarships, visit UMassAlumni.com/students and www.comcol.umass.edu/academics/onsa

The Daily Collegian WANTS YOU

WE JUST LAUNCHED A NEW CLASSIFIED WEB SITE (UMASSFIST.COM) AND WE ARE LOOKING FOR ONE STUDENT TO SERVE AS THE SALES/MARKETING DIRECTOR TO DRIVE REVENUE AND TRAFFIC TO THE WEB SITE.

WHO ARE WE LOOKING FOR?
YOU. THE COLLEGE STUDENT LOOKING FOR THE BEST SALES AND MARKETING EXPERIENCE AROUND

WHAT'S IT IN FOR ME?
FOR EVERY PAID LISTING THAT IS PLACED YOU WILL EARN A COMMISSION FROM THE WEB SITE DEVELOPMENT COMPANY, CAMPUS AVE. THE COMPANY WILL PAY YOU 20 PERCENT OF THE COMMISSION YOU EARN FROM THE DAILY COLLEGIAN ON EACH PAID LISTING.

DURATION.
INITIALLY FOR 2 MONTHS AND THEN THE DAILY COLLEGIAN AND CAMPUS AVE WILL DETERMINE IF THEY WOULD LIKE TO EXTEND THE CONTRACT.

PLEASE CONTACT GREG EDSON AT
greg@campusave.com
INCLUDE NAME, TELEPHONE, MAJOR AND YEAR AND A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF YOUR QUALIFICATIONS.

Minutemen out-fox Marist in victory

Gaffney, Lowe provide spark in comeback win

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

UNCASVILLE, Conn. — Trailing, 58-52, with just over eight minutes remaining, Massachusetts forward Tony Gaffney told his teammates that losing against Marist would be unacceptable.

Gaffney proceeded to use his arms to back up his mouth, helping lead the Minutemen to a 83-68 victory with an impressive defensive display Saturday night at Mohegan Sun Arena.

"When we were down 58-52, I brought the team together and told them, 'we are not losing this game,'" Gaffney said after the game. "Everybody looked at me and agreed and we decided we were going to win the game on the defensive end. We ended the game on a 34-10 run, and that was the end of the story."

UMass	83
Marist	68

Gaffney blocked five shots all in the second half – leading to easy UMass field goals in transition. His biggest play came with the Minutemen (6-2) up two points, with under five minutes left in the game.

Marist's Louie McCroskey (22 points) drove the lane looking for the game-tying basket. The 6-foot-8 Gaffney swatted away any chance of that, with the blocked shot going to teammate Gary Forbes – who found a streaking Ricky Harris up the court.

Harris went the distance of the floor, coming away with a 3-point play after he was fouled by Jay Gavin on the lay-up. After a McCroskey missed shot, the Minutemen extended the lead to seven on a pair of free throws by Chris Lowe and to 10 when Etienne Brower hit a shot from well beyond the 3-point line on the ensuing possession. Brower's shot capped an 18-2 run by the Minutemen.

"Tony was terrific tonight, every time they were coming into the lane he was sending it the other way and starting the fast break for us," Forbes said.

"It was a true case of the first time this year where our defense was the reason we won," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "Our defense in the last eight minutes fueled our offense, and we haven't been able to say that much this year."

Ryan Tetreault/Collegian

Junior point guard Chris Lowe had one of the best performances in his career Saturday in the 83-68 victory over Marist. He scored a career-high 23 points and handed out six assists without committing a turnover.

Lowe led all scorers with a career-high 23 points and handed out six assists after not recording one in the first half. Harris and Forbes each had 18 points, with all but two coming in the second half for Harris. Forbes added 11 rebounds for the double-double, and also assisted on five baskets.

McCroskey added 11 rebounds for his own double-double, but the Red Foxes (6-4) lost for the first time in six games. They kept the game close until the end, finally succumbing to their 22 turnovers and 10 missed free throws.

UMass missed 14 foul shots (23-of-37) but still outscored Marist by 15 at the charity stripe. The Red Foxes shot rather well from beyond the arc (8-of-17) while the Minutemen didn't (6-of-22), but the 29-to-14 edge on points off of turnovers for UMass was too much to overcome for Marist.

"I thought their ball pressure was the difference in the game, [in addition to] our lack of poise against pressure," Marist coach Matt Brady said. "I knew that was going to be the story of the game. We got the lead in the second half and we had two straight turnovers. The momentum completely changed and we never got it back."

Marist held a six-point lead at 58-52 with just over eight minutes left to play, but the Minutemen scored six straight points to tie the game a minute later. After a missed shot by the Red Foxes, Forbes was fouled hard on a lay-up by Ryan Stillphen – a player he jawed with earlier in the game.

The Marist bench erupted after the call against Stillphen, and was called for a technical foul – sending Forbes to the line for four shots at taking the lead.

After the first two attempts missed short, Forbes overcompensated and hit the back rim on his third try. Finally on the fourth free throw, Forbes connected and gave the Minutemen the 1-point lead – a lead they never relinquished.

Lowe played a nearly flawless game in the victory, missing only one of his nine free throw attempts, connecting on his one 3-pointer and hitting 7-of-13 from the floor. Most impressively, Lowe didn't commit a single turnover in 32 minutes of playing time.

"He doesn't go into a game wanting to lead us in scoring, but tonight presented itself and we needed every single point he scored," Ford said. "We needed him to lead us in scoring tonight and he did that. That's the sign of a great point guard, not a good point guard."

"It's amazing at the speed he plays that he did not turn the ball over. That's amazing."

The first half was played at a slower pace by both teams, with the score tied at 32 entering the break. There were seven lead changes and nine ties in the opening stanza. UMass scored 51 points in the second half.

UMass's next game is against Boston College (6-1) on Wednesday night in Chestnut Hill.

Game notes

Freshman Sedale Jones made his first appearance of the season in the first half for the Minutemen, registering two fouls and a steal in three minutes of play … Forbes picked up his fourth foul with 12:24 left in the game and was forced to sit out for five minutes until Ford re-inserted him into the game with 7:41 left. He played the rest of the game without fouling out. Brower fouled out with a minute left to play with the game already well in hand … There were only seven combined assists by the two teams in the first half. UMass finished with 13, but only three players (Lowe, Forbes and Harris) recording one …

Eli Rosenswaike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu.

Fenton nets career-high four points

HOCKEY from page 10

David Leaderer flew through the slot and tipped the rebound past the UNH net minder.

At 12:37 of the second period, Lenton went into the corner with UNH defenseman Kevin Kapstad to the left of Foster. He struggled with the defenseman before kicking the puck to freshman winger James Marcou. Fellow freshman Mike Lecomte headed for the vacated low slot, and took a pass from Marcou before beating Foster over the right shoulder to push the UMass lead to 2-0.

The goal was Lecomte's fourth of the season, and Marcou continued to add to his team-high assist total with nine. He collected his 10th later in the game when Cory Quirk beat Foster to give UMass a 4-1 lead.

Marcou and Lecomte began the game on a line with Chase Langeraap. But at 14:37 of the first period, Langeraap received a game misconduct for hitting from behind. An injury to John Wesbecker already shorthanded UMass, redshirt freshman Kevin Kessler dressed for the first game of his career in his place. Fenton, senior Matt Burtio and junior Scott Crowder rotated the extra shift for the Minutemen.

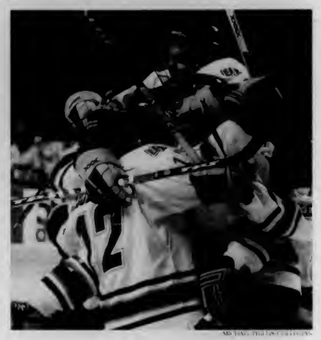
The Wildcats had a great chance to take advantage of the Minutemen after Langeraap's dismissal with a 5-minute power play. Sophomore winger Will Ortiz went off with a slash 51 seconds into Langeraap's major.

UNH senior Matt Fornataro took a pair of one-timers from the right face-off circle that Dainton knocked away with his blocker. After a rebound dropped to the right of a sprawling Dainton, UNH's Danny Dries attempted to stuff it into the vacated lower right corner of the net, but got a skate on the puck, forcing it behind the net where UMass cleared it.

The Wildcats returned the favor of power plays to the Minutemen in the third period. Down a goal late in the third period, the Wildcats committed five penalties which severely limited their ability to create offense.

Freshman James vanRiemsdyk – the second overall pick in the 2007 NHL Draft – chased a puck into the UMass zone and appeared determined to wind up in the penalty box. He and Leaderer exchanged shoves and elbows as they skated behind the net. Leaderer won the puck and quickly fired it up ice. But vanRiemsdyk wasn't done. He skated at Leaderer and immediately fell, but officials whistled him for a diving penalty.

Radja went off on a hooking call at 3:28 of the period, and the Minutemen used the 5-on-4 to extend their lead. Davis passed to Ortiz who skated to the top of the face-off circle where he quickly wheeled and fired on net. Fenton drifted toward the low slot and got a piece of the Ortiz shot. The puck snuck between the legs of Foster to give UMass a 3-1 lead.



"The third goal was the killer. We should've had the puck out of the zone, there was nobody on us. We shouldn't have been in the penalty box in the first place; it was a very lazy penalty," UNH coach Dick Umile said.

"Obviously, I'm very disappointed with the way we performed in the third period. We were very undisciplined to go out there, with the game on the line, and get penalties – poor leadership."

Game notes

The Minutemen are now 38-0-1 in their 39 games all-time when scoring four or more goals … Fenton's goal and three assists tied him for 21st in school history with Rod Lundgren with 75 points and put him alone in 20th place all-time in assists with 45 … Radja's goal snapped UMass's streak of 142:52 without allowing a goal, dating back to the first period of a 5-2 win over Union on Nov. 25.

Joe Meloni can be reached at jmeloni@student.umass.edu.

Mckay Hall/Collegian

The Minutemen celebrate Cory Quirk's third-period goal, giving UMass its fourth and final tally in the victory over UNH Saturday.

All-freshman line producing

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon has a history of making sure younger players earn their due as the newest members of the Minutemen. He even goes so far as to not allow players to pick their own numbers until their second or third year with the team.

But don't think for a second that means Cahoon doesn't recognize talent when he sees it.

Saturday night's lineup against the No. 7 New Hampshire Wildcats is a perfect example. The top two lines for UMass were pretty predictable. The Minutemen's best scoring line, P.J. Fenton, Cory Quirk and Chris Davis were first, followed by Alex Berry, Brett Watson and Will Ortiz. Two seniors, two juniors and two sophomores – that's not a bad mix.

Then there was the third line list for last night's impactful 4-1 win: Chase Langeraap, Michael Lecomte and James Marcou, three freshmen, on the same line.

Cahoon is notorious for shuffling his lineups on an almost game-by-game basis. But the fact that the Minuteman head-man was comfortable putting three rookies on the ice at once against the only Hockey East squad ranked higher than the Minutemen prior to Saturday's game speaks to how quickly the three newcomers are coming along.

"I think they're doing a real good job," Cahoon said. "They've got really good instincts. They're good players."

The rookies didn't disappoint, either. Lecomte scored UMass's second goal in the second period, giving the Minutemen a 2-0 lead at the time, a score that would prove to be the game-winner by the end of the night.

Marcou, the Minutemen's leading scorer with 13 points, tacked on two more assists, including one on Lecomte's goal, for a team-high 10 helpers through 15 games this season.

Lecomte's goal was his fourth this season, tying him with Quirk for second on the team in goals behind Ortiz's six. Langeraap was ejected in the first period for a hit from behind, curtailing Cahoon's efforts to get the trio ice time together, but Marcou and Lecomte picked up the slack.

"They've got things to learn and confidence to be gained," Cahoon said. "In certain situations, you want to make sure they're not being pushed too far too fast, so you just pay attention to who their matchups are, especially in the defensive zone. That's where you grow the most as a young player, learning how to play the defensive side of it."

It's interesting to note that nearly every time the freshman line was on the ice, senior defenseman and team captain Mike Kostka was with them, obviously providing a veteran presence.

Combined, the group is plus-11 this season, scoring nine goals and recording 13 assists.

Marcou alone has quickly become a force for the younger 2007 Minutemen, getting significant ice time on the power play as well. His second assist came on the Minutemen's final goal, their second power play goal of the third period. Marcou was teamed with P.J. Fenton, who had a monster game with a goal and three assists – one coming on that same goal – and Quirk, who scored his fourth goal of the season on the play.

Jeremy Rice can be reached at jeremyr@student.umass.edu.

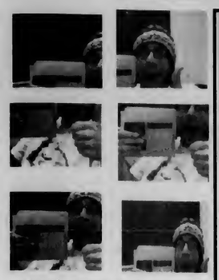
Did You Know We Designed a Graduate Degree Just For You?

New M.S. in Commerce Gives Non-Business Majors An Edge

The McIntire School of Commerce at the University of Virginia announces the creation of a new one-year, 36 credit-hour M.S. in Commerce in either Financial Services or Marketing & Management.* Designed to give strong liberal arts, science, and engineering majors a better understanding of the organizational, cultural, and economic dynamics of today's global business environment, the program consists of three components:

- Integrated Core Experience (ICE) provides an enterprise-wide view of business
- Specialty tracks allow you to focus in either Financial Services or Marketing & Management
- Global immersion offers work and study within an international business context

McINTIRE SCHOOL OF COMMERCE
UNIVERSITY of VIRGINIA



Six-Week Global Immersion

commerce.virginia.edu (877) 349-2620

* Program pending approval from the State Council of Higher Education for Virginia

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
Potter's Collision Repair
at North Amherst Motors
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.potterauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement

ANDY "STILL FLY" GAUVIN

Make it rain.

7						9
	1				8	5		4
4			5
	7		1	6				2
		3	8		5	4
8				3	2		7
					3			6
1		8	6				5
	5							7

Quote of the Day

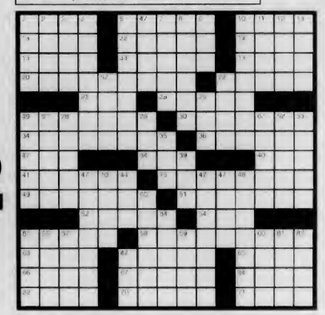
"Because while the truncheon may be used in lieu of conversation, words will always retain their power. Words offer the means to meaning, and for those who will listen, the enunciation of truth."

-Hugo Weaving as V in "V for Vendetta"

Paul By Billy O'Keefe

Kilgore By Knox Yeoman

Labrat By Richard Martelly



WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Welcome to Wombat Week!

Continuing & Professional Education
Winter Session
Classes begin January 2nd
Hibernating this winter?
Get credit without leaving your room!
REGISTER NOW
www.UMass.ULearn.net

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Last time I checked, Sisqo was not enrolled at UMass, so put that thong away.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Kidnap an exchange student and challenge him to an International Tapioca Pudding eat off.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You secrete secrets like a man with over-active sweat glands. Quit being such a stool pigeon and lock it up.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
You may be afraid of spiders, but you'd be fine with a tarantula. They've got that charismatic mega-fauna thing going for them.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Translation: You, beautiful Cole, are Mr. Holland's Opus.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today is a good day to get a haircut or plant some seeds.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You bleed Red Bull and pee Vitamin Water.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You are the world, you are the children, you are the one who makes a brighter day, so please start giving.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
If your meat has been defrosting for more than 24 hours it has surpassed the world of defrost and entered the realm of rotting.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
For a crispy twist on an old favorite, try fry-ing a banana... or a jolly elderly fellow.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Despite what Duran Duran may tell you, you will never share a hunger for raw flesh with our furry four-legged friends.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You owe a $52.43 debt to society. Your bill can be paid in the Collegian office in the mailbox marked "Comics."

THE COMICS PAGE ALWAYS MAKES SURE THAT YOU GET YOURS FIRST.

comics@dailycollegian.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APT. 4 RENT

Brandywine Apt.
JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- conact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts.
Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

APT. FOR RENT

Large quiet comfortable, furnished walk to UMass, on busline for male. Graduate student/Professor. Reasonable. Available January. 413-549-1578

ROOM 4 RENT

Hillel's Jewish Living Community 388 N. Pleasant. Winter session or Spring term Single/Double. Any 5 college student (except freshmen). Laundry, internet, pool table, big rooms. Walk to UM. Parking, cable avail. Quiet. 549-1700 x 205 or www.UMASSHILLEL.ORG/JLLC

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

EMPLOYMENT

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab, phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

The Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore Square has a job for you during Winterbreak if you have Starbucks Coffee experience! Email bdinolo@bu.edu

INFORMATION

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night!

INFORMATION

Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza. Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

LOST

REWARD
Women's Ring. Silver with garnet (Red) stone. Campus Center. Nov 1. Contact Donald Depiro 516-456-7662

SERVICES

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906 1-800-550-

SERVICES

4900 24 - hour hotline. Free Pregnancy test. 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst. www.birthnght.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St., Amherst. Call

SERVICES

413-548-9992
www.tapestryhealth.org

TRAVEL

*#1 Spring Break Website!
4 & 7 night trips. Low prices guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 3 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.StudentCity.com or 800-293-1445

Spring Break 2008 Sell Trips, Earn Cash & Go Free. Call for group discounts. Best Deals Guaranteed! Info/Reservations 800-648-4849/ www.ststravel.com

DEC 11 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 2007 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

On to the College Cup

UMass advances to Final Four

By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

The coaches of the Atlantic 10 picked the Massachusetts men's soccer team to finish 10th in the conference prior to this season.

But UMass coach Sam Koch never cared much for polls. Neither did his team, apparently. The Minutemen defeated Illinois-Chicago, 2-1, Sunday afternoon, clinching a berth in the 2007 Men's College Cup.

They will take on fifth-seeded Ohio State Friday in a national semifinal matchup. No. 2 Wake Forest and No. 7 Virginia Tech are the other two semifinalists.

"To make it to the Final Four, I never expected this would happen four years ago," senior Greg Cirillo said. "We came together so well throughout the year, it's just amazing. It was great to see all the fans that came out. I think they enjoyed it as much as we did."

UMass	2
UIC	1

The Minutemen (17-7-1) utilized a familiar formula in their victory, riding well-worked set pieces and outstanding goalkeeping to the victory. Redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons made five saves and controlled the penalty area for the Minutemen.

Junior midfielder Mike DeSantis scored the game-winner for UMass in the 80th minute after Cirillo fielded a ball headed out of the box off a throw-in and served it into the penalty area. Cirillo collected the ball, waited and fired it into the box to a wide open DeSantis who slid the ball off the post.

See SOCCER on page 7

Simmons only adding to legacy

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Even without the opportunity to lead the Massachusetts men's soccer team to the NCAA College Cup, redshirt junior goalkeeper Zack Simmons had already established himself as one of the best goalies in program history.

The Minutemen's 2-1 victory over Illinois-Chicago in the quarterfinals of the 2007 NCAA Tournament gave him the school-record for career wins with 32. Earlier this year he broke the team records for career shutouts, saves and goals-against average.

Some keepers establish gaudy statistics as a product of their defense. Though the Minutemen have a stout defense, Simmons is a difference maker for the Minutemen with his aggressive goalkeeping style and vocal leadership.

Yet he was quick to acknowledge his defenders after yesterday's match, as always.

"Our backs and midfielders did a great job in front of me," Simmons said. "[UIC] didn't have a whole lot of shots on goal, so [the defense] played very well."

But it wasn't just the defense that was responsible for stifling offensive opportunities. As Simmons has been doing all season, he prevented chances himself Sunday.

Whether it was intercepting balls as the Flames charged into the UMass zone or catching mid-air crosses, Simmons did his best to disrupt scoring chances before they could become dangerous.

See SIMMONS on page 7

UM skates by UNH

Fenton leads Minutemen past undisciplined Wildcats

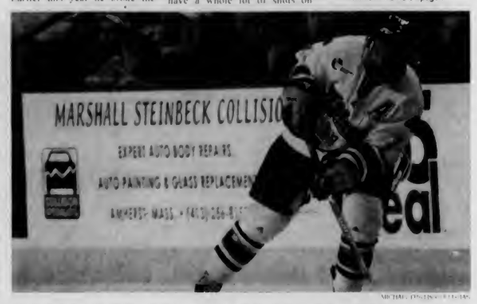
By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

Mike Radja, the first-line center for No. 7 New Hampshire, did his best to make it interesting.

But after he beat freshman goaltender Paul Dainton of the No. 11 Massachusetts hockey team 17-3-5, 4-2-4 Hockey East) late in the second period – cutting the UMass lead to 2-1 – he and his teammates didn't appear too keen on keeping it going.

The Minutemen took advantage of their opponent's undisciplined play in the third period, scoring two power-play goals, in their 4-1 win over the Wildcats (8-4-1, 4-3-1 Hockey East) Saturday at the Mullins Center.

Senior winger P.J. Fenton had a career-high four points – on a goal and three assists in the UMass victory. The win lifted the Minutemen into a second-place tie with Boston College behind conference leader Northeastern entering a 21-day layoff.



UMass	4
UNH	1

"It's nice to have a four-point night and get back on the stat-sheet," Fenton said. "I had some struggles early on this year. But it's also nice to win the game which is the most important thing, and climb up in the standings going into the break."

UMass's next action comes on Dec. 29 against No. 6 Notre Dame as part of the Lightning College Hockey Classic – a four-team New Year's Tournament. No. 2 Colorado College and No. 19 Rensselaer are the other two teams in the tourney.

Fenton had a hand in every UMass goal, and showed a different dimension to his game on each score. Just over three minutes into the second period, he quickly relayed a pass to junior Chris Davis. The speedy winger blew past a UNH defenseman and fired on goaltender Brian Foster. The initial shot went off Foster, but senior defenseman

See HOCKEY on page 8

Senior winger P.J. Fenton recorded a career-high four points in UMass's 4-1 victory over New Hampshire Saturday at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen now have three weeks off before their next game.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

MOSTLY CLOUDY : HI: 35 LO: 22 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 2007

UMASS TRAVELS TO VILLANOVA | PAGE 10

Library thief may be found

Eden Univer
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student was arrested and charged with felony counts of larceny from a building, larceny over $250, and receiving stolen property over $250.

Priscilla Young, 22, of 1621 Coleman Street, Brooklyn, NY, is believed to be connected with a recent string of thefts at the UMass W.E.B. DuBois library. Recently, many laptops were taken from the library while left unattended. Officers responded to a tip leading them to Young and multiple items, including laptops, which did not belong to Young, were found in her dorm room. While she has not been tried, police say that she confessed to the alleged crimes during questioning.

The police report states that the items found in Young's dorm room included a white Mac Book and power cord valued at $1,500, an IBM ThinkPad valued at $400, a Dell Inspiron 640M laptop and case valued at $1,000, a Playstation 3 valued at $399.99, a Sony speak dock/clock radio valued at $104.99, a Sixaxis wireless controller valued at $49.99, a "Kane and Lynch" Playstation 3 game valued at $59.99, an iPod Touch valued at $399.99, a Black Apple Mac Book laptop valued at $1,500, a red leather wallet, and Belkin cleaning wipes.

UMass Police Department Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said this is a significant break in the investigation of the library thefts.

"We've seen an unacceptable number of laptop thefts so far this year," said Deputy Chief Archbald. "We encourage students to keep their belongings with them and not leave them unattended. The library is open 24/7. It's not only the material value of the computer, but the work saved on it too. Students should always lock up their files."

Eden Univer can be reached at euniver@student.umass.edu

VASMA members share their story

Panelists who provided stories for Elise Forbes Tripp's anthology included Jaime Zagami, Richard W. Riley, Solonian Black and David Vacchi.

By Will McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Elise Forbes Tripp and the veterans whose stories were featured in her anthology "Surviving Iraq: Soldiers' Stories" formed their own Iraq study group in the Student Union Ballroom last night as part of a panel on the war put on by the Veterans and Service Members Association (VASMA).

Five veterans featured in the books weighed in on all aspects of a war that was come to define this decade and this generation. The same soldiers who were charged with winning the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people were given the chance to unload what had been building on their. Women in the military, an increased presence of contracted companies, fighting an enemy with no uniform and fighting with fellow volunteers were discussed among other issues.

But perhaps more educating was that each panelist read a piece of his narrative featured in "Surviving Iraq" – a piece of his life and a testimonial to the effects it has had on their present.

Dr. Tripp said she felt compelled to create an "oral history" of the war, to "bring it home to the rest of [the American people]."

She added her subjects' narratives were "more meaningful, more compelling than what's in the newspaper" because they were real stories, ones that would enlighten a population viewing the war in high def and not so definitely as the panelists had.

Before last night, Staff Sergeant and 18-year veteran of the University of Massachusetts Health Services pharmacy, Richard W. Riley, told his to the vast deserts of Kuwait. He walked over grains of sand that could no longer quantify his presence there but instead came to serve as a shoulder for the soldier. They absorbed his complaints, his views and his fears.

"We opened a can of worms, a Pandora's box, and we couldn't leave," he said.

See VASMA on page 3

Iraq vet speaks out against the war

By Jackie Hai
Collegian Staff

President of the Boston chapter of Iraq Veterans Against the War (IVAW) and a member of its national board of directors, Sergeant Liam Madden will speak at Earthfoods Cafe in the Student Union tonight at 6:00 p.m. about his experiences in Iraq and his involvement in the anti-war movement at home.

It was in his last year of a four-year tour of duty with the Marine Corps that Madden began voicing his opposition to the Iraq War. He co-founded the Appeal for Redress, a petition to Congress by thousands of service members to end the conflict. After returning to the United States, he connected with IVAW and has been championing the organization's cause ever since.

Madden served for seven months in Iraq as a Communications Electronics Specialist, supporting infantry patrol units on the ground.

"I was brought to my [current] position by asking why I was really sent to Iraq," he says. "Basically, having been thrown into the middle of it and having my life committed to it, I started seeking answers."

It wasn't what happened in Iraq so much as what didn't happen that turned him against the war. "We didn't find any weapons of mass destruction, and we didn't help the Iraqi people," says Madden. "Being there completely validated to me that Iraq was not a threat to the United States and that the United States was in fact a part of the problem in Iraq."

IVAW was founded in July 2004 by Iraq War veterans determined to "give a voice to the large number of active duty service people and veterans who are against this war, but are under various pressures to remain silent," according to the organization's website, ivaw.org.

Their demands of the U.S. government include immediate withdrawal of all occupying forces in Iraq, reparations for the damages done to Iraqi livelihoods, and full benefits and adequate health care for returning service men and women.

Currently, IVAW is working on a project called "Winter Soldier: Iraq and Afghanistan," investigating the treatment of Iraqi and Afghan civilians.

"We're going to have veterans and Iraqi and Afghan civil-

See MADDEN on page 3

Liam Madden spoke at an Appeal for Redress conference in January 2007. He will speak tonight on the University of Massachusetts campus in association with IVAW.

Republican Club hosts pro-war event

By Kate Olesin
Collegian Staff

All Jonah Goldberg is saying is "give war a chance," and he plans to give that message to the University of Massachusetts community tomorrow night.

The event, hosted by the UMass Republican Club, is bringing the National Review Online editor to campus and hopes that his message will bring about positive dialogue about the war in Iraq.

"I think that there's always a need for political or social dialogue on a campus like this," said Republican Club president Brad DeFlumeri. "And given that this campus is so politically uniform, I think that ideas like his are essential to form an intellectual debate."

Goldberg is editor-at-large for the National Review Online, a prominent on-line journalism site, where he writes columns, and also a contributing editor to the National Review magazine. In addition, Goldberg writes a nationally syndicated column, which appears in newspapers around the country.

The political journalist has numerous articles and opinions on the war and will be publishing a book, due early next year titled "Liberal Fascism: The Secret History of the American Left, From Mussolini to the Politics of Meaning."

"I must confess that one of the things that made me reluctant to conclude that the Iraq War was a mistake was my general distaste for the shabbiness of the arguments on the anti-war side," Goldberg wrote in a 2006 column for the Los Angeles Times.

DeFlumeri hopes that Goldberg will touch on points that the UMass community will find relevant to the wartime era.

"I'd like him to highlight some of the benefits of staying to course in Iraq, and the successes we've had in Iraq," he said.

The Republican Club is expecting to have a large turnout for the event, but not all are in support of the speaker.

"I think that students will follow the lead of activists from the community who are coming to protest," DeFlumeri said. "I think you will see a lot of the liberals acting immaturely."

"I think it's great that the Republican Club can have speakers but they seem to get extreme speakers for the point of causing controversy on campus," said sophomore Jason Stencel of the event.

Despite the controversy, which the Republican Club fully expects, DeFlumeri has high hopes for the event. The group aims to have the event surpass that of Phyllis Schlafly's lecture, which the club hosted in October.

"I think [Schlafly] was talking about issues that were more relevant in the 60s and 70s," said DeFlumeri. "[Goldberg] is talking

See GOLDBERG on page 3

DC to host 'Starry, Starry Night'

Trace Hamnick makes lunch in the Worcester Dining Commons's Oak Room yesterday. Beginning tonight at 5 p.m., all DCs will be hosting "Starry, Starry Night" in celebration of the holidays.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 67

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Esser
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION MANAGER Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COMICS EDITOR Adam Stagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR N.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Derrick Perkins
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Stomiak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Maren Wheaten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Gauthier
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Olesin
ASSISTANT NEWS Will McGuinness
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael Hong
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenzweig
WEB EDITOR James Hale
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS SUMMER SESSION. THE COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED SUNDAY, OPENING AND SPRING RECESS AND FINAL EXAM WEEK. THE COLLEGIAN IS A NON-PROFIT CORPORATION AND THE COLLEGIAN IS A NON-PROFIT CORPORATION. IT WAS FOUNDED IN 1890, AND THE COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED BY THE STUDENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 2007

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
-Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The importance of good leadership

Brad DeFlumeri

For my last column of the semester, I wondered long and hard about what to write. Every columnist, no matter how selfless or disinterested in personal glory, is a bit of a narcissist – we want people to spend their time looking at something we produced.

Consistent with this notion, we also want people to remember and think about what we wrote and, perhaps, this is one of our major motivations for writing in the first place.

What I am getting at is the fact that I wanted this semester-ending column to be considered compelling and important as perhaps certain readers would take what I wrote as being indicative of the value of my writing all semester.

To me, very few things are more important to the country than military issues and politics. These two things have irreversibly changed my life and the lives of many others in a multitude of ways.

Furthermore, they are inextricably linked in the sense that political outcomes have a direct impact on how the military is employed, or not employed.

My column should aspire to discuss something that transcends what most of us consider important. So I settled on the issue of leadership for a germ many reasons – mainly because no organization, institution, civilization or nation can be effective without it.

Merriam-Webster defines the capacity to "lead" as, "directing on a course or in a direction." Twice-failed presidential contender and former United Nations Ambassador Adlai Stevenson once said, "It's hard to lead a cavalry charge if you think you look funny on a horse."

And I think Stevenson's perspective applies to one of the major issues facing our school, state and country – not enough people feel comfortable on the horse; not enough people are comfortable being leaders.

Far too few institutions in this country teach and inculcate leadership in our young men and women.

Far too many of us are all too willing to allow someone else to take responsibility – or blame – when something of importance is on the line. That is to say, our culture has indoctrinated us to think that the risk-averse followership so closely allied with the political correctness of the 21st century is acceptable. In short, we have generally become a nation of principal advisors ducking under a desk when we need more CEOs standing in front.

We see alarming evidence of this all the time in politics where many candidates feel politically compelled to say not what they think, or what they know to be the truth, but what they feel to be the most politically palatable and safe statement. The vulture-like nature of the 24/7 news media is a fundamental cause of this, but we all suffer the consequences.

And therefore what we need are more leaders of industry, culture, politics and every other aspect of our civilization to emerge. We must do a better job of training our children, beginning at a very early age, to be accountable and responsible.

We must – if we care as much as we should about the direction of our great nation and its impressive political culture – stress the importance of inspiring one another to great achievement and taking the blame when things go wrong.

Furthermore, we must lose our politically-correct mentality that suggests that a presidential candidate's single verbal misstep can lead to the demise of his candidacy. Rather, we should cultivate a context in which it is noble and laudable to stand up and say "yes, it was my fault, I was in charge."

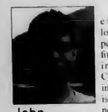
This is usually not the case, and "leaders" in every walk of life are much too quick to find a technicality – or a subordinate – which absolves them of blame.

Far too few institutions in this country teach and inculcate leadership in our young men and women. Public schools might tacitly make an effort to do this. Without question, the military service academies in West Point, Annapolis and Colorado Springs do as good a job at this as anyone.

And it comes as no surprise, then, that arguably the best political-military leader that this country has ever produced – General Dwight Eisenhower – was trained at West Point.

Eisenhower personally had more to do with our victory in WWII and the subsequent emergence of our country as a global superpower than anyone. His views on leadership and examples thereof should be taught, studied and disseminated at every college in the country.

Instead, institutions like UMass and so many other "diversity-embracing" politically-correct colleges across the country choose to teach us the evils of Western civilization and America, specifically. They do this rather than teach us about the men and women whose leadership has helped make us the world's foremost instrument for economic innovation, democracy, civility, ingenuity and advancement.



If we are to continue on our path of national greatness and as the steward of freedom and liberty for people all over the globe, then this 9/11 generation must produce better leaders, especially political ones, than the baby boomer generation did.

Let's hope that Bill Kristol of the Weekly Standard is correct in his observation that "America is such a great country that it will survive even a not-so-great generation."

But it will undoubtedly be our generation's ability to produce leaders who can effectively leverage and focus America's amazing national potential and propensity for greatness that will determine if this American century will be as spectacularly successful as the last one.

Brad DeFlumeri is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bdeflume@student.umass.edu.

Excessive penalties, minor crimes

John Gruenenfelder

Unhappy with exceptionally long copyright periods and giant fines for minor infringements, Congress is working on new legislation to stiffen penalties for intellectual property counterfeiting and infringement. The new bill, Prioritizing Resources and Organization for Intellectual Property (PRO IP), is strongly bipartisan and full of bad ideas.

The majority of the proposed law focuses on international counterfeiting and creates a new federal office, the White House Intellectual Property Enforcement Representative, to enforce IP laws. This section of the law is not so controversial as large scale international counterfeiting is a real problem.

There are, for example, companies in countries like China which produce massive numbers of counterfeit DVDs for sale here. Some people might not consider this horrible, but consider the case where a company produces counterfeit auto parts and packages them to appear the same as authentic parts. If these are used in your car during a repair, you have no guarantees of quality, and these parts could pose a big problem.

The problems with the new bill are the sections which allow the government to come down hard on people accused of relatively minor IP crimes. Crimes such as sharing music on peer-to-peer computer networks, something students at UMass are well aware of.

The bill proposes increasing the fines that courts can levy for infringement and, in the case of music compilations, a court can make "multiple awards of statutory damages." When you can be fined $150,000 maximum per song copied, I think we all can agree that possible fines are already in the "insane" range.

Of course, courts rarely award the full maximum penalty in these cases. This is why the Recording Industry of America (RIAA) might sue an individual for millions of dollars, when actual award or settlement is in the thousands. Still, it can be enormous.

Recently, the RIAA won a $220,000 jury verdict against a woman in Minnesota who shared 24 songs on Kazaa. If that happens to you, I hope you can enjoy your remaining years as an indentured servant to one of the major record labels.

The aspects of PRO IP which focus on small crimes are also bad ideas and unnecessary.

The most troubling aspect of PRO IP is the ability of the federal government to seize any computer or network hardware used to "facilitate" a copyright crime. Such actions are not new and are known as "civil asset forfeiture." It is a disturbing process because you do not need to be found guilty of a crime, or even be charged for the government to take your property.

Such forfeiture has been around for a long time and has been used extensively in the War on Drugs train wreck. The idea is that police can, for example, search your car, find some drugs and confiscate your car. Even if you are later found innocent, you are almost guaranteed to never see your car again.

To make this even worse, the police will then auction off the seized property that is not reclaimed – which happens often – and this money goes directly into their operating budget. You can see how corrupt police departments might become rather reliant on this source of funding.

In the case of PRO IP, if you are accused on infringing on copyright, the new office created by the bill can seize your computer. At that point, you're better off just buying a new one (if you can afford it) because you won't be seeing the old one for a long time, if ever.

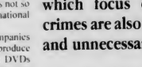
Specifically, the law allows the authorities to seize any computer or network hardware used to facilitate the alleged crime. But at what point does that chain end? My computer is connected to my cable modem, which is attached to numerous pieces of network equipment owned by Comcast. If I commit an IP crime, such as copying music, that network equipment is certainly used and necessary to facilitate my crime. Are they liable too for not stopping me?

Civil asset forfeiture was never a good idea, and expanding it to include alleged copyright crimes is a terrible idea. The aspects of PRO IP which focus on small crimes are also bad ideas and unnecessary. The laws on copyright infringement are clear and the fines are already excessive.

Just because the lawsuit-happy RIAA would like authorities to send hired goons to your house doesn't mean that Congress should roll over and give it to them. PRO IP's heavy-handed sections should be stricken when the bill goes to conference. Unfortunately, with such strong bipartisan support, such a favorable outcome seems rather unlikely.

John Gruenenfelder is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jgruenen@student.umass.edu

LETTER OR OPINION



E-mail: editorial@dailycollegian.com

Fax: 413-545-3699

Mail: Letters to the Editor, 113 Campus Center, Amherst, MA 01003

A plethora of life advice

Josh Walovitch

Advice is a form of relating opinions, belief systems, personal values and recommendations about certain situations relayed in some context to another person. Advice is often offered as a guide to action or train of thought.

Advice is believed to be both practical and theoretical, and is often considered taboo as well as helpful. The nature of advice can range from systems of instructional and practical toward more esoteric and spiritual.

Advice often attributes to problem solving, strategy seeking and solution finding, either from a social standpoint or a personal one – a dictionary definition.

"Advice is what we ask for when we already know the answer but wish we didn't," wrote author Erica Jong. I have noticed that in situations where people are in need of advice and receive it, the answers to their questions can usually be found within themselves.

Life advice, depending on who it is coming from, has had an impact on an endless amount of people. It is most often given from a credible friend or relative, but strangers might also have a lasting impression on how you live your life from that point on.

I recently asked several strangers of multiple ages, races, genders and professions what they thought was a solid piece of life advice. Now I know that it might be hard for most individuals to think of just one piece of life advice on the spot or a piece of advice that could be construed as meaningful. I, however, uncovered a plethora of pensive and endlessly intriguing answers.

You do not know these people and you may not think a bunch of strangers can influence your life, but let your mind roam right now and be open to what some of these friendly strangers have to say.

Stephen Aucoin, a 55-year-old scuba diving instructor laid it out as simple as possible for me – "do what you love and love what you do." When he told me this, I found it very fitting coming from a man who gets to swim with fish and go lobster hunting for a living. Advice like this makes me want to pursue a professional career in skydiving or perhaps competitive fishing.

I talked to the well known "Motown Man," whose real name is Henny Johnson. At the age of 61, he was extremely jovial when he enlightened me with the words, "do a good deed everyday for someone other than yourself." This advice suited him very well because the income he generates, from singing his notorious songs outside of the college bars and all over Amherst, goes straight to charities.

Life advice, depending on who it is coming from, has had an impact on an endless amount of people.

Advice given from your elders is advice that ought to be thought over twice; they have been around for a long time and have experienced many different situations.

Ester Poteshman, retiree and resident of Highland Park, Illinois spoke some wise words, "I am 77-years-old and still formulating, growing and learning as much as I can. This I know – always be a moral and truthful person, be respectful to all, and never demean anyone. We are all human and deserve to be treated with kindness. A sense of humor is also a great attribute. Have a feeling of spirituality to the best that you can."

The funniest advice, in a kind of ironic way, came from 29-year-old Holyoke resident Brendan Feeney. Feeney laughed when he said, "major in something that will actually get you a job when you graduate."

I couldn't help but laugh after he told me this, given the fact that he was working a minimum wage job, ringing up books at Barnes and Noble. I later asked him what he majored in. His response – "journalism". This was not the most comforting advice.

I asked one elderly man who was reading through books at Barnes and Noble, and he said that he could not think of any good advice. I mentioned the fact that he should have at least some advice, seeing as how he was rummaging through the philosophy section. He smiled back at me and said in a laughing manner, "that's why I'm here".

30-year-old April from Amherst, MA, told me, "always trust dogs, babies and Sherpas." I wasn't sure what "Sherpas" were, but she later informed me that they are the guides for mountaineering expeditions in the Himalayas, and without them, the mountains will basically destroy you.

Linda Kinney, 50-year-old resident of Sunderland, MA, who is an HIM professor here at UMass, said, "throughout your life you should stay in touch with nature; take a walk in the woods – it will add enjoyment to your life and you will learn to better appreciate nature and life."

I will leave you with the wise words of 30-year-old Aaron Scoglund, who gave me some, as he called it, "canned life advice," saying (originally in Yiddish), "think good and it will be good."

Some were more insightful than others, but hopefully with reading and considering some of the advice that was presented, you will live tomorrow with less stress and more hope.

Joshua Walovitch is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at jwalovit@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Killers re-invent

Band compiles songs that never made it to CD racks

BY CHASE WHEELER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Vegas indie rockers The Killers have built up an impressive catalogue during their two-album career. The initial success of "Hot Fuss," The Killers' debut album, and their flagship hit "Somebody Told Me" in 2005, was just the beginning of the popular chain-reaction that elicited three more singles from the LP that all landed in the top 15 of the billboard charts.

The Killers' second release, "Sam's Town," followed a year later and was met with mixed reviews, but blew away many critics and listeners with its smash hit "When You Were Young" that barreled its way to the number two position on the UK charts.

Now, numerous nominations and accolades later and fresh off collaboration with The Velvet Underground's Lou Reed, The Killers have compiled a number of covers, never before heard versions of older songs, and other B-sides that never made it onto their two preceding albums. The result "Sawdust."

The Killers kick things off with "Tranquilize," a well-written duet from lead singer Brandon Flowers and producer Lou Reed, the two distinct voices meshing well over the background of guitarist Dave Keuning's heavy clanging guitar. A well-rehearsed cover of Joy Division's "Shadowplay" and a B-side of "Sam's Town," "All the Pretty Faces" follows, both tracks showing The Killers' capacity to create compelling rock songs amidst all their synth experiments.

Flowers then proceeds to reveal the missing first episode of his chilling Murder Trilogy (which includes "Hot Fuss" "Midnight Show" and "Jenny was a Friend of Mine" as its respective second and third episodes) in "Leave the Bourbon on the Shelf," a grunge-industrial jaunt featuring a strong vocal performance from Flowers and a thumping rhythm from Keuning on guitar.

"Move Away" is a promising B-side much in the style of "Hot Fuss'" "Jenny was a Friend of Mine," with its dramatic and bustly-paced exposition, while "Where the White Boys Dance" brings out the melodramatic mix The Killers create so well between Flowers' vocals and synth and Keuning's fuzzy guitar.

On the later part of "Sawdust," covers reign supreme. A rendition of Dire Straits' ballad "Romeo and Juliet" has The Killers painting a lighter, more expressive picture with Keuning's guitar revamping the colorful sound of venerable Dire Straits guitarist Mark Knopfler.

A toned-down version of "Hot Fuss" – "Mr. Brightside" rounds out the compilation CD in fair style. Flowers and Reed decide to slow the tempo and up the effects, but in turn cut much of the driving guitar and bass that made the song so memorable, resulting in a drawn-out and tiring rehash.

In its entirety, "Sawdust" is what it advertised – A voluminous collection of songs that almost were (but weren't for good reason), appropriately chosen covers of other stylistic bands, and well-remodeled versions of some of The Killers' own material. It's allotted two and half out of five stars suitably reflects the theme of the album – an abundance of potential good that was just never realized in the end.

Chase Wheeler can be reached at cwheeler@student.umass.edu

"SAWDUST"
THE KILLERS ISLAND RECORDS
2.5/5

The Killer's became famous with the song "Somebody Told Me" in 2005. A rendition of their second major single in the U.S. "Mr. Brightside" is available on their new album "Sawdust".

Cherish the Ladies brings Christmas joy to UMass FAC

The band combines singing with step dancing and the playing of instruments into their act.

BY MICHELLE FREIDEL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

This Wednesday, Dec. 12, at 7:30 p.m., the Celtic music group Cherish the Ladies will be performing at the Fine Arts Center. This all-female group has performed in some of the grandest music halls worldwide.

The band will be performing "A Celtic Christmas," a blend of traditional Irish carols with more familiar Christmas carols. Some of the more traditional songs include "The Holly and the Ivy" and "The Wexford Carol." More recognizable tunes likely to be heard in the show are "We Three Kings," "Silent Night," and "God Rest Ye Merry Gentlemen."

The band has done this show for several years now, and has been extremely successful each year. With the group's amazing talent, it is no surprise that the holiday show has garnered much attention.

Mixing songs and cultures is not the only blending that the band does. They are extremely versatile, combining singing, step dancing and the playing of instruments into one act. The instrumentation is traditional as well, using fiddles, penny whistles, mandolin, banjo and even accordion, among others.

Even their name is derived from the Celtic tradition. "Cherish the Ladies" is a type of traditional Celtic jig.

The band formed over twenty years ago, and has evolved over the years. The ladies of Cherish the Ladies are Joanie Madden, Mary Coogan, Heidi Talbot, Reennan producing and Megan Fox (Transformers 3 in the lead. Next up are "Fatty Style," her take on college sex comedies, "Time and a Half," a hipster postgraduate satire, and "Thirlesque," a musical about cabaret artists. And she owes her publisher a book this month.

Under the circumstances, Cody is coping with her success as much as reveling in it.

"I'm completely overwhelmed," she said a month ago. "My life is chaos. I cannot even begin to explain to you how busy I am or how drained I am. My entire life is completely upside-down. Promoting the film has been really exhausting. I'm a professional writer and yet I have fewer and fewer opportunities to write. And I have to try to maintain my personal life as well."

The chaos boiled over Wednesday when she and Hunt announced the end of their marriage, a relationship that was often the subject of blissful commentary in her popular memoir "Candy Girl" and her widely read blog. The previous Friday she had unblanketed her body-art tribute to Hunt – a large upper-arm portrait of Cody as a bikini-clad cowgirl created by the banner Jonas's initial – covering the words with a spray of red roses. Their split made headlines in the Los Angeles Times.

"It was frightening," she said Thursday. "I did not realize how public it [separation] had become until yesterday when all this stuff surfaced."

Their relationship had been the subject of some speculation as Cody's life radically changed. When a picture appeared of Reitman and Cody sharing a celebratory hug after winning the top prize at the Rome Film Festival, rumors circulated. When he agreed to co-direct her next film, Cody seemed "Reitman bumps on Cody's flesh."

No thanks, Cody said with an emphatic shake of the head. "He's the sweet devoted family man. He's just a nice babe. He's like my brother."

Hunt also vehemently denied the accusations. That's so disgustingly sexist. The reason it's a romantic rise [of] a mediocre talent

In an interview for December's Alpha St. Paul magazine, Cody's friend Steve Marsh asked her if "Juno" became a major success, would it mean bye-bye Jonas?

"Are you kidding?" she replied. "That's a ridiculous question. He's not going anywhere. Everything we do we do side by side. I've got him tattooed on my arm, for God's sakes."

"Juno," a comedy about an accidentally-pregnant Minnesota teen, was the surprise hit of the Toronto International Film Festival, where Roger Ebert wrote, "I don't know where I've heard a standing ovation so long, loud and warm." Much of the credit has gone to Cody. Typically, writers are shipped to a Siberian gulag when the time comes to publicize a film, but the sassy, photogenic, ever-quotable screenwriter is the film's public face.

She not only shares the limelight with star Ellen Page and Reitman (who praise her effusively) but often eclipses them. In Italy, England, Spain and across the United States she has captivated interviewers with her unique brand of profane, feminism, hi-geek erudition and blustering wit. She was offered up as a sassy role model by Wired and interviewed in Esquire's Women We Love issue. She was The Screenwriter of the Moment in Entertainment Weekly's holiday movie preview, and ranked 58th on the magazine's list of the 50 smartest people in Hollywood (she acknowledges all IQ above 180).

The friends of a Glam schoolgirl are one more than Cody. She was home hand-to-mouth on her lap dancing tips three years ago.

We were always on Jobs she recalled. One day we literally had $9 left. We went to the Fresh in St. Louis Park and bought a loaf of bread, a package of bologna and some generic cigarettes because my husband was still a smoker at the time. I remember sitting in front in the parking lot. 'Don't worry, honey, we can buy more bologna tomorrow,' after I finish shopping.' And we both started laughing so hard at how absurdly white trash our situation

See CELTIC on page 6

See CODY on page 6

'Awake' puts to sleep

Film has the right idea but fails to impress on-screen

BY FRANK GODINHO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Instead of keeping you at the edge of your seat, the utterly predictable "Awake" is more likely to have you checking your watch.

The most interesting aspect of the film is its premise, which is based on the disturbing medical fact that thousands of people experience something called "anesthesia awareness" every year. The exceedingly rare condition leaves patients in a state of paralysis yet awake (hence, the title) and fully aware of their surroundings. For anyone who has been through surgery, the mere thought of feeling every incision of an operation is like something directly out of the movie "Saw."

"Awake" follows Clay Beresford (Hayden Christensen), a young millionaire and one of the heirs to his late father's New York City financial empire, along with his mother Lilith (Lena Olin). After recently surviving a heart attack, Clay's future in the company is at stake as he patiently waits on a donor's list for a healthy heart.

In the meantime, the film introduces the audience to several minor back stories, such as his friendship with Dr. Jack Harper (Terrence Howard), someone who Clay fully trusts and wants to have as the doctor in charge of him when he goes under the knife.

In addition, Clay keeps his engagement to his girlfriend Sam Lockwood (Jessica Alba) a secret from his mother, for he senses a strong tension between the two, and is scared that his mother would disapprove of their relationship. Poor writing is to blame for the uncreative plot development of this odd story line. What began as an interesting premise, notably changes into a silly family drama.

After eloping to get married, despite his mother's strong disapproval, Clay immediately receives news of a readily available heart in the middle of the night, seconds after the happy couple have tied the knot. The predictable plotline continues when entering the hospital Clay decides to once again disagree with his protective mother, and chooses to go forth with his surgery with Dr. Harper as his surgeon instead of his mother's pre-selected choice of one of the best surgeons in the country.

What saves this film from being one of the worst movies of the year, is the realistic and truly frightened narration that Hayden Christensen gives as he learns that the anesthesia isn't quite working the way it should. The surgical scenes are not censored, and for those with a weak stomach, you'll want to cover your eyes.

During the surgery, the audience watches in disbelief as Clay screams and fully feels the pain of his chest incisions and heart removal. To makes matters worse, he's awake to hear that his trusted friend and surgical team is actually planning to murder him.

In a race against time, Clay consciousness escapes from his body and desperately tries to alert his wife Sam and his mother Lilith of the horrific conspiracy that's happening to him on the operating table.

Without giving too much away, the plot goes on to display a series of predictable twists and turns, which will remain unsaid for those who plan on seeing the film. With a frightening premise, "Awake" had the potential to be an intelligent and gripping psychological thriller. However, the weak screenplay and storyline make the film more of a family drama intermixed with a murder mystery.

Frank Godinho can be reached at fgodinho@student.umass.edu

"Awake" is based on the medical experience of "anesthesia awareness" where the patient is awake during their surgery.

From stripper to blogger to screen-writer: Diablo Cody

BY COLIN CONTRI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Diablo Cody's Cinderella moment had arrived. Her film "Juno" was less than four hours from its Hollywood premiere. At the Centerpiece Gala presentation of the annual American Film Institute Festival, her highly-anticipated comedy was about to be seen for the first time by hundreds of the industry's most important people.

And so was Cody. It was to be a flashbulbs-and-red-carpet event and she had nothing to wear.

With her husband, graphic designer Jon Hunt, at her side Cody labored L.A.'s Grove shopping arcade, a tree-lined faux village of chichi boutiques. Cody's small rear ears and T-shirt, Jeff Spicoli checkerboard Vans and gnawed black fingernails marked her as an infrequent visitor to the realm of exclusive retailing. "I loathe shopping," she groaned to Nordstrom's shoe department. she said, "Look at this madness. My feet are so wide and these are delicate little European lady shoe."

When the clerk suggested four-inch heels, Cody shook her head. "Heels. I wish. No. I probably can't wear heels. I have nerve damage in my feet from stripping."

Conversation died in a 50-second radius. Eyes stopped looking at her.

"That always gets kids," she said with an unrumbled shrug.

Welcome to the charmed and frenzied life of Minneapolis' most celebrated former exotic dancer turned Hollywood's hottest scribe, whose prize-winning debut script has those in the know hailing her as the most distinctive new voice since Quentin Tarantino and a shoo-in Oscar nominee.

Right now, she's caught in the headlights of her own astonishing success. Steven Spielberg dipped Cody to write the pilot for The United States of Tara, his showtime series about a suburban mother (Toni Collette) with multiple personalities.

Soon, shooting will begin on "Jennifer's Body," her feminist horror-comedy about a small town Minnesota girl who eats boys, with Juno director Jason

See CELTIC on page 6

Famous pianist inspired by 'A Charlie Brown Christmas'

The five-time Grammy nominee, David Benoit, created "A Charlie Brown Christmas" tribute in honor of the characters that introduced him to jazz.

By Mariuke Rowland
Mc Clatchy Newspapers

Charlie Brown, Snoopy and that sad little tree have become almost as much a part of the holidays as jolly old Saint Nick and all those reindeer.

And equally ingrained in our collective consciousness is the elegant jazz score that accompanies the "Peanuts" gang as it celebrates the season in the classic animated Christmas special. Today, no jazz artist embodies that spirit more than David Benoit.

The contemporary jazz pianist, composer and five-time Grammy nominee created "A Charlie Brown Christmas," a tribute show to the beloved "Peanuts" holiday special created by Charles M. Schulz and composer Vince Guaraldi.

Born in Bakersfield and raised in Los Angeles, CA, the 54-year-old musician was inspired to go into jazz piano by the 1965 "A Charlie Brown Christmas" TV show. He saw it as a boy, and it has stayed with him since.

"It was such a landmark thing back in the 1960s to use jazz in animation," Benoit said from his Palos Verdes home. "I remember I was 10-years-old when it came out. It was a lot of the reason I became a jazz pianist. It captured a spirit. It's just genius."

He began studying music a couple years later. His first piano teacher had a background in jazz, so, unlike most pianists, he learned jazz before he learned classical music. With a father who was a jazz guitarist, the music was always in the house and Benoit said that he was drawn to its laid-back mood.

"Jazz was the weekend music, the music to relax to and have a cocktail to," he said. "Classical was the weekday music, my mother's music. The music we did our homework to."

Five Grammy nominations later, Benoit is working on his latest studio album. The release, called "Heroes," will feature Benoit's take on a collection of standards by an eclectic array of his musical favorites, from The Beatles to Elton John, The Doors to Miles Davis, Oscar Peterson, Bill Evans and Dave Brubeck.

"Those are my influences," he said. "That is probably why I got into contemporary jazz, I was very into popular music and groove-oriented jazz."

He said the CD should be out in the spring.

Benoit said contemporary jazz today is getting more and more fragmented. The genre has gone from the mainstream in the 1950s to a segmented niche that breaks down even further into jazz fusion, smooth jazz, traditional jazz and so on.

"What is disappointing to me is seeing a bitterness in some of the camps. It's such a small percentage of the market now," he said. "It's supposed to be music that makes you feel good and gives you a chill. It's about individual expression. I hope that is what the younger players think about and what is most important."

From seeing the cartoon on TV to writing its music, Benoit's career has come full circle as he became the official composer for the "Peanuts" shows, creating the music for 2003's "I Want a Dog for Christmas, Charlie Brown," 2000's "It's the Pied Piper, Charlie Brown" and 1992's "It's Christmastime Again Charlie Brown," among others.

Benoit also had the opportunity to meet his inspiration, "Peanuts" creator Schulz, a few years before his death in 2000. He said being associated with the Charlie Brown name is an honor.

"He was a wonderful man," Benoit said. "I am best friends with the producer who brought me into [Peanuts]. It's that kind of organization. The people are unlike the kind of people you normally meet in television and show business. And it all started with Charles Schulz ... the most down-to-earth, unassuming person."

Benoit's "A Charlie Brown Christmas" show began big, first with an orchestra and video presentations and then with Al Jarreau and Melissa Manchester. But now he has taken the concert back to its basics, playing with his piano trio and a saxophonist.

"I think that show got a little far away from the innocence of Charlie Brown," he said. "I decided to do something very simple and pay tribute to the music of Charlie Brown."

As has become his tradition on this Christmas tour, Benoit will bring out an area children's choir to sing with him on the show's final song, "Christmastime is Here."

"[Using the children's choir] is a marvelous experience. There's not a dry eye in the house," he said.

A to Z Car Repair
Whether your car is your passion or just a means of getting from point A to point B, we're here to help.
We're a local, family-owned business specializing in auto and small engine repair
Brakes • Tune-ups • Alternators • Suspension • Starter Motors • Exhaust work
Tire mounting and balancing • Performance auto parts Oil changes, and more!

The Daily Collegian now offers free online classifieds for students at WWW.UMASSLIST.COM

- Categories ranging from intramurals to extracurricular activities to study groups to student internships
- More complete, local and relevant category listings than any and all competitor web sites combined
- Users can setup daily e-mail updates for relevant listings. No more searching for apartments, now they come to you.
- Post unlimited online listings
- Little to no spam
- By listing on this site you are supporting your local college newspaper, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

The semester is ending soon so find yourself a winter job or sell some stuff to get some green!

'A Celtic Christmas'

Irish women bring culture to Amherst holiday celebrations

CELTIC from page 5

Mirella Murray and Roisin Dillon.

Madden, who plays the flute and whistles, is one of the founding members of the band, along with guitarist and banjoist and mandolin-ist Cogan. Talbot, who joined the group in 2002, provides lead vocals. Fiddle is supplied by Dillon, who has been with the group for four years, while Murray, a five year member of the Ladies, takes it away on the accordion.

The band also makes use of step dancers who have been regional, national or world champions. The step accompanies every performance and adds to the band's charm.

Acclaim for the band has been both constant and widespread. The Boston Globe has said of it, "It is simply impossible to imagine an audience that wouldn't enjoy what they do." Their touring across multiple continents can attest to that. Cherish the Ladies has wowed audiences in the United Kingdom and Europe, Australia and New Zealand, and North and South America.

Initially, critics were impressed with the group for being the first and only all-female traditional Irish band. Since then, they have proven themselves time and time again with spectacular and humorous concerts. The band has come to be recognized for their undeniable talent.

The BBC named Cherish the Ladies the Best Musical Group of the Year; the Glasgow Royal Concert Hall presented them with the International Group of the Year Award. National Public Radio's "Thistle and Shamrock" have also had their say, calling it the Top North American Celtic Act.

With awards such as these under the band's belt, the audience for Wednesday's show is bound to have high expectations. Cherish the Ladies' Celtic Christmas will not disappoint. Show-goers will surely be dazzled by the ladies' energetic holiday performance.

Michelle Fredette can be reached at mfredett@student.umass.edu.

Cody re-invents herself to become Hollywood writer

CODY from page 5

was."

How times have changed. Cody arrived in full Hollywood regalia for "Juno's" searchlight premiere at the historic Cinerama Dome on Sunset Boulevard. An off-the-shoulder frock showcased her then-intact "Jonny's Girl" tattoo. She struck poses for photographers, looking like she'd be more at home in a hot rod than a studio limousine.

Before the house lights dimmed, Tom Rothman, chairman of Fox Filmed Entertainment, the distributor of "Juno," shimmied through the crowd to pay his respects. "This is such a unique, special movie," said the man behind "Titanic" and "Star Wars" episodes 1, 2 and 3. "We're going to do absolutely everything we can for this one," he beamed. "Every now and then you get one you really don't want to (louse) up."

Originally scheduled as a low-expectation spring release, "Juno" was moved to a prestigious mid-December slot after its festival raves and stratospheric audience testing. It's now positioned as this year's "Little Miss Sunshine."

At the afterparty, praise for Cody's work flowed like champagne.

John Malkovich, one of the film's producers, said her script was clearly destined as the blueprint for a very good film. It was funny, original and well-written.

Jason Bateman, who plays a married yuppie adopting Juno's baby, said the screenplay deserves to be the star of the film.

"A great screenplay makes everybody step up to the bar and deliver," said Catherine Hardwicke, director of the youth drama "Thirteen." "You'd have to be a dirt clod not to like this movie."

It's a wonderful irony that the story of Cody's rise to movieland icon would make a lousy film. No one would believe it. Stripper-turned-screenwriter has become the accepted shorthand for her career, but her life has been a gallery of sudden, dramatic reinventions. Cody's very hair, rumored to be a natural reddish-brown, seems possessed by Sybil-like personalities. To look at her photos on her blog over the years is to see a restless chameleon.

Brook Joan Busey didn't set out to be Diablo Cody. She didn't concoct that identity until she entered the blogosphere in 2003, writing about her experiences in strip clubs, where she was known as Bonbon and Roxanne.

She grew up with older brother Marc, coddled to the point of asphyxiation in a lively Italian Catholic family in Lemont, Ill., southwest of Chicago. She attended parochial school for 12 years, a bright, geeky kid, deep into the normal teenage panoply of comic books, horror movies, rock 'n' roll, boys and blabbing on her hamburger-shaped phone. She was a thrill-seeker and an extrovert, caterwauling for Yak Spackle, a horrible punk band that she and her friends started.

She attended the University of Iowa, famous for its Writers' Workshop. One teacher called her the best writer he'd ever taught, but predicted that laziness would be her undoing. It was an early flare-up of Cody's oppositional disorder, a tendency to torpedo jobs and responsibilities.

Returning to Chicago after graduation in 2000, she took a dismal secretarial position at a bankruptcy law firm. She began goofing off on the World Wide Waste of Time, stoking her passion for the Beach Boys through visits to a fan site operated by Hunt, a musician and music journalist in Minneapolis.

"She started posting on there, and she was very funny," Hunt recalled. "After she shared a few of her weird, impressive stories, I thought, this girl is brilliant. So I kept encouraging her, saying, 'You're a genius and you're going to be huge someday, so please believe it.'"

Diablo Cody began writing in her blog "Pussy Ranch" where she described her everyday life as a stripper. She got her big break when her script entitled "Juno" was picked up by Fox Filmed Entertainment.

In what has been an up-and-down season for the Minutewomen, coach Marnie Dacko hopes her team can earn its first road win against Villanova this evening. UMass lost to another Big East foe – St. John's – last week and face Providence at the end of the month.

UMass, Cats meet in Penn.

W. BASKETBALL from page 10

Mills and Pam Rosanio – squad's leading scorers – come in.

Mills is averaging 15.9 points per game excels offensively in the paint. She has 127 points, going 58-of-116 from the floor.

Rosanio averages 15.4 points a game so far. She is 42-of-82 from the field, for 123 points.

Mills and Rosanio are the only UMass players that are averaging in double figures every game this season.

Dacko also commented on the Wildcat defense. She said they run a tough man-to-man scheme and suspects they will try to double-team Mills.

Dacko said her players just need to run their own scheme and deal with any problems as they come. She said the team will try to pound the ball inside throughout the game and attempt to get Villanova players into foul trouble. Per tradition, Dacko wants her team to focus on its performance and not that of its opponent.

Tonight will not only be just fourth time these teams have squared off, but the first time they have faced each other in exactly five years. The Minutewomen beat the Wildcats 55-50 on Dec. 11, 2002. Dacko's first year at the helm of the program.

The game's hero was then-senior Jen Butler. The future WNBA player scored 16 points and 12 rebounds, in what was the Maroon and White's fifth-straight win.

Domenic Poli can be reached at dpoli@student.umass.edu.

Mass Attack moves up in poll

HOCKEY from page 10

Movin' on up

With their win over New Hampshire, the Minutemen (7-3-5, 4-2-4 Hockey East) moved up two spots in the latest USCHO.com/CSTV Division I Men's Poll to No. 9. The ranking is the highest for UMass since November of 2003 when it sat in the seventh spot.

The Maroon and White are the highest ranked team in Hockey East despite being in second place behind Northeastern.

The Wildcats dropped to No. 10 following the loss, and Northeastern moved up to the 11 spot previously held by the Minutemen.

At this point in the season, the rankings aren't particularly important, but Cahoon uses them to measure himself against national competition not on his schedule.

The Minutemen began the season at No. 20 in the poll. Aside from the early success, the inconsistency of some Hockey East schools has helped the Minutemen rise.

Teams from the Western Collegiate Hockey Association and the Central Collegiate Hockey Association occupy the top seven positions in the poll.

Defense wins the game

The Minutemen boast the top scoring defense in Hockey East, allowing 2.07 goals per game. The UMass defenseman and goaltender Paul Dainton communicate well on the ice, preventing soft goals.

After Saturday's 4-1 win over New Hampshire, Dainton praised his defenders for making his job easy against a high-powered UNH offense.

"The defense played unbelievably. From clearing rebounds to letting me see the shot and communicating well behind the net, everything is just clicking right now," he said. "It's kind of bad that we have a break coming up because we want to keep all of this going."

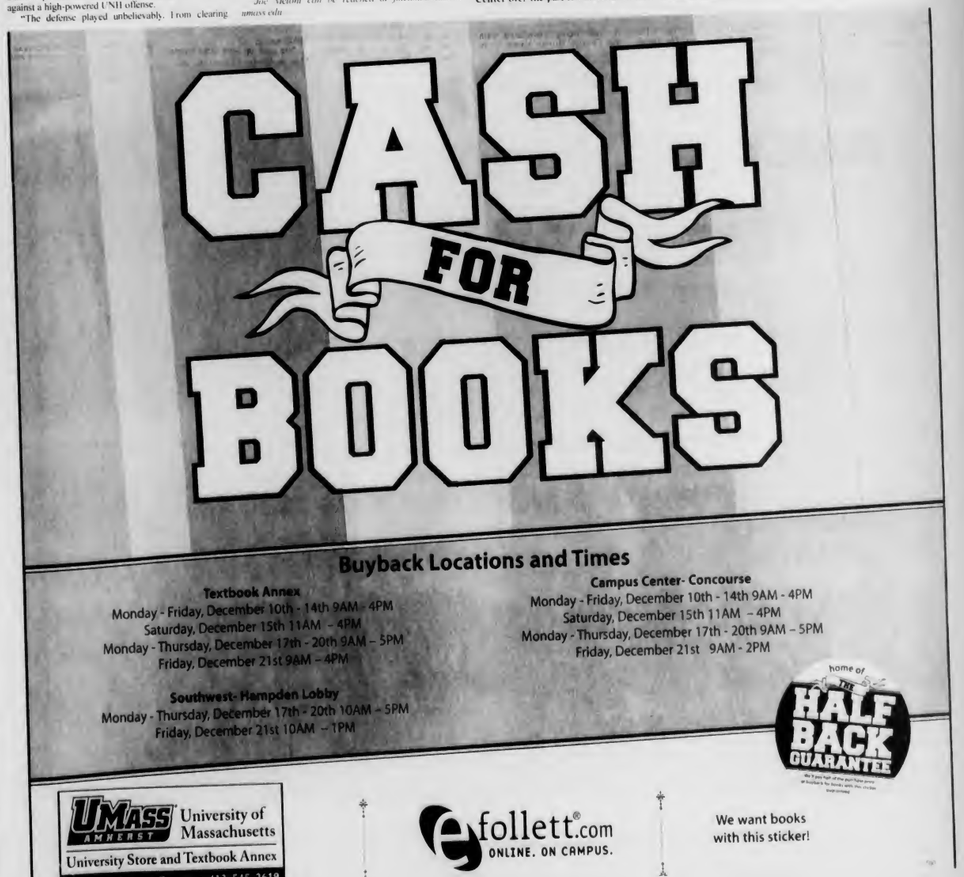
Despite the team effort, Dainton received an individual honor for his performance against the Wildcats. His 32-save effort earned him Hockey East Rookie of the Week honors for the second time this season.

He leads Hockey East with a 2.01 goals-against average and a .929 save percentage. UMass Lowell's Carter Hutton is better in both categories, but has played in five games to Dainton's 13.

The UMass defenseman also contributed offensively in the win over UNH. Leaderer scored UMass's first goal of the matchup, and sophomore Justin Braun added his sixth assist of the season, good enough for second on the team.

Lucky 13

The win over UNH extended UMass's home unbeaten streak to 13, dating back to last season. The Minutemen are 9-0-4 in that stretch.



The large ice surface favors UMass's fast-paced offensive style, but the increased fan support over the last few seasons is something the players point to as a main reason.

"Over my four years here, the fans have been great. Over the past few years, since we've been doing well they've been coming out," Fenton said. "I think there were almost 6,000 people here again tonight. That always helps. When we look up and we see the entire student side full, it's a great feeling. It's kind of like having a seventh guy out there."

Joe Mellom can be reached at jmelomi@student.umass.edu

Junior centerman Cory Quirk and the Minutemen have benefited from the large crowds at the Mullins Center over the past few seasons. In fact, UMass is unbeaten on its home ice this season.

DEC 11 2007

Parker's Terriers in last place

Strong goaltending leads River Hawk surge up HEA standings

By Ricky Eddleston
Collegian Correspondent

When you think of Boston University, you normally think of a team that is atop or close to the top of the Hockey East standings. This season, however, you will find the Terriers in a very unfamiliar place – last place. With only three conference wins and one tie this season, BU has managed to rack up just 7 points, tying them with Merrimack for last place in the conference.

Despite leading all of Hockey East in scoring with 56 goals and 3.50 goals per game, the Terriers defense has not had the same success. BU has given up 59 goals this season, while allowing an average of 3.69 goals per game.

The Terriers' struggles on defense can immediately be attributed to their poor penalty killing and shaky goaltending. Currently, teams have a 22 percent rate of success against the Terriers penalty kill. Their defense also has particularly struggled in the third period of games, giving up 23 goals in that period – the most of any team in Hockey East.

Behind their poor defense, goaltenders have been performing even worse. BU has used three goaltenders this season, sophomore Brett Bennett, senior Karson Gillespie and freshman Adam Kraus. Bennett has been the primary net minder for the Terriers starting seven games this season and playing in eight overall. Bennett has a 3.42 goals-against average to go along 4-4-2 record and a .863 save percentage.

Gillespie has been even worse than Bennett and has struggled mightily in conference games. Gillespie's goals-against average in Hockey East games is 4.17 to go along with an equally dismal .816 save percentage. Kraus has played in just one game, giving up four goals on 27 shots in a loss to UMass Lowell. If Gillespie and Bennett continue to struggle, Kraus might see more time in net.

Hockey East

Goaltending keys UML

Unlike BU, UMass Lowell has relied on its goaltending to earn the team a tie for second place in Hockey East.

The River Hawks have used a pair of sophomores in net this year, both of whom have performed exceptionally well. Nevin Hamilton has received the majority of the playing time, starting nine games. In those nine games, Hamilton has a 2.63 goal-against average, which puts him eighth in Hockey East.

Fellow sophomore, Carter Hutton, has been outstanding in the five games he has played this season for UML. Hutton currently leads not only Hockey East, but also all Division 1 goaltenders with a 1.36 goals against average.

Goaltending has not been the only key to success for the River Hawks. UML currently has the number two scoring defense in Hockey East, trailing only UMass, allowing just 2.27 goals per game. The River Hawks lead Hockey East in penalty kill with an 88.3 percent success rate and have killed 22 of the last 23 opponent power plays

Poll position

Hockey East had four representatives in this week's USCHO.com/ CSTV Division 1 men's poll, led by UMass who moved up two spots to No. 9. New Hampshire, who lost to UMass over the weekend, dropped two spots to No. 10. Hockey East leader Northeastern moved up one spot to No. 11, with Boston College at No. 15.

HEA weekly honors

Junior defensemen Matt Duffy was named CCM/RBK Player of the Week. Duffy recorded his first career hat trick in a 3-1 victory over Merrimack on Saturday. He had five shots on goal with a +2 plus/minus rating in the game.

UMass freshman goaltender Paul Dainton as named Hockey East Rookie of the Week. Dainton made 32 saves in a 4-1 victory over UNH, earning his fifth victory of the season.

Sophomore goaltender Mike Spillane, of Vermont, has been named Pure Hockey Defensive Player of the Week. Spillane had a career-high 35 saves in a 2-2 tie with No. 12 Harvard.

Quick Notes

By beating UNH at home last week, UMass increased its home-unbeaten streak to 13 games. In their last 10 games the Minutemen own a 6-1-3 record and scored 4 or more goals in five of those games ... Northeastern is unbeaten in its last eight games posting a 6-0-2 record. It's the team's longest since an identical 6-0-2 unbeaten streak from Nov. 22-Dec. 28, 1997 ... Maine ended its six game winless streak, when it beat Merrimack 3-1 Saturday. It was the team's longest winless streak since the 1999-2000 season, when the Black Bears were winless in five games from Jan. 15 to Feb. 6.

Ricky Eddleston can be reached at reddlest@student.edu.

HOCKEY EAST STANDINGS

	Hockey East				Overall
Team	W	L	T	Pts.	W	L	T
1 Northeastern	6	3	1	13	7	4	2
2 Massachusetts	4	2	4	12	7	3	5
Boston College	4	3	4	12	5	4	5
UMass Lowell	4	4	4	12	7	4	4
5 New Hampshire	5	4	1	11	8	4	1
6 Providence	4	3	2	10	6	6	2
7 Vermont	3	3	2	8	3	6	3
Maine	3	4	2	8	5	6	2
9 Merrimack	3	7	1	7	4	10	2
Boston University	3	6	1	7	6	7	2

Gaffney's 5 blocks lead UMass defense

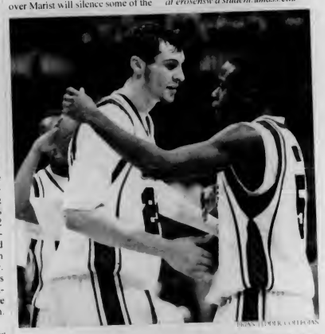
GAFFNEY from page 10

Up two points with 11:30 remaining, Gaffney blocked Dejuan Goodwin's jumper. UMass couldn't capitalize on its possession and Marist went on a 11-3 run to take a 58-52 lead. With 4:45 left and UMass again up by two, Marist's leading scorer Louie McCroskey drove into the lane looking for the tying layup.

Gaffney set the attempt back in the other direction, leading to a fast break opportunity. Gary Forbes picked up the loose ball and sent it to Ricky Harris who converted the 3-point play after he was fouled on a layup – giving the Minutemen a 5-point lead and all the cushion they needed.

"It was a true case of the first time this year where our defense was the reason we won," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "Our defense in the last eight minutes fueled our offense, and we haven't been able to say that much this year."

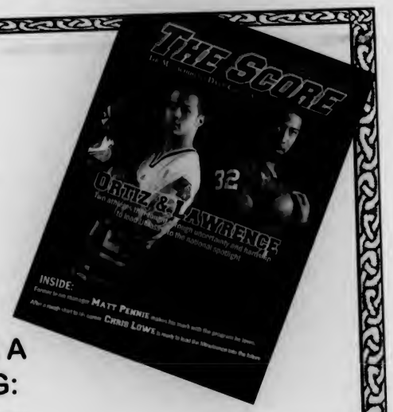
Gaffney hopes that the victory over Marist will silence some of the critics.



"Every time I hear that we're not a good defensive team, I take that straight to heart," he said. "As much pride as our team takes on offense, I try to take that pride on defense, and against IUPUI we really struggled. But we made it a point, obviously, all week in practice. All we did was defense and I think it showed in the second half."

Gaffney played 12 minutes in the second half, split into two shifts. He entered the game with 8:41 remaining for his final appearance, playing for the remainder of the contest. He made the most of it and so did the team, as the Minutemen outscored the Red Foxes, 31-12, during that span.

"He provided a great lift. We always see that in Tony, ever since he first got here blocking shots," point guard Chris Lowe said.



He won't block 387 more shots, but those Gaffney-Lasme comparisons don't seem so crazy for that one night.

Eli Rosensweike can be reached at erosensw@student.umass.edu

The leadership and shot-blocking abilities of junior forward Tony Gaffney (left) were on display in the Minutemen's win over Marist Saturday.

SPORTS NIGHT WITH THE DAILY COLLEGIAN At THE HARP

JOIN US FRIDAY NIGHT AT 7PM FOR A SPORTS SPECTACULAR FEATURING:

- UMass Men's Soccer Final Four Showdown Against Ohio State on the Large Indoor Projector
- The Daily Collegian's "The Score" 2007-'08 Release
- Appearances and Autographs from Featured UMass Athletes

THE HARP
Home of the GREAT TUESDAY TRIVIA

The Harp accepts OCMP, VISA, MasterCard, AmEx, Discover & Debit cards.

TAKE A PHOTO OF YOURSELF WITH YOUR COMPLETED SUDOKU OR CROSSWORD AND SET YOURSELF ON THE COMICS PAGE
COMICS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Total eclipse of Sudoku.

			1	8	5	2		4
	9				3	5	1
		2	8			3
7	1						2	5
		6			7	9
	4	1	3				9
		9	2	5	1
8

ACROSS
1 Identical
5 Wound coverage
9 Garbo of films
14 Prayer ender
15 Etoile
16 Pass along
17 Lake formed by Hoover Dam
18 Secondhand
19 Select few
20 Advantages
22 Wound seriously
23 Elle's style
24 Police state
27 Get hitched again
29 Negative vote
30 Flu type
34 Obtain
35 Conceited
36 007
37 Long, narrow cuts
39 Sicilian eruption
40 Biblical preposition
41 Feel unwell
42 Runs into
43 Equal score
44 Conciliate
47 Economizes severely
49 Educator
54 Duplicate
55 Funeral home
56 Sharp mountain ridge
58 Apple or quince
59 Small nail
60 Detection device
61 What to be right as?
62 Irish Gaelic
63 Reagan cabinet member
64 Formerly
65 Hair colorist

DOWN
1 Dance in duple time
2 Muslim prince
3 Intended
4 Coma to a conclusion
5 Mildstream channel
6 Habitual practice
7 God of war
8 Bottom of a river
9 Slick
10 Object from antiquity
11 Call rid of
12 Moka java
13 Affirmative at sea
21 Simple plant
22 Trading centers
24 Wintry
25 New Orleans player
26 Asian starlings
28 Rumble
30 Borders on 31 Type of boom
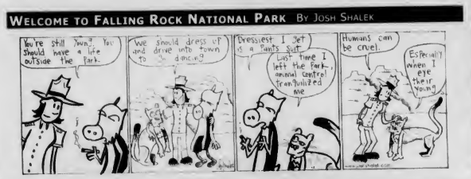
32 Plead on another's behalf
33 Fuss
35 Victory sign
37 Balletic
38 Cub brims
42 Patty part
44 Current unit
45 AEC word
46 Tranquil
48 Very small amounts
50 To the third power
51 Part of HST
52 Delete
53 Actress Winona
56 Ecstatic cry
58 Appendage
57 Norma
58 In favor of

Find all of today's puzzle solutions online!
WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

AHHHHH!



Quote of the Day

"I liked the koala, wallaby, and I chilled with a kangaroo a bit. There was a wombat that I quite enjoyed also."

–Todd Barry

Welcome to Falling Rock National Park By Josh Shalek

Last Ditch Effort By John Kroes

Labrat By Richard Martelly

Horoscopes

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are endowed with the mystic aura of the wise and sacred wombat.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Use all 8 ways to say "no" as taught by D.A.R.E to respectfully decline listening to techno and Nickelback.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You are more valuable to this campus' ecosystem than the last female Yangtze giant soft-shell turtle is to China.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Take out your end of the semester frustations by stealing people's pencils and karate chopping them in half.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Give blood to the vampires in the basement of the Campus Center.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Eventually you're going to have to do all this work so you might as well start tonight and get it out of the way.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Just like Mr. Bucket, you are buckets of fun.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Stop petting your boyfriend's hair, he may act like a dog but he is not a pet.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Always say hello when you enter a room so people will feel more guilty about ignoring you if you have a stroke or something.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Jazz always enhances your image. If you are creepy, jazz makes you creepier. If you are cool, jazz accents your vibage.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Flip your internal battery around and turn your feelings of negativity into actions of positivity.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
It is dangerously icey outside. Arm yourself with a blowtorch and a pair of crampons.

Comics + Wombat= COMBAT

comics@dailycollegian.com

Submit your comics!
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Submit your classifieds!
(413) 545-3500

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Apt. 4 Rent

Brandywine Apt. JAN-MAY. 1 Bdrm New Carpets/Paint- conact mlalli@student.umass.edu for information.

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jan. 1 First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www brandywineapts.com or stop by or call 549-0600

New 2 bedroom condo 30 minutes from campus. Gas fireplace drive under garage country setting must see! $159,000. Call 413-887-7691.

Apt. for Rent

Large quiet comfortable, furnished, walk to UMass, on busines for male Graduate student/Professor. Reasonable. Available January. 413-549-1578

Employment

Rent us your ears! Listening Experiments $10/hr English must be your first language. Email: phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu voicemail: 545-6837

Japanese speakers! Rent us your ears! $12/hr for participating in listening experiments contact the phonetics lab, phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu 545-6837

The Boston University Bookstore in Kenmore

Employment

Square has a job for you during Winterbreak if you have Starbucks Coffee experience! Email bdinolo@bu.edu

Information

CONTIKI TRAVEL INFO NIGHT! Travel Info Night! Monday, the 26th at 6:00 in John Quincy Adams, 12th floor. Free Brunos pizza. Free Contiki stuff chance to win a Free Trip! Questions? dbordona@student.umass.edu. Be a traveler not a tourist!

Lost

REWARD
Women's Ring. Silver with garnet (Red) stone.

Information

Campus Center Nov 1. Contact Donald Depiro 516-456-7662

Room for Rent

Hillel's Jewish Living Community 388 N. Pleasant Winter session or Spring term Single/Double. Any 5 college student (except freshmen). Laundry, internet, pool table, big rooms Walk to UM. Parking, cable avail. Quiet. 549-1700 x 205 or www.UMASSHILLEL.ORG/JLLC

Services

Call someone who really cares. Birthright of Amherst Area 549-1906,1-800-550-4900. 24 - hour hotline Free Pregnancy test 233 N. Pleasant St. Amherst www.birthright.org

Concerned About Your Eating? Do you eat too little? Eat too much? Have food issues? Help is available! Call University Health Services Eating Disorders Clinic 577-5101

Free Rapid HIV Testing at the UMASS Campus Center (168c) this Friday, Nov. 30th from 9 am - 3 pm provided by Tapestry Health. Always confidential, always affordable, always safe. Located at 27 Pray St., Amherst. Call 413-548-9909 www.tapestryhealth.org or 800-226-1445

Travel

#1 Spring Break Website! 4,8,7 night trips. Low prices, guaranteed. Group discounts for 8+. Book 20 people, get 4 free trips! Campus reps needed. www.SpringBreakTravel.com or 800-678-6386

DEC 11 2007

DEC 12 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 2007

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

P.J. STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore guard Kim Benton and the Minutewomen take on Villanova tonight on the road. UMass is in search of its first away victory, having won all of its games at the Mullins Center. Benton averages just under five points and also leads the team in 3-point attempts with 4.8 per game.

UM looks for first road win

Following victory over Maine, Minutewomen face Villanova

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's basketball team has won every game at the Mullins Center this year, but has dropped each road game. The team looks to change all that today when they face Villanova (7-2) at the Pavilion.

"I can't pinpoint it," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said when asked why her team cannot win on the road. "I think we've played well on the road, we just haven't been able to put teams away. We have to be able to come out and play."

Dacko said she is confident her team will stifle the losing trend, adding that it will likely take just one win to get the Minutewomen (4-5) on a roll and be better able to handle games not played in the Mullins Center. She knows the sort of talent and vigor her players have and that they just need to manifest it in an away game to start getting better results. She said today is a perfect time for this to happen.

"Villanova is certainly a good test for us," she said.

The Wildcats are coming off a 67-52 loss to George Washington that snapped a six-game winning streak. A stretch of six scoreless minutes wound up meaning the game for Villanova, as the Colonials (7-3) put together a 16-0 second-half run in that time and secured the victory. During their scoreless span, the Wildcats went 0-for-8 and had three turnovers.

After viewing some of Villanova's game film, Dacko said one of the things that makes the Wildcats so dangerous is their ability to nail 3-pointers, holding a .382 percentage this season. Their two best players are senior Stacie Witman and junior Lisa Karcic, who average .433 and .424 respectively, from the 3-point line this year.

Dacko admits her team isn't known for being a great defending team from behind the arc but said her players know what they need to do today.

The best way for the Minutewomen to combat Villanova's best offensive players is with solid defense and good offensive players of their own. That's where seniors Kate

See W. BASKETBALL on page 7

Cahoon signs recruits

Contribution expected next year from incoming prospects

BY JOE MELLONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts hockey team announced six players signed National Letters of Intent last week. The group includes three forwards and three defensemen. Among the defensemen is John Carlson, a projected first round pick in next June's NHL Draft.

Carlson, 6-foot-2 215 pounds, brings size to a UMass blue line that will lose captain Mike Kostka and assistant captain David Leaderer to graduation after this season.

UMass Hockey

UMass's current core of defenseman lacks a true physical enforcer. Martin Nolet throws his weight around well on the ice, but has been a healthy scratch more than once this season.

Carlson currently plays for the Indiana Ice of the United States Hockey League. UMass coach Don Cahoon expects him to contribute immediately next season, on both ends of the ice. In his first 18 games of the season for Indiana, he scored five goals and assisted on 10 others. But the most impressive side of the Carlson for Cahoon was his maturity.

Matt Irwin, another of the defenseman in this year's class, is as versatile as Carlson.

"Irwin and Carlson are both good-sized kids with good offensive sides to them," Cahoon said. "But they're certainly very respectable defensively and have a maturity to them. They're both going to be contributors from the get go."

Mike Marcou, younger brother of current UMass freshman James Marcou, also signed with the Minutemen. He currently plays in the USHL with the Waterloo Blackhawks.

Offensively, the Minutemen took care of a few needs. Danny Hobbs is a forward with size and a knack for making plays with the puck. The New York Rangers selected him in the seventh round of last June's NHL Draft. But Cahoon likes the overall look of his crew of forwards more so than the talents of one player.

"[David] Boehm is speed and goals. T.J. Syner is speed and defensive excellence, so I think he'll be truly an outstanding penalty killer. I think we've got some dimension, and athletically we're not going get any slower," Cahoon said.

Syner is a local product out of Springfield. He won't put up the offensive numbers as Boehm and Hobbs, but is a heady player who will stabilize any line. Cahoon doesn't exclusively look for players from the area, but tries to keep any player worthy of Division I hockey from opting for another school.

"If there's a real good player out here, then we want him at UMass," he said. "We've got to be selective as we can by taking the right player, not just someone who is out here. Just like P.J. [Fenton], we want as many good kids that are in the area to come here."

The Minutemen only play two seniors among their regular four-line rotation, so next season's freshmen will have to earn any playing time they get. At times, young players have struggled to learn the UMass system, but it compares to that of several NHL teams. That, paired with the commitment of Carlson and Hobbs, has Cahoon confident that players eyeing a career beyond college will consider UMass in the future.

"It helps in when we talk to other kids who are thinking about the pro game, and how they can best get there. I think our style of play is pro themed, so I think kids see it and want to come here," he said.

See HOCKEY on page 7

UMass hockey coach Don Cahoon signed six players to National Letters of Intent last week. Cahoon's recruiting class features both speed and size and one forward (Danny Hobbs) who has been drafted by the NHL.

Defensive stopper

Gaffney sparks 34-10 run in second half with blocked shots

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

UNCASVILLE, Conn. — Tony Gaffney might look at you funny if you compare him to Stephane Lasme.

But after his defensive performance during the second half of Saturday night's win over Marist, the 6-foot-8 reserve forward may have to reconsider the legitimacy of the comparison.

"I don't know, man," Gaffney said laughing after the game, shutting down the thought.

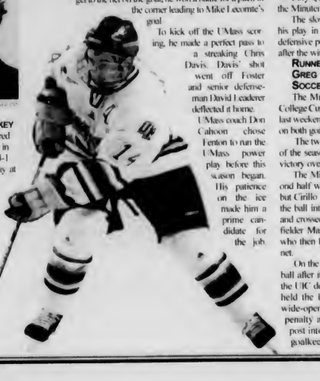
Perhaps he's right. Because even after recording five blocks in the victory, the redshirt junior is still more than a few blocked shots away from breaking Lasme's school record. Just 387 more needed for Gaffney to surpass the 399 shots that Lasme swatted away as a member of the Minutemen men's basketball team.

Gaffney didn't break any records on Saturday, but he did help the Minutemen break away from a tough and talented Marist squad.

"When we were down 58-52, I brought the team together and told them, 'we are not losing this game,'" Gaffney said. "Everybody looked at me and agreed and we decided we were going to win the game on the defensive end. We ended the game on a 34-10 run, and that was the end of the story."

The words of encouragement he gave his teammates certainly may have helped, but his five blocks in the final 12 minutes of the game helped even more.

"Huge, huge," UMass coach Travis Ford said when asked about the impact Gaffney's defense made on the game. "It was huge because we haven't had a physical presence behind our defense; that's what killed us [in the loss] against IUPUI."



Gaffney's final block on Marist guard Jay Gavin with 1:09 left in the game drew the biggest applause from the crowd. It was his third block in a 31-second span and the most emphatic blocked shot of the night, though the least important. The Minutemen already had the game well in hand at the time.

Blocked shot No. 1 and No. 2 came approximately seven minutes apart, but both occurred at crucial junctures in the game – when the two teams were trading baskets in the second half.

See GAFFNEY on page 8

COLLEGIAN SPORTS ATHLETE OF THE WEEK

P.J. FENTON, FORWARD, HOCKEY

Senior forward P.J. Fenton scored a goal and assisted on three others in the Massachusetts hockey team's 4-1 win over New Hampshire Saturday at the Mullins Center.

Fenton didn't begin his senior season as well as he may have liked on the offensive end, but a four-point effort to close out the first half has him primed for a good second half.

In Saturday's game, the winger deflected a Will Ortiz slap-shot past New Hampshire net minder Brian Foster to give UMass a 3-1 lead at the time. The goal was the first since Nov. 9 for Fenton when he capped a 5-3 win over Boston University with an empty-net goal.

He demonstrated several different talents in Saturday's win. Aside from the awareness it took to get to the net on the goal, he won a battle for a puck in the corner leading to Mike Ecomte's goal.

To kick off the UMass scoring, he made a perfect pass to a streaking Chris Davis. Davis' shot went off Foster and senior defenseman David Leaderer deflected it home.

UMass coach Don Cahoon chose Fenton to run the UMass power play before this season began. His patience on the ice made him a prime candidate for the job. Although the Minutemen struggled initially, the man advantage is coming around. Against New Hampshire, UMass was 2-for-5 on the power play, including Fenton's tally.

Cory Quirk scored the other power play goal for the Minutemen, thanks to a Fenton assist.

The slow offensive start for Fenton didn't hurt his play in the defensive end. Cahoon praised his defensive performance and effort on the penalty kill after the win over New Hampshire.

RUNNER UP:
GREG CIRILLO, MIDFIELDER, MEN'S SOCCER

The Minutemen qualified for the 2007 NCAA College Cup with their 2-1 win over Illinois-Chicago last weekend. Senior midfielder Greg Cirillo assisted on both goals in Sunday's win.

The two points were his second and third assists of the season, with the other coming in the team's victory over Xavier on Oct. 14.

The Minutemen opened the scoring in the second half with a goal from freshman Stuart Amick, but Cirillo factored into the play. The senior moved the ball into the offensive third from the right side and crossed the ball into the box. Sophomore midfielder Mark DeSantis headed the pass to Amick, who then kicked the ball into the right side of the net.

On the second UMass goal, Cirillo collected the ball after it was headed out of the 18-yard box by the UIC defense following a throw-in. The senior held the ball for an instant and passed it to a wide-open Mike DeSantis in the left side of the penalty area. DeSantis hit the ball of the right post into the net, just out of the reach of Flame goalkeeper Jovan Bobonja.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY EST. 1890

PARTLY CLOUDY : HI: 41 LO: 18 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2007

MINUTEMEN PREPARE FOR EAGLES | PAGE 12

Coalition brings demands to conscious

Proposal outlines group's points for consideration

BY WILL MCGUINNESS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At a Nov. 21 meeting, Chancellor Cole and USAC members Ruth Thompson, Aaron Buford and Jeff Napolitano agreed to ground rules of the negotiations. Due to his schedule, Cole will be present at every other meeting. Notes are allowed to be taken during the meetings and Thompson was designated as the contact person for the group. A 10-person committee will represent students who will work with the administration to pass a report of the agreements by Feb. 22, 2008.

Each meeting will have one topic each, though several others will be broached for later discussion and research. The proposal also reported that "before agreeing to a final report, the student representatives will convene a student-wide forum to discuss any proposals contained therein."

No agreement to the report will occur without a majority vote of the students present at the forum.

FEE ROLLBACK

The USAC's demands include that by the 2009-2010 school year,

See REPORT on page 3

The United Student Action Coalition – the organization behind November's student strike – released a proposal outlining future negotiations with the administration during a public meeting in the Student Union yesterday.

Following the Nov. 15 and 16 strike, members of the University of Massachusetts administration, including interim chancellor Thomas Cole Jr., met with student organizers to discuss their grievances. After several weeks of negotiations, the coalition – which includes elected representatives of the Student Government Association (SGA) and the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) – released the outline of their demands to be debated upon with the administration.

The 15-page proposal includes sections on each of the coalition's original demands, including a rollback of student fees, more transparency in diversity funding and outreach, the eradication of police presence in private areas of dormitories and the ability for students to control areas of campus that coalition leaders said belong to students.

Mike Goykman (left) and Shaun Robinson (right) wait for their turn to "testify" during a general assembly meeting held yesterday in the Caps Cod Lounge.

Mock trial finds absent admins. 'guilty'

BY WILL MCGUINNESS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Members of the Student Government Association (SGA), University of Massachusetts students and area residents participated in a public hearing yesterday in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union to discuss the effects of last month's class boycott.

Representatives discussed the UMass administration's reaction to the strike and the efforts made to come to agreements regarding the demands presented during the Nov. 15 and 16 boycotts.

The audience heard testimonials from students, faculty and community members, recounting problems that arose as a result of campus conditions.

The presentations were grouped according to their relevance to the concerns of the strike: increased funding and accountability for diversity, a rollback of student fees, an alleged police presence in areas of residence halls deemed private and the return of student control over student space.

Those gathered were asked to evaluate the "guilt" of Chancellor Thomas Cole Jr., Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Joyce Hatch and Dean of Students Jo-Ann Vanin.

Each had been invited to the meeting, but were unable to attend.

Beside a banner reading, "Whose University? Our University!" graduate student Lisha Storey said increased fees directly affected her quality of life. While teaching assistants sign a contract that stipulate their wages, the increases in fees take more from their bank accounts each year, she said.

"For five years, they've taken money right out of my pocket," she said. "I essentially have to pay my employer."

The University's Bursar's Office drew criticism from Shannon Coakley, a UMass undergraduate and Connecticut native. As a New Englander, she is qualified to receive

See TRIAL on page 3

'Real Talk' broaches homosexuality talk

BY GISEL SAILLANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As an extension to their VDN Week programs, the Black Student Union (BSU) hosted "Real Talk: Homosexuality" Wednesday night in the Kennedy residential hall.

The forum generated conversation on the views held by attendees of the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (GLBT) community.

Casimir Mazuaz, the event coordinator for BSU, screened a self-made DVD prior to the discussion. Mazuaz had interviewed UMass students on their feelings in general toward people who identify as gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgender.

Vanessa Laine, a sophomore at UMass, was interviewed by Mazuaz on her reaction to the hypothetical of having a gay brother.

"Well first of all it would be funny because I can't picture my brother being gay, but all I really care about is his happiness," Laine said.

Mohamed Vandi, the secretary of BSU, served as the forum's moderator. He opened the discussion with a few remarks, saying that everyone should keep and open mind and remain respectful. Vandi also asked the attendees to reflect on the video they watched.

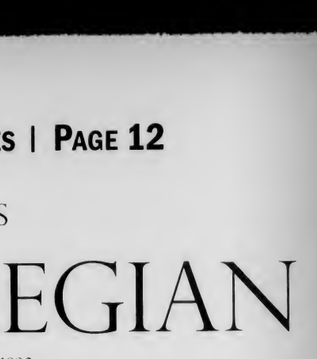
"On camera, people try to be politically correct, people don't keep it 'hunky' in front of the camera when it comes to their views," said Michael Gary, the assistant resident director in the John Adams residential hall.

One student said he doesn't have a

See TALK on page 2

Soldier recounts War in Iraq

Earthfoods hosts speaker



BY JOSHUA WALOVITCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Liam Madden spoke last night at the Earthfoods Café in the Student Union about his experiences in Iraq and his involvement in the anti-war movement. Earthfoods Café was packed, as there were people of all ages in attendance, including many veterans of the Iraq war.

Madden, 23, served as a communications electronics specialist in the Marine Corps from Jan. 2003 to Jan. 2007, touring in Iraq, Kuwait, Thailand, Okinawa, Japan and Korea.

He is a student at Northeastern University and is on the board of directors for the Iraq Veterans Against the War (IVAW). IVAW members are from 48 states, Washington, D.C., Canada and on numerous bases overseas, including Iraq. IVAW members say they

See MADDEN on page 2

Liam Madden addresses a capacity crowd last night in the Earth Foods Cafe. A veteran, he spoke of his qualms with the Iraq War.

Cultural combo makes event

BY GISEL SAILLANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

An encounter of Eastern and Western culture may have never been so decorative and delicious as when the Yuri Kochiyama and Latin American cultural centers united to host "Henna and Pina Colada Night" at the Yuri Kochiyama center last Wednesday night.

Music welcomed students as they entered the event and ushered them quickly to lines for pina coladas and henna, which was drawn on their skin.

Henna is a plant native to the tropical areas of Africa, Southern Asia and northern Australia. From the plant, a paste is created and mixed into a substance that is used for body art, hair dyes and cloth.

Widely used around the world, henna is most popular in India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Morocco and Spain. The students made patterns selected by the attendees. These patterns drawn on the hands could last up to three weeks on the skin. As the skin exfoliates, the stain of henna diminishes.

The students sipped on their pina coladas from their tropical umbrella straws as they waited for the henna artist to call their names. Attendees waited beside a tan for the Henna design to dry. Afterwards, students were given particular henna oils that helped the deep, dark design on the skin stay longer.

"We are doing this every semester … one semester here and one at the Latin American Cultural Center," said Tiffany Vee, a University of Massachusetts senior. "We hit 100 people last year. People are pouring in. Hopefully we have enough food and henna."

"It is fun to get to know people, I like the pina colada," said Mirsie Negoro, a junior exchange student from Japan.

Wilma Crespo, associate director of HEP and supervisor of the LACC, said she enjoys this event every semester. She said that henna and pina coladas are a great combination in attracting many students to drop by the event.

"[THE] HENNA [WE] PROVIDED ARE HEALTHY [SO] THEY GIVE A SAFE AND DIFFERENT, FUN [AND] CREATIVE WAY TO PUT DIFFERENT SYMBOLS," said UMass freshman Ines Mejia.

Gisel Saillant can be reached at gsaillan@student.umass.edu.

A crowd gathers at the Yuri Kochiyama and Latin American cultural centers last Wednesday to take part in the centers' Henna and pina colada celebration.

UMass establishes chemical tracking program, facility

BY JENNIFER HEMBUS
COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts opened a new chemical tracking program and facility Thursday in hopes of better regulation of the chemicals used on campus.

The Chemical Environmental Management System (CEMS) and laboratory seeks to improve laboratory programs and provide important safety and response information

The department of environmental health and safety (EHS) has managed the CEMS and expects the new chemical programs to better the use and control of chemicals on campus.

According to the EHS, the new programs and laboratories are expected to result in drastic reduction of unnecessary chemical purchases in addition to improved overall control of the chemicals used on the UMass campus. The EHS also plans to develop more efficient disposal methods for [illegible] on campus and create a [illegible] for emergency [illegible].

The EHS [illegible] also helped open a [illegible] laboratory that [illegible] and [illegible] to help [illegible] of specific [illegible] chemicals online in a federal [illegible].

According to Tom Robinson, director of environmental health and safety, the department [illegible] to meet

See CHEM. at page 2

Site to personalize applications

BY ASHLEY COLOMBE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A Princeton University undergraduate student and two Brigham Young University students launched Zinch.com earlier this year to connect high school students to prospective colleges through online profiles that act as resumes for admissions departments. According to their Web site, Zinch "exists to extract the wealth of potential in today's high school students."

Through Zinch, high school students from all 50 states and over 150 countries can create a free online profile specifically for colleges and universities to look at as part of the admissions process.

Over 1,810 colleges subscribe to the new site, and the numbers continue to grow each day. College admissions departments can log on to Zinch and read about a diverse selection of high school students, including information on their interests, passions, extracurricular activities and talents – all things that normally would not be found on a college application.

"It is a place for students to shine," said co-founder Sid Krommenacker.

The idea for the Web site came from co-founder Mitch Hagan's quest to get into Princeton.

Princeton had always been at the top of his list. Hagan writes on Zinch.com "They had no idea who I was. I was a public school kid out of Utah … half-Hispanic.

See ZINCH on page 2

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIII
ISSUE 68

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3649 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Nicholas Belanger
MANAGING EDITOR Katie Huston
BUSINESS MANAGER Dan Exter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Chris Martin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Murphy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Alex Bender
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Katherine Shea
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Tim McCall
COPY EDITOR Adam Scagin
EDITORIAL EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
NEWS EDITOR Will McGuinness
SPORTS EDITOR Jeremy Rice
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Eric Sivmetak
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Manea Wheaten
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallace
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Stephanie McPherson
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ryan McAskill
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Teresa Reilly
ASST. EDITORIAL James Mathews
ASST. EDITORIAL Melissa Garber
ASSISTANT NEWS Kate Chinn
ASSISTANT NEWS Derrick Perkins
ASSISTANT NEWS Holly Seabury
ASSISTANT SPORTS Michael King
ASSISTANT SPORTS Joe Meloni
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eli Rosenswaike
WEB EDITOR James Hale
WEB EDITOR Tom Trinh
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Michael Phillis
ASST. PHOTO EDITOR Brian Tedder

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BY THEIR'S 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Murphy

COPY EDITOR
Domenic Poli

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

Talk explores GBLT

TALK from page 1

problem with gays or lesbians, but dislikes when they flaunt their relationships.

In response, Malcolm Gray, the president of BSU, said, "If you see a straight couple kissing or holdings hands, a gay [person] might think heterosexuals are flaunting it."

Attendees were asked to deliberate their stances on gay marriage.

"What is marriage?" Gary asked. The forum came to consensus with a definition of marriage being the union between two people who love each other and have a ceremony. The attendees were asked if people in the GLBT community had a right to marry.

"They [don't] get life insurance if they passed [away], no benefits, your life partner gets no benefits," said UMass senior Kenji Summers.

Kyle Oldham, resident director in James hall, retold the story of the injustice suffered by a lesbian, because doctors didn't sign the legal papers that would have allowed her to see her dying partner.

This forum enlightened those in attendance, with national and international views on the GLBT community, according to attendees.

"I grew up in New York City. There is a large population of [gays and lesbians]. We have an issue with them because of AIDS or HIV. In Brooklyn they are scared about it," said Summers.

Vandi explained that there is no correlation between this topic and the World AIDS Day. The GLBT community is not the hub of disease, he said.

"I come from a country where if you are homosexual, you are stoned. We should appreciate that we five in a country where we can talk about it," said sophomore Fadumo Tahlil.

Gisel Saillant can be reached at gsaillan@student.umass.edu

Zinch personalizes application process and ambitious. No one in the Ivy League had ever heard my name. And that was fine. So I went to them. I decided to let them know who I was."

ZINCH from page 1

Hagan created a portfolio detailing his extracurricular activities and demonstrating his graphic abilities, complete with a picture of himself Photo-shopped on to a photo of the Princeton campus.

"I basically knocked on Princeton's door and said, 'This is who I am. Take me or leave me,'" wrote Hagan, who is now studying economics and computer science at Princeton as a member of the Class of 2009.

"He wanted to present himself in a way that most kids can't," said Krommenhoek. "He was a good student whose best skills were things that weren't necessarily in the realm of good test takers."

Hagan approached his brother, Brad Hagan, and Krommenhoek, both 2006 BYU graduates, about his idea for a place for students to showcase their abilities in the same way he was able to. Eventually, the three came up with Zinch.com and launched the site in May 2007.

Zinch.com gives students a place to say, "I am more than a test score," the Web site read. Not only can students create online profiles to present themselves to their dream colleges, but college admissions officers can also use the site to advertise themselves to potential students and search for prospective undergraduates. Zinch also offers many scholarships, ranging from $1,000 to $20,000, which students can apply for after creating a profile.

In the future, Zinch will be adding ways to connect high school students to each other through their common interests, similarly to other online profile Web sites like Facebook and MySpace.

Krommenhoek emphasized the growth the site has experienced since its launch earlier this year.

"It's an exciting challenge," said Krommenhoek, who also explained what Zinch.com can do to help student's futures. "They can say, 'This is my blank canvass, and I'm creating art here. This is who I am.'"

Ashley Coulombe can be reached at acoulomb@student.umass.edu

Madden maddened by war

MADDEN from page 1

educate the public about the realities of the Iraq War by speaking to communities and to the media about their experiences.

Madden said that his decision to speak out is not fueled by politics.

"Politics has a lot to do with it, but anytime someone makes a decision to put some of their time and energy into changing the world, it is for personal reasons," he said.

During Madden's time in Iraq, he said, he empathized with the Iraqis.

"Put yourself in the shoes of the people in Iraq who sit at home waiting for 'mommy' to come, and she doesn't end up coming home and the reason for that is because she got shot," he said. "This is called empathy, and I think that if we had a little bit more of that we would be better off."

He talked about disturbing experiences he had, including a military briefing in which Madden and fellow soldiers were asked what to do if they were driving and a child appears in the middle of the road. Madden said he was informed to "run that motherf over."

Madden was later questioned by a former Iraqi translator who brought attention back to the previous statement. She was puzzled by the fact that the Marines were instructed to run children over, asking Madden if such actions were in the field manual.

The Iraqi translator, who chose not to give her name, said a reason for such chaos in Iraq is due to the American soldiers' lack of knowledge in regards to the culture of Iraq.

"We had a bare minimum of culturni understanding, and the language barrier that we experienced there was a huge problem," he said.

"Because of this, Marines feel threatened all the time. We have a heightened sense of danger and when it comes down to it is either an 18-year-old kid with a gun or them. And the rule of the road is that it is them," he said, referring to taking Iraqi lives.

Madden and other war veterans that chimed in addressed the fact that the media is sensationalizing the war.

"The media's prerogative is to show their story and make money," he said.

Madden added that he wants to make clear that it is more effective to hear the veterans' side of the story.

Ian J. LaVallee, an Iraq war veteran, described his war experiences.

"Think about the realities. Yes, we would guard the elections and sit on rooftops preventing insurgents from planting IEDs [improved explosive devices], which felt good and justified, but then the next day we would rip apart civilians houses, detaining them, breaking apart families," he said. "Which action is going to outweigh the other?"

Madden told the audience there was no civil rights voter; there was a civil right movement. The movements are what have changed past problems, and they are a result of the demand of the people.

Madden concluded his talk by quoting abolitionist Frederick Douglass, saying, "Power concedes nothing without demand; it never did and it never will."

The IVAW hopes it will see immediate withdrawal of all occupying forces in Iraq, reparations for the destruction and corporate pillaging of Iraq so the Iraqi people can control their own lives and future and full benefits and acceptable health care, including mental health and other supports for returning servicemen and women.

Joshua Walovitch can be reached at jwalovit@student.umass.edu

Wounded soldiers get no cards

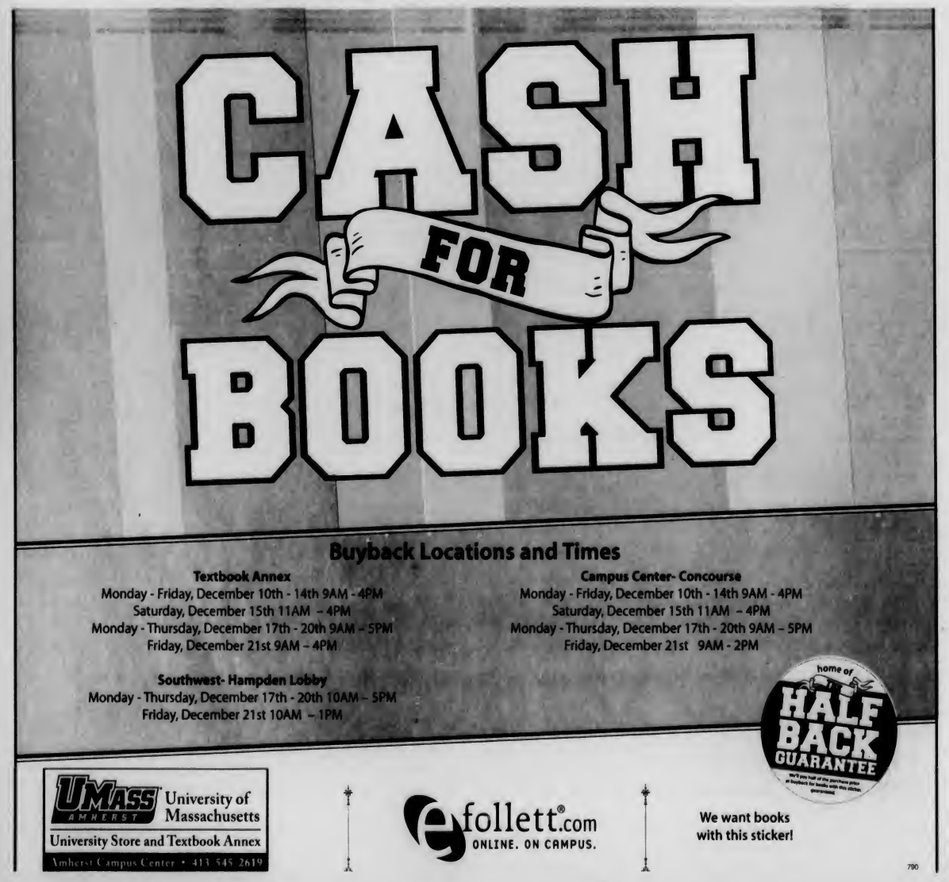
By Jay Reeves
Associated Press

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Hundreds of thousands of holiday cards and letters thanking wounded American troops for their sacrifice and wishing them well never reach their destination. They are returned to sender or thrown away unopened.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks and the anthrax scare, the Pentagon and the Postal Service have refused to deliver mail addressed simply to "Any Wounded Soldier" for fear terrorists or opponents of the war might send toxic substances or demoralizing messages.

Mail must be addressed to a specific member of the armed forces — a rule that pains some well-meaning Americans this Christmas season.

"Are we going to forget our soldiers because we are running in fear?" Fena D'Ottavio asked. The suburban Chicago woman was using her blog to encourage friends to send mail to unspecified soldiers until she learned of the ban, which she called a sad commentary on society.



Last season, despite the rule, officials say as many as 450,000 pieces of mail not addressed to anyone in particular managed to reach Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. But they were returned or, if they had no return address, were thrown out altogether, because the hospital lacked the manpower to open and screen all the mail, spokesman Terry Goodman said.

"A lot of this is because of security concerns because it's unsolicited mail that someone is going to have to go through," Goodman said. "Also, being a democratic society, there could be inappropriate mail from someone who, say, doesn't support the war, and then you've got a wounded soldier getting it."

Lt. Col. Kevin Arata, a spokesman with the Army Human Resources Command, said no one tracks the amount of unnamed-soldier mail being returned, so it is impossible to judge the size of the problem.

The busiest part of the holiday season has yet to arrive, but officials said they are receiving far less mail this year addressed simply to "A Recovering American Soldier" or "Any Wounded Soldier."

Candy Roquemore of Austin, Texas, was also promoting the idea of sending cards to wounded soldiers until she found out about the rule. She suggested the ban is an overreaction.

Representatives speak on strike's effects

USAC finds Cole, others guilty

TRIAL from page 1

a reduction in tuition for her major, environmental design. According to Coakly, the University had overlooked those qualifications, resulting in her overpaying UMass by thousands of dollars to attend.

Originally from Hartford, her hometown is the sort of place people move out of after they have saved up enough money. She could have saved $9,000 per semester if it had not been for the Bursar's Office's oversight.

Upon graduating, she and her mother will be $40,000 in debt.

"I came here to make [Hartford] better," she said. "I was poor before, but I wasn't in debt."

After the crowd found the administrators "guilty" of letting fees get uncontrollable and creating a "lack of affordability," according to the organizers, the testimonials shifted to "victims of scare funding and accountability for outreach and diversity."

Each of the speakers declared that the University has lost focus on issues of diversity. UMass undergraduate Shaun Robinson said the University defines diversity by creating a student body from a diverse collection of states. He said it should instead be focused on ethnic groups and students' socio-economic backgrounds.

"The University has a blatant disregard for the recruitment and retaining of people of color," he said.

He cited the fact that 50 percent of Latin students who enter the University as freshmen do not graduate.

George Liu, a member of the Graduate Employees Association's [GEO] bargaining committee added that the University can only ensure accountability for its disbursement of $800,000 in diversity funding by granting organizations the right to sue them.

Greeno's sub shop, a student-run business, provided free food for the event. Over sandwiches, representatives from student-run organizations voiced their frustrations with the control of the Campus Center and the Student Union. Student leaders allege the University has "taken undue control of the [buildings] charging fees for use of space and equipment."

They have asked the administration to recognize the Campus Center and Student Union Commission's [CCSUC] authority to oversee the buildings' running.

Jennifer Jean Baptiste spoke of her group's deteriorating relationship with the administration of the building. They went from being allowed the use of a room and a piano to having to rehearse musicals in hallways with iPods and computer speakers.

Senior Samantha Smith cited that the University's Web site, www.umass.edu, promotes that fact that hundreds of student groups exist on campus, but she said certain measures can be taken to make existing easier for the groups.

University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian in November that it was hard for students to reserve space in the Campus Center and Student Union due to a lack of it and an environment of high competition that exists when trying to reserve space.

Blaguszewski said the University's policy of diversity funding "has to do with the decision to invest funds in different ways."

"A year or two ago, the University received a federal grant to encourage more underrepresented minority students to pursue careers in sciences and mathematics," he said.

The Board of Trustees has recently worked to raise fees at a level either under or equal to inflation as defined by the Consumer Price Index. Last March, the BOT voted to raise fees for this year by 3.4 percent, which is under the reported inflation rate of 3.6 percent.

The crowd was most responsive to part of the lecture that discussed events the University of Massachusetts Police Department [UMPD] denies and student leaders describe as provable.

Heather McCormack said the fact that the UMPD denies they enter students' rooms without search warrants indicates they know the practice is wrong. The testimonials criticized the presence of plainclothes officers in student space, like University dormitories. Student leaders also asked that the UMPD reinstate its appeals process for minor offenders of the law and make simpler its formal complaint system.

Chancellor Cole, Vice Chancellor Gargano, Dean Vanin and Vice Chancellor Hatch could not be reached by press time, but Deputy Chief of Police Patrick Archibald said officers do not perform illegal searches.

According to Archibald, police officers enter the halls if responding to a call from a resident assistant or a concerned student. The deputy chief said officers must be certain probable cause exists before going through the Assistant District Attorney's Office for a search warrant.

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@gmail.com

Sarah Morgan leads a group of students up the Whitmore ramp during November's student strike.

Report sets tone for meetings

REPORT from page 1

in-state curriculum fees will be dropped from the present fee of $3,063.50 to $2,146.45. They ask that the out of state curriculum fee drop from $4,241 to $2,968.70 and that the administration re-evaluate spending priorities to focus on reducing student fees.

Section I of the plan calls for a reimbursement of any fee increase passed by the University's Board of Trustees, and II calls for the creation of a "Spring Lobby Day" on which students are expected to be able to miss class with no repercussions to lobby the Massachusetts state house to "advocate for increased funding for public higher education."

The report asks that the University fund the lobby day, which includes monies allocated toward bus transportation, 300 lunches and coffee and donuts for 300, totaling $8,070.

First-generation and low-income students will also benefit from the coalition's proposal as it demands for the expansion of the Community Scholars Program that awards first-generation college students An increase in funds from $1.15 million to $4.6 million in fiscal year 2010 will increase the program's capacity to provide last-dollar need-based financial aid, according to the report.

Diversity Dollars

According to the report, the University currently does not have self-initiated outreach programs to recruit underrepresented students. The group cites "Indeed Engine of Inequality," a report from the Education Trust in its argument for increased attention on recruiting minority students. The report gave UMass an "I" for underrepresented minority access.

The report includes actions aimed at developing relationships with neighboring Springfield, Holyoke and areas of Franklin County. The coalition demands eight minivans for "college access activities," expanded bus routes between Franklin County and the five-college system and funds to establish college awareness and preparation programs for local youth. Access to athletics resources is also requested for community groups.

Section B calls for more funds to be allocated to Student Success Centers, including, but not limited to, the Every Women's Center, the Stonewall Center, Disability Services and ALANA programs.

A "pipeline project" is also proposed and aimed to invest institutions of high education from neighboring areas in an effort to recruit more graduate students.

The efforts, according to the report, "revitalize the community with much-needed professional help in economic revitalization, city planning, education, public health and other services."

Police and Privacy

After allegations of the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD) plainclothes officers performing illegal searches of student rooms by posing as students, the coalition called for the overseeing of the department to shift from the student affairs department to the finance department.

The report reads, "Instead of protecting us, the campus police create a culture of fear and confrontation. Hundreds of our peers are losing financial aid and being suspended for minor offenses without due process."

The shift, the report reads, will help to ensure that the department is accountable to the entirety of the campus community. The report cites a finding from the Commission on Campus Diversity that reads other heads of higher education institutions found the placement of the department as odd.

The report also demands the administration work with elected members of the SGA and GSS to create a Community Advisory Board that will oversee the UMPD. Demand- include a policy restricting access to dormitory hallways to resident and their guests only.

A simplification of the appeals process and a more basic complaint process is also alluded to.

Deputy Chief of Police Patrick Archibald said in a previous Massachusetts Daily Collegian article that the searches have not been occurring and that officers must establish probable cause and attain a warrant before entering a student's room.

He added that officers only enter private areas of dormitories when responding to calls from within the building.

Student Control of Space

The coalition made demands for the reversal of generation-specific living arrangements, saying the incoherent only denies limited diversity access to special living arrangements such as legacy floors and 2+2+2 arrangements for gay, lesbian and transgender students and is said to destroy the community traits that residential areas have acquired throughout their existence. It is also said to force out upperclassmen who require on-campus living as part of their financial packages.

The report also calls for the Campus Center and Student Union to be run by the Campus Center Student Union Commission. The supervision will include "long-term space allocation, usage of the buildings for events, activities, etc."

Will McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@gmail.com

DEC 12 2007

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2007

"You provide the prose poems. I'll provide the war." – Citizen Kane

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

I have a nightmare

Ben Duffy

Radio personality Don Imus is mounting a comeback after he was fired this spring for remarks he made about the Rutgers University women's basketball team. He returned to his usual morning slot on Dec. 3.

Imus was terminated last April after a racial uproar erupted when he referred to the Rutgers University women's basketball team as "nappy-headed hos." Were his comments racist? Well, that's debatable. I've known plenty of black women who refer to their own hair as "nappy." In any case, Don Imus shouldn't have taken such a cheap shot at a group of female athletes whose only crime was their love of basketball.

Nonetheless, the Imus incident taught me something about who can say what on the airwaves today. Shortly after Imus was fired, I tuned into Valley Free Radio's "Another Perspective" with Bob Green. If you listen to his program for 30 seconds, you will know that Mr. Green is black because that's all he ever talks about. He allows his identity to be determined by his pigmentation.

Bob Green is also incredibly racist. His racism is usually directed towards white people, but our society is so constrained by white guilt that we don't recognize anti-white racism as a form of bigotry. One day last Spring, Mr. Green veered away from his customary anti-white racism and began to take potshots at Koreans. He said that Korean store owners sell rotten vegetables, and that they sell alcohol and tobacco to black children, although they would never sell these products to white children. I was so fed up with this that I just had to challenge him on the air.

I told him that he had a lot of nerve accusing everyone else of racism when he obviously had issues with Koreans. I told him that no white person in our society could have gotten away with the exact same remarks.

"This is a white country," said Green. "White people can say whatever they want."

The best comebacks always come to you when the conversation is finished. I should have mentioned Don Imus's termination just weeks earlier. To say that "white people can say whatever they want" is an indefensible statement. Whites have to tread on eggshells whenever they talk about racial issues. We have to be extremely careful about what we say and how we say it.

Racism doesn't have to follow this conventional pattern. For example, it's a well known fact that Ben Duffy hates white people, and Ben Duffy is white.

The American left's perception of racism is contradictory at its base. On the one hand, they see racists under every bed, but on the other hand, they don't recognize someone like Bob Green as the bigot that he is.

It's "racist" to cut taxes. As prominent black Congressman Charles Rangel (D-NY) noted in 1994, "It's not 'spic' and 'nigger' anymore. They say, 'let's cut taxes.'"

IQ tests are also "racist," because some races don't do as well as others. It's "racist" to require voters to present picture identification when going to the polls. The Vietnam-era draft was "racist" because it allowed young (white) men of higher economic standing to defer their service while in college. The Iraq-era volunteer military is also "racist" because only those of lower economic status would ever join the military. It's "racist" to enforce our immigration laws and to insist that English is the language of our country. In 1999, Amherst High School canceled a production of the musical "West Side Story" after several Puerto Rican students and parents complained that it was "racist."

The American left's idea of racism always involves a white person hating a non-white person. Liberals can hardly even conceive of racism taking any other form. But racism doesn't have to follow this conventional pattern. For example, it's a well known fact that Ben Duffy hates white people, and Ben Duffy is white.

Japan also has a long history of racial bigotry. Japan's Korean minority is legally barred from some civil service jobs, elite schools and companies. Former prime minister Yasuhiro Nakasone commented on the technical skill of Americans. "On the average, the United States is lower [than Japan] because of a considerable number of blacks, Puerto Ricans and Mexicans."

Mary Frances Berry, former black chairwoman of the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights (USCCR) once commented that, "Civil rights laws were not passed to protect the rights of white men and do not apply to them." Only in America can a bigot like Berry oversee the USCCR. In Brooklyn, an angry mob of black people murdered Yankel Rosenbaum, a Hasidic Jew, in retaliation for an incident in which another Jew accidentally struck and killed a black child with his car. The black crowd chanted, "Kill the Jew." as Rosenbaum was stabbed to death.

In order to be a vicious bigot, white skin is not required. I've known people of all races and ethnicities who have had their prejudices against some group or another. I've known Jews who hate Arabs, Arabs who hate Jews, blacks who hate Asians, and Asians who hate blacks. I've known some white people who hate black people, but a whole lot more black people who hate white people. The left's one-dimensional conception of racism is entirely unsatisfactory and needs to be revised.

Ben Duffy has left the building. He can be reached at bduffy@student.umass.edu

Jesus' birthday is just alright with me

S.P. Sullivan

Holidays are a lot of bunk. All of them. Easter is about candy and eggs. Veterans Day and Presidents Day are both about selling automobiles. Don't even get me started on Thanksgiving. Then there's the end-all-be-all bunk holiday – the one that lasts from two weeks before Thanksgiving until the garbage truck picks up the tree from your curb. I speak, of course, of Christmas.

I don't hate on Christmas – there are plenty of you out there who are preparing to commemorate the birth of your lord and savior Jesus Christ. Wonderful – go nuts. But Bill O'Reilly's "War on Christmas" conspiracy theorizing aside, the holiday no longer belongs to Christians alone. It's a social construct – for many it's as important as the Super Bowl and as perfunctory as a trip to the Registry of Motor Vehicles.

How did this happen?

Well, for a society that prides itself in plurality, we're a pretty Christian nation. God is on our money; he's on gold chains around the necks of our popular music artists. He wasn't allowed in the Constitution, but the GOP is working on getting him in the back door. I'm not made uncomfortable by an overwhelming Christian presence, though I do wish they'd update their rulebook. Read the Sermon on the Mount, and then try and tell me Christianity is a bad thing.

Now, I'm not a Christian; I'm a humanist (that's with a lowercase 'h' – capital letters are the first step on the road to dogma). I'm not going to get into the tenets of humanism, because there aren't many. We're basically an amorphous group of folks who don't appreciate religious people like George Bush claiming they have a monopoly on morality. Kurt Vonnegut was a humanist. Isaac Asimov, Steven Pinker and Albert Einstein were or are all humanists. We like to keep a general rule of "act decently to your fellow human beings" and not get too hung up on the semantics that lead to sectarian violence and persecution.

We have a holiday, too. HumanLight, created by the New Jersey Humanist Network in 2001, is celebrated on Dec. 23 of each year. There are candle-lighting ceremonies, poetry readings, science presentations and dancing, among other things. I haven't attended any HumanLight celebrations, because they sound like a lot of bunk.

The idea behind HumanLight is to create a nonreligious Christmas – which is great. But I, like a lot of Americans, already had one. I come from a family that never took the time to define their ecclesiastical sensibilities. In other words, we're Catholics. Just kidding.

People have asked me how I reconcile celebrating Christmas as a non-Christian. I often ask them how they reconcile never going to church except on Christmas and Easter.

We celebrate the same Christmas that popular culture does – the one that comes with claymation television specials, visits from relatives and vaguely pagan rituals like planting a tree in your living room for the short-term. There are plenty of devout Christians who take this holiday very seriously, and that's fine. But the holiday no longer exclusively belongs to them – it's a cultural tradition these days, not just a religious one.

Isn't this a case of cultural appropriation? How dare we families of quasi-Christians highjack this holiday for an excuse to get together with our loved ones and be merry? Well, people are smiling; charities see a surge in donations around the holidays; there are office parties galore. And I don't think Jesus minds very much that his birthday's on the backburner – from what I hear he's a pretty passive guy.

People have asked me how I reconcile celebrating Christmas as a non-Christian. I often ask them how they reconcile never going to church except on Christmas and Easter yet having the nerve to talk to me about reconciliation. Human existence is about making adjustments. If I were a Jew-turned-humanist, I'd probably celebrate Chanukah; if I were raised by uber-progressive liberal elites, I'd probably celebrate HumanLight and drive a Prius. But my family celebrates Christmas, and I'm not about to lock myself in my room in protest.

In the angstier years of my adolescence, I waxed cynical about Christmas. Not being a Christian, I didn't want anything to do with the highly commercialized Christian holiday.

My sister told me to stop being a jerk.

She, a fellow non-Christian, told me that she didn't have the religious aspect to cling to. But a holiday that advocates peace on Earth and good will towards men – a time of year in which people treat each other decently – cannot be bad, no matter how many times they play "A Christmas Story" over and over.

I know in our super-PC society, the holidays can be tricky. But don't worry too much if you wish your Jewish friend a "Merry Christmas," or you very untactfully give a Christmas card to a Jehovah's Witness. Because when you get right down to it, you're doing your best to act decently and share goodwill to your fellow human beings, which is what us humanists – and Christians, and Muslims, Jews, Buddhists and whatever other capital-letter denomination you belong to – are supposed to be all about.

So I don't care whose birthday it is. Merry Christmas.

S.P. Sullivan is a Collegian editor. He can be reached at spsulliv@student.umass.edu

A bundle of toys

Dan Nicastro

Christmas is 13 days away. First, this means there is light at the end of the academic tunnel, even if it seems to be little more than the soft glow of a 20-watt bulb. More importantly, however, it's a time when the spirit of the season compels us to treat our fellow human beings with dignity and respect and to tell them we appreciate their friendship, love, or kindness. It's a season which also compels us to buy stuff to quantitatively prove how much we "appreciate" this friendship, love, or kindness.

But what should you do about those who are not within your light cadre of friends, family or significant others? What is the line separating "gift" friends from regular friends? Before you run to the Dollar Store on Dec. 23 to buy a gift for everyone you've ever met, take a deep breath. Throw on some Christmas music, relax and think creatively.

One of the most overlooked "gift" groups is professors. Teaching is a rough job, where the level of pay does not accurately reflect the amount of time put spent preparing or grading. Therefore, you should try and recognize how your teachers have affected your life and you should give gifts which reflect your appreciation. Not only will these gifts show your teachers you took the time to think about them, you will very quickly find out if your professors have a sense of humor, something which could prove useful during finals.

Before you run to the Dollar Store … to buy a gift for everyone you've ever met, take a deep breath. Throw on some Christmas music, relax and think creatively.

The advent of the home computer and the Internet have changed modern education, as professors are no longer made to feel guilty about the hands of their students turning into bloody stumps on account of ridiculous amounts of writing. Instead, teachers assign many more papers without feeling the pressing guilt of causing bodily harm.

Therefore, when you have 60 pages worth of writing to complete over the next two weeks, let your professors know exactly how you feel about their ability to keep up with technology. Unfortunately smash and torch your laptop, leaving the remains outside their office. You may even be able to pass off the charred remains of your computer as artwork, possibly netting the professor millions of dollars when you make it big. It's like a lottery ticket – a burned, broken lottery ticket.

If wanton destruction of personal property isn't your style, maybe you should try to organize a class gift. Tell everyone in the class to buy a wrist brace and then proceed to have a "signing" party, where everyone signs each other's brace. When this is done, present all these braces to your professor. When they inquire as to the point of your gift, tell your professor these braces helped ease the pain of the carpal tunnel syndrome you developed over the course of the class.

While you probably know them better than your professors, you may have friends of family members for whom it is impossible to buy gifts. Either these people don't really have any interests or they have impulsively bought everything they have even a passing interest in. There are a few solutions that can be applied to both of these types of people.

Popular Christmas gifts are generally nothing more than fads, so capitalize on a recent one celebrity endorsement. Take a lesson from Bill Clinton, Chuck Norris and Oprah: endorse a friend. Write to The Collegian, demanding they create a new section that names a person of the year. After they agree to this, send an e-mail to the newly created "Person of the Year" section extolling the virtues and good character of your friend.

This is a win-win situation: even if The Collegian does not create this section does not select your friend, you made the effort to try to nominate them for this section and realized you got the idea from an editorial. But don't worry about that, no one really reads the editorials anyway.

Speaking of editorials, you could give one of your friends something they'll always remember and something no one else can give them: the gift of being mentioned in an editorial featured in New England's largest college daily college newspaper (for those of you who don't know, that would be The Collegian). Here's a small sample: "Happy birthday next Wednesday, Jim." See? It's a quick, easy and relatively cheap solution. At only $10 a message, my rates are extremely competitive (just pay no attention to the crack I made about the low readership of our editorials. It was wrong of me to denigrate myself, my fellow columnists and New England's largest college daily.)

So don't worry. If you spend a little bit of time during studying to think of creative solutions, you'll come up with something meaningful that applies directly to your friend (maybe you could organize another strike in hope that they can finish a paper. I know I'd appreciate that). And really, it's the thought that counts. So to all my friends and family I didn't get "presents" for, I want you to know that I dedicate this column to you. And I don't even owe myself $10.

Dan Nicastro is a distant cousin of Santa Claus. He can be reached at dnicastro@student.umass.edu

Fear of a suffering Iran

Parisa Saranj

The first thing that came to mind when I heard the National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) report on Iran's nuclear development wasn't a mere thought. It was an array of feelings that passed through my veins.

For a moment I felt the same comfort that many would have if their country were granted respite and peace. I too, like many who fear threats of war, felt the hope that maybe the world is beginning to realize the beauty of peace.

But soon, President Bush delivered his message to the press. Then, Germany, France, the United Kingdom and the leadership of other nations expressed their feelings. I understood that I must wake up from the dream of "peace and justice in the world."

Last week, BBC news wrote, "The NIE says it is now believed that Iran stopped its weapons program in 2003."

After the report reached Washington, President Bush said in a press release, "Iran remains a threat to the world despite new intelligence saying the country may not be building nuclear weapons," and continued by calling the report "a warning signal."

According to BBC, "[Bush's] view that a nuclear Iran would be a danger hasn't changed." The president stressed that Iran was still trying to enrich uranium and could restart its weapons program.

While I was sunken into this latest news, my heart beat with the vague hope for peace and my mind longed not to hear words of military attack or pressure on Iran, I received an e-mail from a fellow American friend. She kindly expressed her sympathy for me and stated that she is sad for such states of affairs in her beloved country, which she is raised to love and admire. Comforted with these fine words, I came across more statements from the president.

"Iran was dangerous, Iran is dangerous and Iran will be dangerous if they have the know-how to make a nuclear weapon," he said.

"Dangerous." The word rang into my ears and I repeated it over and over, trying to make sense of its meaning. I tried to imagine what "dangerous" looks like.

I wondered if the "dangerous" Iran that threatens the world is that same 15 percent of Iranians who live under the poverty line. It seems like the president believes these people's everyday struggle to survive, to feed their family and to hold on to a lowest-paying jobs possible are "dangerous" to the world.

Also, I thought those nations that had expressed disdain toward this dangerous Iran had forgotten to mention women. These women are struggling every day to raise their voices. Many of them are the members of only 12 percent of total persons employed. I am sure that for these women, a nuclear weapon can assure the demolition of some of the most primitive and fundamental laws and policies against females in the Iranian society.

In addition, there is that 70 percent of Iran's population who are under the age of 30. There is a 35 percent unemployment rate, which is estimated to grow to 50 percent in at least two years. Therefore, I pictured again that such a crowd is so overwhelmingly happy with their existing situation that the only thing there is left for them to get their hands on is nuclear power and bombing the world. It may be the Iranian government that is "dangerous," but it is the Iranian people who would suffer most from a military attack.

At the same time, according to BBC, U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates told a Bahrain conference, "Iran may have restarted its nuclear weapons program, despite a U.S. intelligence report saying it had stopped."

It appears that Mr. Gates doubts agents of his own government. So let me remind you of a similar example. The Iranian president, Mahmud Ahmadinejad, is a man whose radical policies are so detested that nowadays even the conservatives are concerned about the blunders he makes. He makes his own people nervous; his own people doubt his actions.

Millions of Iranians know what a sigh of relief many breathed when the news broke out that Iran had halted its weapons program in 2003.

Here comes again the same request. Why do politicians and people of power fail to distinguish between the minority and the majority? It is at the price of millions of innocent lives that failure to make such distinctions can bring about horrid consequences. Only the fearful hearts of millions of Iranians know what a sigh of relief many breathed when the news broke out that Iran had halted its weapon program in 2003.

And only those who have lived or faced the horror of a military attack know how frustrated many felt when President Bush was asked if military action was a possibility. Only when he said, "The best diplomacy – effective diplomacy – is one in which all options are on the table," I feared immensely again.

Finally, the BBC reported that Democratic Senator Harry Reid, the U.S. Senate majority leader, said, "Maybe [Bush's] opinion hasn't changed, but the facts have changed." Even though he spoke of a definite point, I still fear that so many are failing to see that the fact has always been the same. The fact is the innocent people of an "enemy" nation are going to be the ones to suffer under a possible war.

Parisa Saranj is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at psaranj@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2007

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The art of dance is not dead

RSOs gather together to revive a popular pastime

By Gisel Saillant
Collegian Correspondent

Students walked carefully to class Monday as ice covered the ground. That inconvenience didn't stop handfuls students from parading through campus with flags, colorful masks, noise makers and a boom box chanting, "Dance is not Dead."

The parade was called "Is Dance Part of Culture?" and it was coordinated by Taleen Nazarian, a junior majoring in public health and Spanish. Nazarian planned the event for the past two months and held meetings where students generated ideas about the parade. In the core of this event, Nazaria wanted to unite all the students and RSOs of UMass by creating a platform suitable for students to dance in.

"The reason I wanted to have the event 'Is Dance Part of Culture?' was to bring up a question to everyone on campus. There have been many things going on in and out of this school, segregation being one of them. [Also,] there have been some issues about space we on campus in general. And also a lot of the culture nights on campus are getting segregated," Nazaria said.

The students began to march from the Student Union around noon and rhythmically made their way around Whitmore administration building. With bottles filled with beans, tambourines, drums and a black casket with the word "culture" written on the side of it, as it symbolizes the death of culture if people do not engage in dancing, the students marched through the campus center and back to the steps of the Student Union.

With the help of WMUA, a DJ table was set up outside the Student Union and the dancing began. The DJ went global with music from Cambodia, Ethiopia, Armenia, Persia and Jamaica.

"The live, excited and hyped crowd took over. Music was great. I had a fun time. The cold didn't even matter to me," said junior Adam Ramirez.

The music echoed through campus. As onlookers passed the Student Union, they expressed confusion from the couples dancing. The participants invited the students to join the celebration. "I was walking to class and I saw a group of people dancing. I was engaged by the dance … They grabbed me and asked me to join, I felt comfortable and stayed a while," said sophomore Faristna Cuevas.

Nazarian took the microphone and asked the students that were walking if they believed in the art of dance and music and said that they should join in the dancing celebration.

"The support we had from the audience was great too, some of them even learned how to dance," said sophomore Dalfany Cruz.

"There are some people who are willing to step out of their comfort zone or what they are familiar with, or to step away from those who we think are the 'only ones who understand us,'" she continued.

Enoch H. Page, associate professor for the anthropology department at UMass, gave a speech on the origins of the dance and music and the future of its impact on society. Page told the students to give the music back into the artist's hands, warned about the capitalist corporations that run the music industry and how they exploit "grassroots" music.

"The event today went well. There could have been many more students then there were. But what was important were those who were there," he said. "They stayed strong in the cold, sang, chanted, danced their hearts out in such cold weather. We all united, from many different countries, embracing one another's music and dance and came together, the way we should be."

"Coming out today, it made me feel proud to be among such people of such vibrant culture, and dancing alongside them and throwing our cultures in the air was refreshing and was a reminder to the UMass campus that dance is part of my culture," said sophomore Shanie Coleman.

Gisel Saillant can be reached at gsaillan@student.umass.edu

Students from different RSOs gathered together Monday to discuss the art of dance. A group of students followed the discussion by dancing in a line in front of the Student Union.

Ups and downs of 'Control'

Actor portrays the life of Joy Division frontman Ian Curtis

By Kevin Koczwara
Collegian Staff

Anton Corbijn took on the difficult task of portraying Ian Curtis in the movie "Control," with hopes of shedding light on the famous frontman of the legendary post-punk band Joy Division.

Corbijn took on the task for his first-ever feature film. He is more widely known as a photographer and has directed music videos in the past. He is the last photographer to take pictures of Joy Division as a whole before Curtis's suicide at the young age of 23. A tough task to take on when the outcome is already known and Curtis himself is a cult figure of iconic status.

The movie is slow-paced and at times can feel bogged down by the slow, dreary minute details of everyday life. Ian Curtis (portrayed by the wonderful Sam Riley) is often depicted in his bedroom with records playing and a cigarette in hand. He is alone for most of the movie's beginning.

It can feel daunting for an audience when the black-and-white picture dwells on a simple object for much too long, like the opening scene of Ian putting on makeup in front of a mirror and listening to David Bowie.

Some scenes tend to drag on. It can be daunting for any moviegoer not determined to see Ian form into the great front man he would become.

Sam Riley plays Ian Curtis and does it with a certain poise and skill that should be revered and certainly will get him many jobs in the future. Riley is very much unknown to the world, only being in one previous movie ("24 Hour Party People") and a handful of television programs. His vocals and poise on stage are impressive as he and the other members of the faux-Joy Division were asked to perform all the songs live for the film. He hits the baritone voice of Curtis and moves with the awkward hand motions and flailing body parts that Ian possessed on stage.

The movie is not about the formation of Joy Division but about Ian as a person. The side players in the band members. They take a back seat to the inner turmoil and self-destruction. The movie revolves around Curtis' relationship with his wife, whom he marries at a young age. Deborah (played by the charming and humble Samantha Morton) Ian and Deborah struggle to keep a sane household as he ventures off to late-night concerts and is forced to quit his job due to his lack of sleep and overmedication due to his epileptic episodes. The money is tight and the couple is expecting a baby and Ian becomes more detached. The movie stays with Ian as he falls deeper and deeper into a hole.

The concert sequences are by far the best part of the film. Its steady depiction of what a Joy Division show was like in Manchester in the late 1970s. The band itself performs the songs beyond anything any fan of Joy Division could have imagined. They even have the style of the late 1970s to a tee. The smoke infested air and grainy the concert scenes a punk club feel and dark atmosphere that comes through in the band's dark music and Ian's painful lyrics.

The movie is as far from artistic as something like "I'm Not There" in way of the script. The movie lacks a lot of dialogue. The script feels unfinished and rushed. It has only the necessary words and seems to feel like it is only there to further along the beautiful camerawork and acting. It could use some polishing and slow down to allow the actors more words and more meaning in their conversations.

The inner workings of Curtis are deep but he did express him self in music and in his words. There may be a lack of quotes, but it is a movie and the screen writer and director have a certain freedom to give the audience some sort of working between Curtis and his bandmates, manager and even himself.

The most haunting scene is of Curtis writing his final letter to his lover and mistress Annik (played by the beautiful Alexandra Maria Lara).

The scene is gut-wrenching as Curtis pours all of his feelings from his heart to a pen and onto paper. The inner monologue is well done and lets the audience finally see and feel for Curtis rather than dislike him for his withdrawn and lost personality. It is one of the few scenes where the audience finally can see the torment of the man who suffered from epileptic fits, a sense of failure and a wish to be a performer. His anxieties and look into his own marriage and wrongdoings is finally seen in one letter and it may be to late in the film to save the audience, who may not know who Curtis was and what he was struggling with.

The ending is sad but is an known one for any Joy Division fan and Ian Curtis lover. It is as you could have pictured and yet still dark knowing that this band could have been great and they were about make their way across the pond to America.

Kevin Koczwara can be reached at kkoczwar@student.umass.edu

Sam Riley did all of his own singing in the new Ian Curtis biopic "Control." Curtis was the frontman of Joy Division.

CONTROL

STARRING
SAM RILEY

DIRECTED BY
ANTON CORBIJN

B

A glimpse of backstage access at UMass

Costume designer reflects on her years at Fine Arts Center

By Krista Cosco
Collegian Correspondent

As the lights beam down onto the stage at the Fine Arts Center, a performance comes to life. Weeks of preparation for the actors, actresses and directors have been grueling. Lines need to be rehearsed, stage movements need to be perfected and the director needs to be satisfied.

Then there are the costumes – sketches, fittings and designs have been processed. Hours of drawing, sewing and pinning have been performed by costume students, like elves in Santa's workshop.

June Gaeke is their Santa Claus.

As she sits at her confused desk, she talks of her job. Gaeke speaks eloquently and passionately. She has found her niche some years ago. She pours out her pride when speaking of her work. Gaeke is the costume director of the Fine Arts Center and will be pleased to tell anyone about it.

The costume shop is Gaeke's playground. It is where the clothing is actually sewn and created and where fab-boots for her classes take place. The development begins here in the basement of the Fine Arts Center, "where they always put costume studios," she says. With Rembrandt paintings and signs like Laundry Room pasted on the wall, the costume shop is where the magic happens. Mannequins line the room covered in peasant dresses of dirty whites and teal and brown vests for the upcoming play. "The importance of Being Ernest." Large mustard yellow storage bins that look like oversized lockers take up two walls. Fabrics and sewing machines are strewn about and costume design books are like Bibles in the Vatican Library.

The center of the room is a large light wooden table where the majority of the work is completed. Sewing machines bounce up and down as workers furiously sew arms onto a dress or the seam of pants and sayings like "It didn't feel as natural as we have liked" trail out of the mouths of the students. The bright lights shine on these costume designers; this room is their stage and Gaeke is their director.

For 35 years, Gaeke has been the costume director at the Fine Arts Center. As she sits at her cluttered desk filled with papers, books, magazines and a coffee mug from Wisconsin (where she went to college), she recalls with much detail her role in the the after productions at UMass.

"It's a long process," she says.

Gaeke describes what she does from "about 18 weeks out when you begin to read and think about a show and a preliminarily discussion about ideas" to "taking things apart, dry cleaning and putting things back into stock."

The University of Wisconsin Madison art major graduated in 1969 with a MFA in costume design. Gaeke brought her skills to UMass to become "associate professor in charge of costume area," as she likes to call her job. She teaches three to four classes a semester and heads the costume shop directly downstairs from her office at the Fine Arts Center.

"I teach costume design, which is the first designated class after general pre-requisites. It walks everybody through how to think as a designer," says Gaeke. She also teaches higher level classes, including a graduate course.

"The advanced class is more in-depth, more specific skills and fine-tuning. I have always been the one who was teaching costume design and related materials and skills," she says.

The graduate level course allows the students to become more sophisticated and the studio setting allows for design shows to develop there.

Like the costume shop, Gaeke's small office is a comfort zone she shares with director Maryann Lombardi. It is as one would expect, with pictures of black-and-white costumes posted on the wall and boxes and book cases cover much of the ground.

The office is her costume shop. There are large sketch pads filled with costume ideas and bags of shoes, tangerine colored and called "Oomphies." The magazines are eclectic, ranging from JC Penny and Eastbay (an athletic wear catalog) to A Classic Touch (a costume design magazine). A bulletin board on the far-right wall is littered with papers and a few masks are pinned up.

A Louis XVI costume stands in the entranceway to Gaeke's office. It is from a play called "Lesser Pleasures," in which different appearances and identities of a person are examined. The costume is a long blue velvet robe with white fur around the collar. A large silver and gold necklace hangs down onto the midnight blue and a black curls wig sits atop the costume. A mask molded just of the actor's

See COSTUME on page 6

June Gaeke been the costume designer for the performances at the Fine Arts Center, pictured above, for the past 36 years.

DEC 12 2007

Reflection on life at the Fine Arts Center

COSTUME from page 5

face sits in between the wig and robe.

What makes this costume so interesting is actually the back of it — or the lack thereof. The actor was able to walk right into the robe for a quick change and a wire arm permanently held up the actor's right limb. As Gaeke explained this hidden trick, her eyes lit up with excitement. She was still enthralled at what had gone into this piece and pleasure filled her in being able to show someone for the first time.

A short talk can show Gaeke's love for what she does. She says she will take hours to search for the perfect fabrics and materials for her costumes, sometimes if that means traveling to New York. The soft-spoken voice talks of her job with both exactness and heart.

"I don't think you could be in theater if you didn't have passion. The creativity of it gets into your soul," she says.

Gaeke speaks quickly, but stops at times to think of the perfect words. She is genuine in her conversation and in her job.

"I am not very happy when I am not designing," she says. "I like the drawing and rendering process and working out visualizations."

Gaeke is thin but bulked up by layers of clothing in early winter. She wears gray tweed pants that stop short of her black military style boots when her legs are crossed. Dark socks poke out from the top of the boots. Like her pants, her gray hair has a silvery tone and is pinned back by a hobby pin on the right side of her head. She layers a black long sleeved shirt with a brown vest and a long maroon soft wintry scarf drapes from her neck. Wire trim glasses fit loosely on her thin face and a black watch with large numbers is wrapped tightly to her left wrist.

Gaeke's love for her job and affinity for costume making is not always smooth sailing.

"The part I really hate the most are the things that take me out of the costume department," she says. "Also, this is a very people-centered occupation. Interacting with actors and directors can be a very difficult relationship that directly affects the quality of what gets put on stage."

Gaeke admits that clothing somebody is very personal. If the actor or director does not like it, the problems can arise. Putting on a costume gets the performer into character and if the actor is not comfortable, their performance can suffer. And getting a flawless production is what Gaeke truly cares about.

"I hope I have brought a high level of artistic striving, if not achievement, to the quality of costumes that go onto the stage," she says.

June Gaeke has been a staple at UMass for nearly four decades. She is the only person who does what she does. There are no other costume designers at the Fine Arts Center unless they are students of hers. She works meticulously at the three jobs she does.

Krista Cosco can be reached at kcosco@student.umass.edu.

A look inside the comedy life

Comedian Steve Martin and former Monty Python members publish books

By Michaele Mirschel
Collegian Movies Critic

Even among those of us who love comedy and respect it as a fine art, there's a tendency to think, "How hard could it be?"

Stand on a stage with a fake arrow through your head? I could do that. Slap someone in the face with a giant fish? I could do that. Stuff five cats down your pants on live television? I wouldn't want to do that, but I could.

The reality, of course, is that for a comedy artist, there is no such thing as a cheap laugh. Those glorious moments on stage might have been preceded by years of grinding work in dead-end clubs. They may be the product of squabbling with co-workers, struggles with censors, or even some deep psychological need that goes back to childhood.

At least that's what emerges in reflective new works by funnymen Michael Palin and Steve Martin. Their self-portraits differ — Palin is the pointillist, offering tiny bits of information that eventually fill a massive canvas, while Martin paints himself and the landscape around him with surprising directness and clarity. Both men make it clear that becoming a comedy legend takes more than being a clown.

Palin's revelations come in the form of a decade of journal entries. "Diaries 1969-1979: The Python Years" is more than 600 pages documenting, well, everything. As he describes it, "In the course of these diaries I grow up, my family grows up and Monty Python grows up. It was a great time to be alive."

You get the feeling Palin was indeed happy to be alive. Whether because of careful editing or his genuine good nature, he comes across as a genial, but not gossipy, guide to the Monty Python troupe, whose absurdist TV shows, stage acts and movies have won laughs from millions of fans, many of them sober.

He makes it clear the Pythons' success was a result of enough creative tension to explode a flock of giant penguins. He records the personality quirks that almost sank the troupe just as Americans were catching on. He also records how determined the players were to get their comedy right. Who knew that scenes as simple and hilarious as the ex-leper in "Life of Brian" or the Three-Headed Knight in "Holy Grail" could have come so close to the cutting-room floor?

"Diaries" is full of such details. Dallas fans in particular will delight in the details of their 1975 visit: Palin officially credits former KERA program director Ron Devillier as "the man who finally got Monty Python onto American TV."

The diaries' totality is both a weakness and a strength. On the one hand, those who want only Python tidbits will have to pick through details about Palin's home life, his children, his efforts to care for his aging father and many, many descriptions of breakfasts, dinners and cocktails. On the other, he is an excellent diarist, offering insights not just on the Pythons but on the whole decade.

Over that decade, Palin goes from being a 20-something writer/reformer willing to support his family by doing "Hunky Chunks" dog food commercials to hanging with George Harrison at the ex-Beatle's mansion, accepting congratulations for having the top-grossing movie in America. Even Palin seems to shake his head in wonder at how it happened. Fans will be delighted at his description of the journey.

By comparison, Martin's tome, "Born Standing Up: A Comic's Life," is both less daunting and more self-conscious. And even more enjoyable.

The Waco, Texas, native treats readers to all kinds of revelatory tidbits about how he spent his teen years performing tricks at the Disneyland magic shop, which did sell fake-arrow headwear; how an emotionally distant father (something he and Palin could discuss in group therapy) drove him to leave home at 18; how he landed his first regular acting job doing melodrama at Knott's Berry Farm.

Martin is a spare, careful writer who never gets bogged down. His text is full of droll asides, and if his overall tone is melancholy, this is Steve Martin after all. The laughs are never too far away.

But what it took to develop those laughs.

Martin seems to have played at every lousy venue in America, including a drive-in theater in Northern California, where he performed midday "while a dozen cars honked up to the sound system listened through window speakers. If the drive-in patrons thought a joke was funny, they honked."

He eventually started writing for "The Smothers Brothers Comedy Hour" and making the TV talk show rounds. After years of struggle, he was still playing clubs in remote strip malls.

But he was always analyzing his work and developing his own vision of comedy with no punch lines. His book shows how his style evolved, step by step: "I came up with odd little gags such as 'How many people have never raised their hands before?'" and stepping off the stage saying, "I just want to come down into the audience with my people ... Don't touch me!"

His career would soon explode, with appearances on the new "Saturday Night Live" and multimillion-selling albums. But while success made him famous and wealthy, it also made him a prisoner of the stage. And so the book wraps up as he brings his stand-up career to a halt.

Martin is clearly proud of what he has accomplished, but he makes the emotional toll clear: "When I think of the moments of elation I have had over some of my successes, I am astounded at the number of times they have been accompanied by elation's hellish opposite."

In other words, comedy is not pretty. Or easy. But it's at least worthy of respect.

Michael Palin recently published a series of his diary entries from the 1970s in his new book.

Steve Martin has hosted "Saturday Night Live" a record 14 times. He has also hosted the Oscars and is the author of a new memoir.

DEC 12 2007

Write for Arts
arts@dailycollegian.com

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
A grade dispute?
Teacher, roomate or job concerns?
Billing problems?
...or any other University related problems?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course)
Serving the students, faculty, and staff of the Umass Community
823 Campus Center
Office Hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
Telephone: 413 - 545 - 0867
fax: 413 - 545 - 9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

The Daily Collegian WANTS YOU

WE JUST LAUNCHED A NEW CLASSIFIED WEB SITE (UMASSLIST.COM) AND WE ARE LOOKING FOR ONE STUDENT TO SERVE AS THE SALES/MARKETING DIRECTOR TO DRIVE REVENUE AND TRAFFIC TO THE WEB SITE.

WHO ARE WE LOOKING FOR?
YOU, THE COLLEGE STUDENT LOOKING FOR THE BEST SALES AND MARKETING EXPERIENCE AROUND.

WHAT'S IT IN FOR ME?
FOR EVERY PAID LISTING THAT IS PLACED YOU WILL EARN A COMMISSION FROM THE WEB SITE DEVELOPMENT COMPANY, CAMPUS AVE. THE COMPANY WILL PAY YOU 20 PERCENT OF THE COMMISSION YOU EARN FROM THE DAILY COLLEGIAN ON EACH PAID LISTING.

DURATION.
